P R E F A C E.

THIS work was commenced in 1853. From that time to this, the editors have been engaged, with the aid of several regular collaborators, and of numerous contributors of special articles, in its preparation.

The aim of the work is to furnish a book of reference on all the topics of the science of Theology, in its widest sense, under one alphabet. It includes, therefore, not only articles on the Bible and its literature, but also upon all the subjects belonging to Historical, Doctrinal, and Practical Theology. There is no Dictionary in the English language which seeks to cover the same ground, except upon a comparatively small scale. The Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge, published several years since, under the supervision of the Rev. J. Newton Brown, is, indeed, quite comprehensive in its aim; but, as it is confined to a single volume, it could not give full treatment to the vast range of topics embraced in its plan. Besides this, there is but one other attempt in English at a comprehensive Dictionary of Theology, and that, unfortunately, remains incomplete. We refer to the translation of Herzog's Real-Encyklopædie, commenced in 1856 by the Rev. J. H. A. Bomberger, D.D., the publication of which was suspended during the war.*

In the preparation of this Cyclopædia, Dr. STRONG has had exclusive charge of the department of Biblical literature, and for the articles in that field he is responsible. Twenty years ago, before the publication of Kitto's Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, the student of the Bible had no better Dictionary to consult than the various recensions of Calmet. The great work of Dr. Kitto brought together the results of the critical labors of the preceding century, in which Biblical literature had become substantially a new science. Notwithstanding many and grave defects, Kitto's Cyclopædia gave a new impulse to Biblical studies, and supplied a want almost universally felt. The lapse of twenty years, in which vast advances have been made in the literature of the Bible, has made a new edition necessary, and it has been well prepared under the editorship of Dr. Alexander. In the mean time, Smith's Dictionary of the Bible (3 vols. imp. 8vo) has been issued, on a plan somewhat similar to Kitto's Cyclopædia. It is the aim of the present work, as a Dictionary of the Bible, to combine the excellences of both the great works named, and to avoid their faults. Free use is made of their matter, so far as it has been found suitable to our plan;† but every article has been thoroughly revised, and more than half the articles on Biblical topics are entirely original, while most of the others are so in part. We acknowledge similar, though not quite so extensive obligations to Winer's Biblisches Real-wörterbuch, a book whose discrimination and compactness are unrivalled in this branch of literature. It will be perceived that the Biblical department of this Cyclopædia embraces many subjects and names not contained in any of these three works.

For the treatment of all the topics in Systematic, Historical, and Practical Theology, Dr. MCCLINTOCK is responsible. In this field there has heretofore been no copious Dictionary answering to the Bible Dictionaries of Kitto and Smith. The Real-Encyklopædie of Herzog, and Wetzer und Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, have been the fullest sources of material in this form. Besides these, all other Encyclopædias and

* It is to be hoped that the translation of this vast repository of modern theological science may be resumed and completed.

† Due credit is given in, or at the end of each article, for the use made of the works cited. In some instances the above general credit to Kitto and Smith is all that could justly or conveniently be given. We have intended to reproduce all that is valuable in their works.

Dictionaries of importance, both general and special, have been used in the preparation of this work. Every article has either been written de novo, or thoroughly revised, with reference to the more recent literature on each topic. Great pains have been taken with the verification of references, but we cannot hope to have entirely avoided error in this, or in other points of minute detail in so vast a labor.

The whole work is of course prepared from the editors' point of view as to theology, but, at the same time, it is hoped, in no narrow or sectarian spirit.

The articles on the several Christian denominations have either been prepared by ministers belonging to them, or have been submitted to such ministers for examination and correction. Many of the papers on the various branches of Christian art and archaeology are written or revised by Professor GEORGE F. COMFORT. Most of the articles on Bible Societies have been prepared by the Rev. JOSEPH HOLDICH, D.D. Many of the short biographical sketches of ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church are due to the Rev. GEORGE LANSING TAYLOR; of the German Reformed Church, to the Rev. H. HARRAUGH, D.D.; of the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, to Mr. A. MERWIN; of the Prot. Epis. Church, to Mr. W. MAJOR. In this department Dr. Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit have been of great service. Our thanks are due to the Rev. O. H. TIFFANY, D.D., and to Mr. J. K. JOHNSTON, for contributions, especially in Church history and early ecclesiastical biography. Professor ALEXANDER J. SCHEM and Mr. J. N. PROESCHEL (of Paris) have been regular collaborators throughout the work. The articles relating to Roman Catholic topics have all been prepared or revised by Professor Schem, who has also had entire charge of Church and national statistics, and of reading the proofs in all departments of the work except the Biblical. Many of the articles drawn chiefly from German or French sources are due to Mr. Proeschel's careful and intelligent industry, both as compiler and translator. In succeeding volumes, articles will be found from other contributors, whose services were enlisted at a later period in the progress of the work than that covered in this volume.

The literature of the subjects treated has been a special object of care. Our aim has been to give the names of the most important works, both old and new; but we have especially sought, in view of the wants of the majority of those who will probably use this Cyclopædia, to refer, on all essential points, to accessible books, which ordinary students, seeking to enlarge their knowledge, would be likely to fall in with or could readily obtain. It would have been easy to enlarge the lists of books by emptying the works on Bibliography into them, but we have preferred the more laborious, and, we trust, the more satisfactory plan of discrimination and selection.

One of the greatest difficulties of such a task as this is the adjustment of the relative length of the articles. We have sought to keep in mind the relative importance and interest of the various topics as the only safe guide in this respect. Long articles are given on certain of the more important subjects; but we have never sacrificed to this end our chief purpose, viz., to give as complete a vocabulary as possible of all the branches of theological science. This is what, according to our view, is most wanted in a Dictionary. No essay, however elaborate, in a Cyclopædia, can satisfy the wants of the student who seeks to master any special topic; he will and must go beyond the Dictionary to its sources. But students, and even theologians, are in constant need of accurate information upon minor points; and upon all these we have sought to give, in all cases, statements that may be relied upon.

If the work shall be found, in actual use, to have gathered into a convenient and clear summary the mass of knowledge accumulated in its several departments, and shall likewise serve, to some extent at least, to advance the cause of sacred truth, it will have met the expectations of the authors, who have expended upon it many years of earnest toil and solicitude.

A. See ALPHA.

Aädrak. See AAZRAK.

A'älar (Ααλάρ), a person who (or a place from which some of the Jews) returned after the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 36); more correctly called in the parallel list (Neh. vii, 61) IMMER (q. v.).

Aära (אָרָא), a factitious term used by the Rab- bins (Lex. Talm. Aruch, s. v.) as an example of a word beginning with two N's, like AAZRAK (q. v.). In the Talmud, according to Buxtorf (Lex. Talm. col. 2), it is written Arera (אָרָרָא), perhaps only a sing. Chaldae form of the plur. אָרָא (q. v.), light.

A'äron [vulgarly pronounced Ar'on] (Heb. Aha- ron', אָהֲרֹן, derivation uncertain: Gesenius, Thesaur. Heb. p. 33, thinks from the obsolete root אָהֲרֹן, to be libidinous [so the Heb. Lex. Aruch, from אָהֲרֹן, refer- ring (erroneously) to his conception during the Phara- onic edict]; but in his Heb. Lex. s. v. compares with אָהֲרֹן, mountaineer; Fürst, Heb. Handwörterbuch, s. v., makes it signify enlightener, from an obsolete root אָהֲרֹן = אָהֲרֹן, to shine. Sept., N. T., and Josephus, Ἀαρών).

I. History.—Aaron was the eldest son of the Levite Amram by Jochebed, and the brother of Moses (Exod. vi, 20; vii, 7; Num. xxvi, 59); born B.C. 1742. He is first mentioned in the account of Moses' vision of the burning bush (Exod. iv, 14), where the latter was reminded by the Lord that Aaron possessed a high degree of persuasive readiness of speech, and could therefore speak in His name in his behalf. During the absence of Moses in Midian (B.C. 1698-1658), Aaron had married a woman of the tribe of Judah, named Elisheba (or Elizabeth), who had borne to him four sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar; and Eleazar had, before the return of Moses, become the father of Phinehas (Exod. vi, 23-25). Pursuant to an intimation from God, Aaron went into the wilderness to meet his long-exiled brother, and conduct him back to Egypt. They met and embraced each other at the Mount of Horeb (Exod. iv, 27), B.C. 1658. When they arrived in Goshen, Aaron, who appears to have been well known to the chiefs of Israel, introduced his brother to them, and aided him in opening and enforcing his great commission (Exod. iv, 29-31). In the subsequent transactions, Aaron appears to have been almost always present with his more illustrious brother, assist- ing and supporting him; and no separate act of his own is recorded, although he seems to have been the actual instrument of effecting many of the miracles (Exod. vii, 19 sq.). Aaron and Hur were present on the hill from which Moses surveyed the battle which Joshua fought with the Amalekites (Exod. xvii, 10-12); and these two long sustained the weary hands upon whose uplifting (in order to extend the official od, rather than in prayer, see ver. 9) the fate of the battle was found to depend. Afterward, when Moses ascended Mount Sinai to receive the tables of the law, Aaron, with his sons and seventy of the elders, accompanied him part of the way up, and were per- mitted to behold afar off the symbol of the Sacred Presence (Exod. xxiv, 1, 2, 9-11). During the ab- sence of Moses in the mountain the people seem to have looked upon Aaron as their head, and an occa- sion arose which fully vindicates the divine prefer- ence of Moses by showing that, notwithstanding the seniority and greater eloquence of Aaron, he wanted the high qualities which were essential in the leader of the Israelites (see Niemeyer, Charakt. iii, 238 sq.). The people at length concluded that Moses had perished in the fire that gleamed upon the mountain's top, and, gathering around Aaron, clamorously demanded that he should provide them with a visible symbolic image of their God, that they might worship him as other gods were worshipped (Exod. xxxii). Either through fear or ignorance, Aaron complied with their demand; and with the ornaments of gold which they freely offered, cast the figure of a calf (see Kitto's Daily Bible Illust. in loc.). See CALF. However, to fix the meanin- g of this image as a symbol of the true God, Aaron was careful to proclaim a feast to Jehovah for the ensuing day (see Moncaeus, Aaron purgatus sine de vitulo aureo, Atreb. 1605, Franckf. 1675). At this juncture, Moses' reappearance confounded the multitude, who were se- verely punished for this sin. Aaron attempted to ex- cuse himself by casting the whole blame upon the people, but was sternly rebuked by his brother, at whose earnest intercessions, however, he received the divine forgiveness (Deut. ix, 20). During this and a second absence in the mountain, Moses had received instructions regarding the ecclesiastical establishment, the tabernacle, and the priesthood, which he soon afterward proceeded to execute. See TABERNACLE; WORSHIP. Under the new institution Aaron was to be high-priest, and his sons and descendants priests; and the whole tribe to which he belonged, that of Levi, was set apart as the sacerdotal or learned caste. See LEVITE. Accordingly, after the tabernacle had been completed, and every preparation made for the commencement of actual service, Aaron and his sons were consecrated by Moses, who anointed them with the holy oil and invested them with the sacred gar- ments (Lev. viii, ix), B.C. 1657. The high-priest ap- plied himself assiduously to the duties of his exalted office, and during the period of nearly forty years that it was filled by him his name seldom comes under our notice. But soon after his elevation his two eldest sons, Nadab and Abihu, were struck dead for daring, seemingly when in a state of partial inebriety, to con- duct the service of God in an irregular manner, by offering incense with unlawful fire. On this occasion it was enjoined that the priests should manifest none of the ordinary signs of mourning for the loss of those who were so dear to them. To this heavy stroke

Aaron bowed in silence (Lev. x, 1-11). Aaron joined in, or at least sanctioned, the invidious conduct of his sister Miriam, who, after the wife of Moses had been brought to the camp by Jethro, became apprehensive for her own position, and cast reflections upon Moses, much calculated to damage his influence, on account of his marriage with a foreigner—always an odious thing among the Hebrews. For this Miriam was struck with temporary leprosy, which brought the high-priest to a sense of his sinful conduct, and he sought and obtained forgiveness (Num. xii). See MIRIAM. Subsequently to this (apparently B.C. 1620), a formidable conspiracy was organized against Aaron and his sons, as well as against Moses, by chiefs of influence and station—Korah, of the tribe of Levi, and Dathan and Abiram, of the tribe of Reuben. See KORAH. But the divine appointment was attested and confirmed by the signal destruction of the conspirators; and the next day, when the people assembled tumultuously, and murmured loudly at the destruction which had overtaken their leaders and friends, a fierce pestilence broke out among them, and they fell by thousands on the spot. When this was seen, Aaron, at the command of Moses, filled a censer with fire from the altar, and, rushing forward, arrested the plague between the living and the dead (Num. xvi). This was, in fact, another attestation of the divine appointment; and, for its further confirmation, as regarded Aaron and his family, the chiefs of the several tribes were required to deposit their staves, and with them was placed that of Aaron for the tribe of Levi. They were all laid up together over night in the tabernacle, and in the morning it was found that, while the other rods remained as they were, that of Aaron had budded, blossomed, and yielded the fruit of almonds. The rod was preserved in the tabernacle (comp. Heb. ix, 4) as an authentic evidence of the divine appointment of the Aaronic family to the priesthood—which, indeed, does not appear to have been ever afterward disputed (Num. xvii). Aaron was not allowed to enter the Promised Land, on account of the distrust which he, as well as his brother, manifested when the rock was stricken at Meribah (Num. xx, 8-13). When the host arrived at Mount Hor, in going down the Wady Arabah [see EXODUS], in order to double the mountainous territory of Edom, the divine mandate came that Aaron, accompanied by his brother Moses and by his son Eleazar, should ascend to the top of that mountain in the view of all the people; and that he should there transfer his pontifical robes to Eleazar, and then die (Num. xx, 23-29). He was 123 years old when his career thus strikingly terminated; and his son and his brother buried him in a cavern of the mountain, B.C. 1619. See HOR. The Israelites mourned for him thirty days; and on the first day of the month Ab the Jews yet hold a fast in commemoration of his death (Kitto, s. v.). The Arabs still show the traditional site of his grave (Num. xx, 28; xxxiii, 38; Dent. xxxii, 50), which in the time of Eusebius was reputed to be situated in Petra, in the modern Wady Musa (Thomast. s. v. Or: Am. Bib. Repos. 1838, p. 432, 640). He is mentioned in the Koran (Hottinger, Hist. Orient. p. 85 sq.), and the Rabblins have many fabulous stories relating to him (Eisenmenger, Ent. Judenth. i. 342, 855, 864). For Talmudical references, see Real-Encyklop. s. v. For an attempted identification with Mercury, see the Europ. Mag. i. 16. See MOSES.

In Ps. cxxxiii, 2, Aaron's name occurs as that of the first anointed priest. His descendants ("sons of Aaron," Jos. h. xxi, 4, 10, 13, etc.; poetically, "house of Aaron," Ps. cxv, 10, 12; cxviii, 3, etc.) were the priesthood in general, his lineal descendants being the high-priests. See AARONITE. Even in the time of David, these were a very numerous body (1 Chron. xii, 27). The other branches of the tribe of Levi were assigned subordinate sacred duties. See LEVITE. For the list of the pontiffs, including those of the line of Itamar (q. v.), to whom the office was for some reason transferred from the family of the senior Eleazar (see Josephus, Ant. v, 11, 5, viii, 1, 5), but afterward restored (comp. 1 Sam. ii, 30), see HIGH-PRIEST.

II. Priesthood.—Aaron and his sons were invested by Moses with the priestly office, which was to remain in Aaron's line forever (Exod. xxix). This was altogether distinct from the semi-sacerdotal character with which his mere service in the family invested him according to patriarchal usage. The duty and right of sacrificing to God was thereafter reserved to that family exclusively. The high-priesthood was confined to the first-born in succession; and the rest of his posterity were priests, simply so called, or priests of the second order (Ernesti, De Aaron. Wittenb. 1688-9). See SACERDOTAL ORDER.

III. Typical Character.—Aaron was a type of Christ (see Hylander, De Aaron summisque Judoor. pontificibus, Messie typis. Lond. and Goth. 1827)—not, indeed, in his personal, but in his official, character: 1. As high-priest, offering sacrifice; 2. In entering into the holy place on the great day of atonement, and reconciling the people to God; in making intercession for them, and pronouncing upon them the blessing of Jehovah, at the termination of solemn services; 3. In being anointed with the holy oil by effusion, which was prefigurative of the Holy Spirit with which our Lord was endowed; 4. In bearing the names of all the tribes of Israel upon his breast and upon his shoulders, thus presenting them always before God, and representing them to Him; 5. In being the medium of their inquiring of God by Urim and Thummim, and of the communication of His will to them. But, though the offices of Aaron were typical, the priesthood of Christ is of a far higher order. Aaron's priesthood was designed as "a shadow of heavenly things," to lead the Israelites to look forward to "better things to come," when "another priest" should arise, "after the order of Melchizedek" (Heb. vi, 20), and who should "be constituted, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life." (See Hunter, Sacred Elog. p. 2-2 sq.; Evans, Script. Biog. iii, 77; Williams, Characters of O. T. p. 97; Gordon, Christ in the Ancient Church, i, 271.) See PRIEST.

AARON ACHARON (i. e. the younger), a rabbi born at Nicomedia in the beginning of the 14th century. He belonged to the sect of the Caraites. We have from him several Hebrew works on mystical theology (The Tree of Life, The Garden of Faith, The Garden of Eden), and a literal commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled הַרְוֵה הַחַיִּים (vail of the law). — Hoefler, Biographie Générale, i, 6.

AARON HA-ELZON (i. e. the elder), a celebrated rabbi of the sect of the Caraites, practiced medicine at Constantinople toward the close of the 13th century. He had the reputation of being a great philosopher and an honest man. He is the author of an Essay on Hebrew Grammar (מִשְׁכַּל הַלָּשׁוֹן, "perfect in beauty," Constantinople, 1581), and of a Jewish prayer-book according to the rites of the Caraitic sect (סֵפֶר הַתְּפִלָּה, Venice, 1528-29, 2 vols. 4to). He also wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, the first prophets (Joshua, the Judges, Samuel, and the Kings), on Isaiah and the Psalms, and on Job, all of which are still inedited. — Hoefler, Biographie Générale, i, 6.

AARON BEN-ASER, or AARON BAR-MOSES, a celebrated Jewish rabbi, lived in the first half of the 14th century. He is the author of a Treatise on the Accents of the Hebrew Language, printed in 1517. Aaron collected the various readings of the Old Testament in the manuscripts of the libraries of the West, while his collaborator, Ben-Nephthali, searched for various readings in the Eastern libraries. These variations of the text, though purely grammatical, gave rise to two celebrated sects among the Jews—that of the Occidentals, who followed Ben-Aser; and that of the Orientals, which only admitted the authority of Ben-Nephthali. Their editions give for the first time the vowel signs, the invention of which has therefore frequently been ascribed to them. The works of Aaron ben-Aser have been printed, together with those of Moses ben-David, at the end of the Biblia Rabbinica of Venice.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, i, 7.

Aaron ben-Chayim, a celebrated rabbi, born at Fez in the middle of the 16th century. He was the head of the synagogues of Fez and Morocco. In order to superintend the printing of his works, he made, in 1609, a voyage to Venice, where he died soon after. His works are (in Hebrew), The Heart of Aaron, containing two commentaries on Joshua and the Judges (Venice, 1609, fol.); The Offering of Aaron, or remarks on the book Siphra, an ancient commentary on Leviticus (Venice, 1609, fol.); The Measures of Aaron, or an essay on the 13 hermeneutical rules of Rabbi Ismael.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, i, 7; Fürst, Bib. Jud. i, 159.

Aaron ben-Joseph Sason (SCHASCON), a rabbi of Thessalonica, lived at the close of the 16th century. He is the author of several celebrated Jewish works, among which are הור"ה (the law of truth), a collection of 232 decisions on questions relating to sales, rents, etc. (Venice, 1616, fol.); and הפ"ק (the book of truth), explicatory of the Tosephoth of the Gemara (Amsterd. 1706, 8vo).—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, i, 7.

Aaron Zalaha, a Spanish rabbi, died 1293. He is the author of a commentary published under the title Sepher Huchinuk, ul est Liber Institutionis, recensio 613 legis Mosaeicae proceptorum, etc. (in Hebrew, Venice, 1523, fol.)—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, i, 7.

A'aronite (Heb. same as Aaron, used collectively), a designation of the descendants of Aaron, and therefore priests, who, to the number of 3709 fighting men, with Jehoiada the father of Benaiah at their head, joined David at Hebron (1 Chron. xii, 27). Later on in the history (1 Chron. xxvii, 17) we find their chief was Zadok, who in the earlier narrative is distinguished as "a young man mighty of valour." They must have been an important family in the reign of David to be reckoned among the tribes of Israel.—Smith, s. v. See AARON; PRIEST.

Aäzrak (אָזְרַק), a Cabalistic word found in the Talmudic Lexicon Aruch, and apparently invented by the Rabbins in order to correspond to a prohibition found in the Mishna (Shabbath, xii, 3) that no person should write on the Sabbath two letters, this word beginning with the letter z repeated. In the Talmud, however, it is written Aadrak (אָדְרַק). Buxtorf (Lex. Talmud. col. 2) thinks it is merely the Biblical word אָזְרַק, aäzzerka', I will gird thee (Auth. Vers. "I girded thee"), found in Isa. xlv, 5.

Ab (אָב, prob. i. q. "the season of fruit," from אָב, to be fruitful, and apparently of Syriac origin, D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v. comp. אָב; Josephus, Ant. iv, 4, 7), the Chaldee name of the fifth ecclesiastical and eleventh civil month of the Jewish year (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 2); a name introduced after the Babylonian captivity, and not occurring in Scripture, in which this is designated simply as the fifth month (Num. xxxiii, 38; Jer. i, 3; Zech. vii, 3, etc.). It corresponded with the Macedonian month Loüs (Λῴος), beginning with the new moon of August, and always containing thirty days. The 1st day is memorable for the death of Aaron (Num. xxxiii, 38); the 9th is the date (Moses Cozenzis, in Wagenseil's Sota, p. 736) of the exclusion from Canaan (Num. xiv, 30), and the destruction of the Temple by Nebuchadnezzar (Zech. vii, 5; viii, 19; comp. Roland, Antiq. Sacr. iv, 10; but the 7th day, according to 2 Kings xxv, 8, where the Syriac and Arabic read 9th; also the 10th, according to Jer. lii, 12, probably referring to the close of the conflagration, Buxtorf, Synag. Judenth. xxxv), and also by Titus (Josephus, War. vi, 1, 5); the 15th was the festival of the Xylophoria, or bringing of wood into the Temple (Bodenschatz, Kirchliche Verfassung der Juden, ii, 106; comp. Neh. x, 34; xiii, 31; on nine successive days, according to Otho, Lex. Rab. p. 331; on the 14th, according to Josephus, War. ii, 17); the 18th is a fast in memory of the extinction of the western lamp of the Temple during the impious reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxix, 7).—Kitto, s. v. See MONTH.

Ab- (אָב, father), occurs as the first member of several compound Hebrew proper names, e. g. ABNER, ANSALOM, etc. not as a patronymic [see BEN-], or in its literal acceptance, but in a figurative sense, to designate some quality or circumstance of the person named; e. g. possessor of or endowed with; after the analogy of all the Shemitic languages (Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 7; in Arabic generally Abu-, see D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. s. v.). See FATHER; PROPER NAME. Hence it is equally applicable to females; e. g. ABIGAIL (as among the Arabs; comp. Kosegarten, in Ewald's Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, i, 297-317). In all cases it is the following part of the name that is to be considered as the genitive, the prefix אָב being "in the construct," and not the reverse. See AB-.

Ab'acuc (Lat. Abacuc, the Greek text being no longer extant), one of the minor prophets (2 Esdr. [in the Vulg. 4 Esdr.] i, 40), elsewhere HABAKKUK (q. v.).

Abad'don (Αβαδδὼν, for Heb. אָבְדָּן, destruction, i. e. the destroyer, as it is immediately explained by Ἀπολλύων, APOLLYON), the name ascribed to the ruling spirit of Tartarus, or the angel of death, described (Rev. ix, 11) as the king and chief of the Apocalyptic locusts under the fifth trumpet, and as the angel of the abyss or "bottomless pit" (see Critica Biblica, ii, 445). In the Bible, the word abaddon means destruction (Job. xxxi, 12), or the place of destruction, i. e. the subterranean world, Hades, the region of the dead (Job xxvi, 6; xxviii, 22; Prov. xv, 11). It is, in fact, the second of the seven names which the Rabbins apply to that region; and they deduce it particularly from Psa. lxxxviii, 11, "Shall thy loving-kindness be declared in the grave, or thy faithfulness in (abaddon) destruction?" See HADES. Hence they have made Abaddon the nerthemost of the two regions into which they divided the under world. But that in Rev. ix, 11 Abaddon is the angel, and not the abyss, is perfectly evident in the Greek. There is a general connection with the destroyer (q. v.) alluded to in 1 Chron. xxi, 15; but the explanation, quoted by Bengel, that the name is given in Hebrew and Greek, to show that the locusts would be destructive alike to Jew and Gentile, is far-fetched and unnecessary. The popular interpretation of the Apocalypse, which finds in the symbols of that prophecy the details of national history in later ages, has usually regarded Abaddon as a symbol of Mohammed dealing destruction at the head of the Saracenic hordes (Elliott's Horor Apocalypticæ, i, 410). It may well be doubted, however, whether this symbol is any thing more than a new and vivid figure of the same moral convulsions elsewhere typified in various ways in the Revelation, namely, those that attended the breaking down of Judaism and paganism, and the general establishment of Christianity (see Stuart's Comment. in loc.). See REVELATION, BOOK OF. The etymology of Asmodeus, the king of the demons in Jewish mythology, seems to point to a connection with Apollyon in his character as "the destroyer," or the destroying angel. Compare Eccles. xviii, 22, 25. See ASMODEUS.

Abadi'as (Αβαΐαιε), a son of Jazelus, and one of the descendants (or residents) of Joab, who returned with 212 males from the captivity with Ezra (1 Esdr. vii, 35); evidently the same with the OBADIAH (q. v.) of the parallel list (Ezr. viii, 9).

Abad y Queypeo, MANUEL, a Mexican bishop, born in the Asturias, Spain, about 1775. Having become priest, he went to Mexico, where he was at first judge of wills at Valladolid de Mechoacan, and, in 1809, appointed bishop of Mechoacan. Upon the outbreak of the war of independence, Abad favored the national party, and declared himself against the Inquisition. When the restoration of Ferdinand VII was proclaimed, Abad was sent to Spain and imprisoned at Madrid. He succeeded in winning the favor of the king, and was not only released, but appointed minister of justice. In the night following, however, he was again arrested by order of the Grand Inquisitor, and shut up in a convent. He was liberated in consequence of the events of 1820, and elected a member of the provisional junta of the government. Subsequently he was appointed Bishop of Tortosa. In 1823 he was again arrested by order of the Inquisition, and sentenced to six years imprisonment. He died before this time had expired.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, i, 17.

Abag'tha (Heb. Abagtha', אבגתא, prob. Persian [comp. BIGTHA, BIGTHAN, BIGTHANA, BAGOAS], and, according to Bohlen, from the Sanscrit bagadätä, fortune-given; Sept. Ἀβαραθῶ), one of the seven chief eunuchs in the palace of Xerxes, who were commanded to bring in Vashti (Esth. i, 10), B. C. 483.

Abana [many Ab'ana'] (Heb. Abamah', אבאמא; Sept. Ἀβανά; Vulg. Abana; or rather, as in the margin, AMANAH [q. v.]; Heb. Amanah', אמנא [comp. Isa. xxiii, 16], since the latter means perennial; Gesenius, Thesaur. Heb. p. 116), a stream mentioned by Naaman as being one of the rivers of Damascus; another being the Pharpar (2 Kings v, 12). The main stream by which Damascus is now irrigated is called Barada, the Chryssorroas, or "golden stream" of the ancient geographers (Strabo, p. 755), which, as soon as it issues from a cleft of the Anti-Lebanon mountains, is immediately divided into three smaller courses. The central or principal stream runs straight toward the city, and there supplies the different public cisterns, baths, and fountains; the other branches diverge to the right and left along the rising ground on either hand, and, having furnished the means of extensive irrigation, fall again into the main channel, after diffusing their fertilizing influences, and are at length lost in a marsh or lake, which is known as the Bohr el-Merj, or Lake of the Meadow. Dr. Richardson (Travels, ii, 499) states that the "water of the Barada, like the water of the Jordan, is of a white, sulphureous hue, and an unpleasant taste." Some contend that the Barada is the Abana, and are only at a loss for the Pharpar; others find both in the two subsidiary streams, and neglect the Barada; while still others seek the Abana in the small river Fijih, which Dr. Richardson describes as rising near a village of the same name in a pleasant valley fifteen or twenty miles to the north-west of Damascus. It issues from the limestone rock, in a deep, rapid stream, about thirty feet wide. It is pure and cold as iced water; and, after coursing down a stony and rugged channel for above a hundred yards, falls into the Barada, which comes from another valley, and at the point of junction is only half as wide as the Fijih. The Abana or Amana has been identified by some (especially Gesenius, Heb. Lex.) with the Barada, from the coincidence of the name Amana mentioned in Cant. iv, 8, as one of the tops of Anti-Libanus, from which the Chryssorroas (or Barada) flows; and the ruins of Abila, now found on the banks of that stream, are thought to confirm this view. A better reason for this identification is, that Naaman would be more likely to refer to some prominent stream like the Barada, rather than to a small and comparatively remote fountain like the Fijih. See PHARPAR. The turbid character of the water of Barada is no objection to this view, since Naaman refers to Abana as important for its medicinal qualities rather than on account of its limpid coldness. The identification of the Abana with the Barada is confirmed by the probable coincidence of the Pharpar with the Arvaj; these being the only considerable streams in the vicinity of Damascus (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1849, p. 371; Robinson's Researches, new ed. iii, 447). This is the view taken by the latest traveller who has canvassed the question at length (J. L. Porter, in the Jour. of Sacr. Literature, July, 1853, p. 245 sq.). According to Schwarz (Polst. p. 54) the Jews of Damascus traditionally identify the Barada with the Amana (q. v.). The Arabic version of the passage in Kings has Barä. According to Lightfoot (Cant. Chor. iv) the river in question was also called Kirmijon (כִּרְמִיּוֹן), a name applied in the Talmud to a river of Palestine (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 2138). See DAMASCUS.

Abarbanel. See ABRAHENEL.

Ab'arim (Heb. Abarim', אבארִים, regions beyond, i. e. east of the Jordan; Sept. Ἀβαρίμ, but τὸ πέραν in Num. xxvii, 12, Vulg. Abarim; in Jer. xxii, 20, Sept. τὸ πέραν τῆς θαλάσσης, Vulg. transcantes, Auth. Vers. "passages"), a mountain (אֲבָרִים, אֲבָרִים, Num. xxvii, 12; Deut. xxxii, 49), or rather chain of hills (אֲבָרִים אֲבָרִים, Num. xxxiii, 47, 48), which form or belong to the mountainous district east of the Dead Sea and the lower Jordan, being situated in the land of Moab (Num. xxi, 11), on the route to Palestine (Num. xxvii, 12). It was the last station but one of the Hebrews on their way from Egypt to Canaan (Num. xxxiii, 47, 48). See IJE-ABARIM. The range presents many distinct masses and elevations, commanding extensive views of the country west of the river (Irby and Mangles, p. 459). From one of the highest of these, called Mount Nebo, Moses surveyed the Promised Land before he died (Deut. xxxii, 49). From the manner in which the names Abarim, Nebo, and Pisgah are connected (Deut. xxxii, 49, and xxxiv, 1), it would seem that they were different names of the same general mountain chain. See NEBO. According to Josephus, who styles it Abaris (Ἀβαρίμ, Ant. iv, 8, 48), it was "a very high mountain, situated opposite Jericho," and Eusebius (Onomast. Ναβαῦ) locates it six miles west of Heshbon. The name Abarim has been tortured by some disciples of the Faber and Bryant school of etymologists into a connection with the name of a district of Egypt called Abaris or Avaris (Josephus, Apion, i, 14), and so with the system of Egyptian idolatry, from the deity of the same name. Affinities between the names of two of the peaks of this range, Nebo and Peor, have also been traced with those of other Egyptian deities, Anubis and Horis. There is no good foundation for such speculations.

Abäris. See ABARIM; AVARIS.

Abauzit, FIRMIN, a French Unitarian, was born at Uzès, in Languedoc, Nov. 11, 1679. Though his mother was a Protestant, he was forcibly placed in a Roman Catholic seminary, to be educated as a Papist. His mother succeeded in recovering him, and placed him at school in Geneva. At nineteen he travelled into Holland and England, and became the friend of Bayle and Newton. Returning to Geneva, he rendered important assistance to a society engaged in preparing a translation of the New Testament into French (published in 1726). In 1727 he was appointed public librarian in Geneva, and was presented with the freedom of the city. He died at Geneva, March 20, 1767. Though not a copious writer, he was a man of great reputation in his day, both in philosophy and theology. Newton declared him "a fit man to judge between Leibnitz and himself." Rousseau describes him as the "wise and modest Abauzit," and Voltaire pronounced him "a great man." His knowledge was extensive in the whole circle of antiquities, in ancient history, geography, and chronology. His manuscripts were burned after his death by his relatives at Uzes, who had become Romanists; his printed works are collected, in part, in (Œuvres Diverses de Firmin Abauzit (Amsterdam, 1773, 2 vols.). Many of his theological writings are contained in a volume entitled Miscellanies on Historical, Theological, and Critical Subjects, transl. by E. Harwood, D.D. (Lond. 1774, 8vo). A list of his works is given by Haag, La France Protestante, i, 3. See, also, Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, i, 38.

Ab'ba (Αββᾶ, אבבא) is the Hebrew word אב, father, under a form (the "emphatic" or definite state = the father) peculiar to the Chaldee idiom (Mark xiv, 36; Rom. viii, 15; Gal. iv, 6).

1. As such, it was doubtless in common use to express the paternal relation, in the mixed Aramaean dialect of Palestine, during the New Testament age. Especially would it be naturally employed from infancy in addressing the male parent, like the modern papa; hence its occurrence in the New Testament only as a vocative (Winer, Gram. of the New-Test. Diction, § 29). Its reference to God (comp. Jer. iii, 4; John viii, 41) was common among the later Jews (Hamburger, Real-Encyclop. s. v.). To guard against the appearance of too great familiarity, however, the writers of the New Testament, instead of translating the title into its Greek equivalent, πατήρ, have retained it in its foreign form—one of emphasis and dignity; but they have in all cases added its meaning, for the convenience of their merely Greek readers. Hence the phrase "Abba, father" in its two-fold form (Critica Biblica, ii, 445).

2. Through faith in Christ all true Christians pass into the relation of sons; are permitted to address God with filial confidence in prayer; and to regard themselves as heirs of the heavenly inheritance. This adoption into the family of God inseparably follows our justification; and the power to call God our Father, in this special and appropriative sense, results from the inward testimony of our forgiveness given by the Holy Spirit. See ADOPTION.

3. The word Abba in after ages came to be used in the Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic churches, in an improper sense, as a title given to their bishops (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v.), like pater, etc., in Roman Catholic countries. The bishops themselves bestow the title Abba more eminently upon the Bishop of Alexandria; which gave occasion for the people to call him Baba, or Papa, that is, grandfather—a title which he bore before the Bishop of Rome.

Abbadie, JAMES, born in 1654, at Nay, in Bearn, studied at Saumur and Sedan. His proficiency was so early and so great, that at seventeen he received the title of D.D. from the Academy at Sedan. In 1676 he accepted an invitation from the Elector of Brandenburg, and was for some time pastor of the French Protestant church at Berlin. The French congregation at Berlin was at first but thin; but upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes great numbers of the exiled Protestants retired to Brandenburg, where they were received with the greatest humanity; so that Dr. Abbadie had in a little time a great charge, of which he took all possible care; and, by his interest at court, did many services to his distressed countrymen. The Elector dying in 1688, Abbadie accepted a proposal from Marshal Schomberg to go with him to Holland, and afterward to England with the Prince of Orange. In the autumn of 1689 he accompanied the Marshal to Ireland, where he continued till after the Battle of the Boyne, in 1690, in which his great patron was killed. This occasioned his return to London, where he was appointed minister of the French church in the Savoy. Some years after, he was made Dean of Killaloe, in Ireland, and died at London, 1727. His chief work is his Traité de la Vérité de la Religion Chrétienne (Rotterd. 1692, 2 vols. 12mo), which has passed through several editions, and has been translated into several languages (in English, Lond. 1694-8, 2 vols. 8vo). Madame de Sévigné called it "the most charming of books;" and, though written by a Protestant, it found just favor among French Romanists, and even at the court of Louis XIV. His other principal writings are: Réflexions sur la Présence du Corps de Jésus Christ dans l'Eucharistie; Les Caractères du Chrétien et du Christianisme; Traité de la Divinité de Notre Seigneur Jésus Christ; L'Art de se connaître (Rotterd. 1692, translated into different languages); La Vérité de la Religion Réformée (Rotterd. 1718, 2 vols. 8vo); Le Triomphe de la Providence et de la Religion, an explanation of a portion of the Apocalypse (Amst. 1723, 4 vols. 12mo); Accomplishment of Prophecy in Christ (Lond. new ed. 1840, 12mo). A full list of his writings is given by Haag, La France Protestante, i, 7.—Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, i, 38.

Abbas. Two different authors are frequently quoted by this title.

1. A celebrated canonist who flourished in 1250, and wrote a Commentary on the Five Books of Decretals, printed at Venice in 1588, folio. He is known as Abbas antiquus.

2. The celebrated Nicholas Tuleschi, the Panormitan, known as Abbas Siculus or Abbas junior. See PANORMITAN.

Abbé, the French name for abbot (q. v.). It is used in France not only to designate the superior of an abbey, but is also the general title of the secular clergy. Before the French Revolution it was even sometimes assumed by theological students (unordained) in the hope that the king would confer upon them a portion of the revenues of some abbey. There were at one time in France so many unordained abbés, poor and rich, men of quality and men of low birth, that they formed a particular class in society, and exerted an important influence over its character. They were seen everywhere; at court, in the halls of justice, in the theatres, the coffee-houses, etc. In almost every wealthy family was an abbé, occupying the post of familiar friend and spiritual adviser, and not seldom, that of the gallant of the lady. They corresponded, in a certain degree, to the philosophers who lived in the houses of the wealthy Romans in the time of the emperors.

Abbé commendataire. See ABBOTT.

Abbess (Lat. abbatissa), the superior or head of an abbey of nuns, bearing the same relation to them as the abbot to the monks. An abbess possesses in general the same dignity and authority as an abbot, except that she cannot exercise the spiritual functions appertaining to the priesthood (Conc. Trident. Sess. xxv, c. vii). Generally the abbess must be chosen from the nuns of the same convent; she must be sprung from legitimate marriage, must be over forty years old, and must have observed the vows for eight years. In case of emergency, however, any nun of the order who is thirty years old, and has professed five years, may be elected. In Germany fifteen abbesses (of Essen, Elten, Qu-dlinburg, Herford, Gandersheim, etc.) had formerly the right of sending a representative to the German Diet, and possessed a kind of episcopal jurisdiction, which they exercised through an official. After the Reformation the superiors of several German abbess, which were changed into Protestant institutions of ladies living in common, retained the title "abbess." See ABLEY; ABBOT.

Abbey (Lat. abbatia), a monastery of monks or nuns, ruled by an abbot or abbess [for the derivation of the name, see ABBOT]. The abbeys in England were enormously rich. All of them, 190 in number, were abolished in the time of Henry VIII. The abbey lands were afterward granted to the nobility, under which grants they are held to the present day. Cranmer begged earnestly of Henry VIII to save some of the abbeys for religious uses, but in vain.

In most abbeys, besides the Abbot, there were the following officers or obediuntarii, removable at the abbot's will:

1. Prior, who acted in the abbot's absence as his locum tenens. In some great abbeys there were as many as five priors.
2. Eleemosynarius, or Almoner, who had the oversight of the daily distributions of alms to the poor at the gate.
3. Pitantarius, who had the care of the pitances, which were the allowances given on special occasions over and above the usual provisions.
4. Sacrista, or Sacristan (Sexton), who had the care of the vessels, vestments, books, etc.; he also provided for the sacrament, and took care of burials.
5. Camerarius, or Chamberlain, who looked after the dormitory.
6. Cellararius, or Cellarer, whose duty it was to procure provisions for strangers.
7. Thesaurarius, or Bursar, who received rents, etc.
8. Precentor, who presided over the choir.
9. Hospitalarius, whose duty it was to attend to the wants of strangers.
10. Infirmarius, who attended to the hospital and sick monks.
11. Refectionarius, who looked after the hall, and provided every thing required there.

For the mode of electing abbots, right of visitation, etc., see Conc. Trident. Sess. xxiv. On the most important English abbeys, see Willis, History of Mitred Abbeys vol. i; A. Butler, Lives of Saints, ii, 633. See CONVENT; MONASTERY; PRIORY.

Abbo, Abbot of Fleury, in France, born 958, slain in a tumult at Roole, in Gascony, 1064. He presided two years (985-987) over a monastic school in England, and returned to Fleury, where he was made abbot. He was so celebrated for his wisdom and virtues that people, even in far-distant parts, had recourse to him for advice and assistance, especially in all questions relating to monastic discipline, his zeal for which caused the tumult in which he was slain.—Neander, Abbot (Lat. abbās; from Chaldee אַבְבָּא, the father), the head or superior of an abbey of monks.

1. The title was originally given to every monk, but after the sixth century was restricted to the heads of religious houses. At a later period the title was not confined to the superiors of monasteries, but was also given to the superiors of other institutions (as abbas curie, palatii, scholarum, etc.), while, on the other hand, several other terms, as provost, prior, guardian, major, rector, etc., were adopted to designate the superiors of the convents of the several orders. The Greek Church uses generally the term archimandrite (q. v.). The name abbot was especially retained by the order of the Benedictines, and its branches, the Cistercians, Bernhardines, Trappists, Grandmontanes, Præmonstratenses. But the congregation of Clugny (q. v.) reserved the title abbot to the superior of the principal monastery, calling those of the other monasteries coabbates and proabbates. The Abbot of Monte-Cassino assumed the title abbas abbatum. A number of religious orders are governed by an abbot-general, e. g. (according to the Notizie per l'Anno 1859, the Official Roman Almanac), the regular canons of Laceran, the Camaldulenses, the Trappists, the Olivetans, the (Oriental) order of St. Antonius, and the Basilians. Regular abbots are those who wear the religious habit, and actually preside over an abbey, both in spiritual and temporal matters. Secular abbots are priests who enjoy the benefices, but employ a vicar (q. v.) to discharge its duties. Lay abbots are laymen to whom the revenues of abbeys are given by princes or patrons. Field abbots (abbates castrensis) are regular abbots appointed for army service. Arch abbot is the title of the abbot of St. Martin, in Hungary. The abbots are, in general, subject to the jurisdiction of the diocesan bishop, but formerly some were exempt, and had even a kind of episcopal jurisdiction (jurisdictio quasi episcopalis), together with the right of wearing episcopal insignia (mitred abbots, abbates mitrati). Some, as the abbot of St. Maurice, in Switzerland, have even a small territory. Abbots with episcopal jurisdiction have the right of taking part in general councils, and the right of voting in provincial synods. The privileges and duties of abbots are determined by the rules of the order to which they belong, as well as by canonical regulations.

Costume of an English Mitred Abbot.

The commendatory abbots (abbates commendatarii; Fr. abbés commendataires), in France and England, were secular ecclesiastics, to whom abbeys were given in commendam, who enjoyed a portion of the revenues, together with certain honors, but without jurisdiction over the inmates of the abbeys. This became latterly so common that most abbeys were thus held perpetually in commendam. In England many abbots, among other privileges, had the right of sitting in the House of Lords. According to Fuller (Ch. Hist. b. vi, p. 292, ed. 1655), there were sixty-four abbots and thirty-six priors, besides the Master of the Temple summoned to Parliament, which he terms "a jolly number." Edward III reduced them to twenty-six. In Germany, ten prince-abbots (of Fulda, Corvey, etc.) were members of the German Diet till 1803. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. b. vii, ch. iii; Conc. Trident. Sess. xxv, and, for full details, Martene, De Ant. Monach. Rit. lib. v. The forms for the benefaction of abbots (i. q. inauguration) are given in Boissomet, Dict. des Cérémonies, i, 22 sq.

2. The title of Abbot is still used in some Protestant countries. In Germany it is sometimes conferred upon divines, especially if they enjoy the revenues of former abbeys. Thus the late Professor Lücke of Göttingen was an abbot.

Abbot, Abiel, D.D., a Unitarian minister, born in Wilton, N. H., Dec. 14, 1765. He graduated at Harvard, 1787, was assistant in the Phillips Andover Academy from 1787 to 1789, and became pastor of Coventry, Conn., 1795. Having been brought up a Trinitarian Calvinist, Mr. Abbot became, 1792, a decided anti-Trinitarian, and, in 1811, was deposed by the Consociation of Tolland County from the ministry on account of heretical doctrines. From Sept. 1811 to 1819, he had charge of Dummer Academy, and from 1827 to 1839 he was pastor of Peterborough, N. H. He received the degree of D.D. from Harvard in 1838, and died Dec. 31, 1859. He published in 1811 a "Statement of the Proceedings in his Church at Coventry which terminated in his Renoual," and some occasional pamphlets.—Sprague, Unitarian Pulpit, p. 229 sq.

Abbot, Abiel, D.D., a Unitarian minister, born at Andover, Mass., Aug. 17, 1770. He graduated at Harvard, 1792, and was pastor at Haverhill from 1794 to 1803, and at Beverly from 1803 until 1826. His health failing, he spent the winter of 1827-8 in Charleston, S. C., and in Cuba, but died just as the ship reached quarantine at New York, June 7, 1828. He was a man of taste and culture, and an eloquent preacher. His Letters from Cuba were published after his death (Boston, 1829, 8vo); and also a volume of Sermons, with a Memoir by Everett (Boston, 1831, 12mo).—Sprague, Unitarian Pulpit, p. 309 sq.

Abbot, George, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury, brother of Robert (inf.), one of the translators of the English Bible, and a man of great ability and learning, was born at Guildford, October 29, 1562, and entered at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1578; subsequently was made Master of University College, and, in 1599, Dean of Winchester. At the university he was first brought into contact with Alp. Laud, whose ecclesiastical schemes he opposed through life. In 1604, Dr. Abbot was the second of eight learned divines at Oxford, chosen by King James, to whom the care of translating all (but the Epistles of) the New Testament was committed. In 1608, he assisted in a design to unite the churches of England and Scotland; in which his prudence and moderation raised him high in the favor of the king, who bestowed upon him successively the bishoprics of Lichfield (1609) and of London (1610). In 1611 his majesty elevated him to the See of Canterbury. As archbishop, he had the courage to displease the king by opposing the Book of Sports, the divorce of the Countess of Essex, and the Spanish match. In 1627, he ventured the displeasure of Charles I, by refusing to license a sermon, which Dr. Sibthorpe had preached, to justify one of Charles's unconstitutional proceedings. For this act he was suspended from his functions, but was soon, though not willingly, restored to them. A cause of deep sorrow to him, in his latter days, was his having accidentally, while aiming at a deer, shot one of Lord Zouch's keepers. He died in 1633. He was a Calvinist in theology, and, unfortunately, very intolerant toward Arminians and Arminianism. His Life, with that of his brother Thomas, was published at Guildford (1797, 8vo). His chief works are: Six Lectures on Divinity (Oxford, 1598, 4to); Exposition of the Prophet Jon h (1600, 4to, new ed. Lond. 1845, 2 vols. with Life); A brief Description of the World (Lond. 1617, 4to, et al.); Treatise of the perpetual Visibility and Succession of the true Church (1624, 4to); Judgment of the Archbishop concerning Bowing at the Name of Jesus (Hamburg, 1632, 8vo).—Middleton, Evening Biog.; Collier, Ecc. Hist. vol. ii; Neal, Hist. of Puritans, i, 556; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. iii, 469.

Abbot, Robert, D.D., Bishop of Salisbury, was born at Guildford, in Surrey, in 1560, took the degrees of M.A. in 1582, and that of D.D. in 1597. He won the good opinion of James I by a work in confutation of Bellarmine and Suarez, in defence of the royal authority, and was soon after made Master of Balliol College, and Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford. As Vice-chancellor of the University, he favored the Calvinistic theology, and opposed Laud to the utmost. In 1615 he was appointed by his brother (then Archbishop of Canterbury) to the bishopric of Salisbury, which, however, he enjoyed but a short time, and died on the 2d of March, 1617. His works are: 1. Mirror of Popish Subtilties (Lond. 1591, 4to); 2. Antichristi Demonstratio, contra Fabulos Pontificias, etc. (1603, 4to); 3. Defence of the Reformed Catholic of W. Perkins against Dr. W. Bishop (1606, 1609, 4to); 4. The Old Way, a Sermon (1610, 4to); 5. The true Ancient Roman Catholic (1611, 4to); 6. Antilogia (against the Apology of the Jesuit Eudemon, for Henry Garnett, 1613, 4to); 7. De Gratia et Perseverantia Sanctorum (1618, 4to); 8. De amissione et intercessionis Justificationis et Gratia (1628, 4to); 9. De Suprema Potestate Regis (1619, 4to). He left in MS. a Latin commentary on Rouans which is now in the Bodleian Library.—Middleton, Ecc. Biog.

Abbott, BENJAMIN, one of the most laborious and useful of the pioneer Methodist preachers in America, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1732, and died 1796. He preached for twenty years with great zeal and success, chiefly in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. Though an illiterate man, he was earnest, eloquent, enthusiastic, and self-sacrificing, and thousands were added to the Church through his labors.—Firth, Life of B. Abbott (N. Y., 12mo); Minutes of Conferences, i, 68; Stevens, Hist. of M. E. Ch. i, 382 sq.; Sprague, Annals, vii, 41.

Abbreviation, or the use of one or two initials for the whole of a word. These first occur, in a Scriptural connection, on some of the Maccabean coins (Bayer, De nummis Hebræo-Samaritanis), and in a few MSS. of the O. T. (especially $\text{כ} \text{ה}$ for $\text{כ} \text{ה} \text{נ}$). They have been frequently resorted to for the purpose of explaining supposed discrepancies or various readings, both in words (Eichhorn, Eindeit. ins A. T. i, 323; Drusius, Quest. Ebraicæ, iii, 6) and numbers (Vignoles, Chronologie, pass.; Capellus, Critica Sacra, i, 10; Scaliger, in Walton's Prolegomena, vii, 14; Kenicott's Dissertations), on the theory that letters were employed for the latter as digits (Faber, Litteræ alæ pro vocibus attributæ, Onold, 1775), after the analogy of other Oriental languages (Gesenius, Gesch. d. Heb. Sprache, p. 173). In later times the practice became very common with the Rabbinis (Selig's Compendia vocum Hebræico-Rabbinicorum; also Collectio abbreviatarum Hebræicarum, Iypt., 1781), and was abused for cabalistical purposes (Danz, Rabbinismus Encelatus). An instance of its legitimate numerical use occurs in Rev. xiii, 18 (Eichhorn, Eindeit. ins N. T. iv, 199), and the theory has been successfully applied to the solution of the discrepancy between Mark xv, 25, and John xix, 14 (where the Greek γ [gamma=3] has doubtless been mistaken for τ [stigma=6]).—Kitto, s. v.

Abbreviator, a clerk or secretary employed in the Papal Court to aid in preparing briefs, bulls, etc. They were first employed by Benedict XII in the 14th century. Many eminent men have filled the office. Pius II (Æneas Sylvius) was an abbreviator for the Council of Basle.

Ab'da (Heb. Abda', אבדה [a Chaldaizing form], the servant, i. e. of God), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Ἀβδά.) The father of Adoniram, which latter was an officer under Solomon (1 Kings iv, 6). B.C. ante 995.

2. (Sept. Ἀβδῆας.) The son of Shamma and a Levite of the family of Judthum, resident in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. xi, 17); elsewhere called OBDIAH (q. v.), the son of Shemaiah (1 Chron. ix, 16).

Abdas, a Persian bishop during the reign of Yezdegerd (or Isdegerdes), King of Persia, under whom the Christians enjoyed the free exercise of their religion. Abdas, filled with ill-directed zeal, destroyed (A.D. 414) one of the temples of the fire-worshippers; and being ordered by the monarch to rebuild the temple, refused to do so, although warned that, if he persisted, the Christian temples would be destroyed. Yezdegerd put the bishop to death, and ordered the total destruction of all the Christian churches in his dominions; upon which followed a bitter persecution of the Christians, which lasted thirty years, and was the occasion of war between Persia and the Roman empire. In the Romish and Greek Churches he is commemorated as a saint on May 16. See Socrat, Ch. Hist. vii, 18; Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 110; Theod. Hist. Eccl. v, 39; Butler, Lives of Saints, May 16.

Ab'deël (Heb. Abde'el, אבדעל, servant of God; Sept. Ἀβδειλ), the father of Shelemaiah, which latter was one of those commanded to apprehend Jeremiah (Jer. xxxvi, 26). B.C. ante 605.

Ab'di (Heb. Abdi', אבדי, my servant; or, according to Gesenius, for אבדיה, servant of Jehoahaz; but, according to Fürst, properly אבדיה, bondman), the name of three men.

1. (Sept. Ἀβδι v. r. Ἀβδῆ.) A Levite, grandfather of one Ethan, which latter lived in the time of David (1 Chron. vi, 44). B.C. considerably ante 1014.

2. (Sept. Ἀβδι.) A Levite, father of one Kish (different from Kishi, a son of the preceding), which latter assisted in the reformation under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix, 12). B.C. ante 726.

3. (Sept. Ἀβδῆας.) An Israelite of the "sons" of Elam, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 26), B.C. 459.

Abdias, the name of two men.

1. Abd'as (Lat. Abdus, the Greek text not being extant), one of the minor prophets (2 Esdr. [Vulg. 4 Esdr.], i, 39), elsewhere called OBDIAH (q. v.).

2. Ab'dias, of Babylon, is said to have flourished about the year 59, and to have been one of the seventy disciples; but his very existence is somewhat doubtful. The work attributed to him, viz. Historia Certaminis Apostolici, in ten books, was written in the 8th or 9th century. It may be found in Fabricii Cod. Apocryph. Nov. Test. ii, 388; and was published also by Lazius (Basle, 1551, and Paris, 1660). A German translation is given in Barbery, Bibliothek d. N.-T. Apokryphen (Stuttg. 1841), p. 391 sq.—Gieseler, Ch. Hist. i, 67; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 59; Baronius, Annal. ann. 44.

Ab'diel (Heb. Abdi'el, אבדיעל, servant of God; Sept. Ἀβδειλ), a son of Guni and father of Abi, one of the chief Galites resident in Gilead (1 Chron. v, 15), B.C. between 1093 and 782.

Ab'don (Heb. Abdon, אבדון, אבדון, servile; Sept. Ἀβδών), the name of four men and one city.

1. The son of Hillel, a Pirathonite, of the tribe of Ephraim, and the twelfth Judge of Israel for eight years, B.C. 1233-1225. His administration appears to have been peaceful (Ἀβδών, Josephus, Ant. v, 7, 15); for nothing is recorded of him but that he had forty sons and thirty nephews, who rode on young asses—a mark of their consequence (Judg. xii, 13-15). He is probably the BEDAN referred to in 1 Sam. xii, 11.

2. The first-born of Jehiel, of the tribe of Benjamin, apparently by his wife Maachah, and resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 30; ix, 36). B.C. ante 1093.

3. The son of Micah, and one of the persons sent by King Josiah to ascertain of the prophetess Huldah the meaning of the recently-discovered book of the Law (2 Chron. xxxiv, 20), B.C. 628. In the parallel passage (2 Kings xxii, 12) he is called ACUMOR, the son of Michaiah.

4. A "son" of Shashak, and chief Benjamite of Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 23), B.C. ante 598.

5. A Levitical town of the Gershonites, in the tribe of Asher, mentioned between Mishal or Mashal and Helkath or Hukkok (Josh. xxi, 30; 1 Chron. vi, 74). The same place, according to several MSS., is mentioned in Josh. xix, 28, instead of HEBRON (Ireland, Paläst. p. 518). Under this latter form Schwarz (Paläst. p. 192) identifies it with a village, Ebra, which he affirms lies in the valley of the Leontes, south of Kulat Shakif; perhaps the place by the name of Abnon marked in this region on Robinson's map (new ed. of Researches). It is probably identical with the ruined site Abdeh, 8 or 9 miles N.E. of Accho (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 280).

Abecedarians (Abecedarii), a branch of the sect of Anabaptists, founded by Stork, once a disciple of Luther, who taught that all knowledge served to hinder men from attending to God's voice inwardly instructing them; and that the only means of preventing this was to learn nothing, not even the alphabet, for the knowledge of letters served only to risk salvation. See ANABAPTISTS.

Abecedarian hymns or psalms—psalms, the verses of which commence with the consecutive letters of the alphabet. See ACROSTIC. In imitation of the 119th Psalm, it was customary in the early Church to compose psalms of this kind, each part having its proper letter at the head of it: the singing of the verses was commenced by the precentor, and the people joined him in the close. Occasionally they sang alternate verses. This mode of conducting the psalmody was sometimes called singing acrostics and acrotelics, and is the apparent origin of the Gloria Patri repeated at the end of each psalm in modern liturgical services. See CHORUS. Some of the psalms of David are abecedarian, and others so constructed as to be adapted to the alternate song of two divisions of precentors in the Temple. See PSALMS. The priests continued their services during the night, and were required occasionally to utter a cry to intimate that they were awake to duty. Psalm cxxxiv appears to be of this order. The first watch address the second, reminding them of duty. "Behold, bless ye the Lord, all ye servants of the Lord, which by night stand in the house of the Lord. Lift up your hands in the sanctuary, and bless the Lord." The second respond, "The Lord that made heaven and earth bless thee out of Zion." This custom was probably introduced into the Christian church from the Hebrew service, and was intended to aid the memory. Hymns, composed in this manner, embodying orthodox sentiments, were learned by the people, to guard them against the errors of the Donatists (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. xiv, 1, 12). See HYMN; PSALTER.

Abed'-nego (Heb. Abed' Negro', אבד נגו, servant of Nego, i. e. of Nebo, or the Chaldaic Mercury, Dan. i, 7, and Chald. id. אֲבֵל מֶרְכּוּר; Sept. and Josephus Ἀβελμεργῶ, the Chaldee name imposed by the king of Babylon's officer upon AZARIAH (q. v.), one of the three companions of Daniel (Dan. ii, 49; iii, 12-30). With his two friends, Shadrach and Meshach, he was miraculously delivered from the burning furnace, into which they were cast for refusing to worship the golden statue which Nebuchadnezzar had caused to be set up in the plain of Dura (Dan. iii). He has been supposed by some to be the same person as Ezra; but Ezra was a priest of the tribe of Levi (Ezra vii, 5), while this Azariah was of the royal blood, and consequently of Judah (Dan. i, 3, 6).

Abeel, David, D.D., an eminent missionary, was born at New Brunswick, N. J., June 12th, 1804, studied theology at the seminary in that place, and in 1826 was licensed to preach in the Dutch Reformed churches. In October, 1829, he sailed for Canton as a chaplain of the Seamen's Friend Society; but at the end of a year's labor placed himself under the direction of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He visited Java, Singapore, and Siam, studying Chinese, and laboring with much success, when his health failed him entirely, and he returned home in 1833 by way of England, visiting Holland, France, and Switzerland, and everywhere urging the claims of the heathen. In 1838 he again returned to Canton. The "opium war" preventing his usefulness there, he visited Malacca, Borneo, and other places, and settled at Kolongsoo. His health giving way once more, he returned in 1845, and died at Albany, Sept. 4, 1846. He published Journal of Residence in China, in 1829-1833 (N. Y. 8vo); The Missionary Convention at Jerusalem (N. Y. 1833, 12mo); Claims of the World to the Gospel (N. Y. 1838). See Williamson, Memoirs of the Rev. D. Abeel (N. Y. 1849, 18mo); Amer. Missionary Memorial, p. 338.

Abeel, John Nelson, D.D., a minister of the Reformed Dutch Church, who was born in 1769, graduated in 1787 at Princeton, and was licensed to preach in April, 1793. In 1795 he became one of the clergy of the Collegiate Dutch Church in New York, where he continued until his death in 1812. He was an eloquent preacher, and a man of great and deserved influence.

Abel (Heb. אֲבֵל, אֲבֵל, a breath, i. q. transitory; as Gesenius [Heb. Lex.] thinks, from the shortness of his life; or, as Kitto [Daily Bible Illust.] suggests, perhaps i. q. vanity, from the maternal cares experienced during the infancy of Cain; Sept. and N. T. Ἀβελ; Josephus, Ἀβελος), the second son of Adam and Eve, slain by his elder brother, Cain (Gen. iv, 1-16), B. C. cir. 4945. See ADAM.

I. History.—Cain and Abel, having been instructed, perhaps by their father, Adam, in the duty of worship to their Creator, each offered the first-fruits of his labors: Cain, as a husbandman, the fruits of the field; Abel, as a shepherd, fatlings of his flock (see Fritzsche, De Sacrificiis Caini et Abelis, Lips. 1751). God was pleased to accept the offering of Abel, in preference to that of his brother (Heb. xi, 4), in consequence of which Cain, giving himself up to envy, formed the design of killing Abel; which he at length effected, having invited him to go into the field (Gen. iv, 8, 9; comp. 1 John iii, 12). See CAIN. The Jews had a tradition that Abel was murdered in the plain of Damascus; and accordingly his tomb is still shown on a high hill near the village of Sinic or Seneiah, about twelve miles northwest of Damascus, on the road to Baalbek (Jerome, in Ezech. xxxvii). The summit of the hill is still called Nebi Abel; but circumstances lead to the probable supposition that this was the site, or in the vicinity of the site, of the ancient Abela or Abila (Pococke, East, ii, 168 sq.; Schubert, Reis. iii, 286 sq.). See ABILA. The legend, therefore, was most likely suggested by the ancient name of the place (see Stanley, Palest. p. 405). See ABEL-. (For literature, see Wolf, Cure in N. T., iv, 749.)

II. Traditional Views.—Ancient writers abound in observations on the mystical character of Abel; and he is spoken of as the representative of the pastoral tribes, while Cain is regarded as the author of the nomadic life and character. St. Chrysostom calls him the Lamb of Christ, since he suffered the most grievous injuries solely on account of his innocency (Ad Stag. ii, 5); and he directs particular attention to the mode in which Scripture speaks of his offerings, consisting of the best of his flock, "and of the fat thereof," while it seems to intimate that Cain presented the fruit which might be most easily procured (Hom. in Gen. xviii, 5). St. Augustin, speaking of regeneration, alludes to Abel as representing the new or spiritual man in contradistinction to the natural or corrupt man, and says, "Cain founded a city on earth; but Abel, as a stranger and pilgrim, looked forward to the city of the saints which is in heaven" (De Civitate Dei, xv, 1). Abel, he says in another place, was the first-fruits of the Church, and was sacrificed in testimony of the future Mediator. And on Psa. cxviii (Serm. xxx, § 9) he says: "This city" (that is, "the city of God") "has its beginning from Abel, as the wicked city from Cain." Irenæus says that God, in the case of Abel, subjected the just to the unjust, that the righteousness of the former might be manifested by what he suffered (Contra Hæres. iii, 23). Heretics existed in ancient times who represented Cain and Abel as embodying two spiritual powers, of which the mightier was that of Cain, and to which they accordingly rendered divine homage. In the early Church, Abel was considered the first of the martyrs, and many persons were accustomed to pronounce his name with a particular reverence. An obscure sect arose under the title of Abelites (q. v.), the professed object of which was to inculcate certain fanatical notions respecting marriage; but it was speedily lost amidst a host of more popular parties. For other mythological speculations respecting Abel, see Buttmann's Mythologus, i, 55 sq.; for Rabbinical traditions, see Eisenmenger, Entdeckt. Judenth. i, 462 sq., 832 sq.; for other Oriental notices, see Koran, v, 35 sq.; Hottinger, Hist. Orient. p. 24 sq.; comp. Fabric. Pseudopigr. i, 113; other Christian views may be seen in Irenæus, v, 67; Cedrenus, Hist. p. 8 (Kitto).

The general tenor of these Eastern traditional fictions is that both Cain and Abel had twin sisters, and that Adam determined to give Cain's sister to Abel, and Abel's sister to Cain in marriage. This arrangement, however, did not please Cain, who desired his own sister as a wife, she being the more beautiful. Adam referred the matter to the divine arbitration, directing each brother to offer a sacrifice, and abide the result. Abel presented a choice animal from his flock, and Cain a few poor ears of grain from his field. Fire fell from heaven and consumed Abel's offering without smoke, while it left Cain's untouched. Still more incensed at this disappointment, Cain resolved to take his brother's life, who, perceiving his design, endeavored to dissuade him from so wicked an act. Cain, however, cherished his malice, but was at a loss how to execute it, until the devil gave him a hint by a vision of a man killing a bird with a stone. Accordingly, one night he crushed the head of his brother, while sleeping, with a large stone. He was now at a loss how to conceal his crime. He enclosed the corpse in a skin, and carried it about for forty days, till the stench became intolerable. Happening to see a crow, which had killed another crow, cover the carcass in a hole in the ground, he acted on the suggestion, and buried his brother's body in the earth. He passed the rest of his days in constant terror, having heard a voice inflicting this curse upon him for his fratricide. (See D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, s. v. Cabil.)

III. Character of his Offering.—The superiority of Abel's sacrifice is ascribed by the Apostle Paul to faith (Heb. xi, 4). Faith implies a previous revelation: it comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. It is probable that there was some command of God, in reference to the rite of sacrifice, with which Abel complied, and which Cain disobeyed. The "more excellent sacrifice" was the firstlings of his flock; in the offering of which there was a confession that his own sins deserved death, and the expression of a desire to share in the benefits of the great atonement which, in the fulness of time, should be presented to God for the sins of man. By his faith he was accepted as "righteous," that is, was justified. God testified, probably by some visible sign—the sending of fire from heaven to consume the victim (a token that justice had seized upon the sacrifice instead of the sinner)—that the gift was accepted. Cain had no faith; his offering was not indicative of this principle. Although it is doubtful whether we can render the clause in God's expostulation with him—"sin lieth at the door"—by the words, "a sin-offering lieth or croucheth at the door," that is, a sin-offering is easily procured, yet the sin of Cain is clearly pointed out; for though he was not a keeper of sheep, yet a victim whose blood could be shed as a typical propitiation could without difficulty have been procured and presented. The truths clearly taught in this important event are, confession of sin; acknowledgment that the penalty of sin is death; submission to an appointed mode of expiation: the vicarious offering of animal sacrifice, typical of the better sacrifice of the Seed of the woman; the efficacy of faith in Christ's sacrifice to obtain pardon, and to admit the guilty into divine favor (Wesley, Notes on Heb. xi, 4). The difference between the two offerings is clearly and well put by Dr. Magee (On the Atonement, i, 58-61): "Abel, in firm reliance on the promise of God, and in obedience to his command, offered that sacrifice which had been enjoined as the religious expression of his faith; while Cain, disregarding the gracious assurances which had been vouchsafed, or, at least, disclaiming to adopt the prescribed method of manifesting his belief, possibly as not appearing to his reason to possess any efficacy or natural fitness, thought he had sufficiently acquitted himself of his duty in acknowledging the general superintendence of God, and expressing his gratitude to the supreme Benefactor, by presenting some of those good things which he thereby confessed to have been derived from His bounty. In short, Cain, the first-born of the fall, exhibits the first-fruits of his parents' disobedience, in the arrogance and self-sufficiency of reason, rejecting the aids of revelation, because they fell not within his apprehension of right. He takes the first place in the annals of Deism, and displays, in his proud rejection of the ordinance of sacrifice, the same spirit which, in later days, has actuated his enlightened followers in rejecting the sacrifice of Christ." See SACRIFICE. There are several references to Abel in the New Testament. Our Saviour designates him "righteous" (Matt. xxiii, 35; comp. 1 John, iii, 12). He ranks among the illustrious elders mentioned in Heb. xi. According to Heb. xii, 24, while the blood of sprinkling speaks for the remission of sins, the blood of Abel for vengeance: the blood of sprinkling speaks of mercy, the blood of Abel of the malice of the human heart.—Watson, *Inst. Abel, THOMAS. See ABLE.

Abel- (Heb. Abel', אַבֶּל, a name of several villages in Palestine, with additions in the case of the more important, to distinguish them from one another (see each in its alphabetical order). From a comparison of the Arabic and Syriac, it appears to mean fresh grass; and the places so named may be conceived to have been in peculiarly verdant situations (Gesenius, Theb. Heb. p. 14; see, however, other significations in Lengerke, Kanaan, i, 358; Hengstenberg, Pentat. ii, 261). See ABILA.

In 1 Sam. vi, 18, it is used as an appellative, and probably signifies a grass plain. In this passage, however, perhaps we should read (as in the margin) אֶבֶן, stone, instead of אַבֶּל, Abel, or meadow, as the context (verses 14, 15) requires, and the Sept. and Syriac versions explain; the awkward insertion of our translators, "the great [stone of] Abel," would thus be unnecessary.

In 2 Sam. xx, 14, 18, ABEL stands alone for ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH (q. v.).

Abéla. See ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH.

Abélard, PIERRE [or Abaelard, Abaillard, Abellhardus], born at Le Pallet, or Palais, near Nantes, 1079, was a man of the most subtle genius, and the father of the so-called scholastic theology. In many respects he was far in advance of his age. After a very careful education, he spent part of his youth in the army, and then turned his attention to theological study, and had for his tutor in logic, at thirteen years of age, the celebrated Roscelin, of Compiègne. He left Palais before he was twenty years of age, and went to Paris, where he became a pupil of William of Champeaux, a teacher of logic and philosophy of the highest reputation. At first the favorite disciple, by degrees Abéard became the rival, and finally the antagonist of Champeaux. To escape the persecution of his former master, Abéard, at the age of twenty-two, removed to Melun, and established himself there as a teacher, with great success. Thence he removed to Corbeil, where his labors seem to have injured his health; and he sought repose and restoration by retirement to Palais, where he remained a few years, and then returned to Paris. The controversy was then renewed, and continued till Champeaux's scholars deserted him, and he retired to a monastery. Abéard, having paid a visit to his mother at Palais, found on his return to Paris in 1113 that Champeaux had been made Bishop of Chalons-sur-Marne. He now commenced the study of divinity under Anselm at Laon. Here also the pupil became the rival of his master, and Anselm at length had him expelled from Laon, when he returned to Paris, and established a school of divinity, which was still more numerous attended than his former schools had been. Guizot says, "In this celebrated school were trained one pope (Celestine II), nineteen cardinals, more than fifty bishops and archbishops, French, English, and German; and a much larger number of those men with whom popes, bishops, and cardinals had often to contend, such men as Arnold of Brescia, and many others." The number of pupils who used at that time to assemble round Abéard has been estimated at upward of 500."

Abéard was about thirty-five when he formed an acquaintance with Héloïse, the niece of Fulbert, a canon in the Cathedral of Paris. She was probably under twenty. He contracted with her a secret and unlawful connection, the fruit of which was a son named Peter Astrolabus. Soon after Abéard married Héloïse; but the marriage was kept secret, and, at the suggestion of Abéard, Héloïse retired into the convent of Argenteuil, near Paris, where she had been, as a child, brought up. The relatives of Héloïse, enraged at this, and believing that Abéard had deceived them, revenged themselves by inflicting the severest personal injuries upon him. He then, being forty years old, took the monastic vows at S. Denys, and persuaded Héloïse to do the same at Argenteuil. From this time he devoted himself to the study of theology, and before long published his work Introductio ad Theologiam, in which he spoke of the Trinity in so subtle a manner that he was openly taxed with heresy. Upon this he was cited to appear before a council held at Soissons, in 1121, by the pope's legate, where, although he was convicted of no error, nor was any examination made of the case, he was compelled to burn his book with his own hands. After a brief detention at the abbey of St. Medard, he returned to his monastery, where he quarrelled with his abbot, Adamus, and the other monks (chiefly because he was too good a critic to admit that Dionysius, the patron saint of France, was identical with the Areopagite of the same name mentioned in the Acts), and retired to a solitude near Nogent-sur-Seine, in the diocese of Troyes, where, with the consent of the bishop, Hatto, he built an oratory in the name of the Most Holy Trinity, which he called Paraclete, and dwelt there with another clerk and his pupils, who soon gathered around him again. His hearers, at various periods, were numbered by thousands. Being called from his retreat (A.D. 1125) by the monks of St. Gildas, in Bretagne, who had elected him their abbot, he abode for some time with them, but was at length compelled to flee from the monastery (about 1134) to escape their wicked designs upon his life, and took up his abode near Paraclete, where Heloise and her nuns were at that time settled. About the year 1140, the old charge of heresy was renewed against him, and by no less an accuser than the celebrated Bernard of Clairvaux, who was his opponent in the council held at Sens in that year. Abelard, seeing that he could not expect his cause to receive a fair hearing, appealed to Rome, and at once set out upon his journey thither. Happening, however, on his route, to pass through Cluny, he was kindly received by the abbot, Peter the Venerable, by whose means he was reconciled to Bernard, and finally determined to pass the remainder of his days at Cluny. He died April 21, 1142, aged sixty-three years, at the monastery of S. Marcel, whither he had been sent for his health.

As Bernard was the representative of Church authority in that age, so Abelard was the type of the new school of free inquiry, and of the use of reason in theology. His philosophy was chiefly, if not wholly, dialectic. In the controversy between the Realists and the Nominalists he could be classed with neither: his position was the intermediate one denoted by the modern term Conceptualism. In theology he professed to agree with the Church doctrines, and quoted Augustine, Jerome, and the fathers generally, as authorities; but held, at the same time, that it was the province of reason to develop and vindicate the doctrines themselves.

"At the request of his hearers he published his Introduction ad Theologiam; but in accordance with the stand-point of theological science in that age, the idea of Theologia was confined, and embraced only Dogmatics. The work was originally, and remained a mere fragment of the doctrines of religion. He agreed so far with Anselm's principles as to assert that the Intellectus can only develop what is given in the Fides; but he differs in determining the manner in which Faith is brought into existence; nor does he recognize so readily the limits of speculation, and, in some points, he goes beyond the doctrinal belief of the Church; yet the tendency of the rational element lying at the basis, and his method of applying it, are different. The former was checked in its logical development by the limits set to it in the Creed of the Church; many things also are only put down on the spur of the moment. The work not only created a prodigious sensation, but also showed traces of a preceding hostility."

He treated the doctrine of the Trinity (in his Theologia Christiana) very boldly, assuming "unity in the Divine Being, along with diversity in his relations (relationum diversitas), in which consist the Divine Persons. He also maintains a cognition of God (as the most perfect and absolutely independent Being), by means of the reason, which he ascribes to the heathen philosophers, without derogating from the incomprehensibility of God. He also attempted to explain (in his Ethica), on philosophical principles, the chief conceptions of theological morality, as, for instance, the notions of vice and virtue. He made both to consist in the mental resolution, or in the intention; and maintained, against the moral conviction of his age, that no natural pleasures or sensual desires are in themselves of the nature of sin. He discovered the evidence of the morality of actions in the frame of mind and maxims according to which those actions are undertaken." A pretty clear view of Abelard's theology is given by Neander, Hist. of Christian Dogmas, 478 sq (transl. by Ryland, Lond. 1858, 2 vols.). Abelard founded no school, in the proper sense of the word; the results of his labors were critical and destructive, rather than positive. The later scholastics, however, were greatly indebted to him, especially as to form and method. His writings are as follows: Epistole ad Heloisam, 4; Epistole alie ad diversos; Historia Calamitatum suarum, Apologia; Expositio Oratorum Dominicæ; Expositio in Symbolum Apostolorum; Expositio in Symbolum Athanasii; Solutiones Problematum Heloise; Adversus Hæreses liber; Commentarium in Epistolam ad Romanos, libri 5; Sermones 32; Ad Heloisam cjusque Virgines Paracletenses; Introductio ad Theologiam, libri 3; Epitome Theologie Christianæ.

The philosophy and theology of Abelard have been recently brought into notice anew; in fact, the means of studying them fully have only of late been afforded by the following publications, viz.: Abelardi Epitome Theologie Christianæ, nunc primum edita F. H. Rheinwald (Berlin, 1855); Cousin's edition of his Ouvrages inédits (Paris, 1836, 4to); by the excellent Vie d'Abelard, par C. Remusat (Paris, 1845, 2 vols.); and by P. Abelardi Sic et Non, primum ed. Henke et Lindenkolh (Marburg, 1851, 8vo). The professedly complete edition of his works by Ambrosius (Paris, 1616, 4to) does not contain the Sic et Non. Migne's edition (Patrologiæ, tom. 178) is expurgated of certain anti-papal tendencies. A complete edition in three vols. 4to, was begun in 1859 by MM. Cousin, Jourdain, and Despois. See Berington, History and Letters of Abelard and Heloise (Lond. 1784, 4to); Neander, Ch. Hist. iv, 373; Met. Quar. Review, articles Instauratio Novæ, July and Oct. 1853; Böhringer, Kircheng. in Biog. vol. iv; *Presb. A'bel-beth-ma'achah (Heb. אֵבֶל בֵּית־מַאֲחָה Beyth-Maachah, Sept. Ἀβὴλ οἶκος Μαχά in 1 Kings xv, 20, Ἀβὴλ Βαθμαχά v. r. Βαμαχά in 2 Kings xv, 29), a city in the north of Palestine, in the neighborhood of Dan, Kadesh, and Hazor. It seems to have been of considerable strength from its history, and of importance from its being called "a mother in Israel" (2 Sam. xx, 19), i. e., a metropolis; for the same place is doubtless there meant, although peculiarly expressed (ver. 14, אֵבֶל בֵּית־מַאֲחָה, toward Abel and Beth-Maachah, Sept. sic Ἀβὴλ καὶ εἰς Βαθμαχά, Vulz. in Abelam et Beth-Maachah, Auth. Vers. "unto Abel and to Beth-Maachah;" ver. 15, אֵבֶל בֵּית־מַאֲחָה, in Abelch of the house of Maachah, Sept. εἰς Ἀβὴλ Βαθμαχά, Vulz. in Abela et in Beth-maachah, Auth. Vers. "in Abel of Beth-maachah"). See BETH-MAACHAH. The same place is likewise once denoted simply by ABEL (2 Sam. xx, 18); and in the parallel passage (2 Chron. xvi, 4),

ABEL-MAIM, which indicates the proximity of a fountain or of springs from which the meadow, doubtless, derived its verdure. See ABEL-. The addition of "Maachah" marks it as belonging to, or being near to, the region Maachah, which lay eastward of the Jordan under Mount Lebanon. See MAACHAH. It was besieged by Joab on account of its having sheltered Sheba, the son of Bichri, a Benjamite, who had rebelled against David; but was saved from an assault by the prudence of a "wise woman" of the place, who persuaded the men to put the traitor to death, and to throw his head over the wall; upon which the siege was immediately raised (2 Sam. xx, 14-22). At a later date it was taken and sacked by Benhadad, king of Syria; and 200 years subsequently by Tiglath-pileser, who sent away the inhabitants captives into Assyria (2 Kings xx, 29). The name Behmen (Βελμίν), mentioned in Judith (iv, 4), has been thought a corruption of Abel-maim; but the place there spoken of appears to have been much more southward. Josephus (Ant. vii, 11, 7) calls it Abel machai (Ἀβελμαχία), or (Ant. viii, 12, 4) Abellane (Ἀβελλανή); and Theodoret (Quest. 39 in 2 Reg.) says it was still named Abela (Ἀβελᾶ). Ireland (Palæst. p. 520) thinks it is the third of the cities called Abela mentioned by Eusebius (Onomast.) as a Phœnician city between Damascus and Paneas; but Gesenius (Theol. Heb. p. 15) objects that it need not be located in Galilee (Harenberg, in the Nor. Miscel. Lips. iv, 470), and is, therefore, disposed to locate it farther north. See ABILA. Calmet thinks it, in like manner, the same with Abila of Lysanias. But this position is inconsistent with the proximity to Dan and other cities of Naphtali, implied in the Biblical accounts. It was suggested by Dr. Robinson (Researches, iii, Appendix, p. 137) that Abil el-Karub, in the region of the Upper Jordan, is the ancient Abel-Beth-Maachah; this conclusion has recently been confirmed almost to certainty by Mr. Thomson (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1846, p. 202). It is so productive in wheat as to be called likewise Abil el-Kamch (ib. p. 204). This place "is situated on the west side of the valley and stream that descends from Merj-Ayun toward the Huleh, and below the opening into the Merj. It lies on a very distinctly marked tell, consisting of a summit, with a large offset from it on the south" (Rev. E. Smith, ib. p. 214). It is now an inconceivable village, occupying part of the long oval mound (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 324 sq.). This identification essentially agrees with that of Schwarz (Palæst. p. 65), although he seeks to find in this vicinity three towns of the name of Abel (Palæst. p. 203), for the purpose of accommodating certain Rabbinical notices. (See Reineccius, De urbe Abcl. Weissenfels, 1725.)

A'bel-cera'mim (Heb. Abel' Keramim', אַבֶּל כְּרָמִים, meadow of vineyards; Sept. Ἀβελ κεραιμώνων; Vulg. Abel que est vineis cœnsita; Auth. Vers. "plain of the vineyards"), a village of the Ammonites whither the victorious Jephthah pursued their invading forces with great slaughter; situate, apparently, between Aroer and Minnith (Judg. xi, 33). According to Eusebius (Onomast. Ἀβελ), it was still a place rich in vineyards, 6 (Jerome 7) Roman miles from Philadelphia or Rabboth-Ammon; probably in a south-westerly direction, and perhaps at the present ruins Merj (meadow) Elksh. The other "wine-bearing" village Abel mentioned by Eusebius, 12 R. miles E. of Gadara, is probably the modern Abil (Bitter, Erdk. xv, 1058); but cannot be the place in question, as it lies north of Gilead, which Jephthah passed through on his way south from Manassah by the way of the Upper Jordan. See ABILA.

Abelites, Abelians, or Abelonians, a sect of heretics who appeared in the diocese of Hippo, in Africa, about the year 370. They insisted upon marriage, but permitted no carnal conversation between man and wife, following, as they said, the example of Abel, and the prohibition in Gen. ii, 17. When a man and woman entered their sect they were obliged to adopt a boy and girl, who succeeded to all their property, and were united together in marriage in a similar manner. Augustine says (De Her. cap. 87) that in his time they had become extinct. The whole sect was at last reduced to a single village, which returned to the Church. This strange sect is, to some extent, reproduced in the modern Shakers.—Mosheim, Ch. Hist. c. ii, pt. ii, ch. v, § 18.

Abellâne. See ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH.

Abelli, Louis, Bishop of Rodez (South France), was born at Vez, 1604. He was made bishop in 1664, but resigned in three years, to become a monk in the convent of St. Lazare, at Paris. He was a violent opposer of the Jansenists, and author of a system of Dogmatic Theology, entitled Medulla Theologica (published in Mayence, 1839), and also of Vie de St. Vincent de Paul, &c. He was an ardent advocate of the worship of the Virgin Mary, and wrote, in its defence, La Tradition de l'Église touchant le culte de la Vierge, 1652, 8vo. He died in his convent in 1691.

Abelmachëa. See ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH.

A'bel-ma'ïm (Heb. Abel Ma'ïm, אַבֶּל מַאִיִּם, meadow of water; Sept. Ἀβελμαίμ, Vulg. Abelmáim), one of the cities of Naphtali captured by Benhadad (2 Chron. xvi, 4); elsewhere (1 Kings xv, 20) called ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH (q. v.).

Abelmëa. See ABEL-MEHOIAH.

A'bel-meho'lah (Heb. Abel' Meholah', אַבֶּל מְחֹלָה, meadow of dung; Sept. Ἀβελμειολᾶ and Ἀβελμαωνᾶ, Vulg. Abelmehala and Abelméur), a place not far from the Jordan, on the confines of Issachar and Manassah, in the vicinity of Beth-shittah, Zeredah, and Tabbath, whither Gideon's three hundred picked men pursued the routed Midianites (Judg. vii, 22). It was the birthplace or residence of Elisha the prophet (1 Kings xix, 16), and lay not far from Beth-shean (1 Kings iv, 12); according to Eusebius (Onom. Ἰ. Βηθσαῦδα), in the plain of the Jordan, 16 (Jerome 10) Roman miles south, probably the same with the village Abelmea mentioned by Jerome (ibid. Eusebius less correctly Ἀβελ μεία) as situated between Scythopolis (Bethshean) and Neapolis (Shechem). It is also alluded to by Epiphanius (whose text has inaccurately Ἀβελμαούδ v. r. Ἀμειονῶν), and wrongly locates it in the tribe of Reuben, and (as Ἀβελμαούδ) in the Paschal Chronicle (see Ireland, Palæst. p. 522). It was probably situated not far from where the Wady el-Maleh (which seems to retain a trace of the name) emerges into the Aulon or valley of the Jordan; perhaps at the ruins now called Kharbet esh-Shuk, which are on an undulating plain beside a stream (Van de Velde, Narrative, ii, 340). This appears to agree with the conjectural location assigned by Schwarz (Palæst. p. 159), although the places he names do not occur on any map.

A'bel-miz'raim (Heb. Abel' Mitsra'ïm, אַבֶּל מִצְרַיִם, meadow of Egypt; but which should probably be pointed מִצְרַיִם אַבֶּל, E'bel Mitsra'ïm, mourning of the Egyptians, as in the former part of the same verse; and so appear to have read the Sept. πένθος Αἰγυπτίων, and Vulg. Planctus Egypti), a place beyond (i. e. on the west bank of) the Jordan, occupied (perhaps subsequently) by the threshing-floor of Atad, where the Egyptians performed their seven days' mourning ceremonies over the embalmed body of Jacob prior to interment (Gen. i, 11). See ATAD. Jerome (Onomast. Area Atad) places it between Jericho and the Jordan, at three Roman miles distance from the former and two from the latter, corresponding (Ireland, Palæst. p. 522) to the later site of BETH-HOGLAH (q. v.).

A'bel-shit'tim (Heb. Abel' hash-Shittim', אֲבֵל־שִׁטִּים, מֵדֵבֶר, meadow of the acacias; Sept. Ἀβελσαρτιμ, Vulg. Abel-satim), a town in the plains of Moab, on the east of the Jordan, between which and Beth-Jesimoth was the last encampment of the Israelites on that side the river (Num. xxxiii, 49). See EXODE. The place is noted for the severe punishment which was there inflicted upon the Israelites when they were seduced into the worship of Baal-Peor, through their evil intercourse with the Moabites and Midianites. See BAAL. Eusebius (Onomast. Sarrēn) says it was situated near Mount Peor (Reland, Palest., p. 520). In the time of Josephus it was a town embosomed in palms, still known as Abila or Abile (Αβίλα or Ἀβίλη), and stood sixty stadia from the Jordan (Ant. iv, 8, 1; v, 1, 1). Rabbinical authorities assign it the same relative position (Schwarz, Palest., p. 229). It is more frequently called SHITTIM merely (Num. xxv, 1; Josh. ii, 1; Mic. vi, 5). From the above notices (which all refer to the sojourn of the Israelites there), it appears to have been situated nearly opposite Jericho, in the eastern plain of Jordan, about where Wady Seir opens into the Ghor. The acacia-groves on both sides of the Jordan still "mark with a line of verdure the upper terraces of the valley" (Stanley, Palestine, p. 292), and doubtless gave name to this place (Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii, 17).

Abendana (i. e. Son of Dana), JACOB, a Jewish rabbi, born in Spain about 1630, died in London in 1696. He was rabbi first in Amsterdam, and from 1685 till his death in London. He translated into Spanish the book of Cusari as well as the Mishna, with the commentaries of Maimonides and Bartenora. His Spicilegium rerum preteritarum et intermissarum contains valuable philological and critical notes to the celebrated Michlal Jophi (Amsterdam, 1685). A selection from his works appeared after his death, under the title Discourses of the Ecclesiastical and Civil Polity of the Jews (Lond. 1706).

Aben-Ezra (otherwise ABEN-ESDRA, or IEN-ESRA, properly, ABRAHAM BEN-MEIR), a celebrated Spanish rabbi, called by the Jews the Sage, the Great, etc., was born at Toledo in 1092. Little is known of the facts of his life; but he was a great traveller and student, and was at once philosopher, mathematician, and theologian. His fame for varied and accurate learning was very great in his own day, and has survived, worthily, to the present age. He died at Rome, Jan. 23, 1167. De Rossi, in his Hist. Dict. of Hebrew Writers (Parma, 1802), gives a catalogue of the writings attributed to him. Many of them still exist only in MS. A list of those that have been published, with the various editions and translations, is given by Fürst in his Bibliotheca Judaica (Lpz. 1849, i, 251 sq.). A work on astronomy, entitled תְּחִלַּת הַחֵכֶם (the Beginning of Wisdom), partly translated from the Arabic and partly compiled by himself, greatly contributed to establishing his reputation (a Latin translation of it is given in Wolf, Bibliotheca Hebraica, t. iii). He also wrote a "Commentary on the Talmud," and another work on the importance of the Talmud, entitled יְסוּד הַתּוֹרָה (the Basis of Instruction), several times printed (in German, F. ad M. 1840). His most important work consists of "Commentaries on the Old Testament" (פְּרִישֵׁי טַב, in several parts), a work full of erudition. Bomberg, Buxtorf, and Moses Frankfurter included it in their editions of Hebrew texts and annotations of the Bible (Venice, 1526; Basil, 1618-19; Amst. 1724-7). His "Commentary on the Pentateuch" (פְּרִישֵׁי הַתּוֹרָה) is very rare in its original form (fol. Naples, 1488; Constantinople, 1514), but it has often been reprinted combined with other matter, overlaid by later annotations, or in fragmentary form. None of the other portions of his great commentary have been published separately from the Rabbinical Bibles, except in detached parts, and then usually with other matter and translated. Aben-Ezra usually wrote in the vulgar Hebrew or Jewish dialect; but that he was perfectly familiar with the original Hebrew is shown by some poems and other little pieces which are found in the preface to his commentaries. The works of Aben-Ezra are thoroughly philosophical, and show a great acquaintance with physical and natural science. He also wrote several works on Hebrew Grammar (especially מִצְוֵי תַּבְרִיחַ, Augsb. 1521, 8vo; מִצְוֵי תַּבְרִיחַ, Ven. 1546, 8vo; מִצְוֵי תַּבְרִיחַ, Constpl. 1530, 8vo), most of which have been re-edited (by Lippmann, Heidenheim, etc.) with Heb. annotations. Some of his arithmetical and astronomical works have been translated into Latin.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale.

Abercrombie, James, D.D., an Episcopal divine and accomplished scholar, was born in Philadelphia in 1758, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, 1776. He then studied theology, but, on account of an injury to his eyes, he entered into mercantile pursuits in 1783. In 1793 he was ordained, and became associate pastor of Christ Church in 1794. From 1810 to 1819 he was principal of the "Philadelphia Academy." In 1833 he retired on a pension, and died at Philadelphia, June 26, 1841, the oldest preacher of that Church in the city. He was distinguished as well for eloquence and liberality as for learning. He wrote Lectures on the Catechism (1807), and published a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, v, 394.

Abercrombie, John, M.D., author of Enquiries concerning the Intellectual Powers, published 1830, and the Philosophy of the Moral Feelings, published 1833, was born at Aberdeen, Nov. 11, 1781, and attained the highest rank as a practical and consulting physician at Edinburgh. He became Lord Rector of Marischal College, Aberdeen, 1835. Besides the works above named, he wrote Essays and Tracts on Christian Subjects (Edinb. 18mo); Harmony of Christian Faith and Character (reprint from preceding, N. Y. 1845, 18mo). He died Nov. 14, 1844.—Quart. Rev. xlv, 341.

Aberdeen (Aberdonia Duvana), the seat of a Scotch bishopric, formerly suffragan to the Archbishopric of St. Andrew. The bishopric was transferred to Aberdeen about the year 1130, by King David, from Murthillack, now Mortick, which had been erected into an episcopal see by Malcolm II in the year 1010, Beancus, or Beyn, being the first bishop.

ABERDEEN, BREVIARY OF. While Romanism prevailed in Scotland, the Church of Aberdeen had, like many others, its own rites. The missal, according to Palmer, has never been published; but an edition of the breviary was printed in 1509.—Palmer, Orig. Liturg. i, 188, who cites Zaccaria, Biblioth. Ritibus, tom. i; A. Butler, Lives of Saints, i, 113.

Abernethy, JOHN, an eminent Presbyterian divine, educated at the University of Glasgow, and afterward at Edinburgh. Born at Coleraine, in Ireland, 1680; became minister at Antrim in 1708, and labored zealously for twenty years, especially in behalf of the Roman Catholics. The subscription controversy, which was raised in England by Hoadley, the famous Bishop of Bangor, and the agitation of which kindled the flames of party strife in Ireland also, having led to the rupture of the Presbytery of Antrim from the General Synod in 1726, Abernethy, who was a warm supporter of the liberal principals of Hoadley, lost a large number of his people; and these having formed a new congregation, he felt his usefulness so greatly contracted that, on his services being solicited by a church in Wood Street, Dublin, he determined to accept their invitation. Applying himself with redoubled energy to his ministerial work, he soon collected a numerous congregation. His constitution failed under his excessive labors, and he died suddenly in December, 1740. His discourses on the being and attributes of God have always been held in much esteem. His works are: 1. Discourses on the Being and Perfections of God (Lond. 1743, 2 vols. 8vo); 2. Sermons on various Subjects (Lond. 1748-'51, 4 vols. 8vo); 3. Tracts and Sermons (Lond. 1751, 8vo).

Abēsār. See ABĒZ.

Abesta. See AVĒSTA.

Abeyance signifies expectancy, probably from the French bayer, to gape after. Lands, dwelling-houses, or goods, are said to be in abeyance when they are only in expectation, or the intentment of the law, and not actually possessed. In the Church of England, when a living has become vacant, between such time and the institution of the next incumbent, it is in abeyance. It belongs to no parson, but is kept suspended, as it were, in the purpose, as yet undeclared, of the patron.

Ab'ez (Heb. E'βets, אֶבֶז, in pause אֶבֶז, A'βets, lustre, and hence, perhaps, En; Sept. Αβηζ, Vulg. Abes), a town in the tribe of Issachar, apparently near the border, mentioned between Kishion and Remeth (Josh. xix, 20). It is probably the Abesar (Αβέσαρος) mentioned by Josephus (Ant. vi, 13, 8) as the native city of the wife whom David had married prior to Abigail and after his deprivation of Michal; possibly referring to Abinoam the Jezreelitess (1 Sam. xxv, 43), as if she had been so called as having resided in some town of the valley of Esdraelon. According to Schwarz (Palest. p. 167), "it is probably the village of Kunbūz, called also Karm en-Ab'ez, which lies three English miles west-south-west from Iksal;" meaning the Khunējis or Ul'huējis of Robinson (Researches, iii, 167, 218), which is in the general locality indicated by the associated names.

Abgārus (ABAGARUS, AGBARUS; sometimes derived from the Arabic Akbar, "greater," but better from the Armenian Avag, "great," and air, "man;" see Ersch and Gruber, s. v. Abgar), the common name of the petty princes (or Toparchs) who ruled at Edessa in Mesopotamia, of one of whom there is an Eastern tradition, recorded by Eusebius (Evel. Hist. i, 13), that he wrote a letter to Christ, who transmitted a reply. Eusebius gives copies of both letters, as follows:

"Abgarus, Prince of Edessa, to Jesus, the merciful Saviour, who has appeared in the country of Jerusalem, greeting. I have been informed of the prodigies and cures wrought by you without the use of herbs or medicines, and by the efficacy only of your words. I am told that you enable cripples to walk; that you force devils from the bodies possessed; that there is no disease, however incurable, which you do not heal, and that you restore the dead to life. These wonders persuade me that you are some god descended from heaven, or that you are the Son of God. For this reason I have taken the liberty of writing this letter to you, beseeching you to come and see me, and to cure me of the indisposition under which I have so long labored. I understand that the Jews persecute you, murmur at your miracles, and seek your destruction. I have here a beautiful and agreeable city which, though it be not very large, will be sufficient to supply you with every thing that is necessary."

To this letter it is said Jesus Christ returned him an answer in the following terms: "You are happy, Abagarus, thus to have believed in me without having seen me; for it is written of me, that they who shall see me will not believe in me, and that they who have never seen me shall believe and be saved. As to the desire you express in receiving a visit from me, I must tell you that all things for which I am come must be fulfilled in the country where I am; when this is done, I must return to him who sent me. And when I am departed hence, I will send to you one of my disciples, who will cure you of the disease of which you complain, and give life to you and to those that are with you." According to Moses of Chorene (died 470), the reply was written by the Apostle Thomas.

Eusebius further states that, after the ascension of Christ, the Apostle Thomas sent Thaddæus, one of the seventy, to Abgar, who cured him of leprosy, and converted him, together with his subjects. The documents from which this narrative is drawn were found by Eusebius in the archives of Edessa. Moses of Chorene relates further that Abgarus, after his conversion, wrote letters in defence of Christianity to the Emperor Tiberius and to the king of Persia. He is also the first who mentions that Christ sent to Abgarus, together with a reply, a handkerchief impressed with his portrait. The letter of Christ to Abgarus was declared apocryphal by the Council of Rome, A. D. 494, but in the Greek Church many continued to believe in its authenticity, and the people of Edessa believed that their city was made unconquerable by the possession of this palladium. The original is said to have later been brought to Constantinople. In modern times, the correspondence of Abgarus, as well as the portrait of Christ, are generally regarded as forgeries; yet the authenticity of the letters is defended by Tillemont, Mémoires pour Servir à l'Hist. Eccles. i, p. 362, 615; by Welte, Tüb. Quartalschrift, 1842, p. 335 et seq., and several others. Two churches, St. Sylvester's at Rome, and a church of Genoa, profess each to have the original of the portrait. A beautiful copy of the portrait in Rome is given in W. Grimm, Die Sage vom Ursprung der Christusbilder (Berlin, 1843). The authenticity of the portrait in Genoa is defended by the Mechitarist, M. Samuelian. Hefele puts its origin in the fifteenth century, but believes it to be the copy of an older portrait. Ab'i (Heb. Ab'i, אֲבִי, my father, or rather father of [see ABI-]; Sept. Αβι, Vulg. Abi), a shortened form (comp. 2 Chron. xxix, 1) of אֲבִיהָ (q. v.), the name of the mother of King Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii, 2, where the full form is also read in some MSS.).

Abi- (אֲבִי, an old construct form of אָב, father, as is evident from its use in Hebrew and all the cognate languages), forms the first part of several Hebrew proper names (Bib. Repos. 1846, p. 760); e. g. those following. See AB-.

Abi'a (Αβιά), a Grecized form of the name ABIAH (Matt. i, 7; Luke i, 5). It also occurs (1 Chron. iii, 10) instead of ABIAH (q. v.).

Abi'ah, a less correct mode (1 Sam. viii, 2; 1 Chron. ii, 4; vi, 28; vii, 8) of Anglicizing the name ABIAH (q. v.).

Abi'al'bon (Heb. Abi'-Albon, אֲבִי־אֶלְבוֹן, father of strength, i. e. valiant; Sept. Αβι' Αλβων v. r. Αβι' Αρβων, Vulg. Abialbon), one of David's body-guard (2 Sam. xxiii, 31); called in the parallel passage (1 Chron. xi, 32) by the equivalent name ABIEL (q. v.).

Abi'asaph (Heb. Abiasaph, אֲבִי־אַסָּף, father of gathering, i. e. gatherer; Sept. Αβιασάφ, Vulg. Abiasaph), the youngest of the three sons of Korah the Levite (Exod. vi, 24); B. C. post 1740. He is different from the Ebiasaph of 1 Chron. vi, 23, 37; ix, 19. See SAMUEL.

Abi'athar (Heb. Ebyathar', אֲבִיָּאֶתָר, father of abundance, i. e. liberal; Sept. Ἀβιάθαρ or Ἀβιάθαρ, N. T. Ἀβιάθαρ, Josephus Ἀβιάθαρ), the thirteenth high-priest of the Jews, being the son of Ahimelech, and the third in descent from Eli; B. C. 1060-1012. When his father was slain with the priests of Nob, for suspected partiality to David, Abiathar escaped; and bearing with him the most essential part of the priestly raiment [see ERNOD], repaired to the son of Jesse, who was then in the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. xxii, 20-23; xxiii, 6). He was well received by David, and became the priest of the party during its exile and wanderings, receiving for David responses from God (1 Sam. xxx, 7; comp. 2 Sam. ii, 1; v, 19). The cause of this strong attachment on the part of the monarch was the feeling that he had been unintentionally the cause of the death of Abiathar's kindred. When David became king of Judah he appointed Abiathar high-priest (see 1 Chron. xv, 11; 1 Kings ii, 26), and a member of his cabinet (1 Chron. xxvii, 34). Meanwhile Zadok had been made high-priest by Saul—an appointment not only unexceptionable in itself, but in accordance with the divine sentence of deposition which had been passed, through Samuel, upon the house of Eli (1 Sam. ii, 30-36). When, therefore, David acquired the kingdom of Israel, he had no just ground on which Zadok could be removed, and Abiathar set in his place; and the attempt would probably have been offensive to his new subjects, who had been accustomed to the ministration of Zadok, and whose good feeling he was anxious to cultivate. The king appears to have got over this difficulty by allowing both appointments to stand; and until the end of David's reign Zadok and Abiathar were joint high-priests (1 Kings iv, 4). As a high-priest, Abiathar was the least excusable, in some respects, of all those who were parties in the attempt to raise Adonijah to the throne (1 Kings i, 19); and Solomon, in deposing him from the high-priesthood, plainly told him that only his sacerdotal character, and his former services to David, preserved him from capital punishment (1 Kings ii, 26, 27). This completed the doom upon the house of Eli, and restored the pontifical succession—Zadok, who remained the high-priest, being of the elder line of Aaron's sons. See ELEAZAR.

In Mark ii, 26, a circumstance is described as occurring "in the days of Abiathar, the high-priest" (ἡμετέρας τῶν ἡμετέρων ἀρχιερέων—a phrase that is susceptible of the rendering, in [the time] of Abiathar, [the son] of the high-priest), which appears, from 1 Sam. xxi, 1, to have really occurred when his father Ahimelech was the high-priest. The most probable solution of this difficulty (but see Alford's Comment. in loc.) is that which interprets the reference thus: "in the days of Abiathar, who was afterward the high-priest" (Milderton, Greek Article, p. 188-190). But this leaves open another difficulty, which arises from the precisely opposite reference (in 2 Sam. viii, 17; 1 Chron. xviii, 16; xxiv, 3, 6, 31) to "Ahimelech [or Abimelech] the son of Abiathar," as the person who was high-priest along with Zadok, and who was deposed by Solomon; whereas the history describes that personage as Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech. Another explanation is, that both father and son bore the two names of Ahimelech and Abiathar, and might be, and were, called by either (J. C. Leuschner, De Achimelechis binominio, Hirschb. 1750). But although it was not unusual for the Jews to have two names, it was not usual for both father and son to have the same two names. Others suppose a second Abiathar, the father of Ahimelech, and some even a son of the same name; but none of these suppositions are warranted by the text, nor allowable in the list of high-priests. See HIGH-PRIEST. The names have probably become transposed by copyists, for the Syriac and Arabic versions have "Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech." The mention of Abiathar in the above passage of Mark, rather than the acting priest Ahimelech, may have arisen from the greater prominence of the former in the history of David's reign, and he appears even at that time to have been with his father, and to have had some part in the pontifical duties. In additional explanation of the other difficulty above referred to, it may be suggested as not unlikely that Ahimelech may have been the name of one of Abiathar's sons likewise associated with him, as well as that of his father, and that copyists have confounded these names together.—KITTO, s.v. See AHIMELECH.

A'bib (Heb. Abib', אֲבִיב, from an obsolete root אֲבִיב, to fructify), properly, a head or ear of grain (Lev. ii, 14, "green ears"; Exod. xiii, 31, "ear"); hence, the month of newly-ripe grain (Exod. xiii, 4; xxiii, 15; xxxiv, 18; Deut. xvi, 1), the first of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, afterward (Neh. ii, 1) called NISAN (q. v.). It began with the new moon of March, according to the Rabbins (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 5), or rather of April, according to Michaelis (Comment. de Mensibus Hebræor., comp. his Commentat. Bremæ, 1769, p. 16 sq.); at which time the first grain ripens in Palestine (Robinson's Researches, ii, 99, 100). See MONTH. Hence it is hardly to be regarded as a strict name of a month, but rather as a designation of the season; as the Sept., Vulg., and Saadias have well rendered, in Exod. xiii, 4, "the month of the new grain;" less correctly the Syriac, "the month of flowers" (comp. Bochart, Hieroz. i, 557). Others (as A. Müller, Gloss. Sacra, p. 2) regard the name as derived from the eleventh Egyptian month, Epp (Ἐπί, Plat. de Iside, p. 372); but this corresponds neither to March or April, but to July (Fabricii Menologium, p. 22-27; Jablonsky, Opusc. ed. Water, i, 65 sq.). See TEL-ABIB.

Abibas, a martyr of Edessa, burned in 322, under the Emperor Licinius. He is commemorated in the Greek Church, as a saint, on 15th November.

Ab'ida [many Abi'dah] (Heb. Abida', אֲבִידָה, father of knowledge, i. e. knowing; 1 Chron. i, 33, Sept. Ἀβιδά; Gen. xxv, 4, Ἀβιδά, Auth. Vers. "Abidah"), the fourth of the five sons of Midian, the son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv, 1; 1 Chron. i, 33), and apparently the head of a tribe in the peninsula of Arabia, B. C. post 2000. See ARABIA. Josephus (Ant. i, 15, 1) calls him Ebidus (Ἐβιδά). For the city Abida, see ABILA.

Ab'idah [many Abi'dah], a less correct mode of Anglicizing (Gen. xxv, 4) the name ABIDA (q. v.).

Ab'idan (Heb. Abidan', אֲבִידָן, father of judgment, i. e. judge; Sept. Ἀβιδάν), the son of Gideon, and phylarch of the tribe of Benjamin at the exode (Num. i, 11; ii, 22; x, 24). At the erection of the Tabernacle he made a contribution on the ninth day, similar to the other chiefs (Num. vii, 60, 65), B. C. 1657.

A'biel (Heb. Abiel', אֲבִיֵּל, lit. father [i. e. possessor] of God, i. e. pious, or perhaps father of strength, i. e. strong; Sept. Ἀβιήλ), the name of two men.

1. The son of Zeror, a Benjamite (1 Sam. ix, 1), and father of Ner (1 Sam. xiv, 51), which last was the grandfather of Saul, the first king of Israel (1 Chron. viii, 33; ix, 39). B. C. 1063. In 1 Sam. ix, 1 he is called the "father" (q. v.) of Kish, meaning grandfather. See NER.

2. An Arbatite, one of David's distinguished warriors (1 Chron. xi, 32). B. C. 1053. In the parallel passage he is called ABI-ALBON (2 Sam. xxiii, 31). See DAVID.

Abi'zer (Heb. id., אֲבִיזֵר, father of help, i. e. helpful; Sept. Ἀβιζέρ), the name of two men.

1. The second of the three sons of Hammoleketh, sister of Gilead, grandson of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii, 18). B. C. cir. 1618. He became the founder of a family that settled beyond the Jordan [see OPHRAI], from which Gideon sprang (Josh. vii, 2), and which bore this name as a patronymic (Judg. vi, 34), a circumstance that is beautifully alluded to in Gideon's delicate reply to the jealous Ephraimites (Judg. viii, 2). See ABIEZRITE. He is elsewhere called JEZEZER, and his descendants Jezeerites (Num. xxvi, 30).

2. A native of Anathoth, one of David's thirty chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 27; 1 Chron. xi, 28), B.C. 1053. He was afterward appointed captain of the ninth contingent of troops from the Benjamites (1 Chron. xxvii, 12), B.C. 1014. See DAVID.

Abiëz'rite (Heb. Abi'ha-Ezri', אֲבִיחַזְרִיתִי, father of the Ezrite; Sept. πατήρ τοῦ Ἐζρι, Vulg. pater familie Ezri; but in Judg. viii, 32, 'Αβι' Ἐζρι, de familia Ezri), a patronymic designation of the descendants of ABIEZER (Judg. vi, 2, 24; viii, 32).

Ab'igail (Heb. Abiga'yil, אֲבִיגַיִל, father [i. e. source] of joy, or perh. i. q. leader of the dance, once contracted Abigal', אֲבִיגַל, 2 Sam. xvii, 25; Sept. Ἀβιγαῖλ v. r. Ἀβιγαία, Josephus Ἀβιγαία), the name of two women.

1. The daughter of Nahash (? Jesse), sister of David, and wife of Jether or Ithra (q. v.), an Ishmaelite, by whom she had Amasa (1 Chron. ii, 16, 17; 2 Sam. xvii, 25). B.C. 1068.

2. The wife of Nabal, a prosperous but churlish sheep-master in the district of Carmel, west of the Dead Sea (1 Sam. xxv, 3). B.C. 1060. Her promptitude and discretion averted the wrath of David, which, as she justly apprehended, had been violently excited by the insulting treatment which his messengers had received from her husband (comp. Josephus, Ant. vi, 13, 6-8). See NABAL. She hastily prepared a liberal supply of provisions, of which David's troop stood in much need, and went forth to meet him, attended by only one servant, without the knowledge of her husband. When they met, he was marching to exterminate Nabal and all that belonged to him; and not only was his rage mollified by her prudent remonstrances and delicate management, but he became sensible that the vengeance which he had purposed was not warranted by the circumstances, and was thankful that he had been prevented from shedding innocent blood (1 Sam. xxv, 14-35). The beauty and prudence of Abigail (see H. Hughes, Female Characters, ii, 250 sq.) made such an impression upon David on this occasion, that when, not long after, he heard of Nabal's death, he sent for her, and she became his wife (1 Sam. xxv, 39-42). She accompanied him in all his future fortunes (1 Sam. xxvii, 3; xxx, 5; 2 Sam. ii, 2). See DAVID. By her he had one son, Chileab (2 Sam. iii, 3), who is probably the same elsewhere called Daniel (1 Chron. iii, 1).—Kitto, s. v.

Abiha'il (Heb. Abicha'yil, אֲבִיחַיִל, father of [i. e. endowed with] might, or perhaps leader of the song), the name of three men and two women.

1. (Sept. Ἀβιχαῖλ.) The father of Zurie!, which latter was the chief of the Levitical family of Merari at the exode (Num. iii, 35). B.C. ante 1657.

2. (Sept. Ἀβιγαία v. r. Ἀβιγαία.) The wife of Abishur (of the family of Jerahmeel), and mother of Abhan and Molid (1 Chron. ii, 29, where the name in some MSS. is Abiha'yil, אֲבִיחַיִל, apparently by error). B.C. considerably post 1612.

3. (Sept. Ἀβιχαία.) The son of Huri, and one of the family chiefs of the tribe of Gad, who settled in Bashan (1 Chron. v, 14), B.C. between 1093 and 782.

4. (Sept. Ἀβιαῖλ v. r. Ἀβιαία and Ἀβιχαία.) The second wife of king Rehoboam, to whom she or the previous wife bore several sons (2 Chron. xi, 18), B.C. 972. She is there called the "daughter" of Eliab, the son of Jesse, which must mean descendant [see FATHER], since David, the youngest of his father's sons, was thirty years old when he began to reign, eighty years before her marriage.

5. (Sept. Ἀβραάβ v. r. Ἀβλααία.) The father of Esther, and uncle of Mordecai (Esther ii, 15; ix, 29; comp. ii, 7). B.C. ante 479.

Abi'hu (Heb. Abihu', אֲבִיהוּ, lit. father [i. e. worshipper] of Him, sc. God; Sept. Ἀβιοῦ, Josephus Ἀβιωῦ, Vulg. Abiu), the second of the sons of Aaron by Elisheba (Exod. vi, 23; Num. iii, 2; xxvi, 60; 1 Chron. vi, 3; xxiv, 1), who, with his brothers Nadab, Eleazar, and Ithamar, was set apart and consecrated for the priesthood (Exod. xxviii, 1). With his father and elder brother, he accompanied the seventy elders partly up the mount which Moses ascended to receive the divine communication (Exod. xxiv, 1, 9). When, at the first establishment of the ceremonial worship, the victims offered on the great brazen altar were consumed by fire from heaven, it was directed that this fire should always be kept up, and that the daily incense should be burnt in censers filled with it from the great altar (see Lev. vi, 9 sq.). But one day Nadab and Abihu presumed to neglect this regulation, and offered incense in censers filled with "strange" or common fire, B.C. 1657. For this they were instantly struck dead by lightning, and were taken away and buried in their clothes without the camp (Lev. x, 1-11; comp. Num. iii, 4; xxvi, 61; 1 Chron. xxiv, 2). See AARON. There can be no doubt that this severe example had the intended effect of enforcing becoming attention to the most minute observances of the ritual service. As immediately after the record of this transaction, and in apparent reference to it, comes a prohibition of wine or strong drink to the priests whose turn it might be to enter the tabernacle, it is not unfairly surmised that Nadab and Abihu were intoxicated when they committed this serious error in their ministrations.—Kitto, s. v. See NADAB.

Abi'hud (Heb. Abihud', אֲבִיהוּד, father [i. e. possessor] of renown, q. d. Πάροχος; Sept. and N. T. Ἀβιοῦδ), the name of two men.

1. One of the sons of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 3); apparently the same elsewhere called AMUD (ver. 7). B.C. post 1856. See JACOB.

2. The great-great-grandson of Zerubbabel, and father of Eliakim, among the paternal ancestry of Jesus (Matt. i, 13, where the name is Anglicized "Abiud"); apparently the same with the JUDA, son of Joanna and father of Joseph in the maternal line (Luke iii, 26); and also with OBADIAH, son of Arnan and father of Shechaniah in the O. T. (1 Chron. iii, 21). B.C. ante 410. (See Strong's Harmony and Expos. of the Gosp. p. 16.) Comp. ΗΙΟΔΑΙΑ.

Abi'jah (Heb. Abijah', אֲבִיחַ, father [i. e. possessor or worshipper] of Jehovah; also in the equivalent protracted form Abija'hu, אֲבִיחַהּ, 2 Chron. xiii, 20, 21; Sept. and N. T. Ἀβιά, but Ἀβία in 1 Kings xiv, 1; Neh. x, 7; Ἀβιας in 1 Chron. xxiv, 10; Neh. xii, 4, 17; Ἀβιοῦ v. r. Ἀβιοῦδ in 1 Chron. vii, 8; Josephus, Ἀβια, Ant. vii, 10, 3; Auth. Vers. "Abiah" in 1 Sam. viii, 2; 1 Chron. ii, 24; vi, 28; vii, 8; "Abia" in 1 Chron. iii, 10; Matt. i, 7; Luke i, 5), the name of six men and two women.

1. A son of Becher, one of the sons of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 8). B.C. post 1856.

2. The daughter of Maclur, who bore to Hezron a posthumous son, Ashur (1 Chron. ii, 24). B.C. cir. 1612.

3. The second son of Samuel (1 Sam. viii, 2; 1 Chron. vi, 12). Being appointed by his father a judge in Beersheba, in connection with his brother, their corrupt administration induced such popular discontent as to provoke the elders to demand a royal form of government for Israel, B.C. 1093. See SAMUEL.

4. One of the descendants of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, and chief of one of the twenty-four courses or orders into which the whole body of the priesthood was divided by David (1 Chron. xxiv, 10), B.C. 1014. Of these the course of Abijah was the eighth. Only four of the courses returned from the captivity, of which that of Abijah was not one (Ezra ii, 36-39; Neh. vii, 39-42; xii, 1). But the four were divided into the original number of twenty-four, with the original names; and it hence happens that Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist, is described as belonging to the course of Abijah (Luke i, 5). See PRIEST.

5. The second king of the separate kingdom of Judah, being the son of Rehoboam, and grandson of Solomon (1 Chron. iii, 10). He is also called (1 Kings xiv, 31; xv, 1-8) ABIJAM (q. v.). He began to reign B.C. 956, in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam, king of Israel, and he reigned three years (2 Chron. xii, 16; xiii, 1, 2). At the commencement of his reign, looking on the well-founded separation of the ten tribes from the house of David as rebellion, Abijah made a vigorous attempt to bring them back to their allegiance (2 Chron. xiii, 3-19). In this he failed; although a signal victory over Jeroboam, who had double his force and much greater experience, enabled him to take several cities that had been held by Israel (see J. F. Bahrdt, De bello Abiæ et Jerob., Lips. 1769). The speech which Abijah addressed to the opposing army before the battle has been much admired (C. Simeon, Works, iv, 96). It was well suited to its object, and exhibits correct notions of the theoretical institutions (Keil, Apolog. d. Chron., p. 336). His view of the political position of the ten tribes with respect to the house of David is, however, obviously erroneous, although such as a king of Judah was likely to take. The numbers reputed to have been present in this action are 800,000 on the side of Jeroboam, 400,000 on the side of Abijah, and 500,000 left dead on the field. Hales and others regard these extraordinary numbers as corruptions, and propose to reduce them to 80,000, 40,000, and 50,000 respectively, as in the Latin Vulgate of Sixtus V. and many earlier editions, and in the old Latin translation of Josephus; and probably also in his original Greek text, as is collected by De Vignoles from Abarbanel's charge against the historian of having made Jeroboam's loss no more than 50,000 men, contrary to the Hebrew text (Kennicott's Dissertations, i, 533; ii, 201 sq., 564). See NUMBER. The book of Chronicles mentions nothing concerning Abijah adverse to the impressions which we receive from his conduct on this occasion; but in Kings we are told that "he walked in all the sins of his father" (1 Kings xv, 5). He had fourteen wives, by whom he left twenty-two sons and sixteen daughters (2 Chron. xiii, 20-22). Asa succeeded him (2 Chron. xiv, 1; Matt. i, 7). See JUDAH.

There is a difficulty connected with the maternity of Abijah. In 1 Kings xv, 2, we read, "His mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom" (comp. 2 Chron. xi, 20, 22); but in 2 Chron. xiii, 2, "His mother's name was Michaiah, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah." Maachah and Michaiah are variations of the same name; and Abishalom is in all likelihood Absalom, the son of David. The word (רַעַיָה) rendered "daughter" (q. v.), is applied in the Bible not only to a man's child, but to his niece, granddaughter, or great-granddaughter. It is therefore possible that Uriel of Gibeah married Tamar, the beautiful daughter of Absalom (2 Sam. xiv, 27), and by her had Maachah, who was thus the daughter of Uriel and granddaughter of Absalom. See MAACHAH.

6. A son of Jeroboam I, king of Israel. His severe and threatening illness induced Jeroboam to send his wife with a present [see GIFT] suited to the disguise in which she went, to consult the prophet Ahijah respecting his recovery. This prophet was the same who had, in the days of Solomon, foretold to Jeroboam his elevation to the throne of Israel. Though blind with age, he knew the disguised wife of Jeroboam, and was authorized, by the prophetic impulse that came upon him, to reveal to her that, because there was found in Abijah only, of all the house of Jeroboam, "some good thing toward the Lord," he only, of all that house, should come to his grave in peace, and be mourned in Israel (see S. C. Wilkes, Family Sermons, 12; C. Simeon, Works, iii, 385; T. Gataker, Sermons, pt. ii, 291). Accordingly, when the mother returned home, the youth died as she crossed the threshold of the door. "And they buried him, and all Israel mourned for him" (1 Kings xiv, 1-18), B.C. cir. 782.—Kitto, s. v. See Jeroboam.

7. The daughter of Zechariah, and mother of King Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix, 1), and, consequently, the wife of Ahaz, whom she survived, and whom, if we may judge from the piety of her son, she excelled in moral character. She is elsewhere called by the shorter form of the name, AMT (2 Kings xviii, 2). B.C. 726. Her father, may have been the same with the Zechariah, the son of Jeberchiah, whom Isaiah took as a witness of his marriage with "the prophetess" (Isa. viii, 2; comp. 2 Chron. xxvi, 5).

8. One of those (apparently priests) who affixed their signatures to the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. x, 7), B.C. 410. He is probably the same (notwithstanding the great age this implies) who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii, 4), B.C. 536, and who had a son named Zichri (Neh. xii, 17).

Abi'jam (Heb. Abijam', אֲבִיָּאִם, father of the sea, i. q. seaman; Sept. Ἀβία v. r. Ἀβιάς, Vulg. Abiam), the name always given in the book of Kings (1 Kings xiv, 31; xv, 1, 7, 8) to the king of Judah (1 Kings xiv, 1, refers to another person), elsewhere (1 Chron. iii, 10; 2 Chron. xiii, 1-22) called ABIJAH (q. v.). Lightfoot (Harm. O. T. in loc.) thinks that the writer in Chronicles, not describing his reign as wicked, admits the sacred JAM into his name; but which the book of Kings, charging him with following the evil ways of his father, changes into JAM. This may be fanciful; but such changes of name were not unusual (comp. BETHAVEN; SYCHAR).—Kitto, s. v.

Abila (τὰ Ἀβίλα and ἡ Ἀβίλη, Polyb. v, 71, 2; Ptol. v, 18), the name of at least two places.

1. The capital of the "Abilene" of Lysanias (Luke iii, 1), and distinguished (by Josephus, Ant. xix, 5, 1) from other places of the same name as the "ABILA or LYSANIAS" (Ἀβίλα ἢ Λυσανίων). The word is evidently of Hebrew origin, signifying a grassy plain. See ABEL. This place, however, is not to be confounded with any of the Biblical localities of the O. T. having this prefix, since it was situated beyond the bounds of Palestine in Coele-Syria (Antonin. Itin. p. 197, ed. Wessel), being the same with the "Abila of Lebanon" (Abila ad Libanum), between Damascus and Baalbek or Heliopolis (Richard, Palast. p. 317, 458). Josephus (see Hudson's ed. p. 864, note) and others also write the name Abella (Ἀβέλλα), Abela (Ἀβέλα), and even Abilla (Ἀρβίλλα), assigning it to Phœnicia (Richard, ib. p. 527-529). A medal is extant, bearing a bunch of grapes, with the inscription, "Abila Leucas," which Belleve (in the Transactions of the Acad. of Belles Lettres) refers to this city; but it has been shown to have a later date (Eckhel, iii, 337, 345); for there is another medal of the same place, which bears a half figure of the river-god, with the inscription "Chrysooras Claudiaion," a title which, although fixing the site to the river Chrysorrohoas, yet refers to the imperial name of Claudius. Perhaps Leucas and Claudiopolis were only later names of the same city; for we can hardly suppose that two cities of the size and importance which each of these evidently had, were located in the same vicinity and called by the same name. The existence of a large and well-built city in this region (Hogg's Damascus, i, 301) is attested by numerous ruins still found there (Bankes, in the Quart. Review, vol. xxvi, p. 388), containing inscriptions (De Sauley, Narrative, ii, 453). Some of these inscriptions (first published by Lebronne, Journal des Savans, 1827, and afterward by Urelli, Inscr. Lat. 4997, 4998) have lately been deciphered (Trans. Roy. Geog. Soc. 1851; Jour. Sac. Lit. July, 1853, p. 248 sq.), and one has been found to contain a definite account of certain public works executed under the Emperor M. Aurelius, "at the expense of the Abilerians;" thus identifying the spot where this is found with the ancient city of Abila (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1848, p. 85 sq.). It is the modern village Suk el-Barada, not far from the south bank of the river Barada (the ancient Chrysorrohoas), near the mouth of the long gorge through which the stream flows from above, and directly under the cliff (800 feet high) on which stands the Wely of Nebi Abil, or traditional tomb of Abel (Bib. Sacra, 1853, p. 144). This tradition is an ancient one (Quaresimus, Eleucil. Terre Sanele, vii, 7, 1; Maundrel, May 4), but apparently based upon an incorrect derivation of the name of the son of Adam. See ABEL. This spot is on the road from Heliopolis (Baalbek) to Damascus, at a distance corresponding to ancient notities (Reland, Paläst. p. 527, 528). The name Suk (i. e. market), a frequent title of villages where produce is sold, and therefore indicating fertility, of Wady Barada first occurs in Burckhardt (Syria, p. 2), who speaks of the lively green of the neighborhood, which, no doubt, has suggested the name Abel in its Hebrew acceptance of meador (see Robinson, Researches, new ed. iii, 480 sq.). See ABILENE.

Coin of Abila-Leucas.

2. There are two or three other places mentioned in ancient authorities (Reland, Paläst. p. 523 sq.) by the general name of Abel, Abela, or Abila (once Abila, Abīca, apparently by error, Reland, ib. p. 459), as follows:

(a.) ABELA OF PHENICIA (Jerome, Onomast. s. v.), situated between Damascus and Paneas (Caesarea Philippi), and therefore different from the Abila of Lysanias, which was between Damascus and Heliopolis (Baalbek). It is probably the same as ABELBETH-MAACHAH (q. v.).

(b.) ABILA OF PEREA, mentioned by Josephus (War, ii, 13, 2) as being in the vicinity of Julius (Bethsaida) and Besimoth (Bethjeshimoth) (ib. iv, 7, 6). It is probably the same as ABEL-SHITTIM (q. v.).

(c.) ABILA OF BATANÆA, mentioned by Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Astaroth Carnaim) as situated north of Adara, and by Josephus (quoting Polybius) as being taken with Gadara by Antiochus (Ant. xii, 3, 3). It is apparently the same with the "Abila of the Decapolis" (comp. Pliny, v, 18), named on certain Palmyrene inscriptions (Reland, Paläst. p. 525 sq.), and probably is the Abel (אַבֵּיל) of Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.), situated 12 miles E. of Gadara, now Abil. See under ABEL-CERAMIM.

Abile nê (אַבִּילָנָה sc. חֶפְצָא, Luke, iii, 1), the small district or territory in the region of Lebanon which took its name from the chief town, Abila (Polyb. v, 71, 2; Josephus, War, ii, 13, 2; iv, 7, 5; Heb. Abel, אַבֵּיל, a plain), which was situated in Cœle-Syria (Ptolem. v, 18), and (according to the Antoineine Itin.) 18 miles N. of Damascus, and 38 S. of Heliopolis (lat. 68° 45', long. 33° 20'); but which must not be confounded with Abila of the Decapolis (Burckhardt, p. 269; Ritter, xv, 1059). See ABILA. Northward it must have reached beyond the upper Barada, in order to include Abila; and it is probable that its southern border may have extended to Mount Hermon (Jebel es-Sheikh). It seems to have included the eastern declivities of Anti-Libanus, and the fine valleys between its base and the hills which front the eastern plains. This is a very beautiful and fertile region, well wooded, and watered by numerous springs from Anti-Lebanon. It also affords fine pastures; and in most respects contrasts with the stern and barren western slopes of Anti-Lebanon.

This territory had been governed as a tetrarchy by Lysanias, son of Ptolemy and grandson of Menæus (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 13, 3); but he was put to death, B.C. 33, through the intrigues of Cleopatra, who then took possession of the province (Ant. xv, 4, 1). After her death it fell to Augustus, who rented it out to one Zenodorus; but as he did not keep it clear of robbers, it was taken from him, and given to Herod the Great (Ant. xv, 10, 1; War, i, 20, 4). At his death a part (the southern, doubtless) of the territory was added to Trachonitis and Iturea to form a tetrarchy for his son Philip; but by far the larger portion, including the city of Abila, was then, or shortly afterward, bestowed on another Lysanias, mentioned by Luke (iii, 1), who is supposed to have been a descendant of the former Lysanias, but who is nowhere mentioned by Josephus. See LYSANIAS. Indeed, nothing is said by him or any other profane writer respecting this part of Abilene until several years after the time referred to by Luke, when the Emperor Caligula gave it to Agrippa I as "the tetrarchy of Lysanias" (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 10), to whom it was afterward confirmed by Claudius. At his death it was included in that part of his possessions which went to his son Agrippa II. (See Josephus, Ant. xiii, 16, 3; xiv, 12, 1; 3, 2; 7, 4; xv, 10, 3; xvii, 11, 4; xix, 5, 1; x, 7, 1; War, i, 13, 1; ii, 6, 3; 11, 5; Dio Cass. xlix, 32; liv, 9.) This explanation as to the division of Abilene between Lysanias and Philip removes the apparent discrepancy in Luke, who calls Lysanias tetrarch of Abilene at the very time that, according to Josephus (a part of) Abilene was in the possession of Philip (see Noldii Hist. Idum. p. 279 sq.; Krebs, Observ. Flar. p. 110 sq.; Süsskind, Symbol. ad Illustr. Quædam Ecclæg. Luca, i, 21; ii, 23 sq.; also in Pott, Sylog. viii, 90 sq.; also in the Stud. u. Krit. 1836, ii, 431 sq.; Münter, De Robur Urucor. Hafn. 1824, p. 22 sq.; Wieseler, Chronol. Synopsis, p. 174 sq.; Ebrard, Wissenschaftl. Kritik, p. 181 sq.; Hög, Gutachten üb. Strauss, p. 119 sq.). In fact, as Herod never actually possessed Abilene (Josephus, Ant. xix, 5, 1; War, ii, 11, 5), and Zenodorus only had the farming of it, this region never could have descended to Herod's heirs, and therefore properly did not belong to Philip's tetrarchy. The same division of the territory in question is implied in the exclusion of Chalcis from the government of the later Lysanias, although included in that of the older (Josephus, Ant. xx, 7, 1). We find Abila mentioned among the places captured by Placidus, one of Vespasian's generals, in A.D. 69-70 (Josephus, War, iv, 7, 5); and from that time it was permanently annexed to the province of Syria (Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.). The metropolis Abila is mentioned in the lists of the Christian councils as the seat of an episcopal see down to A.D. 634 (Reland, Paläst. p. 529).—Winer, s. v.

Ability. See INABILITY; WILL.

Abim'ael (Heb. Abimael', אַבִּימָאֵל, father of Maël, Sept. Ἀβιμαῖλ, Ἀβιμαῖλ, Josephus Ἀβιμαῖλ), one of the sons of Joktan in Arabia (Gen. x, 28; 1 Chron. i, 22). B.C. post 244. See ARABIA. He was probably the father or founder of an Arabian tribe called Maël (אַבִּימָאֵל, of unknown origin), a trace of which Bochart (Phaleg, ii, 24) discovers in Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. ix, 4), where the name Mali (Μᾶλι) occurs as that of a spice-bearing region. Perhaps the same is indicated in Eratosthenes (ap. Strabo, xvi, 1112) and Eustathius (ad Dionys. Periegetes, p. 288, ed. Bernhardt) by the Minaí (Μινάιοι). So Diodorus Siculus (iii, 42); but Ptolemy (vi, 7) distinguishes the Manite (Μανίται) from these, and at the same time refers to a village called Mamala (Μάμαλα κόμη) on the shore of the Red Sea. Hence Schneider proposes to read Mamali (Μαμάλι) in the above passage of Theophrastus; or perhaps we should rather read Mani (Μάνι), a natural interchange of liquids; and then we may compare a place mentioned by Ahlfreda (Arabia, ed. Gagnier, p. 3, 42), called Minay, 3 miles from Mecca (Michaëlis, Spicileg. ii, 179 sq.).—Gesenius, Theo. Heb. p. 9.

Abim'elech (Heb. Abimelek, אַבִּימֶלֶךְ, father [i. e. friend] of the king, or perhaps i. q. royal father; Sept. Ἀβιμελεχ, but Ἀβιμελεχ in 1 Chron. xviii, 16; Josephus Ἀβιμελεχος), the name of four men. From the recurrence of this name among the kings of the Philistines, and from its interchange with the name "Aeshish" in the title to Psal. xxxiv, it would appear to have been, in that application, not a proper name, but rather a general title, like Pharaoh among the Egyptians. Compare the title Padishah, i. e. "father of the king," given to the kings of Persia, supposed by Ludolf (Lex. Ethiop. p. 350) to have arisen from a salutation of respect like that among the Ethiopians, abba nagasi, equivalent to "God save the king" (Simon Onomast. p. 460). Comp. AHASUERUS.

1. The Philistine king of Gerar (q. v.) in the time of Abraham (Gen. xx, 1 sq.), B.C. 2086. Abraham removed into his territory perhaps on his return from Egypt; and, fearing that the extreme beauty of Sarah (q. v.) might bring him into difficulties, he declared her to be his sister (see S. Chandler, Vol. of O. T. p. 52). The conduct of Abimelech in taking Sarah into his harem shows that, even in those early times, kings claimed the right of taking to themselves the unmarried females not only of their natural subjects, but of those who sojourned in their dominions. The same usage still prevails in Oriental countries, especially in Persia (Critical Review, iii, 332). See WOMAN. Another contemporary instance of this custom occurs in Gen. xii, 15, and one of later date in Esth. ii, 3. But Abimelech, obedient to a divine warning communicated to him in a dream, accompanied by the information that Abraham was a sacred person who had intercourse with God, restored her to her husband (see J. Orton, Works, i, 251). As a mark of his respect he added valuable gifts, and offered the patriarch a settlement in any part of the country; but he nevertheless did not forbear to rebuke, with mingled delicacy and sarcasm (see C. Simeon, Works, i, 163), the deception which had been practised upon him (Gen. xx). The present consisted in part of a thousand pieces of silver, as a "covering of the eyes" for Sarah; that is, according to some, as an atoning present, and to be a testimony of her innocence in the eyes of all (see J. C. Biedermann, Meleten. Philol. iii, 3; J. C. Körner, Exercit. Theol. ii; J. A. M. Nagel, Exercit. Philol. Altd. 1759; J. G. F. Leun, Philol. Exerc. Giess. 1781). Others more happily (see COVERING OF THE EYES) think that the present was to procure a veil for Sarah to conceal her beauty, that she might not be coveted on account of her comeliness; and "thus was she reproved" for not having worn a veil, which, as a married woman, according to the custom of the country, she ought to have done (Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.). The interposition of Providence to deliver Sarah twice from royal harems (q. v.) will not seem superfluous when it is considered how carefully women are there secluded, and how impossible it is to obtain access to them (Esth. iv, 5) or get them back again (Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in Gen. xii). In such cases it is not uncommon that the husband of a married woman is murdered in order that his wife may be retained by the tyrant (Thomson's Land and Book, ii, 353). Nothing further is recorded of King Abimelech, except that a few years after he repaired to the camp of Abraham, who had removed southward beyond his borders, accompanied by Phichol, "the chief captain of his host," to invite the patriarch to contract with him a league of peace and friendship. Abraham consented; and this first league on record [see ALLIANCE] was confirmed by a mutual oath, made at a well which had been dug by Abraham, but which the herdsmen of Abimelech had forcibly seized without his knowledge. It was restored to the rightful owner, on which Abraham named it Beersheba (the Well of the Oath), and consecrated the spot to the worship of Jehovah (Gen. xxi, 22-34). (See Origen, Opera, ii, 76; Whately, Prototypes, p. 197). See ABRAHAM.

2. Another king of Gerar, in the time of Isaac (Gen. xxvi, 1-22), supposed to have been the son of the preceding. B.C. cir. 1985. Isaac sought refuge in his territory during a famine; and having the same fear respecting his fair Mesopotamian wife, Rebekah, as his father had entertained respecting Sarah (supra), he reported her to be his sister. This brought upon him the rebuke of Abimelech when he accidentally discovered the truth. The country appears to have become more cultivated and populous than at the time of Abraham's visit, nearly a century before; and the inhabitants were more jealous of the presence of such powerful pastoral chieftains. In those times, as now, wells of water were of so much importance for agricultural as well as pastoral purposes, that they gave a proprietary right to the soil, not previously appropriated, in which they were dug. Abraham had dug wells during his sojourn in the country; and, to bar the claim which resulted from them, the Philistines had afterward filled them up; but they were now cleared out by Isaac, who proceeded to cultivate the ground to which they gave him a right. See WELL. The virgin soil yielded him a hundred-fold; and his other possessions, his flocks and herds, also received such prodigious increase that the jealousy of the Philistines could not be suppressed, and Abimelech desired him to seek more distant quarters. Isaac complied, and went out into the open country, and dug wells for his cattle. But the shepherds of the Philistines, out with their flocks, were not inclined to allow the claim to exclusive pasturage in these districts to be thus established; and their opposition induced the quiet patriarch to make successive removals, until he reached such a distance that his operations were no longer disputed. Afterward, when he was at Beersheba, he received a visit from Abimelech, who was attended by Ahuzzath, his friend, and Phichol, the chief captain of his army. They were received with some reserve by Isaac; but when Abimelech explained that it was his wish to renew, with one so manifestly blessed of God, the covenant of peace and good-will which had been contracted between their fathers, they were more cheerfully entertained, and the desired covenant was, with due ceremony, contracted accordingly (Gen. xxvi, 26-31). From the facts recorded respecting the connection of the two Abimelechs with Abraham and Isaac, it is manifest that the Philistines, even at this early time, had a government more organized, and more in unison with that type which we now regard as Oriental, than appeared among the native Canaanites, one of whose nations had been expelled by these foreign settlers from the territory which they occupied. (See Origen, Opera, ii, 94-97; Saurin, Discours, i, 368; Dissert. p. 207.)—Kitto, s. v. See PHILISTINE.

3. A son of Gideon by a concubine wife, a native of Shechem, where her family had considerable influence (Judg. ix). Through that influence Abimelech was proclaimed king after the death of his father, who had himself refused that honor when tendered to him, both for himself and his children (Judg. viii, 22-24). In a short time, a considerable part of Israel seems to have recognised his rule (Ewald, Gesch. Isr. ii, 444), which lasted three years (B.C. 1322-1319). One of the first acts of his reign was to destroy his brothers, seventy in number, being the first example of a system of barbarous state policy of which there have been frequent instances in the East, and which indeed has only within a recent period been discontinued. They were slain "on one stone" at Ophrah, the native city of the family. Only one, the youngest, named Jotham, escaped; and he had the boldness to make his appearance on Mount Gerizim, where the Shechemites were assembled for some public purpose (perhaps to inaugurate Abimelech), and rebuke them in his famous parable of the trees choosing a king (see Josephus, Ant. v. 7, 2); a fable that has been not unaptly compared with that of Menenius Agrippa (Livy, ii, 32; comp. Herder, Geist der Hebr. Poesie, ii, 262). See JOTHAM; PARABLE. In the course of three years the Shechemites found ample cause to repent of what they had done; they eventually revolted in Abimelech's absence, and caused an ambuscade to be laid in the mountains, with the design of destroying him on his return. But Zebul, his governor in Shechem, contrived to apprise him of these circumstances, so that he was enabled to avoid the snare laid for him; and, having hastily assembled some troops, appeared unexpectedly before Shechem. The people of that place had meanwhile secured the assistance of one Gaal (q. v.) and his followers, who marched out to give Abimelech battle. He was defeated, and returned into the town; and his inefficiency and misconduct in the action had been so manifest that the people were induced by Zebul to expel him and his followers (comp. Josephus, Ant. v. 7, 4). But the people still went out to the labors of the field. This being told Abimelech, who was at Arumah, he laid an ambuscade in four parties in the neighborhood; and when the men came forth in the morning, two of the ambushed bodies rose against them, while the other two seized the city gates to prevent their return. Afterward the whole force united against the city, which, being now deprived of its most efficient inhabitants, was easily taken. It was completely destroyed by the exasperated victor, and the ground strewn with salt (q. v.), symbolical of the desolation to which it was doomed. The fortress, however, still remained; but the occupants, deeming it untenable, withdrew to the temple of Baal-Berith, which stood in a more commanding situation. Abimelech employed his men in collecting and piling wood against this building, which was then set on fire and destroyed, with the thousand men who were in it. Afterward Abimelech went to reduce Thebez, which had also revolted. The town was taken with little difficulty, and the people withdrew into the citadel. Here Abimelech resorted to his favorite operation, and while heading a party to burn down the gate, he was struck on the head by a large stone cast down by a woman from the wall above. Perceiving that he had received a death-blow, he directed his armor-bearer to thrust him through with his sword, lest it should be said that he fell by a woman's hand (Judg. ix). Abimelech appears to have been a bold and able commander, but uncontrolled by religion, principle, or humanity in his ambitious enterprises (Nie Meyer, Charakt. iii, 324). His fate resembled that of Pyrrhus II, king of Epirus (Justin, xxv, 5; Pausan. i, 13; Val. Max. v. I, 4; comp. Orosius, Ecc. 42; Thucyd. iii, 74); and the dread of the ignominy of its being said of a warrior that he died by a woman's hand was very general (Sophoc. Trach. 1064; Senec. Hercl. Œt. 1176). Vainly did Abimelech seek to avoid this disgrace (Saurin, Disc. Hist. iii, 400); for the fact of his death by the hand of a woman was long after associated with his memory (2 Sam. xi, 21). See SHECHEM.

4. In the title of Psa. xxxiv, the name of Abimelech is interchanged for that of ABISHAG (q. v.), king of Gath, to whom David fled for refuge from Saul (1 Sam. xxi, 10).

5. The son of Abiathar, and high-priest in the time of David, according to the Masoretic text of 1 Chron. xviii, 16 [see ABI-], where, however, we should probably read (with the Sept., Syr., Arab., Vulg., Targums, and many MSS.) ABIMELECH (as in the parallel passage, 2 Sam. viii, 17). See ABIATHAR.

Abin'adab (Heb. Abinadab, אֲבִינָדָב, father of nobleness, i. e. noble; Sept. everywhere: Αμινάδᾱβ, Vulg. Ab'nadab, Josephus Ἀβινάδαβος, Ant. viii, 2, 3), the name of four men.

1. A Levite of Kirjath-jearim, in whose house, which was on a hill [see GIBEATH], the ark of the covenant was deposited, after being brought back from the land of the Philistines (1 Sam. vii, 1), B.C. 1124. It was committed to the special charge of his son Eleazar; and remained there eighty years, until it was removed by David (2 Sam. vi, 3, 4; 1 Chron. xiii, 7). See ARK.

2. The second of the eight sons of Jesse, the father of David (1 Sam. xvi, 8; 1 Chron. ii, 13), and one of the three who followed Saul to the campaign against the Philistines in which Goliath defied the army (1 Sam. xvii, 13), B.C. 1063.

3. The third named of the four sons of King Saul (1 Chron. viii, 33; ix, 39), and one of the three who perished with their father in the battle at Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi, 2; 1 Chron. x, 2), B.C. 1053. His name appears to be omitted in the list in 1 Sam. xiv, 49.

4. The father of one of Solomon's purveyors (or rather BEN-ABINADAB is to be regarded as the name of the purveyor himself), who presided over the district of Dor, and married Taphath, Solomon's daughter (1 Kings iv, 11), B.C. ante 1014.

Abin'oam (Heb. Abino'am, אֲבִינוֹאָם, father of grace, i. e. gracious; Sept. Ἀβινώαμ), the father of Barak the judge (Judg. iv, 6, 12; v, 1, 12). B.C. ante 1409.

Abi'ram (Heb. Abiram, אֲבִירָם, father of height, i. e. proud), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Ἀβιράωρ, Vulg. Abiron, Josephus Ἀβιράωρος, Ant. iv, 2, 2.) One of the sons of Eliab of the family-heads of Reuben, who, with his brother, Dathan, and with On of the same tribe, joined Korah the Levite in a conspiracy against Moses and Aaron, which resulted in their being swallowed up with all their families and possessions (except the children of Korah) by an earthquake (Num. xvi, 1-27; xxvi, 9; Deut. xi, 6; Isa. evi, 17), B.C. cir. 1620. See KORAH.

2. (Sept. Ἀβιράωρ, Vulg. Abiram.) The eldest son of Hiel the Bethelite, who is remarkable as having died prematurely (for such is the evident import of the statement), for the presumption or ignorance of his father, in fulfilment of the doom pronounced upon his posterity who should undertake to rebuild Jericho (1 Kings xvi, 34), B.C. post 905. See HIEL.

Abi'ron (Ἀβιράωρ), the Græcized form (Ecclus. xl, 18) of the name of the rebellious ABIRAM (q. v.).

Abis. See CAPHAR-ABIS.

Abis'eî [many Abise'i] (Lat. Abisei, for the Greek text is not extant), an incorrect form (2 [Vulg. 4] Esdr. i, 2) of the name of the priest ABISHA (q. v.).

Ab'ishag (Heb. Abishag, אֲבִישָׁג, father of [i. e. given to] error, i. q. inconsiderate; Sept. Ἀβιθάγ), a beautiful young woman of Shunem, in the tribe of Issachar, who was chosen by the servants of David to be introduced into the royal harem, for the special purpose of ministering to him and cherishing him in his old age, B.C. cir. 1015. She became his wife, but the marriage was never consummated (1 Kings i, 3-15). Some time after the death of David, Adonijah, his eldest son, persuaded Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, to entreat the king that Abishag might be given to him in marriage, B.C. cir. 1013. But as rights and privileges peculiarly regal were associated with the control and possession of the harem (q. v.) of deceased kings (2 Sam. xii, 8; Solomon detected in this application a fresh aspiration to the throne, which he visited with death (1 Kings ii, 17-22; Josephus, Ἀβισηαί, Ant. vii, 11, 3). See ADONIAH.

Ab'ishai [many Abishai] (Heb. Abishay', אֲבִישַׁי, father [i. e. desirous] of a gift; Sept. Ἀβισαί, but Ἀβισσαί in 1 Sam. xxvi, 6, 7, 8, 9; 1 Chron. xix, 11, 15; Ἀβισσαί in 1 Chron. ii, 16; Ἀβισσαί in 1 Chron. xi, 20; Ἀβισαί in 1 Chron. xviii, 12; and Ἀμισαί in 2 Sam. xx, 6; also contracted Abshay', אֲבִישַׁי, in the text of 2 Sam. x, 10; 1 Chron. ii, 16; xi, 20, xviii, 12; xix, 11, 15; Josephus Ἀβισσαίος, a nephew of David (by an unknown father, perhaps a foreigner) through his sister Zeruah, and brother of Joab and Asahel (2 Sam. ii, 18; 1 Chron. ii, 16). The three brothers devoted themselves zealously to the interests of their uncle during his wanderings. Though David had more reliance upon the talents of Joab, he appears to have given more of his private confidence to Abishai, who seems to have attached himself in a peculiar manner to his person, as we ever find him near, and ready for council or action, on critical occasions (2 Sam. ii, 24; 1 Chron. xix, 11). Abishai, indeed, was rather a man of action than of council; and, although David must have been gratified by his devoted and uncompromising attachment, he had more generally occasion to check the impulses of his ardent temperament than to follow his advice (2 Sam. iii, 30). Abishai was one of the two persons whom David asked to accompany him to the camp of Saul, and he alone accepted the perilous distinction (1 Sam. xxvi, 5-9), B.C. 1055. The desire he then expressed to smite the sleeping king identifies him as the man who afterward burned to rush upon Shimei and slay him for his abuse of David (2 Sam. xvi, 9, 11; xix, 21). When the king fled beyond the Jordan from Absalom, Abishai was by his side; and he was intrusted with the command of one of the three divisions of the army which crushed that rebellion (2 Sam. xviii, 2-12), B.C. cir. 1023. When the insurrection of Sheba occurred David sent him, in connection with Joab, to quicken the tardy preparations of Amasa in gathering troops against the rebel (2 Sam. xx, 6-10), B.C. cir. 1022. During the last war with the Philistines David was in imminent peril of his life from a giant named Ishbi-benob, but was rescued by Abishai, who slew the giant (2 Sam. xxi, 15-17), B.C. cir. 1018. He was also the chief of the second rank (2 Sam. xxiii, 19; 1 Chron. xi, 20) of the three "mighties," who, probably in some earlier war, performed the chivalrous exploit of breaking through the host of the Philistines to procure David a draught of water from the well of his native Bethlehem (2 Sam. xxiii, 14-17). Among the exploits of this hero it is mentioned (2 Sam. xxiii, 18) that he withstood 300 men, and slew them with his spear; but the occasion of this adventure, and the time and manner of his death, are equally unknown. In 2 Sam. viii, 13, the victory over the Edomites in the Valley of Salt (B.C. cir. 1037) is ascribed to David, but in 1 Chron. xviii, 12, to Abishai. It is hence probable that the victory was actually gained by Abishai, in connection with Joab (1 Kings xi, 16), but is ascribed to David as king and commander-in-chief (comp. 2 Sam. x, 10, 14).—Kitto, s. v. See DAVID.

Abish'alom, a fuller form (1 Kings xv, 2, 10) of the name ABSALOM (q. v.).

Abish'uā (Heb. Abishu'ā, אֲבִישׁוּא, father of welfare, i. e. fortunate; Sept. Ἀβισού or Ἀβισού, but in 1 Chron. viii, 4 [v. r. Ἀβισσοῦ] and Ezra vii, 5, Ἀβισσοῦ), the name of two men.

1. A son of Bela, and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 4); possibly the same as JEREMOTH (1 Chron. vii, 7). B.C. post 1856. See JACOB.

2. The son of Phinehas (grandson of Aaron) and father of Bukki, being the fourth high-priest of the Hebrews (1 Chron. vi, 4, 5, 59; Ezra vii, 5). Josephus calls him Abiezer (Ἀβιέζερ, Ant. v, 11, 4), but elsewhere Josephus (Ἰωσήπος, Ant. viii, 1, 3, ed. Havercamp). He appears from the Chronicon of Alerandria to have been nearly contemporary with Ehud, B.C. cir. 1523-1466. See HIGH-PRIEST.

Ab'ishur (Heb. Abishur', אֲבִישׁוּר, father of the well, i. e. perhaps wisdom; Sept. Ἀβισούριον), the second named of the two sons of Shammai, of the tribe of Judah, who married Abihail, by whom he had two sons (1 Chron. ii, 28, 29), B.C. considerably post 1612.

Ab'isum (Ἀβισαί v. r. Ἀβισουαί), the son of Phineas and father of Boaz, in the genealogy of Ezra (1 Esdr. viii, 2); evidently the high-priest ABISHUA (q. v.).

Ab'ital (Heb. Abital', אֲבִיטָל, father of dew, i. e. fresh; Sept. Ἀβιτάλ), the fifth wife of David, by whom she had Shephatiah, during his reign in Hebron (2 Sam. iii, 4; 1 Chron. iii, 3), B.C. 1052.

Ab'itub (Heb. Abitub', אֲבִיטוּב, father of goodness, i. e. good; Sept. Ἀβιτόβ v. r. Ἀβιτόβα), a Benjamite, first named of the two sons of Shaharaim by his second wife, Baara or Hodesh, in Moab (1 Chron. viii, 11). B.C. cir. 1612. See SHAHARAIM.

Abi'ud, a Grecized form (Matt. i, 13) of the name ABIHUD (q. v.).

Abiyonah. See CAPER.

Abjuration (I), in the Roman Church, a formal and solemn act by which heretics and those suspected of heresy denied and renounced it. In countries where the inquisition was established, three sorts of abjuration were practised: 1. Abjuration de formali, made by a notorious apostate or heretic; 2. Abjuration de rechement, made by a Roman Catholic strongly suspected of heresy; 3. Abjuration de veri, made by a Roman Catholic only slightly suspected. (II.) In England, the oath of abjuration is an oath by which an obligation was come under not to acknowledge any right in the Pretender to the throne of England. It is also used to signify an oath ordained by the 25th of Charles II, abjuring particular doctrines of the Church of Rome. (See S. G. WALK, De Heresi Abjuranda, Regiom. 1821; Von d. Abschöpfung der Simonie, in Henke's Encyclopädie, i, 184 sq.) See HERETIC.

Able (or Abel), THOMAS, chaplain to queen Catherine, wife of Henry VIII of England. He took the degree of M.A. at Oxford, in 1516, and subsequently that of D.D. He vehemently opposed the divorce of the king and queen, and wrote a treatise on the subject in 1530, entitled De non dissolubendo Henrici et Catharine matrimonio. He was also a strenuous opponent of the king's supremacy, for which he was hanged at Smithfield in 1540 (Hook, Eccles. Biog. i, 45).

Ablution (I), the ceremonial washing, whereby, as a symbol of purification from uncleanness, a person was considered (1.) to be cleansed from the taint of an inferior and less pure condition, and initiated into a higher and purer state; (2.) to be cleansed from the soil of common life, and fitted for special acts of religious service; (3.) to be cleansed from defilements contracted by particular acts or circumstances, and restored to the privileges of ordinary life; (4.) as absolving or purifying himself, or declaring himself absolved and purified, from the guilt of a particular act. We do not meet with any such ablutions in patriarchal times; but under the Mosaic dispensation they are all indicated. See LUSTRATION; SPRINKLING.

A marked example of the first kind of ablution occurs when Aaron and his sons, on their being set apart for the priesthood, were washed with water before they were invested with the priestly robes and anointed with the holy oil (Lev. viii, 6). To this head we are inclined to refer the ablution of persons and raiment which was required of the whole of the Israelites, as a preparation to their receiving the law from Sinai (Exod. xix, 10-15). We also find examples of this kind of purification in connection with initiation into some higher state both among the Hebrews and in other nations. Thus those admitted into the mysteries of Eleusis were previously purified on the banks of the Ilissus by water being poured upon them by the Hydranos (Polyan. v, 17; iii, 11). See CONSECRATION.

The second kind of ablution was that which required the priests, on pain of death, to wash their hands and their feet before they approached the altar of God (Exod. xxx, 17-21). For this purpose a large basin of water was provided both at the tabernacle and at the temple. See LAVER. To this the Psalmist alludes when he says, "I will wash my hands in innocency, and so will I compass thine altar" (Ps. xxvi, 6). Hence it became the custom in the early Christian Church for the ministers, in the view of the congregation, to wash their hands in a basin of water brought by the deacon, at the commencement of the communion (Jamieson, p. 126); and this practice, or something like it, is still retained in the Eastern churches, as well as in the Church of Rome, when mass is celebrated. See HOLY WATER. Similar ablutions by the priests before proceeding to perform the more sacred ceremonies were usual among the heathen (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Chernips). The Egyptian priests indeed carried the practice to a burdensome extent (Wilkinson, i, 324, abridgm.), from which the Jewish priests were, perhaps designedly, exonerated; and in their less torrid climate it was, for purposes of real cleanliness, less needful. Reservoirs of water were attached to the Egyptian temples; and Herodotus (ii, 37) informs us that the priests shaved the whole of their bodies every third day, that no insect or other filth might be upon them when they served the gods, and that they washed themselves in cold water twice every day and twice every night; Porphyry says thrice a day, with a nocturnal ablution occasionally. This kind of ablution, as preparatory to a religious act, answers to the simple wudu of the Moslems, which they are required to go through five times daily before their stated prayers (see Lane, Mod. Eg. i, 94 sq.), besides other private purifications of a more formal character (see Reland, De Relig. Moh. p. 80-83). This makes the ceremonies of ablution much more conspicuous to a traveller in the Moslem East at the present day than they would appear among the ancient Jews, seeing that the law imposed this obligation on the priests only, not on the people. Connected as these Moslem ablutions are with various forms and imitative ceremonies, and recurring so frequently as they do, the avowedly heavy yoke of even the Mosaic law seems light in the comparison. See BATH.

In the third class of ablutions washing is regarded as a purification from positive defilements. The Mosaic law recognises eleven species of uncleanness of this nature (Lev. xii-xv), the purification for which ceased at the end of a certain period, provided the unclean person then washed his body and his clothes; but in a few cases, such as leprosy and the defilement contracted by touching a dead body, he remained unclean seven days after the physical cause of pollution had ceased. This was all that the law required; but in later times, when the Jews began to refine upon it, these cases were considered generic instead of specific—as representing classes instead of individual cases of defilement—and the causes of pollution requiring purification by water thus came to be greatly increased. This kind of ablution for substantial uncleanness answers to the Moslem ghusl (Lane, ib. p. 99; Reland, ib. p. 66-77), in which the causes of defilement greatly exceed those of the Mosaic law, while they are perhaps equalled in number and minuteness by those which the later Jews devised. The uncleanness in this class arises chiefly from the natural secretions of human beings and of beasts used for food, and from the ordure of animals not used for food; and, as among the Jews, the defilement may be communicated not only to persons, but to clothes, utensils, and dwellings—in all which cases the purification must be made by water, or by some representative act where water cannot be applied. Thus in drought or sickness the rinsing of the hands and face may be performed with dry sand or dust, a ceremony that is termed tayammum (Lane, ib.). See UNCLEANNESS.

Of the last class of ablutions, by which persons declared themselves free from the guilt of a particular action, the most remarkable instance is that which occurs in the expiation for an unknown murder, when the elders of the nearest village washed their hands over the expiatory heifer, beheaded in the valley, saying, "Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it" (Deut. xxi, 1-9). It has been thought by some that the signal act of Pilate, when he washed his hands in water and declared himself innocent of the blood of Jesus (Matt. xxvii, 24), was a designed adoption of the Jewish custom; but this supposition does not appear necessary, as the practice was also common among the Greeks and Romans (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Lustratio). See MURDER.

Other practices not indicated in the law appear to have existed at a very early period, or to have grown up in the course of time. From 1 Sam. xvi, 5, compared with Exod. xix, 10-14, we learn that it was usual for those who presented or provided a sacrifice to purify themselves by ablution; and as this was everywhere a general practice, it may be supposed to have existed in patriarchal times, and, being an established and approved custom, not to have required to be mentioned in the law. There is a passage in the apocryphal book of Judith (xii, 7-9) which has been thought to intimate that the Jews performed ablutions before prayer. But we cannot fairly deduce that meaning from it (comp. Ruth iii, 3); since it is connected with the anointing (q. v.), which was a customary token of festivity (see Arnald, in loc.). It would indeed prove too much if so understood, as Judith bathed in the water, which is more than even the Moslems do before their prayers. Moreover, the authority, if clear, would not be conclusive. See PURIFICATION.

But after the rise of the sect of the Pharisees, the practice of ablution was carried to such excess, from the affectation of extraordinary purity, that it is repeatedly brought under our notice in the New Testament through the several animal versions of our Saviour on the consummate hypericry involved in this fastidious attention to the external types of moral purity, while the heart was left unclean (e. g. Matt. xxiii. 25). All the practices there exposed come under the head of purification from uncleanness; the acts involving which were made so numerous that persons of the stricter sect could scarcely move without contracting some involuntary pollution. For this reason they never entered their houses without abluion, from the strong probability that they had unknowingly contracted some defilement in the streets; and they were especially careful never to eat without washing the hands (Mark vii. 1-5), because they were peculiarly liable to be defiled; and as unclean hands were held to communicate uncleanness to all food (excepting fruit) which they touched, it was deemed that there was no security against eating unclean food but by always washing the hands ceremonially before touching any meat. We say "ceremonially," because this article refers only to ceremonial washing. The Israelites, who, like other Orientals, fed with their fingers, washed their hands before meals for the sake of cleanliness. See EATING. But these customary washings were distinct from the ceremonial ablutions, as they are now among the Moslems. There were, indeed, distinct names for them. The former was called simply netilah, or washing, in which water was poured upon the hands; the latter was called tebilah, plunging, because the hands were immersed in water (Lightfoot on Mark vii. 4). It was this last, namely, the ceremonial abluion, which the Pharisees judged to be so necessary. When, therefore, some of that sect remarked that our Lord's disciples ate "with unwashed hands" (Mark vii. 2), it is not to be understood literally that they did not at all wash their hands, but that they did not plunge them ceremonially according to their own practice (πυργύ, not "oft," as in the Auth. Vers., but with the fist, q. d. "up to the elbow," as Theophylact interprets). And this was expected from them only as the disciples of a religious teacher; for these refinements were not practised by the class of people from which the disciples were chiefly drawn. Their wonder was, that Jesus had not inculcated this observance on his followers, and not, as some have fancied, that he had enjoined them to neglect what had been their previous practice. (See Otho, Lex. Rab. s. v. Lotio.) See WASIT.

In at least an equal degree the Pharisees multiplied the ceremonial pollutions which required the abluion of inanimate objects—"cups and pots, brazen vessels and tables"—the rules given in the law (Lev. vi. 28; xi. 32-36; xv. 23) being extended to these multiplied contaminations. Articles of earthenware which were of little value were to be broken, and those of metal and wood were to be scoured and rinsed with water. All these matters are fully described by Buxtorf, Lightfoot, Schöttgen, Gill, and other writers of the same class, who present many striking illustrations of the passages of Scripture which refer to them. The Mohammedan usages of abluion, which offer very clear analogies, are fully detailed in the third book of the Mishkat ul-Masabih (or "Collection of Mussulman Traditions," translated from the Arabic by A. N. Matthews, Calcutta, 1809, 2 vols. 4to), and also in D'Oshson's Tableau, liv. i. chap. i.—Kitto, s. v. See BAPTISM.

(11.) In the Roman Church abluion is a liturgical term, denoting the use of wine and water by the priest, after communion, to cleanse the chalice and his fingers. Two ablutions are made in the mass. 1. Wine alone is poured into the chalice, in order to disengage the particles, of either kind, which may be left adhering to the vessel, and is afterward drunk by the priest. 2. Wine and water are poured upon the priest's fingers into the chalice (see Boissonnet, Dict. des Rites, i. 65). See MASS.

(11.) In the Greek Church, abluion is a ceremony observed seven days after Baptism, wherein the unction of the chrism is washed off from those who have been baptized (King, Greek Church). See CHRISM.

Abnaïm (rather OBNAÏM). See STOOL.

Ab'ner (Heb. Abner, אֲבִנֵר, once in its full form Abner, אֲבִנֵרִים, 1 Sam. xiv. 50, father of light, i. e. Lightning; Sept. Αβνεργο, Josephus Αβναγιος, Ant. vi. 4, 3, elsewhere Αβνεργος), the son of Ner (q. v.) and uncle of Saul (being the brother of his father Kish), and the commander-in-chief of his army (1 Sam. xiv. 50 sq.), in which character he appears several times during the early history of David (1 Sam. xvii. 55; xx. 25; xxvi. 5 sq.; 1 Chron. xxvi. 28). It was through his instrumentality that David was first introduced to Saul's court after the victory over Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 57), B.C. 1063; and it was he whom David sarcastically addressed when accompanying his master in the pursuit of his life at Hachilah (1 Sam. xxvi. 14), B.C. 1055. After the death of Saul (B.C. 1053), the experience which he had acquired, and the character for ability and decision which he had established in Israel, enabled him to uphold the falling house of Saul for seven years; and he might probably have done so longer if it had suited his views (2 Sam. ii. 6, 10; v. 5; comp. vi. 1). It was generally known that David had been divinely nominated to succeed Saul on the throne: when, therefore, that monarch was slain in the battle of Gilboa, David was made king over his own tribe of Judah, and reigned in Hebron, the old capital. In the other tribes an influence adverse to Judah existed, and was controlled chiefly by the tribe of Ephraim. Abner, with great decision, availed himself of this state of feeling, and turned it to the advantage of the house to which he belonged, of which he was now the most important surviving member. He did not, however, venture to propose himself as king; but took Ishbosheth, a surviving son of Saul, whose known imbecility had excused his absence from the fatal fight in which his father and brothers perished, and made him king over the tribes, and ruled in his name (2 Sam. ii. 8). This event appears to have occurred five years after Saul's death (2 Sam. ii. 10; comp. 11), an interim that was probably occupied in plans for settling the succession, to which Ishbosheth may have been at first disinclined. See ISHOSHETH. Nor, perhaps, had the Israelites sooner than this recovered sufficiently from the oppression by the Philistines that would be sure to follow the disaster upon Mount Gilboa to reassert their independence, at least throughout Palestine proper. Accordingly Ishbosheth reigned in Mahanaim, beyond Jordan, and David in Hebron. A sort of desultory warfare continued for two years between them, in which the advantage appears to have been always on the side of David (2 Sam. ii. 1). The only one of the engagements of which we have a particular account is that which ensued when Joab, David's general, and Abner met and fought at Gibeon (2 Sam. ii. 12 sq.), B.C. 1048. Abner was beaten, and fled for his life; but was pursued by Asahel (the brother of Joab and Abi-hai), who was "swift of foot as a wild roe." Abner, dreading a blood-feud with Joab, for whom he seems to have entertained a sincere respect, entreated Asahel to desist from the pursuit; but finding that he was still followed, and that his life was in danger, he at length ran his pursuer through the body by a back thrust with the pointed heel of his spear (2 Sam. ii, 18-32). This put a strife of blood between the two foremost men in all Israel (after David); for the law of honor, which had from times before the law prevailed among the Hebrews, and which still prevails in Arabia, rendered it the conventional duty of Joab to avenge the blood of his brother upon the person by whom he had been slain. See BLOOD-REVENGE.

As time went on Abner had occasion to feel more strongly that he was himself not only the chief, but the only remaining prop of the house of Saul; and this conviction, acting upon a proud and arrogant spirit, led him to more presumptuous conduct than even the mildness of the feeble Ishbosheth could suffer to pass without question. See ANSALOM; ADOXIAN. He took to his own harem a woman named Rizpah, who had been a concubine-wife of Saul (2 Sam. iii, 7 sq.). This act, from the ideas connected with the harem of a deceased king (comp. Josephus, Apion, i, 15; Herod. iii, 68), was not only a great impropriety, but was open to the suspicion of a political design, which Abner may very possibly have entertained. See HAREM. A mild rebuke from the nominal king, however, enraged him greatly; and he plainly declared that he would henceforth abandon his cause and devote himself to the interests of David. To excuse this desertion to his own mind, he then and on other occasions avowed his knowledge that the son of Jesse had been appointed by the Lord to reign over all Israel; but he appears to have been unconscious that this avowal exposed his previous conduct to more censure than it offered excuse for his present. He, however, kept his word with Ishbosheth. After a tour, during which he explained his present views to the elders of the tribes which still adhered to the house of Saul, he repaired to Hebron with authority to make certain overtures to David on their behalf (2 Sam. iii, 12 sq.). He was received with great attention and respect; and David even thought it prudent to promise that he should still have the chief command of the armies when the desired union of the two kingdoms took place (De Pacto Davidis et Abneri, in the Crit. Sac. Thes. Nov. i, 651). The political expediency of this engagement is very clear, and to that expediency the interests and claims of Joab were sacrificed. That distinguished personage happened to be absent from Hebron on service at the time, but he returned just as Abner had left the city. He speedily understood what had passed; and his dread of the superior influence which such a man as Abner might establish with David (see Josephus, Ant. vii, 1, 5) quickened his remembrance of the vengeance which his brother's blood required. His purpose was promptly formed. Unknown to the king, but apparently in his name, he sent a message after Abner to call him back; and as he returned, Joab met him at the gate, and, leading him aside as if to confer peaceably and privately with him, suddenly thrust his sword into his body, B.C. 1046. The lamentations of David, the public mourning, which he ordered, and the funeral honors which were paid to the remains of Abner (2 Sam. iv, 12), the king himself following the bier as chief mourner, exonerated him in public opinion from having been privy to this assassination (2 Sam. iii, 31-39; comp. 1 Kings ii, 5, 32). As for Joab, his privilege as a blood-avenger must to a great extent have justified his treacherous act in the opinion of the people; and that, together with his influence with the army, screened him from punishment. See JOAB.

David's short but emphatic lament over Abner (2 Sam. iii, 33, 34) may be rendered, with strict adherence to the form of the original (see Ewald, Dich- ter des alten Bundes, i, 99; comp. Lowth, Heb. Poetry, xxii), as follows:

As a villain dies, should Abner die?
Thy hands not bound,
And thy feet not brought into fetters;
As one falls before the sons of mallee, fellest thou!

As to the sense of the words, J. D. Michaelis (Uebersetzung des alten Test.) saw that the point of this indignant, more than sorrowful, lament, lies in the mode in which Abner was slain. Joab professed to kill him "for the blood of Asahel, his brother" (2 Sam. iii, 27). But if a man claimed his brother's blood at the hand of his murderer, the latter (even if he fled to the altar for refuge, Exod. xxi, 14) would have been delivered up (bound, hand and foot, it is assumed) to the avenger of blood, who would then possess a legal right to slay him. Now Joab not only had no title to claim the right of the Goel, as Asahel was killed under justifying circumstances (2 Sam. ii, 19); but, while pretending to exercise the avenger's right, he took a lawless and private mode of satisfaction, and committed a murder. Hence David charged him, in allusion to this conduct, with "shedding the blood of war in peace" (1 Kings ii, 5); and hence he expresses himself in this lament, as if indignant that the noble Abner, instead of being surrendered with the formalities of the law to meet an authorized penalty, was treacherously stabbed like a worthless fellow by the hands of an assassin.—Kitto, s. v. See HOMICIDE.

We find the name of a son of Abner, Jaasiel, subsequently appointed phylarch, under Solomon, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. xxvii, 21). (On the character of Abner, see Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.; Niemeyer, Charakterist. iv, 343 sq. On his death, see C. Simeon, Works, iii, 327; H. Lindsay, Lectures, ii, 50; R. Abomination (פִּגְמוֹת, pigmoth, filthy stench, Lev. vii, 18; "abominable," Lev. xix, 7; Isa. lxx, 4; Ezek. iv, 14; פְּגָמָה, shikkath), Deut. xxix, 17; 1 Kings xi, 5, 7; 2 Kings xxiii, 13, 24; 2 Chron. xv, 8; Isa. lxxvi, 3; Jer. iv, 1; vii, 30; xiii, 27; xvi, 18; xxxii, 34; Ezek. v, 11; vii, 20; xi, 18, 21; xx, 7, 8, 30; xxxvii, 23; Dan. ix, 27; xi, 31; xii, 11; Hos. ix, 10; Nah. iii, 6; Zech. ix, 7; and פְּגָמָה, she'keth, filth, Lev. vii, 21; xi, 10, 11, 12, 13, 20, 33, 41, 42; Isa. lxxvi, 17; Ezek. viii, 10; elsewhere פְּגָמָה, to'ebah, abhorrence; Sept. βδέλυγμα, and so N. T., Matt. xxiv, 14; Mark xiii, 14; Luke xvi, 15; Rev. xvii, 4, 5; xxi, 27), any object of detestation or disgust (Lev. xviii, 22; Deut. vii, 25); and applied to an impure or detestable action (Ezek. xxii, 11; xxx, 26; Mal. ii, 11, etc.); to any thing causing a ceremonial pollution (Gen. xliii, 32; xlv, 34; Deut. xiv, 3); but more especially to idols (Lev. xviii, 22; xx, 13; Deut. vii, 26; 1 Kings xi, 5, 7; 2 Kings xxiii, 13); and also to food offered to idols (Zech. ix, 7); and to filth of every kind (Nah. iii, 6). There are several texts in which the word occurs, to which, on account of their peculiar interest or difficulty, especial attention has been drawn. See IDOLATRY.

The first is Gen. xliii, 32: "The Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews, for that is an abomination (פְּגָמָה) unto the Egyptians." This is best explained by the fact that the Egyptians considered themselves ceremonially defiled if they ate with any strangers. The primary reason appears to have been that the cow was the most sacred animal among the Egyptians, and the eating of it was abhorrent to them; whereas it was both eaten and sacrificed by the Jews and most other nations, who, on that account, were abominable in their eyes. It was for this, as we learn from Herodotus (ii, 41), that no Egyptian man or woman would kiss a Greek on the mouth, or would use the cleaver of a Greek, or his spit, or his dish, or would taste the flesh of even clean beef (that is, of oxen) that had been cut with a Grecian carving-knife. It is true that Wilkinson (Anc. Egyptians, iii, 358) ascribes this to the disgust of the fastidiously-clean Egyptians at the comparatively foul habits of their Asiatic and other neighbors; but it seems scarcely fair to take the facts of the father of history, and ascribe them to any other than the very satisfactory reasons which he assigns for them. We collect, then, that it was as foreigners, not pointedly as Hebrews, that it was an abomination for the Egyptians to eat with the brethren of Joseph. The Jews themselves subsequently exemplified the same practice; for in later times they held it unlawful to eat or drink with foreigners in their houses, or even to enter their dwellings (John xviii, 28; Acts x, 28; xi, 3); for not only were the houses of Gentiles unclean (Mishna, Ohaloth, xviii, 7), but they themselves rendered unclean those in whose house they lodged (Maimonides, Misheeb a Markeb, xii, 12) which was carrying the matter farther than the Egyptians (see also Mithrath Toru, 148). We do not trace these instances, however, before the Captivity (see J. D. Winkler, Animadvers. Philol. ii, 175 sq.). See UNCLEANNESS.

The second passage is Gen. xli, 34. Joseph is telling his brethren how to conduct themselves when introduced to the king of Egypt; and he instructs them that when asked concerning their occupation they should answer, "Thy servants' trade hath been about cattle from our youth even until now, both we and also our fathers." This last clause has emphasis, as showing that they were hereditary nomade pastors; and the reason is added, "That ye may dwell in the land of Goshen, for every shepherd is an abomination (הַבְּרִיָּה) unto the Egyptians." In the former instance they were "an abomination" as strangers, with whom the Egyptians could not eat; here they are a further abomination as nomade shepherds, whom it was certain that the Egyptians, for that reason, would locate in the border land of Goshen, and not in the heart of the country. That it was nomade shepherds, or Bedouins, and not simply shepherds, who were abominable to the Egyptians, is evinced by the fact that the Egyptians themselves paid great attention to the rearing of cattle. This is shown by their sculptures and paintings, as well as by the offer of this very king of Egypt to make such of Jacob's sons as were men of activity "overseers of his cattle" (xlvii, 6). For this aversion to nomade pastors two reasons are given; and it is not necessary that we should choose between them, for both of them were, it is most likely, concurrently true. One is, that the inhabitants of Lower and Middle Egypt had previously been invaded by, and had remained for many years subject to, a tribe of nomade shepherds, who had only of late been expelled, and a native dynasty restored—the grievous oppression of the Egyptians by these pastoral invaders, and the insult with which their religion had been treated. See Hyksos. The other reason, not necessarily superseding the former, but rather strengthening it, is that the Egyptians, as a settled and civilized people, detested the lawless and predatory habits of the wandering shepherd tribes, which then, as now, bounded the valley of the Nile and occupied the Arabias—a state of feeling which modern travellers describe as still existing between the Bedouin and fellahs of modern Egypt, and indeed between the same classes everywhere in Turkey, Persia, and the neighboring regions (see Critical Sac. Thes. Nov. i, 220). See SHEPHERD.

The third marked use of this word again occurs in Egypt. The king tells the Israelites to offer to their god the sacrifices which they desired, without going to the desert for that purpose. To this Moses objects that they should have to sacrifice to the Lord "the abomination (הַבְּרִיָּה) of the Egyptians," who would thereby be highly exasperated against them (Exod. viii, 26). A reference back to the first explanation shows that this "abomination" was the cow, the only animal which all the Egyptians agreed in holding sacred; whereas, in the great sacrifice which the Hebrews proposed to hold, not only would heifers be offered, but the people would feast upon their flesh (see J. C. Dietric, Antiquitates, p. 136). See ARIS.

A fourth expression of marked import is the ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION (שְׁמֵת הַמְּדִינָה, Dan. xi, 31; Sept. βδέλυγμα ἱερουσαλῶν, or βδέλυγμα ἱερουσαλῶν, Dan. xii, 11; Sept. τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐπιμώσεως, literally, filthiness of the desolation, or, rather, desolating filthiness), which, without doubt, means the idol or idolatrous apparatus which the desolator of Jerusalem should establish in the holy place (see Hitzig, in loc.). This appears to have been (in its first application) a prediction of the pollution of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, who caused an idolatrous altar to be built on the altar of burnt offerings, whereon unclean things were offered to Jupiter Olympius, to whom the temple itself was dedicated (see Hoffman, in loc.). Josephus distinctly refers to this as the accomplishment of Daniel's prophecy; as does the author of the first book of Maccabees, in declaring that "they set up the abomination of desolation (τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐπιμώσεως) upon the altar" (1 Macc. i, 59; vi, 7; 2 Macc. vi, 2-5; Joseph. Ant. xii, 5, 4; xii, 7, 6). The phrase is quoted by Jesus in the same form (Matt. xxiv, 15), and is applied by him to what was to take place at the advance of the Romans against Jerusalem. They who saw "the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place" were enjoined to "flee to the mountains." This may with probability be referred to the advance of the Roman army against the city with their image-crowned standards, to which idolatrous honors were paid, and which the Jews regarded as idols. The unexpected retreat and discomfiture of the Roman forces afforded such as were mindful of our Saviour's prophecy an opportunity of obeying the injunction which it contained. That the Jews themselves regarded the Roman standards as abominations is shown by the fact that, in deference to their known aversion, the Roman soldiers quartered in Jerusalem forbore to introduce their standards into the city; and on one occasion, when Pilate gave orders that they should be carried in by night, so much stir was made in the matter by the principal inhabitants that, for the sake of peace, the governor was eventually induced to give up the point (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 3, 1). Those, however, who suppose that "the holy place" of the text must be the temple itself, may find the accomplishment of the prediction in the fact that, when the city had been taken by the Romans and the holy house destroyed, the soldiers brought their standards in due form to the temple, set them up over the eastern gate, and offered sacrifice to them (Joseph. War, vi, 6, 1); for (as Havercamp notes from Tertullian, Apol. c. xvi, 162) "almost the entire religion of the Roman camp consisted in worshipping the ensigns, swearing by the ensigns, and in preferring the ensigns before all the other gods." Nor was this the last appearance of "the abomination of desolation in the holy place;" for not only did Hadrian, with studied insult to the Jews, set up the figure of a boar over the Bethlehem gate of the city (Ælia Capitolina) which rose upon the site and ruins of Jerusalem (Euseb. Chron. l. i, p. 45, ed. 1658), but he erected a temple to Jupiter upon the site of the Jewish temple (Dion Cass. lxxix, 12), and caused an image of himself to be set up in the part which answered to the most holy place (Nicephorus Callist. iii, 24). This was a consummation of all the abominations which the iniquities of the Jews brought upon their holy place (see Auberlen, Dan'el and the Revelation, p. 161 sq.). —KITTO, s. v. See JERUSALEM.

In Dan. ix, 27, the phrase is somewhat different and peculiar: כַּנְּפֵי עֹרֹת הַבַּיִת וְכַנְּפֵי הַבַּיִת, which (as pointed in the text) must be rendered, And upon the wing of filthiness that desolates, or (there shall be) a desolator; but the Sept. has ἐπὶ τῷ ἰσθμῷ βιβλίου τῶν ἐπισημῶσεων (v. r. τῆς ἐπισημῶσεως) ἔσται, Vulg. et crit. in templo abominatio desolationis; a sense that is followed by Christ in his allusion (Matt. xxiv, 15), and which may be attained by a slight change of pointing (כַּנְּפֵי in the "absolute"), and so rendering, "And upon the wing (of the sacred edifice there shall be) filthiness, even a desolator." Rosenmüller (Scholia in Vet. Test. in loc.) understands the "wing" (כַּנְּפֵי) to signify the hostile army or battalion detached for that purpose (a sense corresponding to the Latin ala), at the head of which the proud Gentile general should enter the city. Stuart, on the other hand (Commentary on Dan'el, in loc.), likewise interpreting the whole passage as denoting exclusively the pollution of the temple caused by Antiochus, translates the verse in question thus, "And over the winged-fowl of abominations shall be a waster," and applies the "wing" (כַּנְּפֵי, i. q. "fowl," in our version "overspreading") to a "statue of Jupiter Olympius erected in the temple; and this statue, as is well known, usually stood over an eagle at its feet with wide-spread wings." Both these interpretations, however, appear too fanciful. It is preferable to render כַּנְּפֵי, with Gesenius (Thesaur. Heb. p. 698), Fürst (Heb. Handb. s. v.), and the marginal translation, a battlement, i. e. of the temple, like περιβόλιον, in Matt. iv, 5; both words meaning literally a wing, and applied in each case to a corner or summit of the wall inclosing the temple. Neither can we so easily dispose of our Saviour's reference to this prophecy, since he speaks of it as about to be fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem. It appears to tally completely with that event in all its particulars, and to have had at most but a primary and typical fulfilment in the case of Antiochus (q. v.). (For the dates involved in this coincidence, see the Meth. Quar. Review, July, 1850, p. 494 sq.) See SEVENTY WEEKS. The distinction attempted by some (Alford and Olshausen, in loc.) between the events referred to in this passage and in Luke xxi, 20, is nugatory, for they are obviously parallel (see Strong's Harmony, § 123). Meyer (in loc.) thinks the pollution designated was but "the horrible desolation by the Romans of the temple area generally," but the terms are more explicit than this. The allusion cannot in any case be to a profanation of the sacred precincts by the Jews themselves, for the excesses of the Zealots (q. v.) during the final siege (Josephus, War, iv, 3, 7) were never directed to the introduction of idolatry there; whereas the first act of heathen occupancy was the erection of the standards crowned with the bird of victory—a circumstance that may be hinted at in the peculiar term "wing" here employed (see F. Nolan, Warburton Lect. p. 183). See BANNER.

A still more important difference among commentators, as to the meaning of the expression in question, has respect to the point, whether the abomination, which somehow should carry along with it the curse of desolation, ought to be understood of the idolatrous and corrupt practices which should inevitably draw down desolating inflictions of vengeance, or of the heathen powers and weapons of war that should be the immediate instruments of executing them. The following are the reasons assigned for understanding the expression of the former: 1. By far the most common use of the term abomination or abominations, when referring to spiritual things, and especially to things involving severe judgments and sweeping desolation, is in respect to idolatrous and other foul corruptions. It was the pollution of the first temple, or the worship connected with it by such things, which in a whole series of passages is described as the abominations that provoked God to lay it in ruins (2 Kings xxi, 2-13; Jer. vii, 10-14; Ezek. v, 11; vii, 8, 9, 20-25). And our Lord very distinctly intimated, by referring on another occasion to some of these passages, that as the same wickedness substantially was lifting itself up anew, the same retributions of evil might certainly be expected to chastise them (Matt. xxi, 13). 2. When reference is made to the prophecy in Daniel it is coupled with a word, "Whoso readeth let him understand," which seems evidently to point to a profound spiritual meaning in the prophecy, such as thoughtful and serious minds alone could apprehend. But this could only be the case if abominations in the moral sense were meant; for the defiling and desolating effect of heathen armies planting themselves in the holy place was what a child might perceive. Such dreadful and unseemly intruders were but the outward signs of the real abominations, which cried for vengeance in the ear of heaven. The compassing of Jerusalem with armies, therefore, mentioned in Luke xxi, 20, ready to bring the desolation, is not to be regarded as the same with the abomination of desolation; it indicated a farther stage of matters. 3. The abominations which were the cause of the desolations are ever spoken of as springing up from within, among the covenant people themselves, not as invasions from without. They are so represented in Daniel also (ch. xi, 30, 32; xii, 9, 10); and that the Jews themselves, the better sort of them at least, so understood the matter, is plain from 1 Macc. i, 54-57, where, with reference to the two passages of Daniel just noticed, the heathen-inclined party in Israel are represented, in the time of Antiochus, as the real persons who "set up the abomination of desolation and built idol altars;" comp. also 2 Macc. iv, 15-17. (See Hengstenberg on the Genuineness of Daniel, ch. iii, § 3; and Christology, at Dan. ix, 27, with the authorities there referred to.) These arguments, however, seem to be outweighed by the conclusive historical fact that the material ensigns of paganism were actually erected both by the Syrian and Roman conquerors in the place in question, and in so plainly physical a prediction, it is most natural to suppose that both Daniel and our Lord intended to refer to this palpable circumstance. See DESOLATION.

Abraham, Abrenabel, or Abravanal (also called ABARBANEL, ABRAVENEL, BARBANELLA, RAVANELLA), ISAAC, a famous rabbi, born at Lisbon, 1437. He was descended from an ancient and distinguished Jewish family, which claimed to be able to trace their pedigree to king David. He was a favorite of Alphonso V of Portugal, but after that king's death he was charged with certain misdemeanors and compelled to quit Portugal. He took refuge in Castile, where he obtained (1484) employment under Ferdinand and Isabella; but, in 1492, with the rest of the Jews, he was driven out of the kingdom. He went at first (1493) to Naples, where he gained the confidence of king Ferdinand I. After the conquest of Naples by Charles VIII of France, he followed Alphonso II to Italy. After the death of Alphonso he flew to Corfu, then (1496) to Monopoli, a town of Apulia, and ultimately (1503) to Venice, in which city he became very popular by terminating a conflict between the Venetians and the Portuguese. He finally died at Venice, 1508. His body was brought to Padua, and there buried with the greatest honors on the part of the republic of Venice. Abrahamel was an indefatigable student and writer, and is placed by the Jews almost in the same rank with Maimonides. He wrote bitterly against Christianity, but his commentaries are nevertheless much esteemed, as he is very careful in illustrating the literal sense of the text. The most important of them are, פְּרִישׁ הַתּוֹרָה, a Commentary on the Pentateuch (fol. Venice, 1579, and later; best ed. by Van Bashuyzen, fol. Hanau, 1710); פְּרִישׁ רַשְׁתֵּי תּוֹרָה, a Commentary on the Early Prophets [Josh.—Kings] (fol. Pesaro, 1522; Naples, 1543; best ed. by Pfeiffer and Christiani, Leipzig, 1686); פְּרִישׁ סֵפֶר הַנְּבִיאִים, a Commentary on the [properly so called] Prophets (fol. Pesaro, 1520; best ed. Amst. 1641); פְּרִישׁ סֵפֶר דָּנִיֵּאל, a Commentary on Daniel (4to, Naples, s. d.; Ferrara, 1651, and later; best ed. Venice, 1652). This commentary contains the strongest invectives against Christ and the Christians, though some of them are omitted in the second edition (see De Rossi, Bibl. Jud. Antich., p. 7 sq.), and it therefore called forth a large number of refutations from Danz, C. l'Empereur, Seb. Schnell, Pfeiffer, Koppen, Brand, H. Gebhard, J. Fr. Weidler, and C. G. Mundinus. Latin translations were published of the Commentaries on Nahum and Habakkuk by J. Meyer (in his Notes to Seder Olam); of the commentary on Haggai by Scherzer (Trifol. Or., Lips. 1663 and 1672), and Abicht (Select. Rabb. Phil.); of the commentaries on Malachi by J. Meyer (Hamburg, 1685). A translation of the whole commentary was made, but not published, by a former Jew at Vienna. The preface to this work by Rabbi Baruch gives an essay on the life and the writings of Abrahamel, compiled from his works. He also wrote הַשְׁמָרָה (herald of salvation), an explanation of the principal Messianic passages of the Old Testament, in which work a complete system of the views of the Jewish theology concerning the Messiah is given. This work, in which Abrahamel gives full scope to his animosity against the Christians, was prepared by him at Monopoli, and for the first time published (in 4to) without the name of place (probably at Salonichi) in 1526 (again, Amsterdam, 1644; Offenbach, 1767). A Latin translation, under the title Præco Salutis, was published by H. May (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1712, 4to), who, in the room of a preface, gives a biography of Abrahamel. פְּרִישׁ הַשְׁמָרָה (head of security), a treatise on the articles of the Jewish faith (first ed., Constantinople, 1505, fol.), פְּרִישׁ הַשְׁמָרָה (crowns of old men), one of the first works of the author, in which he treats of the different kinds of prophecy (first printed at Sabionetta, 1537, 4to). פְּרִישׁ מַעֲשֵׂי הָאֱלֹהִים (works of God), a philosophical treatise on the creation of the world, in which he argues against the assumption of an eternity of the world (Venice, 1592, 4to). Several works of Abrahamel have not been printed yet. The proposal of Bashuyzen to issue a complete edition of all the works of Abrahamel has never been executed. All his works were in Hebrew, but many of his Dissertations have been translated into Latin by Buxtorf (4to, Basil, 1660) and others. Although he spent many years at royal courts, Abrahamel, in one of his works, expressed very decided republican opinions. He left two sons, one of whom distinguished himself as a physician and as the author of an Italian poem, Diálogo d'Amore; the other embraced the Christian religion. The son of the latter published at Venice, in 1552, a collection of Hebrew letters.—Winer, Theol. Lit., vol. i; Fürst, Bib. Jud., i, 11 sq.; Jost, Gesch. d. Juden, viii, 104; Wolf, *Biblioth. Abracadabra, a magical word of factitious origin, like most alliterative incantations. It is found on one of the amulets under which the Basilidian heretics were supposed to conceal the name of God. It was derived from the Syrian worship, and was recommended as a magical charm against ague and fever. It is described by Serenus Sammonicus (the elder), who is usually classed, apparently without reason, among the followers of Basilides (q. v.). The word was written in a kind of inverted cone, omitting the last letter every time it is repeated. The lines of Serenus (De Medicina) which describe it are as follows:

"Mortiferum magis est, quod Græcis hemitritumum
Vulgatur verbis, hoc nostrâ dicere lingua
Non potuere ulli, nec voluere parentes.
Inseribis chartæ, quod dicitur Abracadabra,
Serpens et subter repetis, sed detrahe summam,
Et magis atque magis desint elementa figuris
Singulis, quæ semper r. pios, et cætera fecerit, Donec in angustum redigerit litera conum.
His lino nexis collum redimere memento," &c.

Different opinions have been advanced as to the origin and meaning of the word. Basnage ascribed it to an Egyptian, Beausobre a Greek, others a Hebrew origin, but Grotfend (in Ersch and Gruber, Encycl. s. v.) tries to prove that it is of Persian (or rather Pehlevi) origin. As Greek amulets are inscribed with ΑΒΡΑΚΑΔΑΒΡΑ, he considers it certain that the word ought to be pronounced Abracadabra. He derives it from the Persian Abrasar (the name of the Supreme Being) and the Chaldee word אֲבִרָא (the utterance), so that the meaning of it is "a divine oracle." This explanation, Grotfend thinks, throws some light on other magical words which the Basilidians used in nearly the same manner as the Thibetans and Mongolians their Homammi Peme-Ium; as the Palendrones Ablanuthomaba and Anuromna.—Lardner, Works, viii, 683; C. F. Ducange, Glossarium, s. v. See ABRAXAS.

A'braham (Heb. Abraham, אַבְרָהָם, father of a multitude; Sept. and N. T. Ἀβραάμ, Josephus, Ἀβραάμ), the founder of the Hebrew nation. Up to Gen. xvii, 4, 5 (also in 1 Chron. i, 27; Neh. ix, 7), he is uniformly called ABRAM (Heb. Abram, אַבְרָם, father of elevation, or high father; Sept. Ἀβραάμ); but the extended form there given to it is significant of the promise of a numerous posterity which was at the same time made to him. See infra.

I. History.—Abraham was a native of Chaldaea, and descended, through Heber, in the ninth generation, from Shem the son of Noah (see F. Lee, Dissertations, ii, 78 sq.). His father was Terah, who had two other sons, Nahor and Haran. Haran died prematurely "before his father," leaving a son, Lot, and two daughters, Milcah and Iscah. Lot attached himself to his uncle Abraham; Milcah became the wife of her uncle Nahor; and Iscah, who was also called Sarai, became the wife of Abraham (Gen. xi, 26-29; comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 6, 5). See ISCAH. Abraham was born A.M. 2009, B.C. 2164, in "Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. xi, 28). The concise history in Genesis states nothing concerning the portion of his life prior to the age of about 70. There are indeed traditions, but they are too manifestly built up on the foundation of a few obscure intimations in Scripture to be entitled to any credit (see Weil's Biblical Legends). Thus it is intimated in Josh. xxiv, 2, that Terah and his family "served other gods" beyond the Euphrates; and on this has been found the romance that Terah was not only a worshipper, but a maker of idols; that the youthful Abraham, discovering the futility of such gods, destroyed all those his father had made, and justified the act in various conversations and arguments with Terah, which we find repeated at length. Again, "Ur of the Chaldees" was the name of the place where Abraham was born, and from which he went forth to go, he knew not whither, at the call of God. Now Ur (𐎠𐎺𐎢) means fire; and we may therefore read that he came forth from the fire of the Chaldees, on which has been built the story that Abraham was, for his disbelief in the established idols, cast by king Nimrod into a burning furnace, from which he was by special miracle delivered. And to this the premature death of Haran has suggested the addition that he, by way of punishment for his disbelief of the truths for which Abraham suffered, was marvellously destroyed by the same fire from which his brother was still more marvellously preserved. Again, the fact that Chaldaea was the region in which astronomy was reputed to have been first cultivated, suggested that Abraham brought astronomy westward, and that he even taught that science to the Egyptians (Josephus, Ant. i, 8). It is just to Josephus to state that most of these stories are rejected by him, although the tone of some of his remarks is in agreement with them. Abraham is, by way of eminence, named first, but it appears that he was not the oldest (nor probably the youngest, but rather the second) of Terah's sons, born (perhaps by a second wife) when his father was 130 years old (see N. Alexander, Hist. Eccl. i, 287 sq.). Terah was seventy years old when the eldest son was born (Gen. xi, 32; xii, 4; xx, 12; comp. Hales, ii, 107); and that eldest son appears to have been Haran, from the fact that his brothers married his daughters, and that his daughter Sarai was only ten years younger than his brother Abraham (Gen. xvii, 17). Abraham must have been about 70 years old when the family quitted their native city of Ur, and went and abode in Charran (for he was 75 years old when he left Haran, and his stay there could not well have been longer than five years at most). The reason for this movement does not appear in the Old Testament. Josephus alleges that Terah could not bear to remain in the place where Haran had died (Ant. i, 6, 5); while the apocryphal book of Judith, in conformity with the traditions still current among the Jews and Moslems, affirms that they were cast forth because they would no longer worship the gods of the land (Judith v, 6-8). The real cause transpires in Acts vii, 2-4: "The God of glory appeared to our father Abraham while he was (at Ur of the Chaldees) in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Depart from thy land, and from thy kindred, and come hither to a land which I will shew thee. Then departing from the land of the Chaldees, he dwelt in Charran." This first call is not recorded, but only implied in Gen. xii; and it is distinguished by several pointed circumstances from the second, which alone is there mentioned. Accordingly Abraham departed, and his family, including his aged father, removed with him. They proceeded not at once to the land of Canaan, which, indeed, had not been yet indicated to Abraham as his destination; but they came to Haran, and tarried at that convenient station for five current years, until Terah died, at the age of 205 years. Being free from his filial duties, Abraham, now 75 years of age, received a second and more pointed call to pursue his destination: "Depart from thy land and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto the land which I will shew thee" (Gen. xii, 1). The difference of the two calls is obvious; in the former the land is indefinite, being designed only for a temporary residence; in the latter it is definite, intimating a permanent abode. A third condition was also annexed to the latter call, that he should separate from his father's house, and leave his brother Nahor's family behind him in Charran. He, however, took with him his nephew Lot, whom, having no children of his own, he appears to have regarded as his heir, and then went forth, "not knowing whither he went" (Heb. xi, 8), but trusting implicitly to the Divine guidance. (See Philo, Opera, i, 436; ii, 43; Saurin, Discours, i, 161; Dissert. p. 92; Simeon, Works, i, 100; Roberts, Sermans, p. 52; Hunter, Sac. Bïog. p. 55 sq.). See UR; HARAN.

Abraham probably took the same route as Jacob afterward, along the valley of the Jabbok, to the land of Canaan, which he found thinly occupied by the Canaanites, in a large number of small independent communities, who cultivated the districts around their several towns, leaving ample pasture-grounds for wandering shepherds. In Mesopotamia the family had been pastoral, but dwelling in towns and houses, and sending out the flocks and herds under the care of shepherds. But the migratory life to which Abraham had now been called compelled him to take to the tent-dwelling as well as the pastoral life; and the usages which his subsequent history indicates are therefore found to present a condition of manners and habits analogous to that which still exists among the nomadic pastoral or Bedouin tribes of south-western Asia. The rich pastures in that part of the country tempted Abraham to form his first encampment in the vale of Moreh, which lies between the mountains of Ebal and Gerizim. Here the strong faith which had brought the childless man thus far from his home was rewarded by the grand promise: "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing; and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee: and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii, 2, 3). It was further promised that to his posterity should be given the rich heritage of that beautiful country into which he had come (v. 7). It will be seen that this important promise consisted of two parts—the one temporal, the other spiritual. The temporal was the promise of posterity; that he should be blessed himself, and be the founder of a great nation; the spiritual, that he should be the chosen ancestor of the Redeemer, who had been of old obscurely predicted (Gen. iii, 15), and thereby become the means of blessing all the families of the earth. The implied condition on his part was that he should publicly profess the worship of the true God in this more tolerant land; and, accordingly, "he built there an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him." He soon after, perhaps in consequence of the jealousy of the Canaanites, removed to the strong mountain-district between Bethel and Ai, where he also built an altar to that "JEHOVAH" whom the world was then hastening to forget. His farther removals tended southward, until at length a famine in Palestine compelled him to withdraw into Egypt, where corn abounded. Here his apprehension that the beauty of his wife Sarai might bring him into danger with the dusky Egyptians overcame his faith and rectitude, and he gave out that she was his sister (comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 8, 1). As he had feared, the beauty of the fair stranger excited the admiration of the Egyptians, and at length reached the ears of the king, who forthwith exercised his regal right of calling her to his harem, and to this Abraham, appearing as only her brother, was obliged to submit (comp. Josephus, War. v, 9, 4). As, however, the king had no intention to act harshly in the exercise of his privilege, he loaded Abraham with valuable gifts, suited to his condition, being chiefly in slaves and cattle. These presents could not have been refused by him without an insult which, under all the circumstances, the king did not deserve. A grievous disease inflicted on Pharaoh and his household relieved Sarai from her danger by revealing to the king that she was a married woman; on which he sent for Abraham, and, after rebuking him for his conduct, restored his wife to him, and recommended him to withdraw from the country. The period of his stay in Egypt is not recorded, but it is from this time that his wealth and power appear to have begun (Gen. xii, 16). If the dominion of the Hyksos in Memphis is to be referred to this epoch, as seems not improbable [see EGYPT], then, since they were kin to the Hebrews, it is not impossible that Abram may have taken part in their war of conquest, and so have had another recommendation to the favor of Pharaoh. He accordingly returned to the land of Canaan, much richer than when he left it "in cattle, in silver, and in gold" (Gen. xiii, 2). It was probably on his way back that his sojourn in the territories of Abimelech, king of Gerar, occurred. This period was one of growth in power and wealth, as the respect of Abimelech, and his alarm for the future, so natural in the chief of a race of conquering invaders, very clearly shows. Abram's settlement at Beersheba, on the borders of the desert, near the Amalekite plunderers, shows both that he needed room, and was able to protect himself and his flocks. It is true, the order of the narrative seems to place this event some twenty-three years later, after the destruction of Sodom; but Sarah's advanced age at that time precludes the possibility of her seizure by the Philistine king. By a most extraordinary infatuation, Abraham allowed himself to stoop to the same mean and foolish prevarication in denying his wife which had just occasioned him so much trouble in Egypt. The result was also similar [see ABIMELECH], except that Abraham answered the rebuke of the Philistine by stating the fears by which he had been actuated, adding, "And yet indeed she is my sister; she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother; and she became my wife." This mends the matter very little, since, in calling her his sister, he designed to be understood as saying she was not his wife. As he elsewhere calls Lot his "brother," this statement that Sarah was his "sister" does not interfere with the probability that she was his niece. The occurrence, however, broke up his encampment there, and expedited the return of the entire party northward. Lot also had much increased his possessions; and after their return to their previous station near Bethel, the disputes between their respective shepherds about water and pasturage soon taught them that they had better separate. The recent promise of posterity to Abraham himself, although his wife had been accounted barren, probably tended also in some degree to weaken the tie by which the uncle and nephew had hitherto been united. The subject was broached by Abraham, who generously conceded to Lot the choice of pasture-grounds. Lot chose the well-watered plain in which Sodom and other towns were situated, and removed thither. See Lot. Thus was accomplished the dissolution of a connection which had been formed before the promise of children was given, and the disruption of which appears to have been necessary for that complete isolation of the coming race which the Divine purpose required. Immediately afterward the patriarch was cheered and encouraged by a more distinct and formal reiteration of the promises which had been previously made to him of the occupation of the land in which he lived by a posterity numerous as the dust (see M. Weber, Proles et salus Abraham promissa, Viteb. 1787). Not long after, he removed to the pleasant valley of Mamre, in the neighborhood of Hebron (then called Arba), situated in the direct line of communication with Egypt, and opening down to the wilderness and pasture-land of Beersheba, and pitched his tent under a terebinth-tree (Gen. xiii). This very position, so different from the mountain-fastness of Ai, marks the change in the numbers and powers of his clan.

It appears that fourteen years before this time the south and east of Palestine had been invaded by a king called Chedorlaomer, from beyond the Euphrates, who brought several of the small disunited states of those quarters under tribute (comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 10, 1). Among them were the five cities of the plain of Sodom, to which Lot had withdrawn. This burden was borne impatiently by these states, and they at length withheld their tribute. This brought upon them a ravaging visitation from Chedorlaomer and four other (perhaps tributary) kings, who scoured the whole country east of the Jordan, and ended by defeating the kings of the plain, plundering their towns, and carrying the people away as slaves. Lot was among the sufferers. When this came to the ears of Abraham he immediately armed such of his slaves as were fit for war, in number 318, and being joined by the friendly Amoritic chiefs, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre, pursued the retiring invaders. They were overtaken near the springs of the Jordan; and their camp being attacked on opposite sides by night, they were thrown into disorder, and fled (see Thomson's Land and Book, i, 320 sq.). Abraham and his men pursued them as far as the neighborhood of Damascus, and then returned with all the men and goods which had been taken away (comp. Buckingham, Mezop. i, 274). Although Abraham had no doubt been chiefly induced to undertake this exploit by his regard for Lot, it involved so large a benefit that, as the act of a sojourner, it must have tended greatly to enhance the character and power of the patriarch in the view of the inhabitants at large. When they had arrived as far as Salem on their return (see Thomson, ii, 211 sq.), the king of that place, Melchizedek, who was one of the few native princes, if not the only one, that retained the knowledge and worship of "the Most High God," whom Abraham served, came forth to meet them with refreshments, in acknowledgment for which, and in recognition of his character, Abraham presented him with a tenth of the spoils. By strict right, founded on the war usages which still subsist in Arabia (Burckhardt's Notes, p. 97), the recovered goods became the property of Abraham, and not of those to whom they originally belonged. This was acknowledged by the king of Sodom, who met the victors in the valley near Salem. He said, "Give me the persons, and keep the goods to thyself." But with becoming pride, and with a disinterestedness which in that country would now be most unusual in similar circumstances, he answered, "I have lifted up mine hand [i. e. I have sworn] unto Jehovah, the most high God, that I will not take from a thread even to a sandal-thing, and that I will not take any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldst say, I have made Abram rich" (Gen. xiv). The history of his attack on Chedorlaomer gives us a specimen of the view which would be taken of him by the external world. By the way in which it speaks of him as "Abram the Hebrew," it would seem to be an older document, a fragment of Canaanitish history preserved and sanctioned by Moses. The invasion was clearly another northern immigration or foray, for the chiefs or kings were of Shinar (Babylonia), Ellasar (Assyria?), Elam (Persia), etc.; that it was not the first is evident from the vassalage of the kings of the cities of the plain; and it extended (see Gen. xiv, 5-7) far to the south, over a wide tract of country. The patriarch appears here as the head of a small confederacy of chiefs, powerful enough to venture on a long pursuit to the head of the valley of the Jordan, to attack with success a large force, and not only to rescue Lot, but to roll back for a time the stream of northern immigration. His high position is seen in the gratitude of the people, and the dignity with which he refuses the character of a hireling. That it did not elate him above measure is evident from his reverence to Melchizedek, in whom he recognised one whose call was equal and consecrated rank superior to his own. See MELCHIZEDEK.

Soon after his return to Mamre the faith of Abraham was rewarded and encouraged, not only by a more distinct and detailed repetition of the promises formerly made to him, but by the confirmation of a solemn covenant contracted, as nearly as might be, "after the manner of men," between him and God. See COVENANT. It was now that he first understood that his promised posterity were to grow up into a nation under foreign bondage; and that, in 400 years after (or, strictly, 405 years, counting from the birth of Isaac to the exode), they should come forth from that bondage as a nation, to take possession of the land in which he sojourned (Gen. xiv). After ten years' residence in Canaan (B.C. 2078), Sarai being then 75 years old, and having long been accounted barren, chose to put her own interpretation upon the promised blessing of a progeny to Abraham, and persuaded him to take her woman-slave Hagar, an Egyptian, as a secondary, or concubine-wife, with the view that whatever child might proceed from this union should be accounted her own. See HAGAR. The son who was born to Abraham by Hagar, and who received the name of Ishmael [see ISHMAEL], was accordingly brought up as the heir of his father and of the promises (Gen. xvi). Thirteen years after, when Abraham was 99 years old, he was favored with still more explicit declarations of the Divine purposes. He was reminded that the promise to him was that he should be the father of many nations; and to indicate this intention his name was now changed (see C. Iken, De mutatione nominum Abrahami et Saræ, in his Dissert. Philol. i) from ABRAM to ABRAHAM (see Philo, Opp. i, 588; comp. Aikin, Vor. Hist. ii, 32; Euseb, Præp. Ev. xi, 6; Ewald, Isr. Gesch. i, 373; Lengerke, Ken. i, 227). See NAME. The Divine Being then solemnly renewed the covenant to be a God to him and to the race that should spring from him; and in token of that covenant directed that he and his should receive in their flesh the sign of circumcision. See CIRCUMCISION. Abundant blessings were promised to Ishmael; but it was then first announced, in distinct terms, that the heir of the special promises was not yet born, and that the barren Sarai, then 90 years old, should twelve months thence be his mother. Then also her name was changed from Sarai to Sarah (princess); and, to commemorate the laughter with which the prostrate patriarch received such strange tidings, it was directed that the name of Isaac (laughter) should be given to the future child. The very same day, in obedience to the Divine ordinance, Abraham himself, his son Ishmael, and his house-born and purchased slaves, were all circumcised (Gen. xvii), spring, B.C. 2064. Three months after this, as Abraham sat in his tent door during the heat of the day, he saw three travellers approaching, and hastened to meet them, and hospitably pressed upon them refreshment and rest (Dreist, De tribus viris Abrahamo appar. Doct. 1707). They assented, and under the shade of a terebinth, or rather an oak (q. v.) tree, partook of the abundant fare which the patriarch and his wife provided, while Abraham himself stood by in respectful attendance, in accordance with Oriental customs (see Shaw, Trav. i, 207; comp. Iliad. ix, 205 sq.; xxiv, 621; Odys. viii, 59; Judg. vi, 19). From the manner in which one of the strangers spoke, Abraham soon gathered that his visitants were no other than the Lord himself and two attendant angels in human form (see J. R. Kiesseling, De divinis Abrahami hospitibus, Lips. 1748). The promise of a son by Sarah was renewed; and when Sarah herself, who overheard this within the tent, laughed inwardly at the tidings, which, on account of her great age, she at first disbelieved, she incurred the striking rebuke, "Is any thing too hard for Jehovah?" The strangers then addressed themselves to their journey, and Abraham walked some way with them. The two angels went forward in the direction of Sodom, while the Lord made known to him that, for their enormous iniquities, Sodom and the other "cities of the plain" were about to be made signal monuments of his wrath and of his moral government. Moved by compassion and by remembrance of Lot, the patriarch ventured, reverently but perseveringly, to intercede for the doomed Sodom; and at length obtained a promise that, if but ten righteous men were found therein, the whole city should be saved for their sake. Early the next morning Abraham arose to ascertain the result of this concession; and when he looked toward Sodom, the smoke of its destruction, rising "like the smoke of a furnace," made known to him its terrible overthrow (Gen. xix, 1-28). See SODOM. Tradition still points out the supposed site of this appearance of the Lord to Abraham. About a mile from Hebron is a beautiful and massive oak, which still bears Abraham's name (Thomson, Land and Book. i, 375; ii, 414). The residence of the patriarch was called "the oaks (A. V. "plain") of Mamre" (Gen. xiii, 18; xviii, 1); but the exact spot is doubtful, since the tradition in the time of Josephus (Jar. iv, 9, 7) was attached to a terebinth. See MAMRE. This latter tree no longer remains; but there is no doubt that it stood within the ancient inclosure, which is still called "Abraham's House." A fair was held beneath it in the time of Constantine; and it remained to the time of Theodosius (Robinson, ii, 443; Stanley, Palestine, p. 142).—The same year Sarah gave birth to the long-promised son, and, according to previous direction, the name of Isaac was given to him. See ISAAC. This greatly altered the position of Ishmael, who had hitherto appeared as the heir both of the temporal and the spiritual heritage; whereas he had now to share the former, and could not but know that the latter was limited to Isaac. This appears to have created much ill-feeling both on his part and that of his mother toward the child; which was in some way manifested so pointedly, on occasion of the festivities which attended the weaning, that the wrath of Sarah was awakened, and she insisted that both Hagar and her son should be sent away. This was a very hard matter to a loving father; and Abraham was so much pained that he would probably have refused compliance with Sarah's wish, had he not been apprised in a dream that it was in accordance with the Divine intentions respecting both Ishmael and Isaac. With his habitual uncompromising obedience, he then hastened them away early in the morning, with provision for the journey (Gen. xxi, 1-21), B.C. 2061. (See Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.) See HAGAR.

Again for a long period (25 years, Josephus, Ant. i, 13, 2) the history is silent; but, when Isaac was nearly grown up (B.C. cir. 2047), it pleased God to subject the faith of Abraham to a most severe trial (see H. Benzenberg, Nach mehr Rezensionen, Leipz. 1791, No. 5). He was commanded to go into the mountainous country of Moriah (probably where the temple afterward stood) [see MORIAH], and there offer up in sacrifice the son of his affection, and the heir of so many hopes and promises, which his death must nullify. (See Hufnagel, Christenth. Aufkär. i, vii, 592 sq.; J. G. Greneri, Comment. Miscel. Synag. Oldenb. 1794; Zeitschr. für Phil. u. kath. Theol. 20.) It is probable that human sacrifices already existed; and as, when they did exist, the offering of an only or beloved child was considered the most meritorious, it may have seemed reasonable to Abraham that he should not withhold from his own God the costly sacrifice which the heathen offered to their idols (comp. Hygin. Fab. 98; Tzetzes in Lycophr. 40, ed. Canter; see Apollodor. Bibl. i, 9, 1; Euseb. Præp. Ev. i, 10, p. 40). The trial and peculiar difficulty lay in the singular position of Isaac, and in the unlikelyhood that his loss could be supplied. But Abraham's faith shrunk not, assured that what God had promised he would certainly perform, and "that he was able to restore Isaac to him even from the dead" (Heb. xi, 17-19), and he rendered a ready, however painful, obedience. Assisted by two of his servants, he prepared wood suitable for the purpose, and without delay set out upon his melancholy journey. On the third day he descried the appointed place; and, informing his attendants that he and his son would go some distance farther to worship and then return, he proceeded to the spot. To the touching question of his son respecting the victim to be offered, the patriarch replied by expressing his faith that God himself would provide the sacrifice; and probably he availed himself of this opportunity of acquainting him with the Divine command. At least, that the communication was made either then or just after, is unquestionable; for no one can suppose that a young man could, against his will, have been bound with cords and laid out as a victim on the wood of the altar. Isaac would most certainly have been slain by his father's uplifted hand, had not the angel of Jehovah interposed at the critical moment to arrest the fatal stroke. A ram which had become entangled in a thicket was seized and offered; and a name was given to the place (Jehovah-Jirch—"the Lord will provide") allusive to the believing answer which Abraham had given to his son's inquiry respecting the victim. The promises before made to Abraham—of numerous descendants, superior in power to their enemies, and of the blessings which his spiritual progeny, and especially the Messiah, were to extend to all mankind—were again confirmed in the most solemn manner; for Jehovah swore by himself (comp. Heb. vi, 13, 17), that such should be the rewards of his uncompromising obedience (see C. F. Bauer, De Domini ad Abrahamum juramento, Viteb. 1746). The father and son then rejoined their servants, and returned rejoicing to Beersheba (Gen. xxi, 19).

Sarah died at the age of 120 years, being then at or near Hebron, B.C. 2027. This loss first taught Abraham the necessity of acquiring possession of a family sepulchre in the land of his sojourning (see J. S. Semler, De patriarcharum ut in Palestina sepeliretur desiderio, Hal. 1756). His choice fell on the cave of Machpelah (q. v.), and after a striking negotiation [see BARGAIN] with the owner in the gate of Hebron, he purchased it, and had it legally secured to him, with the field in which it stood and the trees that grew thereon (see Thomson's Land and Book, ii, 381 sq.). This was the only possession he ever had in the Land of Promise (Gen. xxiii). The next care of Abraham was to provide a suitable wife for his son Isaac. It has always been the practice among pastoral tribes to keep up the family ties by intermarriages of blood-relations (Burekhardt, Notes, p. 154); and now Abraham had a further inducement in the desire to maintain the purity of the separated race from foreign and idolatrous connections. He therefore sent his aged and confidential steward Eliezer (q. v.), under the bond of a solemn oath to discharge his mission faithfully, to renew the intercourse between his family and that of his brother Nahor, whom he had left behind in Charran. He prospered in his important mission, and in due time returned, bringing with him Rebeckah (q. v.), the daughter of Nahor's son Bethuel, who became the wife of Isaac, and was installed as chief lady of the camp, in the separate tent which Sarah had occupied (Gen. xxiv). Some time after Abraham himself took a wife named Keturah, by whom he had several children. See KETURAH. These, together with Ishmael, seem to have been portioned off by their father in his lifetime, and sent into the east and south-east, that there might be no danger of their interference with Isaac, the divinely appointed heir. There was time for this: for Abraham lived to the age of 175 years, 100 of which he had spent in the land of Canaan. He died B.C. 1989, and was buried by his two eldest sons in the family sepulchre which he had purchased of the Hittites (Gen. xxv, 1-10).—Kitto, s. v.

H. Traditions and Literature.—The Orientals, as well Christians and Mohammedans, have preserved some knowledge of Abraham, and highly commend his character; indeed, a history of his life, though it would be highly fanciful, might easily be compiled from their traditions. Arabic accounts name his father Azar (Abulfeda, Hist. Ant. p. 21), with which some have compared the contemporary Adores, king of Damascus (Justin. xxxvi, 2; see Josephus, Ant. i, 7, 2; Bertheau, Israel. Gesch. p. 217). His mother's name is given as Adna (Herbelot, Bih. Orient. s. v. Abraham). The Persian magi believe him to have been the same with their founder, Zerdost, or Zoroaster; while the Zalmians, their rivals and opponents, lay claim to a similar honor (Hyde, Kol. Persar. p. 28 sq.). Some have affirmed that he reigned at Damascus (Nicol. Damasc. apud Josephus, Ant. i, 7, 2; Justin. xxxvi), that he dwelt long in Egypt (Artapan. et Eupolem. apud Euseb. Præp. ix, 17, 18), that he taught the Egyptians astronomy and arithmetic (Joseph. Ant. i, 8, 2), that he invented letters and the Hebrew language (Suidas in Abraham), or the characters of the Syrians and Chaldeans (Isidor. Hispal. Orig. i, 3), that he was the author of several works, among others of the famous book entitled Jezeira, or the Creation—a work mentioned in the Talmud, and greatly valued by some rabbins; but those who have examined it without prejudice speak of it with contempt. See CABALA. In the first ages of Christianity, the heretics called Sethians published "Abraham's Revelations" (Epiphani. Hæres. xxxix, 5). Athanasius, in his Synopsis, speaks of the "Assumption of Abraham;" and Origen (in Lac. Homil. 35) notices an apocryphal book of Abraham's, wherein two angels, one good, the other bad, dispute concerning his damnation or salvation. The Jews (Rab. Selem, in Baba Bathra, c. i) attribute to him the Morning Prayer, the 81st Psalm, a Treatise on Idolatry, and other works. The authorities on all these points, and for still other traditions respecting Abraham, may be found collected in Fabricii Cod. Pseudepigr. V. T. i, 344 sq.; Eisenmenger, Entd. Judæoth. i, 490; Otho, Læx. Rabb. p. 2 sq.; Beck, ad Targ. Chron. ii, 267; Stanley, Jewish Church, p. 2 sq.

We are informed (D'Herbelot, ut sup.) that, A.D. 1119, Abraham's tomb was discovered near Hebron, in which Jacob, likewise, and Isaac were interred. The bodies were found entire, and many gold and silver lamps were found in the place. The Mohammedans have so great a respect for his tomb, that they make it their fourth pilgrimage (the three others being Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem). See HERMON. The Christians built a church over the cave of Machpelah, where Abraham was buried, which the Turks have changed into a mosque, and forbidden Christians from approaching (Quaresm. Eluail. ii, 772). The supposed oak of Mamre, where Abraham received the three angels, was likewise honored by Christians, as also by the Jews and Pagans (see above). The Koran (iv, 124) entitles him "the friend of God" (see Michaelis, Orien. Bibl. iv, 167 sq.; Withof, De Abrah. Amico Dei, Duisb. 1743; Kurcz, Hist. of Old Cor. § 51-68).

III. Typical Character.—The life and character of Abraham were in many respects typical. 1. He and his family may be regarded as a type of the Church of God in after ages. They, indeed, constituted God's ancient Church. Not that many scattered patriarchal and family churches did not remain; such was that of Melchizedek; but a visible church relation was established between Abraham's family and the Most High, signified by the visible and distinguishing sacrament of circumcision, and followed by new and enlarged revelations of truth. Two purposes were to be answered by this—the preservation of the true doctrine of salvation in the world, which is the great and solemn duty of every branch of the Church of God, and the manifestation of that truth to others. Both were done by Abraham. Wherever he sojourned he built his altars to the true God, and publicly celebrated his worship; and, as we learn from the Apostle Paul, he lived in tents in preference to settling in the land of Canaan, though it had been given to him for a possession, in order that he might thus proclaim his faith in the eternal inheritance of which Canaan was a type (Gal. iii, 16-29). 2. The numerous natural posterity promised to Abraham was also a type of the spiritual seed, the true members of the Church of Christ, springing from the Messiah, of whom Isaac was the symbol. Thus the Apostle Paul expressly distinguishes between the fleshly and the spiritual seed of Abraham (Gal. iv, 22-31). 3. The faithful offering up of Isaac, with its result, was probably the transaction in which Abraham, more clearly than in any other, "saw the day of Christ, and was glad" (John viii, 56). He received Isaac from the dead, says Paul, "in a figure" (Heb. xi, 19). This could be a figure of nothing but the resurrection of our Lord; and if so, Isaac's being laid upon the altar was a figure of his sacrificial death, scenically and most impressively represented to Abraham. 4. The transaction of the expulsion of Hagar was also a type. It was an allegory in action, by which the Apostle Paul teaches us (Gal. iv, 22-31) to understand that the son of the bondwoman represented those who are under the law; and the child of the freewoman those who by faith in Christ are supernaturally begotten into the family of God. The casting out of the bondwoman and her son represents also the expulsion of the unbelieving Jews from the Church of God, which was to be composed of true believers of all nations, all of whom, whether Jews or Gentiles, were to become "fellow heirs."

IV. Covenant Relation.—1. Abraham is to be regarded, further, as standing in a federal or covenant relation, not only to his natural seed, but specially and eminently to all believers. "The Gospel," we are told by Paul (Gal. iii, 8), "was preached to Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." "Abraham believed in God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness;" in other words, he was justified (Gen. xv, 6). A covenant of gratuitous justification through faith was made with him and his believing descendants; and the rite of circumcision, which was not confined to his posterity by Sarah, but appointed in every branch of his family, was the sign or sacrament of this covenant of grace, and so remained till it was displaced by the sacraments appointed by Christ. Wherever that sign was, it declared the doctrine and offered the grace of this covenant—free justification by faith, and its glorious results—to all the tribes that proceeded from Abraham. This same grace is offered to us by the Gospel, who become "Abraham's seed," his spiritual children, with whom the covenant is established through the same faith, and are thus made "the heirs with him of the same promise."

2. Abraham is also exhibited to us as the representative of true believers; and in this especially, that the true nature of faith was exhibited in him. This great principle was marked in Abraham with the following characters: an entire, unhesitating belief in the word of God; an unflinching trust in all his promises; a steady regard to his almighty power, leading him to overlook all apparent difficulties and impossibilities in every case where God had explicitly promised; and habitual, cheerful, and entire obedience. The Apostle has described faith in Heb. xi, 1, and that faith is seen living and acting in all its energy in Abraham. (Niemeyer, Charakt. ii, 72 sq.)

V. The intended offering up of Isaac is not to be supposed as viewed by Abraham as an act springing out of the Pagan practice of human sacrifice, although this may have somewhat lessened the shock which the command would otherwise have occasioned his natural sympathies. The immolation of human victims, particularly of that which was most precious, the favorite, the first-born child, appears to have been a common usage among many early nations, more especially the tribes by which Abraham was surrounded. It was the distinguishing rite among the worshippers of Moloch; at a later period of the Jewish history, it was practised by a king of Moab; and it was undoubtedly derived by the Carthaginians from their Phœnician ancestors on the shores of Syria. Where it was an ordinary usage, as in the worship of Moloch, it was in unison with the character of the religion and of its deity. It was the last act of a dark and sanguinary superstition, which rose by regular gradation to this complete triumph over human nature. The god who was propitiated by these offerings had been satiated with more cheap and vulgar victims; he had been glutted to the full with human suffering and with human blood. In general, it was the final mark of the subjugation of the national mind to an inhuman and domineering priesthood. But the Mosaic religion held human sacrifices in abhorrence; and the God of the Abrahamic family, uniformly beneficent, had imposed no duties which entailed human suffering, had demanded no offerings which were repugnant to the better feelings of our nature. The command to offer Isaac as a "burnt-offering" was, for these reasons, a trial the more severe to Abraham's faith. He must, therefore, have been fully assured of the Divine command, and he left the mystery to be explained by God himself. His was a simple act of unhesitating obedience to the command of God; the last proof of perfect reliance on the certain accomplishment of the Divine promises. Isaac, so miraculously bestowed, could be as miraculously restored; Abraham, such is the comment of the Christian Apostle, "believed that God could even raise him up from the dead" (Heb. xi, 17).

VI. The wide and deep impression made by the character of Abraham upon the ancient world is proved by the reverence which people of almost all nations and countries have paid to him, and the manner in which the events of his life have been interwoven in their mythology and their religious traditions. Jews, Magians, Sabians, Indians, and Mohammedans have claimed him as the great patriarch and founder of their several sects; and his history has been embellished with a variety of fictions. The ethnological relations of the race of Abraham have been lately treated by Ewald (Geschichte des Volkes Israel), and by Bertheau (Geschichte der Israeliten), who maintain that Abraham was the leader of tribes who migrated from Chaldea to the south-west. See ARABIA.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM (ὁ καθ' ἑσπέρην Ἀβραάμ). There was no name which conveyed to the Jews the same associations as that of Abraham. As undoubtedly he was in the highest state of felicity of which departed spirits are capable, "to be with Abraham" implied the enjoyment of the same felicity; and "to be in Abraham's bosom" meant to be in recess and happiness with him (comp. Josephus, De Macc. § 13; 4 Macc. xiii, 16). The latter phrase is obviously derived from the custom of sitting or reclining at table which prevailed among the Jews in and before the time of Christ. See ACCURATION. By this arrangement the head of one person was necessarily brought almost into the bosom of the one who sat above him, or at the top of the triclinium, and the guests were so arranged that the most favored were placed so as to bring them into that situation with respect to the host (comp. John xiii, 23; xxi, 20). See BOSOM. These Jewish images and modes of thought are amply illustrated by Lightfoot, Schöttgen, and Wettstein, who illustrate Scripture from rabbinical sources. It was quite usual to describe a just person as being with Abraham, or lying on Abraham's bosom; and as such images were unobjectionable, Jesus accommodated his speech to them, to render himself the more intelligible by familiar notions, when, in the beautiful parable of the rich man and Lazarus, he describes the condition of the latter after death under these conditions (Luke xvi, 22, 23).—Kitto, s. v. Abraham, A SANCTA CLARA, a Roman Catholic preacher, highly popular in Vienna, and remarkable for his eccentric writings. His family name was Ulrich Megerle, and he was born in Baden, 1642. In 1662 he entered the order of barefooted Augustinians, and became distinguished, as a preacher, for directness, tact, and pungency, mixed with rudeness. He died 1709. His sermons and other writings are contained in (unfinished) Sämmtliche Werke nach dem Originaltexte (Lindau, 20 vols. 1835-50). His Grammatica Religiosa, containing 55 sermons, was reprinted in Latin, 1719 (Colon. 4to).

Abraham, USQUE, a Portuguese Jew, who translated the celebrated Spanish Bible of the Jews, first printed at Ferrara, in 1553. It is translated word for word from the original, which fact, with the use of many old Spanish words, only employed in the synagogues, renders it very obscure. Asterisks (mostly omitted in the Holland ed. of 1639) are placed against certain words to denote that the exact meaning of the original Hebrew words is difficult to determine.—Fürst, Bib. Jud. iii, 463.

Abrahamites (1), a sect of heretics, named from their founder Abraham (or Ibrahim), of Antioch, A. D. 865. They were charged with the Paulician errors, and some of them with idolatry and licentiousness;

but for these charges we have only the word of their persecutors. See PAULICIANS. (2), a sect of Deists in Bohemia, who existed as late as 1782, and professed the religion of Abraham before his circumcision, admitting no scriptures but the decalogue and the Lord's prayer. They believed in one God, but rejected the Trinity, and other doctrines of revelation. They received the doctrines of original sin, the immortality of the soul, and future rewards and punishments. They were required by Joseph II to incorporate themselves with one of the religions tolerated in the empire; and, in case of non-compliance, threatened with banishment. As the result of obstinate refusal to comply with the imperial command, they were transported to Transylvania. Many persons are still found in Bohemia, between whom and the Abrahamites some connection may be traced. They are frequently called Nihilists and Deists. (See an anonymous Gesch. der Böhmischen Deisten (1785); Grégoire, Hist. des Sectes relig. v, 419 sq.)

A'bram, the original name (Gen. xvii, 5) of ABRAHAM (q. v.).

Abrazas (1) (ἀβράζας or ἀβράσαζ), a mystical word composed of the Greek letters α, β, γ, δ, ε, ζ, η, θ, which together, according to Greek numeration, make up the number 365. Basilides taught that there were 365 heavens between the earth and the empyrean, and as many different orders of angels; and he applied the Cabalistic name Abraxas to the Supreme Lord of all these heavens (Irenæus, lib. i, cap. xxiv, 67). See BASILIDES. In his system there was an imitation of the Pythagorean philosophy with regard to numbers, as well as an adoption of Egyptian hieroglyphical symbols. Jerome seems to intimate that this was done in imitation of the practice of thus representing Mithras, the deity of the Persians; or the sun, otherwise Apollo, the god of healing. For instance:

α	=	1	μ	=	40
β	=	2	ν	=	5
γ	=	100	ξ	=	10
α	=	1	θ	=	9
ε	=	60	ρ	=	100
α	=	1	α	=	1
ς	=	200	ς	=	200

Abrazas = 365 Meithras, or Mithras = 365

Probably Basilides intended, in this way, to express the number of intelligences which compose the Pleroma, or the Deity under various manifestations, or the sun, in which Pythagoras supposed that the intelligence resided which produced the world.—A few of the modes of deriving this term are subjoined. Belerman takes it from the Coptic, the ancient language of Egypt; the syllable sadsch which the Greeks were obliged to convert into σαζ, or σας, or σαζ, as the last letter of this word could only be expressed by Ξ, Σ, or Ζ) signifying "word," and abrak, "blessed, holy, adorable;" abrazas being, therefore, "adorable word." Others make it to signify "the new world." Beausobre derives it from ἀβράζ, which he renders magificent; and either αἰω, I save, or αἰ, suavity. Others find it to signify the mystery of the Trinity and of the divinity of Christ; they assume that it is composed of the initial letters of the following words: Ζῆς, father; ἱῆ, son; ἡγία, spirit; ἡγία, one (that is, one God); Χριστός, Christ; Ἀσθροσπος, man (that is, God-man); Σωτήρ, Saviour. See ABRACADABRA.

(2.) Abrazas Genus or Images.—A great number of relics (zeus and plates, or tablets of metal) have been discovered, chiefly in Egypt, bearing the word abrazas, or an image supposed to designate the god of that name. There has been much discussion about these relics, some regarding them as all of Basilidian origin; others holding them, in part or in whole, to be Egyptian. Descriptions of them may be found in Macarii Abrazas seu de Gen. Basil. Disquisitio, edited by Chifflet (Antw. 1657, 4to); Montfaucon, Talæogr.

Græc. lib. ii, cap. viii; Passeri, De Gemmis Basilidianis, in Gori, Thesaurus Gem. Astrif. (Flor. 1750, 3 vols. 4to); Bellermann, Ueb. die Gemmender Alten mit dem Abraxas-bilde (Berlin, 1817-1819); Walsh, Ancient Coins, Medals, etc. (Lond. 1828, 8vo); Kopp, Palæographia Critica (Mannh. 1827, pt. iv). Matter (in Herzog's Real-Encyclopædie, and in his Histoire du Gnosticisme, vol. iii) gives a classification of them which will tend greatly to facilitate their study. Some of them contain the Abraxas image alone, or with a shield, spear, or other emblems of Gnostic origin. Some have Jewish words (e. g. Jehovah, Adonai, etc.); others combine the Abraxas with Persian, Egyptian, or Grecian symbols. Montfaucon has divided these gems into seven classes. 1. Those having the head of a cock, the symbol of the sun; 2. Those having the head of a lion, expressive of the heat of the sun: these have the inscription Mitra; 3. Serapis; 4. Sphinxes, apes, and other animals; 5. Human figures, with the names of Iao, Sabaoth, Adonai, etc.; 6. Inscriptions without figures; 7. Monstrous forms. He gives 300 fac-similes of gems with different devices and inscriptions, one of which is shown in the accompanying cut from the collection of Viscount Strangford. It is of an oval form, convex on both sides, and both the surface of the stone and the impression of the sculpture highly polished.

Gnostic Gem.

On one side is represented a right line crossed by three curved ones, a figure very common on gnostic gems, and perhaps representing the golden "candlestick." This is surrounded by the legend ΑΒΡΑΧΑ ΙΑΩ, words also of very common use, and which are to be found either by themselves, or accompanied by every variety of figure. The word ΙΑΩ, in a variety of modifications, is also found on most of the gems of the Gnostics; and, next to Abraxas, seems to have been the most portentous and mysterious. It is generally supposed to be a corruption of the tetragrammaton, יהוה, or Jehovah, to which the Jews attached so awful an importance. Irenæus supposes it has allusion to the name by which the Divine character of Christ was expressed; as if the ΑΩ was intended to be the Alpha and Omega of the Revelation, and the characters ΙΑΩ stood for Jesus the "Redeemer, the first and the last." See Mosheim, Conn. i, 417; Matter, Hist. du Gnosticisme, t. iii; Neander, Gnost. System, 1818; Neander, Ch. Hist. i, 401; Lardner, Works, viii, 352 sq.; Jeremie, *Ch. See Gnosticism; BASILIDES.

Abrech (Heb. abrek', אַבְרֵחַ, Sept. κῆρον, Vulg. gena phetereon), a word that occurs only in the original of Gen. xli, 4, where it is used in proclaiming the authority of Joseph. Something similar happened in the case of Mordecai, but then several words were employed (Esth. vi, 11). If the word be Hebrew, it is probably an imperative (not directly, Buxtorf, Thes. Gramm. p. 134; nor the first pers. fut., as explained by Aben-Ezra, but the infin. absolute used imperatively, Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 19) of אַבְרֵחַ in Hiphil, and would then mean, as in our version, "bow the knee" (so the Vulg., Erpenius, Luther, Aquila, and the Ven. Gr. version). We are indeed assured by Wilkinson (Anc. Egyptians, ii, 24) that the word abrek is used to the present day by the Arabs when requiring a camel to kneel and receive its load. But Luther (subsequently) and others (e. g. Onkelos, the Targum, Syr. and Persic versions) suppose the word to be a compound of אֲבִי-רֵחַ, "the father of the state," and to be of Chaldee origin. The Sept. and Samar. understand vaguely a herald. It is, however, probably Egyptian, slightly modified so as to suit the Hebrew; and most later writers are inclined with De Rossi (Egyp. Egypt. p. 1) to repair to the Coptic, in which Abrech or Abrek means "bow the head"—an interpretation essentially agreeing with those of Pfeiffer (Opp. i, 94) and Jablonski (Opusc. i, 4, 5, ed. Water). See SALUTATION. But Origen (Hexapla, i, 49, ed. Montfaucon), a native of Egypt, and Jerome (Comment. in loc.), both of whom knew the Semitic languages, are of the opinion that Abrech means "a native Egyptian;" and when we consider how important it was that Joseph should cease to be regarded as a foreigner [see ABOMINATION], it has in this sense a significance, as a proclamation of naturalization, which no other interpretation conveys (see Ameside, De Abrech Egyptianor. Dresd. 1750). Osburn thinks the title still appears in Joseph's tomb as hb-resk, "royal priest" (Mon. Hist. of Eg. ii, 39).

Ab'salom (Heb. Abshalom, אֲבִישָׁלוֹם, fully Abishalom', אֲבִישָׁלוֹם, 1 Kings, xv, 2, 10, father of peace, i. e. peaceful; Sept. Ἀβισσαλὼμ, Josephus, Ἀψαλωμωρ, Ant. xiv, 4, 4), the name of three men.

1. The third son of David, and his only one (comp. 1 Kings i, 6) by Maacah, the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur (2 Sam. iii, 3; 1 Chron. iii, 2), born B.C. cir. 1050. He was particularly noted for his personal beauty, especially his profusion of hair, the inconvenient weight of which often (not necessarily "every year," as in the Auth. Vers.) compelled him to cut it off, when it was found to weigh "200 shekels after the king's weight"—an amount variously estimated from 112 ounces (Geddes) to 7½ ounces (A. Clarke), and, at least, designating an extraordinary quantity (2 Sam. xiv, 25-26; see Journal de Trévoux, 1702, p. 176; Dieckrichs, Ueb. d. Haare Absalom's, Gött. 1776; Handb. d. A. T. p. 142 sq.; Bochart, Opp. ii, 384).

David's other child by Maacah was a daughter named Tamar, who was also very beautiful. She became the object of lustful regard to her half-brother Amnon, David's eldest son; and was violated by him, in pursuance of a plot suggested by the artful Jonadab (2 Sam. xiii, 1-20), B.C. cir. 1033. See AMNON. In all cases where polygamy is allowed we find that the honor of a sister is in the guardianship of her full brother, more even than in that of her father, whose interest in her is considered less peculiar and intimate (see Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 39). We trace this notion even in the time of Jacob (Gen. xxxiv, 6, 13, 25 sq.). So in this case the wrong of Tamar was taken up by Absalom, who kept her secluded in his own house, and brooded silently over the injury he had sustained. It was not until two years had passed that Absalom found opportunity for the bloody revenge he had meditated. He then held a great sheep-shearing at Baal-hazor near Ephraim, to which he invited all the king's sons; and, to lull suspicion, he also solicited the presence of his father. As he expected, David declined for himself, but allowed Amnon and the other princes to attend. They feasted together; and when they were warm with wine Amnon was set upon and slain by the servants of Absalom, according to the previous directions of their master. The others fled to Jerusalem, filling the king with grief and horror by the tidings which they brought. Absalom hastened to Geshur, and remained there three years with his grandfather, king Tahai (2 Sam. xiii, 23-38). See GESHUR.

Absalom, with all his faults, was eminently dear to his father. David mourned every day after the banished fratricide, whom a regard for public opinion and a just horror of his crime forbade him to recall. His secret wishes to have home his beloved though guilty son were, however, discerned by Joab, who employed a clever woman of Tekoah to lay a supposed case before him for judgment; and she applied the anticipated decision so adroitly to the case of Absalom, that the king discovered the object and detected the interposition of Joab. Regarding this as in some degree expressing the sanction of public opinion, David gladly commissioned Joab to "call home his banished." Absalom returned; but David controlled his feelings, and declined to admit him to his presence. After two years, however, Absalom, impatient of his disgrace, found means to compel the attention of Joab to his case; and through him a complete reconciliation was thus effected, and the father once more indulged himself with the presence of his son (2 Sam. xiii, 39; xiv, 33), B.C. cir. 1027. Scarcely had he returned when he began to cherish aspirations to the throne, which he must have known was already pledged to another (see 2 Sam. vii, 12). His reckless ambition was probably only quickened by the fear lest Bathsheba's child should supplant him in the succession, to which he would feel himself entitled, as of royal birth on his mother's side as well as his father's, and as being now David's eldest surviving son, since we may infer that the second son, Chileab, was dead, from no mention being made of him after 2 Sam. iii, 3. It is harder to account for his temporary success, and the imminent danger which befell so powerful a government as his father's. The sin with Bathsheba had probably weakened David's moral and religious hold upon the people; and as he grew older he may have become less attentive to individual complaints, and that personal administration of justice which was one of an Eastern king's chief duties. The populace were disposed to regard Absalom's pretensions with favor; and by many arts he so succeeded in winning their affections that when, four years (the text has erroneously 40 years; comp. Josephus, Ant. vii, 9, 1; see Kennicott, Diss. p. 267; Ewald, Isr. Gesch. ii, 637) after his return from Geshur, he repaired to Hebron, and there proclaimed himself king, the great body of the people declared for him. It is probable that the great tribe of Judah had taken some offence at David's government, perhaps from finding themselves completely merged in one united Israel; and that they hoped secretly for pre-eminence under the less wise and liberal rule of his son. Thus Absalom selects Hebron, the old capital of Judah (now supplanted by Jerusalem), as the scene of the outbreak; Amasa, his chief captain, and Ahithophel of Giloh, his principal counsellor, are both of Judah, and, after the rebellion was crushed, we see signs of ill-feeling between Judah and the other tribes (xix, 41). But whatever the causes may have been, the revolt was at first completely successful. David found it expedient to quit Jerusalem and retire to Mahanaim, beyond the Jordan. When Absalom heard of this, he proceeded to Jerusalem and took possession of the throne without opposition. Among those who had joined him was Ahithophel, who had been David's counsellor, and whose profound sagacity caused his counsels to be regarded like oracles in Israel. This defection alarmed David more than any other single circumstance in the affair, and he persuaded his friend Hushai to go and join Absalom, in the hope that he might be made instrumental in turning the sagacious counsels of Ahithophel to foolishness. The first piece of advice which Ahithophel gave Absalom was that he should publicly take possession of that portion of his father's harem which had been left behind in Jerusalem; thus fulfilling Nathan's prophecy (2 Sam. xiii, 11). This was not only a mode by which the succession to the throne might be confirmed [see ABISHAG; comp. Herodotus, iii, 68], but in the present case, as suggested by the wily counsellor, this villainous measure would dispose the people to throw themselves the more unreservedly into his cause, from the assurance that no possibility of reconciliation between him and his father remained. But David had left friends who watched over his interests. Hushai had not then arrived. Soon after he came, when a council of war was held to consider the course of operations to be taken against David. Ahithophel counselled that the king should be pursued that very night, and smitten while he was "weary and weak handed, and before he had time to recover strength." Hushai, however, whose object was to gain time for David, speciously urged, from the known valor of the king, the possibility and disastrous consequences of a defeat, and advised that all Israel should be assailed against him in such force as it would be impossible for him to withstand. Finally for Absalom, the counsel of Hushai was preferred to that of Ahithophel; and time was thus afforded for the king, by the help of his influential followers, to collect his resources, as well as for the people to reflect upon the undertaking in which so many of them had embarked. David soon raised a large force, which he properly organized and separated into three divisions, commanded severally by Joab, Abishai, and Ittai of Gath. The king himself intended to take the chief command; but the people refused to allow him to risk his valued life, and the command then devolved upon Joab. The battle took place in the borders of the forest of Ephraim; and the tactics of Joab, in drawing the enemy into the wood, and there hemming them in, so that they were destroyed with ease, eventually, under the providence of God, decided the action against Absalom. Twenty thousand of his troops were slain, and the rest fled to their homes. Absalom himself fled on a swift mule; but as he went, the boughs of a terebinth (or oak; see Thomson's Land and Folk, i, 374; ii, 234) tree caught the long hair in which he gloried, and he was left suspended there (comp. Josephus, Ant. vii, 10, 2; Celsii Hierob. i, 45). The charge which David had given to the troops to respect the life of Absalom prevented any one from slaying him; but when Joab heard of it, he hastened to the spot and pierced him through with three darts. His body was then taken down and cast into a pit there in the forest, and a heap of stones was raised upon it as a sign of abhorrence (see Thomson, ibid. ii, 234). David's fondness for Absalom was unextinguished by all that had passed; and as he sat, awaiting tidings of the battle, at the gate of Mahanaim, he was probably more anxious to learn that Absalom lived than that the battle was gained; and no sooner did he hear that Absalom was dead, than he retired to the chamber above the gate, to give vent to his paternal anguish. The victors, as they returned, slunk into the town like criminals when they heard the bitter wailings of the king; "O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" The consequences of this weakness might have been most dangerous, had not Joab gone up to him, and, after sharply rebuking him for thus discouraging those who had risked their lives in his cause, induced him to go down and cheer the returning warriors by his presence (2 Sam. xv, 1; xix, 8; comp. Psa. iii, title), B.C. cir. 1023.—Kitto, s. v.

Absalom is elsewhere mentioned only in 2 Sam. xx, 6; 1 Kings ii, 7, 28; xv, 2, 10; 2 Chron. xi, 20, 21; from the last two of which passages he appears to have left only a daughter (having lost three sons, 2 Sam. xiv, 27; comp. xviii, 18), who was the grandmother of Abijah (q. v.). ABSALOM'S TOMB. A remarkable monument bearing this name a conspicuous figure in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, outside Jerusalem; and it has been noticed and described by almost all travellers. It is close by the lower bridge over the Kedron, and is a square isolated block hewn out from the rocky ledge so as to leave an area or niche around it. The body of this monument is about 21 feet square, and is ornamented on each side with two columns and two half columns of the Ionic order, with pilasters at the corners. The architrave exhibits triglyphs and Doric ornaments. The elevation is about 18 or 20 feet to the top of the architrave, and thus far it is wholly cut from the rock. But the adjacent rock is here not so high as in the adjoining tomb of Zechariah (so called), and therefore the upper part of the tomb has been carried up with mason-work of large stones. This consists, first, of two square layers, of which the upper one is smaller than the lower; and then a small dome or cupola runs up into a low spire, which appears to have spread out a little at the top, like an opening flume. This mason-work is perhaps 20 feet high, giving to the whole an elevation of about 40 feet. There is a small excavated chamber in the body of the tomb, into which a hole had been broken through one of the sides several centuries ago. Its present Mohammedan name is Tamur Ewvan (Biblioth. Sac. 1813, p. 34). The old travellers who refer to this tomb, as well as Calmet after them, are satisfied that they find the history of it in 2 Sam. xviii, 18, which states that Absalom, having no son, built a monument to keep his name in remembrance, and that this monument was called "Absalom's Place" (אֶבְסָלוֹם הַמָּקוֹם, Absalom's Place), as in the margin; Sept. Ἰεῖο Ἀβσαλώμ, Vulg. Manus Absalom), that is, index, memorial, or monument. See HAND. Later writers, however, dispute such a connection between this history and any of the existing monuments on this spot. "The style of architecture and embellishment," writes Dr. Robinson (Bib. Res. i, 519 sq.), "shows that they are of a later period than most of the other countless sepulchres round about the city, which, with few exceptions, are destitute of architectural ornament. But the foreign ecclesiastics, who crowded to Jerusalem in the fourth century, found these monuments here; and, of course, it became an object to refer them to persons mentioned in the Scriptures. Yet, from that day to this, tradition seems never to have become fully settled as to the individuals whose names they should bear. The Itin. Hieros. in A.D. 333 speaks of the two monolithic monuments as the tombs of Isaiah and Hezekiah. Adannus, about A.D. 697, mentions only one of these, and calls it the tomb of Jehoshaphat. . . . The historians of the Crusades appear not to have noticed these tombs. The first mention of a tomb of Absalom is by Benjamin of Tudela, who gives to the other the name of king Uzziiah; and from that time to the present day the accounts of travellers have been varying and inconsistent." Yet so eminent an architect as Prof. Cockerell speaks of this tomb of Absalom as a monument of antiquity, perfectly corresponding with the ancient notices (Athencurium, Jan. 28, 1843). Notwithstanding the above objections, therefore, we are inclined to identify the site of this monument with that of Scripture. Josephus (Ant. viii, 10, 3) says that it was "a marble pillar in the king's dale [the Valley of Jehoshaphat, which led to "the king's gardens"], two furlongs distant from Jerusalem," as if it were extant in his day. The simple monolith pillar may naturally have been replaced in after times by a more substantial monument. See PILLAR. It is worthy of remark that the tradition which connects it with Absalom is not a monkish one merely; the Jewish residents likewise, who would not be likely to borrow from Christian legends, have been in the habit from time immemorial of casting a stone at it and spitting, as they pass by it, in order to show their horror at the rebellious conduct of this unnatural son. (See Williams, Holy City, ii, 451; Olin's Travels, ii, 145; Pococke, East, ii, 34; Richter, Walf. p. 33; Rosenmüller's Ansichten von Palästina, ii, plate 14; Wilson, Lands of Bible, i, 488; Thomson's Land and Book, ii, 482; *Crit. 2. (Sept. Ἀβερᾶλομος.) The father of Matthias (1 Macc. xi, 70) and Jonathan (1 Macc. xiii, 11), two of the generals under the Maccabees.

3. (Sept. Ἀβσαλώμ.) One of the two Jews sent by Judas Maccabeus with a petition to the viceroy Lysias (2 Macc. xi, 17, in some "Absalon").

Abealon, or Axel, archbishop of Lund, in Sweden, and primate of the kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, was born in the island of Zealand, in 1125. After finishing his studies at Paris, he devoted himself to the priesthood, and was appointed bishop of Roeskilde in 1158. He was at the same time made prime-minister and general of the armies of Waldemar. In the latter capacity he overcame the Wends, and established Christianity there. In 1178 he was made archbishop of Lund, but still retained the see of Roeskilde, and remained in Zealand until 1191. He also quelled a rebellion in the district of Schoonen; and after Canute VI had ascended the throne he helped this prince in repulsing his rival, the Duke of Pomerania, and in conquering Mecklenbourg and Estonia. These occupations did not prevent his attending diligently to his clerical duties. In 1187 he called a national council to regulate the ceremonial of the churches. He was also a patron of the sciences and of literature. He died in the convent of Soroe in 1201. —Neander, Ch. Hist. iv, 31; Ilgen, Zeitschrift, 1832, i.

Absinthium. See WORMWOOD.

Absolution, the act of loosing or setting free. In civil law it is a sentence by which the party accused is declared innocent of the crime laid to his charge, and is equivalent to acquittal. In the Roman theology it signifies the act by which the priest declares the sins of penitent persons to be remitted to them.

1. In the first centuries, the restoration of a penitent to the bosom of the Christian Church was deemed a matter of great importance, and was designed not only to be a means of grace to the individual, but also a benefit to the whole body. Absolution was at that time simply reconciliation with the Church, and restoration to its communion, without any reference to the remission of sins. Early writers, such as Tertullian, Novatian, Cyprian, Athanasius, Basil, Chrysostom, Jerome, and Cyril, lay great stress on the fact that the forgiveness of sins is the prerogative of God only, and can never belong to any priest or bishop. After the fourth century, as the practice of private penance prevailed, the doctrine of ministerial absolution of sins began to gain ground, and was at length exalted to the rank of a sacrament.

2. Five kinds of absolution are mentioned by the early writers. a. That of baptism. b. The eucharist. c. The word and doctrine. d. The imposition of hands, and prayer. e. Reconciliation to the Church by relaxation of censures. Baptism in the ancient Church was called absolution, because remission of sins was supposed to be connected with this ordinance. It is termed by Augustine "absolutio"; or, "sacramentum absolutiois et remissionis peccatorum." It had no relation to penitential discipline, being never given to persons who had once received baptism. The absolution of the eucharist had some relation to penitential discipline, but did not solely belong to it. It was given to all baptized persons who never fell under discipline, as well as to those who fell and were restored. In both respects it was called the perfection or consummation of a Christian (ἡ ἑκτελευτησις). The absolution of the word and doctrine was declarative. It was that power which the ministers of Christ have, to make declaration of the terms of reconciliation and salvation to mankind. The absolution of intercession and prayer was generally connected with all other kinds of absolution. Prayers always attended baptism and the Eucharist, and also the final reception of penitents into the Church. The absolution of reconciliation to the Church took place at the altar, after canonical penance, and is often referred to, in earlier writers, by the terms, "granting peace," "restoring to communion," "reconciling to the church," "loosing bonds," "granting indulgence and pardon." Some councils enacted that the absolution of a penitent should only be granted by the bishop who had performed the act of excommunication, or by his successor. Severe penalties were inflicted on any who violated this regulation. Various ceremonies accompanied this act. The time selected was usually Passion-week: and, from this circumstance, the restoration is called hebdomas indulgentia. If not in Passion-week, it took place at some time appointed by the bishop. The act was performed in the church, when the people were assembled for divine worship, and usually immediately before the administration of the Lord's supper. The penitent, kneeling before the altar-table, or the reading-desk (ambo), was absolved by the bishop, by the imposition of hands, and by prayer. As the act was designated by the phrase Dare pacem, it is probable that a form was used which contained in it the expression, "Depart in peace." The fifty-first Psalm was usually sung on the occasion, but not as a necessary part of the service. Immediately after the ceremony, the absolved were admitted to the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and from that moment restored to all church privileges, with one exception, that a minister, under these circumstances, was reckoned among the laity, and a layman disqualified for the clerical office. In the case of heretics, chrism was added to the imposition of hands, to denote their reception of the Holy Spirit of peace on their restoration to the peace and unity of the Church. The bishop touched with oil the forehead, eyes, nose, mouth, and ears of the penitent, saying, "This is the sign of the gifts of the Holy Ghost." The Roman Church has also a form of absolution for the dead (absolutio defunctorum). It consists in certain prayers performed by the priest, after the celebration of the mass for a deceased person, for his delivery from purgatory.

3. The Roman Church practises sacramental absolution. According to the decision of the Council of Trent (sess. xiv, cap. vi, etc. can. ix), the priest is judge as well as the minister of Jesus Christ; so that the meaning of the words, ego te absolvo a peccatis tuis in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti. Amen, is not merely, "I declare to thee that thy sins are remitted," but, "As the minister of Jesus Christ, I remit thy sins." The view of the Greek Church appears to be that "Penitence is a mystery, or sacrament, in which he who confesses his sins is, on the outward declaration of pardon by the priest, inwardly loosed from his sins by Jesus Christ himself" (Longer Catechism of the Russian Church, by Blackmore). It is very plain that the New Testament does not sanction the power claimed by the Roman hierarchy, and that it is altogether inconsistent with the teaching of the earlier fathers of the Church. When Jesus Christ says to his ministers, "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained," he imparts to them a commission to declare with authority the Christian terms of pardon, and he also gives them a power of inflicting and remitting ecclesiastical censures; that is, admitting into a Christian congregation or excluding from it. Absolution in the New Testament does not appear to mean more than this; and in early ecclesiastical writers it is generally confined to the remission of church censures, and re-admission into the congregation. It is generally agreed that the indicative form of absolution—that is, "I absolve thee"—instead of the deprecatory—that is, "Christ absolve thee"—was introduced in the twelfth or thirteenth century, just before the time of Thomas Aquinas, who was one of the first that wrote in defence of it. The Greek Church still retains the deprecatory form. See INDULGENCE.

4. "The Church of England also holds the doctrine of absolution, but restrains herself to what she supposes to be the Scriptural limits within which the power is granted, which are the pronouncing God's forgiveness of sins upon the supposition of the existence of that state of mind to which forgiveness is granted. The remission of sins is God's special prerogative—'Who can forgive sins but God only?' (Luke v, 21)—but the public declaration of such remission to the penitent is, like all other ministrations in the Church, committed to men as God's ministers. The Church of England has three forms of absolution. In that which occurs in the morning service, the act of pardon is declared to be God's. The second form, in the communion service, is precatory: it expresses the earnest wish that God may pardon the sinner. The third form, in the visitation of the sick, is apparently more unconditional, but not really so; since it is spoken to those who 'truly repent and believe in God.' The words of absolution which follow must be interpreted according to the analogy of the two other forms, which refer the act of pardon to God. And that the Church does not regard the pronouncing of this absolution as necessary, or as conducive to the sinner's pardon, is evident from the absence of any injunction or admonition to that effect. It is noticed in the rubric, apparently, as an indulgence to the sick man if he heartily desire it; but no hint is given that he ought to desire it, nor any exhortation to seek it." Abstemii, a name given to such persons as could not partake of the cup at the Eucharist on account of their natural aversion to wine.

Abstinence (caricia, not eating, Acts xxvii, 21), a general term, applicable to any object from which one abstains, while fasting is a species of abstinence, namely, from food. See FAST. The general term is likewise used in the particular sense to imply a partial abstinence from particular food, but fast signifies an abstinence from food altogether. Both are spoken of in the Bible as a religious duty. Abstinence again differs from temperance, which is a moderate use of food or drink usually taken, and is sometimes extended to other indulgences; while abstinence (in reference to food) is a refraining entirely from the use of certain articles of diet, or a very slight partaking of ordinary meals, in cases where absolute fasting would be hazardous to health. See SELF-DENIAL.

1. Jewish.—The first example of abstinence which occurs in Scripture is that in which the use of blood is forbidden to Noah (Gen. ix, 20). See BLOOD. The next is that mentioned in Gen. xxxii, 32: "The children of Israel eat not of the sinew which shrank, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day, because he (the angel) touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew that shrank." See SIXEWE. This practice of particular and commemorative abstinence is here mentioned by anticipation long after the date of the fact referred to, as the phrase "unto this day" intimates. No actual instance of the practice occurs in the Scripture itself, but the usage has always been kept up; and to the present day the Jews generally abstain from the whole hind-quarter on account of the trouble and expense of extracting the particular sinew (Allen's Modern Judaism, p. 421). By the law abstinence from blood was confirmed, and the use of the flesh of even lawful animals was forbidden, if the manner of their death rendered it impossible that they should be, or uncertain that they were, duly exsanguinated (Exod. xxii, 31; Dent. xiv, 21). A broad rule was also laid down by the law, defining whole classes of animals that might not be eaten (Lev. xi). See ANIMAL FOOD. Certain parts of lawful animals, as being sacred to the altar, were also interdicted. These were the large lobe of the liver, the kidneys and the fat upon them, as well as the tail of the "fitted" sheep (Lev. iii, 9-11). Every thing consecrated to idols was also forbidden (Exod. xxxiv, 15). In conformity with these rules the Israelites abstained generally from food which was more or less in use among other people. Instances of abstinence from allowed food are not frequent, except in commemorative or afflictive fasts. The forty days' abstinence of Moses, Elijah, and Jesus are peculiar cases, requiring to be separately considered. See FASTING. The priests were commanded to abstain from wine previous to their actual ministrations (Lev. x, 9), and the same abstinence was enjoined to the Nazirites during the whole period of their separation (Num. vi, 5). See NAZARITE. A constant abstinence of this kind was, at a later period, voluntarily undertaken by the Rechabites (Jer. xxxv, 16, 18). See RECHABITE.

Among the early Christian converts there were some who deemed themselves bound to adhere to the Mosaic limitations regarding food, and they accordingly abstained from flesh sacrificed to idols, as well as from animals which the law accounted unclean; while others contemned this as a weakness, and exerted in the liberty wherewith Christ had made his followers free. This question was repeatedly referred to the Apostle Paul, who laid down some admirable rules on the subject, the purport of which was, that every one was at liberty to act in this matter according to the dictates of his own conscience, but that the strong-minded had better abstain from the exercise of the freedom they possessed whenever it might prove an occasion of stumbling to a weak brother.

(Rom. xiv, 1-3; 1 Cor. viii). In another place the same apostle reproves certain sectaries who should arise, forbidding marriage, and enjoining abstinence from meats which God had created to be received with thanksgiving (1 Tim. iv, 3, 4). The council of the apostles at Jerusalem decided that no other abstinence regarding food should be imposed upon the converts than "from meats offered to idols, from blood, and from things strangled" (Acts xv, 29). Paul says (1 Cor. ix, 25) that wrestlers, in order to obtain a corruptible crown, abstain from all things, or from every thing which might weaken them. In his First Epistle to Timothy (iv, 3), he blames certain heretics who condemned marriage, and the use of meats which God hath created. He requires Christians to abstain from all appearance of evil (1 Thess. v, 22), and, with much stronger reason, from every thing really evil, and contrary to religion and piety. See FLESH; ALMSGEMA.

The Essenes, a sect among the Jews which is not mentioned by name in the Scriptures, led a more abstinent life than any recorded in the sacred books. See ESSENES. They refused all pleasant food, eating nothing but coarse bread and drinking only water; and some of them abstained from food altogether until after the sun had set (Philos. De Vita Contemplativa, p. 632, 636). That abstinence from ordinary food was practised by the Jews medicinally is not shown in Scripture, but is more than probable, not only as a dictate of nature, but as a common practice of their Egyptian neighbors, who, we are informed by Diodorus (l, 82), "being persuaded that the majority of diseases proceed from indigestion and excess of eating, had frequent recourse to abstinence, emetics, slight doses of medicine, and other simple means of relieving the system, which some persons were in the habit of repeating every two or three days. See PORPHYRY, De Abst. iv.—Kitto, s. v. See UNCLEANNESS.

2. Christian.—a. Early.—In the early Church catechumens could be admitted to baptism; they were required, according to Cyril and Jerome, to observe a season of abstinence and prayer for forty days; according to others, of twenty days. Extreme caution and care were observed in the ancient Church in receiving candidates into communion, the particulars of which may be found under the head CATECHUMENS. Superstitions abstinence by the clergy was deemed a crime. If they abstained from flesh, wine, marriage, or any thing lawful and innocent, in accordance with the heretical and false notions that the creatures of God were not good, but polluted and unclean, they were liable to be deposed from office. See ABSTINENTS. There was always much disputation between the Church and several heretical sects on the subjects of meats and marriage. The Manichees and Priscillianists professed a higher degree of spirituality and refinement, because they abstained from wine and flesh as things unlawful and unclean, and on this account censured the Church as impure in allowing men the moderate and just use of them. The Apostolical Canons enjoin, "That if any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, or any other clerk, abstain from marriage, flesh, or wine, not for exercise, but abhorrence—forgetting that God made all things very good, and created man male and female, and speaking evil of the workmanship of God, unless he correct his error, he shall be deposed, and cast out of the church." At the same time, strict observance of the fasts of the church was enjoined, and deposition was the penalty in case of non-compliance with the directions of the canons on this subject.

b. Romish.—In the Romish Church a distinction is made between fasting and abstinence, and different days are appointed to each. On days of fasting, one meal in twenty-four hours is allowed; but on days of abstinence, provided flesh is not eaten and the meal is moderate, a collation is allowed in the evening. Their days of abstinence are all the Sundays in Lent, St. Mark's day, if it does not fall in Easter-week, the three Rogation-days, all Saturdays throughout the year, with the Fridays which do not fall within the twelve days of Christmas. The observance of St. Mark's day as a day of abstinence is said to be in imitation of St. Mark's disciples, the first Christians of Alexandria, who are said to have been eminent for their prayer, abstinence, and sobriety. The Roman days of fasting are, all Lent except Sundays, the Ember-days, the vigils of the more solemn feasts, and all Fridays except such as fall between Easter and the Ascension. See CALENDAR.

c. Protestant.—The Church of England, in the table of vigils, mentions fasts and days of abstinence separately; but in the enumeration of particulars, they are called indifferently days of fasting or abstinence, and the words seem to refer to the same thing. The Word of God never teaches us that abstinence is good and valuable per se, but only that it ministers to holiness; and so it is an instrument, not an end.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. x, ch. 11, § 9. See ASCETICISM.

Abstinentes, a sect of heretics that appeared in France and Spain about the end of the third century, during the persecutions of Diocletian and Maximin. They condemned marriage and the use of flesh and wine, which they said were made not by God, but by the devil. See ABSTINENCE.

Abus, a river of Palestine, according to Vibius Sequester (see Reland, Palest. p. 297), prob. the "gentle stream" (molliis) referred to by Lucan (x, 485), and by Cæsar (Bell. Civ. iii, 13), as having been crossed by Pompey near Apollonia; hence, no doubt, the brooklet that enters the Mediterranean at this place.

Abu'bus (ʿAḅḅuḅ, prob. of Syrian origin), the father of Ptolemy, the general of Antiochus, who slew Simon Maccabæus (1 Macc. xvi, 11, 15).

Abul-faraj (ABU-FHARAGIUS, or ABULFARADASH), GREGORY (called also Bar-Hebræus, from his father having been originally a Jew), was the son of Aaron, a physician of Malakia, in Armenia, and was born in 1226, and, like his father, was a Jacobite. He applied himself to the study of the Syriac and Arabic languages, philosophy, theology, and medicine; in the latter he became a great proficient, and acquired a high reputation among the Moslems. When only twenty-one years of age he was made bishop of Guba by the Jacobite patriarch Ignatius; and in 1247 he was made bishop of Aleppo. About 1266 he was made Maphrian, or primate of the Jacobites in the East, which dignity he retained till his death, in 1296. His works are very numerous; the best known is the Syriac Chronicle, which is largely cited by Gibbon, and is, in fact, a repository of Eastern history. It consists of two parts: 1. The Dynasties—a Civil Chronicle from Adam to A. D. 1286; 2. An Ecclesiastical History, which again falls into two divisions: (1.) A Catalogue and Chronicle of the Patriarchs of Antioch, called by this author the Pontiffs of the West; (2.) A Catalogue and Chronicle of the Primates, Patriarchs, and Maphrians of the East. The Civil Chronicle is published in Syriac and Latin, from the Bodleian MS., under the title Chronicon Syriacum, ed. P. J. Bruns and G. G. Kirsch (Lips. 1788, 2 vols. 4to); an abridgment of the whole chronicle made in Arabic by Abul-faraj, in Arabic and Latin by Pococke, under the title Historia Compendiosa Dynastiærum, ab Ed. Pocockio interprete (Oxon. 1663, 2 vols. 4to). A complete edition was proposed in Germany by Bernstein, in 1847, but nothing beyond the prospectus has yet appeared. The "Ecclesiastical History" exists in MS. in the Vatican and Bodleian (?) libraries. The autobiography of Abul-faraj is given by Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis, tom. ii. See Cave, Hist. Lit. Ann. 1284; Christian Remembrancer, vol. xxx, p. 500.

Abūma. See RUMAI.

Abūna (our father), the title given by the Abyssinian Christians to their metropolitan. They receive this prelate from the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria. At one time, when the Abyssinians were greatly oppressed, they applied to the pope for help, promising never again to accept their metropolitan from the Coptic patriarch; but this forced submission to Rome did not last long. See ABYSSINIAN CHURCH.

Abyss (ʿAḅḅuḅ). The Greek word means literally "without bottom," but actually deep, profound. It is used in the Sept. for the Hebrew tehom (תְּהוֹמֹת), which we find applied either to the ocean (Gen. i, 2; vii, 11) or to the under world (Ps. lxxi, 21; cvii, 26). In the New Testament it is used as a noun to describe Hades, or the place of the dead generally (Rom. x, 7); but more especially Tartarus, or that part of Hades in which the souls of the wicked were supposed to be confined (Luke viii, 31; Rev. ix, 1, 2, 11; xx, 1, 3; comp. 2 Pet. ii, 4). In the Revelation the authorized version invariably renders it "bottomless pit;" elsewhere "deep." See PIT.

Most of these uses of the word are explained by reference to some of the cosmological notions which the Hebrews entertained in common with other Eastern nations. It was believed that the abyss, or sea of fathomless waters, encompassed the whole earth. The earth floated on the abyss, of which it covered only a small part. According to the same notion, the earth was founded upon the waters, or, at least, had its foundations in the abyss beneath (Ps. xxiv, 2; exxxvi, 6). Under these waters, and at the bottom of the abyss, the wicked were represented as groaning and undergoing the punishment of their sins. There were confined the Rephaim—those old giants who, while living, caused surrounding nations to tremble (Prov. ix, 18; xxix, 16). In those dark regions the sovereigns of Tyre, Babylon, and Egypt are described by the prophets as undergoing the punishment of their cruelty and pride (Jer. xxvi, 14; Ezek. xxviii, 10, etc.). This was "the deep" into which the evil spirits, in Luke viii, 31, besought that they might not be cast, and which was evidently dreaded by them. See CREATION; HADES. The notion of such an abyss was by no means confined to the East. It was equally entertained by the Celtic Druids, who held that Annwn (the deep, the low part), the abyss from which the earth arose, was the abode of the evil principle (Gwarthawn), and the place of departed spirits, comprehending both the Elysium and the Tartarus of antiquity. With them also wandering spirits were called Plout annwn, "the children of the deep" (Davis's Celtic Researches, p. 175; Myth. and Rites of the B. Druids, p. 49).—Kitto, s. v. See DEEP.

We notice a few special applications of the word "deep," or abyss, in the Scriptures (see Wemyss, Synb. Diet. s. v.). Isaiah (xlii, 27) refers to the method by which Cyrus took Babylon, viz., by laying the bed of the Euphrates dry, as mentioned by Xenophon and others. The same event is noticed in similar terms by Jeremiah (i, 38 and li, 36). A parallel passage in relation to Egypt occurs in Isaiah (xix, 5), where the exhaustion of the country and its resources by foreign conquerors seems to be pointed out. Rom. x, 7: "Who shall descend into the abyss [Deut. xxx, 13, "beyond the sea"] to bring up Christ again from the dead?" i. e. faith does not require, for our satisfaction, things impracticable, either to scale the heavens or to explore the profound recesses of the earth and sea. The abyss sometimes signifies metaphorically grievous afflictions or calamities, in which, as in a sea, men seem ready to be overwhelmed (Ps. xlii, 7; lxxi, 20).

Abyssinia. See ABYSSINIAN CHURCH.

Abyssinian Church. Abyssinia is an extensive district of Eastern Africa, between lat. 7° 50' and 15° 40' N., long. 35° and 42° E., with a population of perhaps four millions. Carl Ritter, of Berlin, has shown that the high country of Habesh consists of three terraces or distinct table-lands, rising one above another, and of which the several grades of ascent offer themselves in succession to the traveller as he advances from the shores of the Red Sea (Erdkunde, th. i. s. 165). The first of these levels is the plain of Baharnegash; the second level is the plain and kingdom of Tigré, which formerly contained the kingdom of Axum; the third level is High Abyssinia, or the Kingdom of Amhara. This name of Amhara is now given to the whole kingdom, of which Gondar is the capital, and where the Amharic language is spoken, eastward of the Takazzé. Amhara Proper is, however, a mountainous province to the south-east, in the centre of which was Tegulat, the ancient capital of the empire, and at one period the centre of the civilization of Abyssinia. This province is now in the possession of the Gallas, a barbarous people who have overcome all the southern parts of Habesh. The present kingdom of Amhara is the heart of Abyssinia, and the abode of the emperor, or Negush. It contains the upper course of the Nile, the valley of Dembea, and the lake Tzana, near which is the royal city of Gondar, and likewise the high region of Gojam, which Bruce states to be at least two miles above the level of the sea. See ETHIOPIA.

1. History.—Christianity is believed to have been introduced, about A.D. 330, by Frumentius, who was ordained bishop of Axumma (now Axum, or Tigré) by Athanasius. See FRUMENTIUS. As the Alexandrian Church held the Monophysite doctrine, the Abyssinian converts were instructed in this faith, which has maintained itself ever since. From the fifth to the fifteenth century little was known in Western Europe about Abyssinia or its Church. The Portuguese sent out by John II having opened a passage into Abyssinia in the fifteenth century, an emissary (Bermudes) was sent to extend the influence and authority of the Roman pontiff, clothed with the title of patriarch of Ethiopia. The Jesuits went out thirteen of their number in 1555, but the Abyssinians stood so firm to the faith of their ancestors that the Jesuits were recalled by a bull from St. Peter's. Another Jesuit mission was sent out in 1603, and led to twenty years of intrigue, civil war, and slaughter. In December, 1624, the Abyssinian Church formally submitted to the see of Rome; but the people rebelled, and, after several years of struggle and bloodshed, the emperor abandoned the cause of Rome, and the Roman patriarch abandoned Abyssinia in 1633. After this, little or nothing was heard from Abyssinia till 1763, when Bruce visited the country, and brought back with him a copy of the Ethiopic Scriptures. In 1809 Mr. Salt explored Abyssinia by order of the British government, and described the nation and its religion as in a ruinous condition. Mr. Salt urged the British Protestants to send missionaries to Abyssinia. Portions of the Bible were translated and published in the Amharic and Tigré languages under the auspices of the British and Foreign Bible Society (Jowett, Christ. Researches, vol. i); and in 1826 two missionaries (from the Basle Missionary Seminary), viz., Dr. Gobat, now bishop of Jerusalem, and Christian Kugler, were sent out by the Church Missionary Society. Kugler dying, was replaced by Mr. Isenberg. He was followed by the Rev. Charles Henry Blunhardt in the beginning of 1837, and by the Rev. John Ludwig Krapf at the close of that year. The Romish Church renewed its missions in 1828, and, by stirring up intrigues, compelled the withdrawal of the Protestant missionaries in 1812. Their labors had already laid the foundation of a reform in the Abyssinian Church. Much had been done also in the way of translations into the Amharic language. Mr. Isenberg carried through the press, after his return to England in 1840, an Amharic spelling-book, 8vo; grammar, royal 8vo; dictionary, 4to; catechism, 8vo; Church history, 8vo; Amharic general history, 8vo. Mr. Isenberg had prepared a vocabulary of the Dankali language, which was likewise printed. The mission aimed not only at the Christian population of Shoa, but the Galla tribes extensively spread over the south-eastern parts of Africa. To the Galla language, therefore, hitherto unwritten, Mr. Krapf's attention was much given. During Mr. Isenberg's stay in London, the following Galla works, prepared by Mr. Krapf, were printed: Vocabulary, 12mo; Elements of the Galla Language, 12mo; Matthew's Gospel, 12mo; John's Gospel, 12mo.

Recent indications give us better hopes of Abyssinia. In 1849 the Roman Catholic missionaries themselves were expelled. The young king of Shoa requested in that year the return of Dr. Krapf, now engaged in the East African Mission. King Theodore, who now unites under his sceptre the greater part of Abyssinia, has shown himself favorable to the Protestant missions. The present Abuna, appointed in 1841, is a pupil of the Church Mission school at Cairo. At the request of both the king and the Abuna the missionaries of the Society of Basle have recommenced their labors for the evangelization of the Abyssinian Church. In 1858 their number was increased to six. In 1859 the king received gladly the vernacular Scriptures sent by the London Bible Society, and began at once to distribute them. In the same year Negussie, king of Tigré and Samen, sent an embassy to Rome to announce to the pope his submission to the Roman Church. According to the reports of the Roman Catholic missionaries, 50,000 subjects of the king have entered with him into communion with Rome. See AFRICA.

II. Doctrines and Usages.—(1.) The Abyssinian creed is, as has been said, Monophysite, or Eutychem; maintaining one nature only in the person of Christ, namely, the divine, in which they considered all the properties of the humanity to be absorbed, in opposition to the Nestorians. In both faith and worship they resemble the Romish Church in many respects; but they do not admit transubstantiation. (2.) They practise the invocation of saints, prayer for the dead, and the veneration of relics; and while they reject the use of images, they admit a profusion of pictures, and venerate them. They practise circumcision, but apparently not as a religious rite. They keep both the Jewish and the Christian sabbath, and also a great number of holidays. Their clergy and churches are very numerous, the latter richly ornamented; and the number of monastic institutions among them is said to be great. The monks call themselves followers of St. Anthony, but follow various rules. (3.) The supreme government lies with the patriarch, called Abuna (q. v.), who resides in Gondar. The Abuna receives his investiture from the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria, who is the nominal head of the Ethiopian Church. (4.) They practise an annual ablation, which they term baptism, and which they consider necessary to wash away the defilement of sin. The priests receive the Lord's Supper every day, and always fasting; besides priests and monks, scarcely any but aged persons and children attend the communion. They call the consecration of the element Mellawat. At Gondar Bishop Gobat found no person that believed in transubstantiation. In Tigré there are some who believe in it. The wine is mixed with water. They consider fasting essential to religion; consequently their fasts occupy the greater part of the year, about nine months; but these are seldom all observed except by a few monks. The priests may be married men, but they may not marry after they have received orders. The priesthood is very illiterate, and there is no preaching at all. The Abyssinians prostrate themselves to the saints, and especially to the Virgin; and, like the Copts of Egypt, practice circumcision. When questioned on the subject, they answer that they consider circumcision merely as a custom, and that they abstain from the animals forbidden in the Mosaic law, but only because they have a disgust to them; but

Dr. Gobat observed that, when they spoke upon these subjects without noticing the presence of a stranger, they attached a religious importance to circumcision, and that a priest would not fail to impose a fast or penance on a man who had eaten of a wild boar or a hare without the pretext of illness. In short, their religion consists chiefly in ceremonial observances. Their moral condition is very low; facilities of divorce are great, and chastity is a rare virtue; the same man frequently marries several women in succession, and the neglected wives attach themselves to other men. Yet their religion, corrupt as it is, has raised the Abyssinian character to a height far beyond that of any African race. Much authentic information as to this interesting Church and people in modern times is to be found in Gobat, Three Years' Residence in Abyssinia; Isenberg and Krapf, Missionary Journals in Abyssinia (Lond. 1843, 8vo); Marsden, Churches and Sects, vol. i; Newcomb, Cyclopaedia of Missions; Ruppell, Reisen in Abyssinien, Frankf. 1849; Veitch, W. Acacia. See SHITTAH-TREE.

Acacians, followers of Acacius, Monophthalmus, bishop of Caesarea. In the Council of Seleucia, A. D. 359, they openly professed their agreement with the pure Arians, maintaining, in opposition to the semi-Arians, that the Son was not of the same substance with the Father, and that even the likeness of the Son to the Father was a likeness of will only, and not of essence. Socrat. Eccl. Hist. iii, 25. See ACACIUS.

Acacius (surnamed Monophthalmus, from his having but one eye), was the disciple of Eusebius of Caesarea, in Palestine, whom he succeeded in the see of Caesarea in 340. He was one of the chiefs of the Arian party, and a man of ability and learning, but unsettled in his theological opinions. He was deposed as an Arian by the Synods of Antioch (A. D. 341) and Seleucia (359). Subsequently he subscribed the Nicene creed, and therefore fell out with the Anomoeans, with whom he had before acted. He died A. D. 363. St. Jerome (de Scrip. cap. 98) says that he wrote seventeen books of commentaries upon Holy Scripture, six on various subjects, and very many treatises, among them his book Adversus Marcellum, a considerable fragment of which is contained in Epiphanius, Haeres. 72. Socrates (ib. ii, cap. iv) says that he also wrote a life of his predecessor, Eusebius.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno. 340; Lardner, Works, iii, 583.

Acacius, bishop of Berea, was born about the year 322, in Syria. He embraced the monastic life at an early age under the famous anchorite Asterius. About A. D. 378 he was promoted to the see of Berea by Eusebius of Samosata; and after 381 Flavian sent him to Rome, to obtain for him communion with the Western bishops, and to effect the extinction of the schism in the Church of Antioch, in both which designs he succeeded. At the commencement of the 5th century he conspired with Theophilus of Alexandria and others against Chrysostom, and was present in the pseudo-council ad Querentem, in 403, where Chrysostom was deposed. In the great contest between Cyril and Nestorius, Acacius wrote to Cyril, endeavoring to excuse Nestorius, and to show that the dispute was in reality merely verbal. In 431 the Council of Ephesus assembled for the decision of this question. Acacius did not attend, but gave his proxy to Paul of Emesa against Cyril, and addressed a letter to the Oriental bishop, accusing him of Apollinarianism. In 432 he was present in the synod of Berea, held by John, and did all in his power to reconcile Cyril and the Orientals. His death occurred about 436, so that he must have attained the age of 114 years. Of the numerous letters which he wrote, three only, according to Cave, are extant, viz., two Epistles to his Primate, Alexander of Hierapolis; one to Cyril.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 430; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iv.

Academics, a name given to such philosophers as adopted the doctrines of Plato. They were so called from the Academia, a grove near Athens, where they studied and lectured. The Academies are divided into those of the first academy, who taught the doctrines of Plato in their original purity; those of the second, or middle academy, who differed materially from the first, and inclined to skepticism; and those of the new academy, who pursued probability as the only attainable wisdom. The Academies and Epicureans (q. v.) were the prevailing philosophical sects at the time of Christ's birth.—Tennemann, Hist. Phil. §§ 127-138.

Ac'atan (ʿAkārā), the father of Johannes, said to be one of those who returned from the Babylonian captivity (1 Esdr. viii, 38); evidently the same with HAKATTAN (q. v.) of the parallel text (Ezra viii, 12).

Acatho'ici, not catholic; a name sometimes used by members of the Papal Church to distinguish Protestants, under the arrogant assumption that the word "Catholic" is to be appropriated solely to Romanists. See CATHOLIC.

Ac'cad (Heb. Akkad', אַכַּד, fortress; or, according to Simonis Oonomast. p. 276, bend, i. e. of conquered nations; Sept. Ἀκκαδ [prob. by resolution of the Dagesh, like אַכַּדָּא for אַכַּדָּא], Vulg. Achad), one of the five cities in "the land of Shinar," or Babylon, which are said to have been built by Nimrod, or, rather, to have been "the beginning of his kingdom" (Gen. x, 10). Elian (De Animal. xvi, 42) mentions them in the district of Sittacee as a river called Argades (Ἀργάδες), which is so near the name Achad which the Sept. give to this city, that Bochart was induced to fix Accad upon that river (Phaleg, iv, 17). Mr. Loftus (Trav. in Chald. and Susiana, p. 36) compares the name of a Hamitic tribe emigrating to the plains of Mesopotamia from the shores of the Red Sea, and which he says the cuneiform inscriptions call Akkadim; but all this appears to be little more than conjecture. In the inscriptions of Sargon the name of Akkad is applied to the Armenian mountains instead of the vernacular title of Ararat (Rawlinson, in Herodotus, i, 247, note). The name of the city is believed to have been discovered in the inscriptions under the form Kūzi Akkad (ib. 357). It seems that several of the ancient translators found in their Hebrew MSS. Accar (אַכַּר) instead of Accad (Ephrem Syrus, Pseudo-Jonathan, Targum Hieros., Jerome, Abulfaragi, etc.). Achar was the ancient name of Nisibis (see Michaelis, Spicileg. i, 226); and hence the Targumists give Nisibis or Nisibin (נִּסְבִּינ) for Accad, and they continued to be identified by the Jewish literati in the times of Jerome (Oonomast. s. v. Aead). But Nisibis is unquestionably too remote northward to be associated with Babel, Erech, and Calneh, "in the land of Shinar," which could not have been far distant from each other. On the supposition that the original name was Akar, Col. Taylor suggests its identification with the remarkable pile of ancient buildings called Akker-kuif, in Sittacee, and which the Turks know as Akker-i-Nimrod and Akker-i-Babil (Chesney's Survey of the Euphrates, i, 117). The Babylonian Talmud might be expected to mention the site, and it occurs accordingly under the name of Aggada. It occurs also in Maimonides (Jud. Chaz. Tract. Ma'as. fol. 25, as quoted by Hyde). Akker-kuif is a ruin, consisting of a mass of sun-dried bricks, in the midst of a marsh, situated to the west of the Tigris, about five miles from Bagdad (Layard's Babylon, 2d ser. p. 407). The most conspicuous part of this primitive monument is still called by the natives Tel Nimrod, and Nimrod T-pissi, both designations signifying the hill of Niurod (see Ker Porter's Travels, ii, 275). It consists of a mound, surmounted by a mass of building which looks like a tower, or an irregular pyramid, according to the point from which it is viewed, it is about 400 feet in circumference at the bottom, and rises to the height of 125 feet above the elevation on which it stands (Ainsworth's Researches in Assyria, p. 175). The mound which seems to form the foundation of the pile is a mass of rubbish, accumulated from the decay of the superincumbent structure (Bononi's Niniveh, p. 41). In the ruin itself, the layers of sun-dried bricks can be traced very distinctly. They are cemented together by lime or bitumen, and are divided into courses varying from 12 to 20 feet in height, and are separated by layers of reeds, as is usual in the more ancient remains of this primitive region (Buckingham, Mesopotamia, ii, 217 sq.). Travellers have been perplexed to make out the use of this remarkable monument, and various strange conjectures have been hazarded. The embankments of canals and reservoirs, and the remnants of brick-work and pottery occupying the place all around, evince that the Tel stood in an important city; and, as its construction announces it to be a Babylonian relic, the greater probability is that it was one of those pyramidal structures erected upon high places, which were consecrated to the heavenly bodies, and served at once as the temples and the observatories of those remote times. Such buildings were common to all Babylonian towns; and those which remain appear to have been constructed more or less on the model of that in the metropolitan city of Babylon.—Kitto, s. v. See BABEL.

Accaron (1 Macc. x, 89). See EKRON.

Accensorii In the early Church there was a class of officers called acolyths, corresponding to the Roman apparitor or pedellus, becellus, beadle. In their ordination, the bishop, after informing them as to the duties of their office, placed in the hands of each a candlestick with a lighted taper in it, intimating that it was their duty to light the candles of the church; hence they were sometimes called accensorii, taper-lighters. Jerome says it was a custom in the Oriental churches to set up lighted tapers when the Gospel was read, as a demonstration of joy; but it does not appear that there was a peculiar order of acolyths for this purpose. The duty in question seems to have been nothing more than lighting the candles at night, when the church was to meet at evening prayer. The Romaniists contend that their sero-f. rarii, taper-bearers, whose office is only to walk before the deacons, etc., with lighted tapers, are derived from the practice of the acolyths. The two offices are widely different, and the assumption that the Romish practice is derived from apostolical institution is absurd.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. iii, ch. iii. See ACOLYTHS.

Accent, in a grammatical sense, is the tone or stress of the voice upon a particular syllable, which is the means of distinguishing or separating words in rapid enunciation, and is not to be confounded with the rhythmical or musical ictus or force which regulates poetry or metre, and is, at the same time, independent of the prosodial quantity. In English, as in most European languages, there is no fixed rule for the position of the accent, which often differs in words formed after the same analogy. In Latin, in the absence of all positive information as to how the Romans themselves pronounced their language, at least in this particular, an arbitrary rule has been invented and generally acceded to by scholars of all nations, by which the tone is placed upon every long penult, and upon the antepenult of words having a short or doubtful ("common") vowel in the penult. Many apply the same rule to the Greek language; but, as this has a written accent, the custom, still preserved among the modern Greeks, is gradually prevailing, of conforming the spoken to the written tone. In Hebrew the place of the accent is carefully designated in the common or Masoretic text (see R. Jebuda Ibn Balam, Treatise on the Poetic Accents, in Hebrew, Paris, 1556; reprinted with annotations, Amst. 1858), although the Jews of some nations, disregarding this, pronounce the words with the accent on the penult, after the analogy of modern languages, and as is done by natives in speaking Syriac and Arabic (see J. D. Michaelis, Anfangsgründe der Hebr. Accentuation, Hall, 1741; Hirts, Einkelt. in d. Hebr. Abtheilungskunst, Jena, 1762; Spitzner, Id. a Analytica I. T. ex Accentibus, Lips, 1769; Stern, Grundr. Lehre d. Hebr. Accentuation, Frankf. 1849). In words anglicized from the Greek the Latin rules are observed for the accent; and in those introduced from the Hebrew, as they have mostly come to us through the Vulgate, the same principle is in the main adhered to, so far as applicable, though with great irregularity and disagreement among orthoepists, and generally to the utter neglect of the proper Hebrew tone. In pronouncing Scripture and other foreign names, therefore, care should be taken to conform to the practice of the best speakers and readers, rather than to any affected or pedantic standard, however exact in itself (see Worcester's Eng. Dict. 1860, Appendix).

Accept—ACCEPTABLE—ACCEPTED (properly רָצוּן , ratsah "to take pleasure in; לְעִוְוָה). To accept is not only to receive, but to receive with pleasure and kindness (Gen. xxxii, 20). It stands opposed to reject, which is a direct mode of refusal, and implies a positive sentiment of disapprobation (Jer. vi, 30; vii, 29). To receive, is an act of right—we receive what is our own; to accept, is an act of courtesy—we accept what is offered by another. Hence an acceptable time, or accepted time (Psa. lxxix, 13; 2 Cor. vi, 2), signifies a favorable opportunity. "No prophet is accepted in his own country" (Luke iv, 24), that is to say, his own countrymen do not value and honor him as they ought. "Neither accepted thou the person of any" (Luke xx, 21). The word person here is intended to denote the outward appearance in contrast with inward character. See ACCESS.

Acceptance, (1) a term which imports the admission of man into the favor of God. As things are best understood by contrast with their opposites, so acceptance is to be understood from its opposite, rejection, the sense of which will be found by reference to Jer. vi, 30; vii, 29. To understand aright the Scriptural idea of acceptance with God, we must keep in mind the fact that sin is highly displeasing to God, and is attended by the hiding of his face or the withholding of his favor. Sin causes God to refuse to hold friendly intercourse with man; but the mediation of the Son of God restores this intercourse. Sinners are said to be "accepted in the Beloved" (Eph. i, 6); that is, in Christ. They are no longer held in a state of rejection, but are received with approbation and kindness. It is to be noticed that it is an idea of a positive kind which the word acceptance contains. As the rejection which sin occasioned was express, equally express and positive is the acceptance of which Christ is the author. One who had disgraced himself before his sovereign would be particularly refused any share in the favors of the court. When this breach was repaired, the excluded party would again be favorably received (Eden). See ACCEPT.

(2.) Acceptance (Eph. i, 6), in theology, is nearly synonymous with justification. We mistake the terms of acceptance with God when we trust in, 1, the superiority of our virtues to our vices (Rom. iii, 20; Jas. ii, 10); 2, in a faith in Christ which does not produce good works (Jas. ii, 14); 3, in the atonement, without personal repentance from sin (Luke xiii, 5); 4, in the hope of future repentance, or conversion on a dying bed (Prov. i, 24-31). See ADOPTION; JUSTIFICATION.

Acceptants, a name that arose in the second period of the Jansenist controversy in France. The bull Unigenitus (q. v.) of Clement XI, 1713, was accepted by some of the French clergy unconditionally; by others only on condition of its reference to a general council. The former were called acceptants or constitutionalists; the latter opponents. See JANSENISTS.

Acceptation (acceptatio), a term in theology, used, with regard to redemption, to denote the acceptance on the part of God of an atonement not really equal to that in place of which it is received, but equivalent, not because of its intrinsic value, but because of God's determination to receive it. The term is borrowed from the commercial law of the Romans, in which it is defined "an acquittance from obligation, by word of mouth, of a debtor by a creditor" (Pandects of Justinian), or "an imaginary payment" (Institutes of Justinian). In the theology of the Middle Ages, the term was first used and the theory developed by Duns Scotus in his controversy with the followers of Thomas Aquinas. He defended the proposition that "every created oblation or offering is worth what God is pleased to accept it for and no more." The doctrine continued to be a subject of dispute between the followers of Duns Scotus and those of Thomas Aquinas throughout the Middle Ages, and still divides the Roman Catholic theologians, as the Popes have never authoritatively settled it. The Lutheran and Calvinistic theologians mostly adopted the doctrine of a strict satisfaction; but the theory of a relative necessity found eloquent defenders in Hugo Grotius (q. v.), and the Arminian theologians Episcopius (q. v.), Limborch (q. v.), and Curcellæus (q. v.). See Shedd, History of Doctrines, ii, 347 sq.

Access (προσγωγή, a bringing toward) is the privilege of approaching a superior with freedom. It is distinguished from admittance thus: "We have admittance where we enter; we have access to him whom we address. There can be no access where there is no admittance; but there may be admittance without access. Servants or officers may grant us admittance into the palaces of princes; the favorites of princes only have access to their persons" (Crabbe, Engl. Syn., s. v.). See ACCEPTANCE.

(1.) Introduction, free admission into the presence of a superior. In the New Testament it signifies the free intercourse which we enjoy with God in the exercise of prayer, resulting from our having entered into a state of friendship with him (Rom. v, 2; Eph. ii, 18; iii, 12). It is more than simple admittance; it is such an introduction as leads to future and frequent intercourse. When the veil of the temple was rent at the death of Christ, a new and living way of access to God was opened. Under the law, the high-priest alone had access into the holy of holies. By the death of Christ the middle wall of partition was broken down, and Jew and Gentile have both free access to God; before this, the Gentiles, in the temple-worship, had no nearer access than to the gate of the court of Israel. All the privileges of Christianity are equally bestowed on all believers of all nations. See PRAYER.

(2.) In Roman ecclesiastical usage—1, a collection of preparatory prayers, used by the priests before the celebration of the mass; 2, in the election of the pope, a transfer of votes from one candidate to another to secure the necessary number is called an access. If a voter wishes to change his vote to another person, he writes on his paper accedo domino, etc.

Ac'cho (Heb. Akko, אַכּוֹ, from an Arab. root signifying to be hot [see Drummond, Origines, v, 3], referring to the sultry sand in the neighborhood, used by the Phœnicians in the manufacture of glass [Plin., v, 19; Strabo, xvi, 877]; Sept. Ἀκχώ, Josephus, Ant., ix, 14, 2), a town and haven within the nominal territory of the tribe of Asher, which, however, never acquired possession of it (Judg. i, 31). It is, perhaps, likewise mentioned in Micah i, 10 (אַכּוֹ, prob. אַכּוֹ for אַכּוֹ, in Accho; Sept. ἰν' Ἀκκίῳ, Vulg. lachrymis, Auth. Vers. "at all"; see Henderson, Comment. in loc.). The Greek and Roman writers call it Ἀκκῆ, Ἀκῆ (Strab. xvii, 877; Diod. Sic. xix, 93; C. Nep. xiv, 5); but it was eventually better known as Ptolemais (Plin. Hist. Nat., v, 19), which name it received from the first Ptolemy, king of Egypt, by whom it was much improved. By this name it is mentioned in the Apocrypha (1 Mace. x, 56; xi, 22, 24; xii, 45, 48; 2 Mace. xiii, 14), in the New Testament (Acts xxi, 7), and by Josephus (Ant., xiii, 12, 2 sq.). It was also called Colonia Claudia Cesaris, in consequence of its receiving the privileges of a Roman city from the emperor Claudius (Plin. v, 17; xxxvii, 65). It continued to be called Ptolemais by the Greeks of the lower empire, as well as by Latin authors, while the Orientals adhered to the original designation (see Mishna, Aboth Zarab, iii, 4; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., p. 117), which it still retains in the form Akko. During the Crusades the place was usually known to Europeans by the name of Acem; afterward, from the occupation of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, as St. Jean d'Acre, or simply Acre. The Romans at a late date appear to have called it also Ptolemaida (the accentive being transformed into a nominative); at least the name appears in this form in the Vin. Antonia, and Hiccol. The Greeks themselves, although using the name Ptolemais, were evidently aware of the original Heb. (i. e. Phœnician) name Accho, which they merely Grecized into Acē. Thus, the authors of the Egyptiologia Magnoni, say, "Acē, a city of Phœnicia, which is now called Ptolemais. Some say that the citadel of Ptolemais was called Acē because Hercules, being bitten by a serpent and there cured, named it Acē, from ἀκκίσσα [to heal]." Other ancient authors speak of the place by the same name, and some of them allude to the same fable as the origin of the name (Reiland, Palest. p. 536, 537). These, however, were evidently but speculations common to the mythology of the Greeks, who were fond of giving Greek terminations as well as Greek derivations to foreign terms. See PROLEMAIS.

This famous harbor-city is situated in N. lat. 32° 55', and E. long. 35° 5', and occupies the north-western point of a commodious bay, called the bay of Acre, the opposite or south-western point of which is formed by the promontory of Mount Carmel. The city lies on the plain to which it gives its name. Inland the hills, which from Tyre southward press close upon the sea-shore, gradually recede, leaving in the immediate neighborhood of Acco a plain of remarkable fertility about six miles broad, and watered by the small river Belus (Nahr Namân), which discharges itself into the sea close under the walls of the town; to the S.E. the still receding heights afford access to the interior in the direction of Sepphoris. Acco, thus favorably placed in command of the approaches from the north, both by sea and land, has been justly termed the "key of Palestine." The bay, from the town of Acre to the promontory of Mount Carmel, is three leagues wide. The port, on account of its shallowness, can only be entered by vessels of small burden (Prokesch, p. 146); but there is excellent anchorage on the other side of the bay, before Haifa, which is, in fact, the roadstead of Acre (Turner, ii, 111; G. Robinson, i, 198). In the time of Strabo Acco was a great city (xvi, p. 877), and it has continued to be a place of importance down to the present time. But after the Turks gained possession of it, Acre so rapidly declined, that the travellers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries concur in describing it as much fallen from its former glory, of which, however, traces still remained. The missionary Eugene Roger (La Terre Sainte, 1645, p. 44-46) remarks that the whole place had such a sacked and desolate appearance that little remained worthy of note except the palace of the grand-master of the Knights Hospitallers and the church of St. Andrew; all the rest was a sad and deplorable ruin, pervaded by a pestiferous air which soon threw strangers into dangerous maladies. The emir Fakr-ed-din had, however, lately built a commodious khan for the use of the merchants; for there was still considerable traffic, and vessels were constantly arriving from France, Venice, England, and Holland, laden with oil, cotton, skins, and other goods. The emir had also built a strong castle, notwithstanding repeated orders from the Porte to desist. Roger also fails not to mention the immense stone balls, above a hundred-weight, which were found in the ditches and among the ruins, and which were thrown into the town from machines before the use of cannon. This account is confirmed by other travellers, who add little or nothing to it (Doubdan, Cotovicus, Zuallart, Morison, Nau, D'Arvieux, and others). Morison, however, dwells more on the ancient remains, which consisted of portions of old walls of extraordinary height and thickness, and of fragments of buildings, sacred and secular, which still afforded manifest tokens of the original magnificence of the place. He affirms (ii, 8) that the metropolitan church of St. Andrew was equal to the finest of those he had seen in France and Italy, and that the church of St. John was of the same perfect beauty, as might be seen by the pillars and vaulted roof, half of which still remained. An excellent and satisfactory account of the place is given by Nau (liv. v, ch. 19), who takes particular notice of the old and strong vaults on which the houses are built. Maundrell mentions that the town appears to have been encompassed on the land side by a double wall, defended with towers at small distances; and that without the walls were ditches, ramparts, and a kind of bastions faced with hewn stone (Journey, p. 72). Pococke speaks chiefly of the ruins (East, ii, 176 sq.). After the impulse given to the prosperity of the place by the measures of sheik Daher, and afterward of Djezzar Pasha, the descriptions differ (Clarke, Trav. ii, 379). It is mentioned by Buckingham (i, 116) that, in sinking the ditch in front of the then (1816) new outer wall, the foundations of small buildings were exposed, twenty feet below the present level of the soil, which must have belonged to the earliest ages, and probably formed part of the original Acco. He also thought that traces of Ptolemais might be detected in the shafts of gray and red granite and marble pillars, which lie about or have been converted into thresholds for large doorways, of the Sarcenic period; some partial remains might be traced in the inner walls; and he is disposed to refer to that time the now old khan, which, as stated above, was really built by the emir Fakr-ed-din. All the Christian ruins mentioned by the travellers already quoted had disappeared. In actual importance, however, the town had much increased. The population in 1819 was computed at 10,000, of whom 3900 were Turks, the rest Christians of various denominations (Connor, in Jowett, i, 423). Approached from Tyre the city presented a beautiful appearance, from the trees in the inside, which rise above the wall, and from the ground immediately around it on the outside being planted with orange, lemon, and palm trees. Inside, the streets had the usual narrowness and filth of Turkish towns; the houses solidly built with stone, with flat roofs; the bazaars mean, but tolerably well supplied (Turner, ii, 113). The principal objects were the mosque, the pasha's seraglio, the granary, and the arsenal (Irby and Mangles, p. 195). Of the mosque, which was built by Djezzar Pasha, there is a description by Pliny Fisk (Life, p. 337; also G. Robinson, i, 200). The trade was not considerable; the exports consisted chiefly of grain and cotton, the produce of the neighboring plain; and the imports chiefly of rice, coffee, and sugar from Danieta (Turner, ii, 112). As thus described, the city was all but demolished in 1832 by the hands of Ibrahim Pasha; and although considerable pains were taken to restore it, yet, as lately as 1837, it still exhibited a most wretched appearance, with ruined houses and broken arches in every direction (Lord Lindsay, Letters, ii, 81). It is only important at present as a military post, and all its municipal regulations are according to the laws of war (Thomson, Laud and Book, i, 480).

Acco continued to belong to the Phenicians (Strab. ii, 134; Plin. v, 17; Ptol. v, 15) until they, in common with the Jews, were subjugated by the Babylonians (comp. 1 Macc. v, 15). By the latter it was doubtless maintained as a military station against Egypt, as it was afterward by the Persians (Strabo, xvi, p. 877). In the distribution of Alexander's dominions Acco fell to the lot of Ptolemy Soter, who valued the acquisition, and gave it his own name. In the wars that ensued between Syria and Egypt, it was taken by Antiochus the Great (Ptol. v, 62), and attached to his kingdom. When the Maccabees established themselves in Judæa, it became the base of operations against them (1 Macc. v, 15, 55). Simon drove his enemies back within its walls, but did not take it (1 Macc. v, 22). In the endeavor of Demetrius Soter and Alexander Balas to bid highest for the support of Jonathan, the latter gave Ptolemais and the lands around to the temple at Jerusalem (x, 1, 39). Jonathan was afterward invited to meet Alexander and the king of Egypt at that place, and was treated with great distinction by them (x, 56-66); but there he at length (B.C. 144) met his death through the treachery of Tryphon (xii, 48-50). On the decay of the Syrian power it was one of the few cities of Judæa which established its independence. Alexander Jannæus took advantage of the civil war between Antiochus Philometer and Antiochus Cyzicenus to besiege Ptolemais, as the only maritime city in those parts, except Gaza, which he had not subdued; but the siege was raised by Ptolemy Lathyrus (then king of Cyprus), who got possession of the city (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 12, 2-6), of which he was soon deprived by his mother, Cleopatra (xiii, 13, 2). She probably gave it, along with her daughter Selene, to Antiochus Grypus, king of Syria. At least, after his death, Selene held possession of that and some other Phœnician towns, after Tigranes, king of Armenia, had acquired the rest of the kingdom (xiii, 16, 4). But an injudicious attempt to extend her dominions drew upon her the vengeance of that conqueror, who, in B.C. 70, reduced Ptolemais, and, while thus employed, received with favor the Jewish embassy which was sent by queen Alexandra, with valuable presents, to seek his friendship (xiii, 16, 4). A few years after, Ptolemais was absorbed, with all the country, into the Roman empire, and the rest of its ancient history is obscure and of little note. It is only mentioned in the New Testament from Paul's having spent a day there on his voyage to Cesarea (Acts xxi, 7). The importance acquired by the last-named city through the mole constructed by Herod, and the safe harbor thus formed, must have had some effect on the prosperity of Ptolemais; but it continued a place of importance, and was the seat of a bishopric in the first ages of the Christian Church. The see was filled sometimes by orthodox and sometimes by Arian bishops; and it has the equivocal distinction of having been the birthplace of the Sabellian heresy (Niceph. vi, 7). Acco (or Acco as the Latins style it) was an imperial garrison town when the Saracens invaded Syria, and was one of those that held out until Cesarea was taken by Arnun, in A. D. 638 (Mod. Univ. Hist. i, 473).—Kitto, s. v.

The Franks first became masters of it in A. D. 1110, when it was taken by Baldwin, king of Jerusalem. But in A. D. 1187 it was recovered by Salah-ud-din, who retained it till A. D. 1191, when it was retaken by the Christians under Richard Cœur-de-Lion. The Christians kept it till A. D. 1291; and it was the very last place of which they were dispossessed. It had been assigned to the Knights Hospitallers of Jerusalem, who fortified it strongly, and defended it valiantly, till it was at length wrested from them by Khalil ben-Kelaoun, sultan of Egypt, who is called Melek Seruf by Christian writers (D'Herbelot, s. v. Acca; Will. Tyr. i, xxiii, c. 6, 7; Vitriacus, cap. 25, 99, 100; Quaresmius, tom. ii, p. 897). Under this dominion it remained till A. D. 1517, when the Mameluke dynasty was overthrown by Selim I, and all its territories passed to the Turks (Chronica de Syria, lib. v, cap. 1; Mod. Univ. Hist. b. xv, c. 10, § 2). After this Acre remained in quiet obscurity till the middle of the last century, when the Arab sheik Daher took it by surprise. Under him the place recovered some of its trade and importance. He was succeeded by the barbarous but able tyrant, Djezzar Pasha, who strengthened the fortifications and improved the town. Under him it rose once more into fame, through the gallant and successful resistance which, under the direction of Sir Sidney Smith, it offered to the arms of Bonaparte.

After that the fortifications were further strengthened, till it became the strongest place in all Syria. In 1832 the town was besieged for nearly six months by Ibrahim Pasha, during which 35,000 shells were thrown into it, and the buildings were literally beaten to pieces (Hogg's Damascus, p. 160-166). It had by no means recovered from this calamity, when on the 3d of November 1840, it was bombarded by the English fleet till the explosion of the powder-magazine destroyed the garrison and town (Napier's War in Syria). The walls and castles have since been repaired more strongly than ever; but the interior remains in ruins (Thomson. Land and Book, i, 479).

There are several medals of Acco, or Ptolemais, both Greek and Latin. Most of the former have also the Phœnician name of the city, אַכּוֹ, Ak (see Gesenius, Mon. Phœn. p. 269, 270, pl. 35), and the head of Alexander the Great, apparently in consequence of favors received from that prince, perhaps at the time when he was detained in Syria by the siege of Tyre. From others it appears that the city assumed the privilege of asylum and of sanctity, and that it possessed a temple of Diana. Accident, a term of philosophy used to express that which is merely adventitious to a substance, and not essential to it; e. g. roundness is an accident of any body, since it is a body all the same, whether it be round or square. In theology this word is used in connection with the Roman doctrine of transubstantiation, which teaches that the accidents of the bread and wine in the holy Eucharist continue to subsist without a subject: "Accidentia autem sine subiecto in eodem [sacramento] subsistunt" (Aquinas, Opuscula, p. 57). And the catechism of the council of Trent speaks in these terms: "Tertium restat, quod in hoc Sacramento maximum atque mirabile videatur, panis videlicet et vini species in hoc Sacramento sine aliquâ re subiectâ constare" (Par. ii, No. 44). In defence of this doctrine, Roman writers argue thus: If the eucharistic accidents have any subject, that subject must be either (1) the matter of bread, or (2) the surface of the Lord's body, or (3) the air and other corpuscles contained in the pores, etc., of the matter, whatever it is, which, by God's appointment, continue to subsist after the destruction of the matter, so as to produce the same sensations. Now (1) they cannot have the matter of bread for their subject, because that matter no longer subsists, and is changed into the body of Jesus Christ; (2) they cannot have the surface of the Lord's body for their subject, because it is only present in an invisible manner; and (3) the air cannot be the subject of these accidents, because the same accidents, numero, cannot pass from one subject to another; and because, further, the air cannot at the same time be the substance of its own proper attributes and of those of bread (Thomas Aquinas, par. iii, q. 77, art. i, in corp.). They argue further, that the contrary doctrine, viz., that they are not really the accidents of bread and wine, but only appear such to us, destroys the nature and idea of a sacrament and of transubstan-tiation. That a sacrament, by its very nature, is essentially a sensible sign, not only in relation to ourselves, but in itself, i. e. in the language of the schools, not only ex parte nostri, but ex parte sui; and that, consequently, if all that there is real and physical in the eucharistic accidents consists in this, that God causes them to produce in us, after consecration, the same sensations which the bread did previously, the sacrament is no longer a sensible sign, ex parte sui, in itself, but only ex parte nostri; and, therefore, when God ceases to produce such sensations in us, as, for instance, when the consecrated host is locked up in the pyx, it is no longer a sacrament. They argue also, that to hold that they are not pure, or absolute accidents, destroys equally the nature of transubstantiation, because (1) transubstantiation is a real conversion of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Jesus Christ. Now, in every conversion there must be something common to both substances remaining the same after the change that it was before, else it would be simply a substitution of one thing for another. As, then, in the holy eucharist, the substances of bread and wine do not remain after consecration, it follows that what does remain is the pure accidents. (2) They who oppose the doctrine of absolute accidents teach that one body differs from another only in the different configuration of its parts; and that wherever there is the same configuration of parts, there is the same body; and wherever there are the same sensations produced, there is also the same arrangements of parts to produce them. If this be so, since, in the holy eucharist, the same sensations are produced after the consecration as before, there must be the same configuration of parts after consecration as before, or the same body; in other words, there is no change, no transubstantiation. — Landon, Ecol. Dictionary, s. v. See TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

Acclamation, (1.) in Roman use, the unanimous concurrence of all the votes in an election for pope or bishop, without previous balloting, is called acclamatio or quasi-inspiratio.

(2.) In the ancient Church, the name acclamatio was given to shouts of joy, by which the people expressed their approval of the eloquence or doctrine of their preachers. Sometimes in the African Church, when the preacher quoted an apposite text of Scripture in illustration or confirmation of his argument, the people would join him in repeating the close of it. This was encouraged by the minister, in order that the people might gain a familiar acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures. The acclamations were general, and consisted not only of exclamations, but of clapping the hands, and other indications of assent. It is said that the people applauded the sermons of Chrysostom, some by tossing their garments, others by moving their plumes, others laying their hands on their swords, and others waving their handkerchiefs, and crying out, "Thou art worthy of the priesthood! Thou art the thirteenth apostle! Christ hath sent thee to save our souls," etc. While the ancients did not refuse these acclamations, they took care to exhort those to whom they spoke to show their approval of the sermons they heard by the fruits of godly living. They proved to them that the best praise of the sermon is the compunction of the hearers. Jerome lays it down as a rule, in his directions to Nepotian, that in preaching he should try to excite the groans of the people rather than their applauses, and let the tears of the hearer be the commendation of the preacher. Many passages in Chrysostom's writings show that he desired the practice to be banished from the Church, because it was abused by vain and ambitious persons, who only preached to gain the applause of their hearers, and even hired men to applaud them. He says, "Many appear in public, and labor hard, and make long sermons, to gain the applause of the people, in which they rejoice as much as if they had gained a kingdom; but, if their sermon ends in silence, they are more tormented about that silence than about the pains of hell. This is the ruin of the Church, that ye seek to hear such sermons as are apt not to move compunction, but pleasure; hearing them as you would hear a musician or singer, with a tinkling sound and composition of words." The practice of giving expression to the same feelings in worship has been known in modern times. There was a sect in Flanders, in the fourteenth century, called Dancers, whose practice it was to seize each other's hands, and to continue dancing till they fell down breathless. The Whippers or Flagellants, the Jumpers, the Shakers, have obtained their respective designations from certain customs adopted in worship. — Bingham, Orig. Ecol. xiv, iv, 27.

Acco. See ACCIO.

Accolti, PETER, known under the title of Cardinal of Ancona, was born at Florence in 1497, and died at Florence in 1549. Under Leo X he occupied the place of Apostolical Abbreviator, and in 1549 he drew up against Luther the famous bull which condemned 41 propositions of this reformer. While secretary of Clement VII he was appointed cardinal in 1527, and sent as legate in 1532 into the March of Ancona. Under Paul III he fell into disfavor, and was imprisoned in the castle of San Angelo. He obtained his liberty only upon paying the large sum of 59,000 dollars. He obtained several bishoprics, and left one daughter and two sons. He is the author of a treatise on the rights of the popes upon the kingdom of Naples. Some of his poems are contained in the first volume of the Carminum illustrium poetarum Italorum (Florence, 1562, 8vo). — Hoefler, Biographie Générale, i, 165.

Accommodation, a technical term in theology, first innocently used by certain mystical interpreters, who maintained that although the sense of holy Scripture is essentially but one, yet that certain passages were made the vehicle of a higher and more distant import than the mere literal expressions exhibited (Walch, Bibl. Theol. iv, 228). See HYPONOTA. From this, however, the term was extended by writers of a Socinian tendency to indicate a certain equivocal character in the language of the sacred writers and speakers. (See Whately's Bampton Lect.; Conybeare, Lect. on Theol.; Tittmann's Miletem. Sacra, pref.; Hauff, Bemerk. üb. d. Lehrart Jesu; Forster, Crit. Essays, p. 59; Marsh, in Michaelis's Introd. i, 473 sq. Express treatises on the subject have been written in Latin by Pisanusky [Gedan, 1781], Pappellann [Stargard, 1763], Weber [Viteb, 1789], Bang [Amst. 1789], Van Hemert [Amst. 1791, and Dortm. 1797], Krug [Viteb. 1791], Kirsten [Amst. 1816], Cramer [Havn. 1792], Carus [Lips. 1793], Detharding [Gott. 1782]; in German, by Zachariä [Bütz, and Wism. 1762], Eckermann, in his *Theol. It is now applied,

1. To explain the application of certain passages of the Old Testament to events in the New to which they have no apparent historical or typical reference. Citations of this description are apparently very frequent throughout the whole New Testament, but especially in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

The difficulty of reconciling such seeming misapplications, or deflections from their original design, has been felt in all ages, although it has been chiefly reserved to recent times to give a solution of the difficulty by the theory of accommodation. By this it is meant that the prophecy or citation from the Old Testament was not designed literally to apply to the event in question, but that the New Testament writer merely adopted it in order to produce a strong impression, by showing a remarkable parallelism between two analogous events which had in themselves no mutual relation. Thus Dr. Adam Clarke, in his Commentary on Jeremiah (xxxii, 15-17), remarks: "St. Matthew, who is ever fond of accommodation, applied these words to the massacre of the children of Bethlehem; that is, they were suitable to that occasion, and therefore he applied them, but they are not a prediction of that event."

There is a catalogue of more than seventy of these accommodated passages adduced by the Rev. T. H. Horne, in support of this theory, in his Introduction (ii, 317, Am. ed. 1835), but it will suffice for our purpose to select the following specimens:

Matt. xiii, 35,	quoted from	Psa. lxxviii, 2.
"viii, 17,	"	Isa. liii, 4.
"ii, 15,	"	Hos. xi, 1.
"ii, 17, 18,	"	Jer. xxxi, 15.
"iii, 3,	"	Isa. xl, 3.

It will be necessary, for the complete elucidation of the subject, to bear in mind the distinction not only between accommodated passages and such as must be properly explained (as those which are absolutely adduced as proofs), but also between such passages and those which are merely borrowed, and applied by the sacred writers, sometimes in a higher sense than they were used by the original authors. Passages which do not strictly and literally predict future events, but which can be applied to an event recorded in the New Testament by an accidental parity of circumstances, can alone be thus designated. Such accommodated passages therefore, if they exist, can only be considered as descriptive, and not predictive.

The accommodation theory in exegesis has been equally combated by two classes of opponents. Those of the more ancient school consider such mode of application of the Old Testament passages not only as totally irreconcilable with the plain grammatical construction and obvious meaning of the controverted passages which are said to be so applied, but as an unjustifiable artifice, altogether unworthy of a divine teacher. The other class of expositors, who are to be found chiefly among the most modern of the German Rationalists (see Rose's Protestantism in Germany, p. 75), maintain that the sacred writers, having been themselves trained in this erroneous mode of teaching, had mistakenly, but bona fide, interpreted the passages which they had cited from the Old Testament in a sense altogether different from their historical meaning, and thus applied them to the history of the Christian dispensation. Some of these have maintained that the accommodation theory was a mere shift resorted to by commentators who could not otherwise explain the application of Old Testament prophecies in the New consistently with the inspiration of the sacred writers. See CONDENSATION.

2. The word is also used to designate a certain rationalistic theory, viz., that Christ fell in with the popular prejudices and errors of his time; and so accommodated himself to the mental condition of the Jews. The Gnostics seem to have first originated this theory. They asserted that Christ's doctrine could not be fully known from Scripture alone, because the writers of the New Testament condescended to the stage of culture existing at the time (Irenæus, Adv. Hæc. iii, 5). The theory derives all its plausibility from confounding two things essentially different, viz., condescension to ignorance and accommodation to error. The former was indeed employed by the great Teacher (e. g. in his use of parables); the latter would have been utterly unworthy of him. In this last sense, the theory is one of the most pernicious outgrowths of German rationalism. See Horne, Introd. i, 317, 324; and for the rationalistic view, Seiler, Bib. Herm. 418; Planck, Introd. 145; Neander, Life of Christ, 113, 114.

Ac'cos (Ἀκκόσ, prob. for Heb. קוז, i. e. Accoz, קוזקוז; Vulg. Jacob), the father of John, and grandfather of the Eupolemus who was one of the ambassadors of Judas Maccabæus to Rome (1 Macc. viii, 17).

Ac'coz (Ἀκκόζ v. r. Ἀκκόσ, for Heb. קוז, with the art. קוזקוז, hak-Kots'), one of the priests whose descendants returned from the captivity, having lost their pedigree (1 Esdr. v, 38); evidently the same with קוז (q. v.) of the parallel text (Ezra ii, 61).

Accubation, the posture of reclining (ἀνάκλιμα, anáklîma, "sit at meat," "sit down") on couches at table, which prevailed among the Jews in and before the time of Christ; a custom apparently derived from Persian luxury, but usual among the Romans likewise. The dinner-bed, or triclinium, stood in the middle of the dining-room (itself hence called "triclinium" also), clear of the walls, and formed three sides of a square which enclosed the table. The open end of the square, with the central hollow, allowed the servants to attend and serve the table. In all the existing representations of the dinner-bed it is shown to have been higher than the enclosed table. Among the Romans the usual number of guests on each couch was three, making nine for the three couches—equal to the number of the Muses; but sometimes there were four to each couch. The Greeks went beyond this number (Cic. In Pis. 27); the Jews appear to have had no particular fancy in the matter, and we know that at our Lord's last supper thirteen persons were present. As each guest leaned, during the greater part of the entertainment, on his left elbow, so as to leave the right arm at liberty, and as two or more lay on the same couch, the head of one man was near the breast of the man who lay behind him, and he was, therefore, said "to lie in the bosom" of the other. This phrase was in use among the Jews (Luke xvi, 22, 23; John i, 18; xiii, 23), and occurs in such a manner as to show that to lie next below, or "in the bosom" of the master of the feast, was considered the most favored place; and is shown by the citations of Kypke and Wetstein (on John xiii, 23) to have been usually assigned to near and dear connections. So it was "the disciple whom Jesus loved" who "reclined upon his breast" at the last supper. See LORD'S SUPPER. Lightfoot and others suppose that as, on that occasion, John lay next below Christ, so Peter, who was also highly favored, lay next above him. This conclusion is founded chiefly on the fact of Peter beckoning to John that he should ask Jesus who was the traitor. But this seems rather to prove the contrary—that Peter was not near enough to speak to Jesus himself. If he had been there, Christ must have lain near his bosom, and he would have been in the best position for whispering to his master, and in the worst for beckoning to John. The circumstance that Christ was able to reach the sop to Judas when he had dipped it, seems to us rather to intimate that he was the one who filled that place. The morsel of favor was likely to be given to one in a favored place; and Judas, the treasurer and almoner of the whole party might be expected to fill that place. This also ag gravates by contrast the turpitude and treachery of his conduct. See BANQUET. The frame of the dinner-bed was laid with mattresses variously stuffed, and, latterly, was furnished with rich coverings and hangings. Each person was usually provided with a cushion or bolster on which to support the upper part of his person in a somewhat raised position, as the left arm alone could not long without weariness sustain the weight. The lower part of the body being extended diagonally on the bed, with the feet outward, it is at once perceived how easy it was for "the woman that was a sinner" to come behind between the dinner-bed and the wall and anoint the feet of Jesus (Matt. xxvi, 7; Mark xiv, 3). The dinner-beds were so various at different times, in different places, and under different circumstances, that no one description can apply to them all (see Critica Biblica, ii, 481). Even among the Romans they were at first (after the Punic war) of rude form and materials, and covered with mattresses stuffed with rushes or straw; mattresses of hair and wool were introduced at a later period. At first the wooden frames were small, low, and round; and it was not until the time of Augustus that square and ornamental couches came into fashion. In the time of Tiberius the most splendid sort were venerated with costly woods or tortoise-shell, and were covered with valuable embroideries, the richest of which came from Babylon, and cost large sums (Soc. Useful Knowl. Pompeii, ii, 88). The Jews perhaps had all these varieties, though it is not likely that the usage was ever carried to such a pitch of luxury as among the Romans; and it is probable that the mass of the people fed in the ancient manner—seated on stools or on the ground. It appears that couches were often so low that the feet rested on the ground; and that cushions or bolsters were in general use. It would also seem, from the mention of two and of three couches, that the arrangement was more usually square than semicircular or round (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in John xiii, 23). See DIVAN.

It is utterly improbable that the Jews derived this custom from the Romans, as is constantly alleged. They certainly knew it as existing among the Persians long before it had been adopted by the Romans themselves (Esth. i, 6; vii, 8); and the presumption is that they adopted it while subject to that people. The Greeks also had the usage (from the Persians) before the Romans; and with the Greeks of Syria the Jews had very much intercourse. Besides, the Romans adopted the custom from the Carthaginians (Val. Max. xii, 1, 2; Liv. xxviii, 28); and that they had it, implies that it previously existed in Phœnicia, in the neighborhood of the Jews. It is also unlikely that, in so short a time, it should have become usual and even (as the Talmud asserts, see Otho, Lec. Rabb. p. 447) obligatory to eat the Passover in that posture of indulgent repose, and in no other (Gizring, Accubit. ad Pasch. Vit. 1735). The literature of this subject has been brought together by Stuckey (Antiq.

Concivium, ii, 34); and the works on Pompeii and Herculaneum (see Cockburn's Pompeii Illustrated, ii, 5) supply the more recent information. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Cœna, Deipnon, Triclinium.)—Kitto, s. v. See EATING.

Accursed (in general designated by some form of קלל , kallal, Gr. καταράω, to "curse"), a term used in two senses. See OATH.

(1.) Anathema (אנאתמה , an'athema), a vow (Num. xxi, 2), by which persons or things were devoted to Jehovah, whose property they became irrevocably and never to be redeemed (sacer, sacrum esto Jehovah; comp. Caesar, Bell. Gall. vi, 17; Tacit. Annal. xiii, 57; Lev. iii, 55; Diod. Sic. xi, 3; see Mayer, De Nomîn. Piacularibus, in Ugolini Thesaur. xxiii). Persons thus offered were doomed to death (Lev. xxvii, 29; see Judg. xi, 31 sq.; 1 Sam. xiv, 44). Cattle, land, and other property were appropriated for the use of the temple, i. e. of the caste of the priests (Lev. xxvii, 28; Num. xviii, 14; Ezek. xxiv, 29). Originally such vows were spontaneous on the part of the Israelites (see Num. xxi, 2; 1 Sam. xiv, 24 [in this latter case, all the individual warriors of an army were bound by the vow made by the leader]); but occasionally the anathema, losing its votive character, assumed that of a theocratic punishment (see Ezra x, 8), in consequence of the prescriptions of the law, as, for example, in the case of the anathema (capital sentence) pronounced against an idolatrous Israelite (Exod. xxii, 20), or against a whole idolatrous city (Deut. xiii, 10 sq.), which was ordered to be destroyed utterly by fire with all that was therein, and the inhabitants and all their cattle to be put to the sword (see Judg. xx, 48; xxi, 10, 19; comp. Appian. Pun. 133; Mithrid. 45; Liv. x, 29; see Miller, Deotiones veterum in bellis, Lips. 1730). Essentially identical with this was the anathema against the Canaanitish cities, to be executed by the Israelites when they should enter the land (Deut. ii, 34 sq.; iii, 6; Josh. vi, 17 sq.; x, 28, 35, 37, 40; xi, 11), [in consequence of a vow (Num. xxi, 2 sq.), or upon the express command of Jehovah (Deut. vii, 2; xx, 16 sq.; see 1 Sam. xv, 3)], in order that they should be secured against all manner of temptation to enter into nearer relations with the idolatrous natives (Deut. xx, 18; see Exod. xxiii, 32 sq.). Such city, therefore, was burned with all things therein, and the inhabitants and their cattle were killed, while all metals and metallic utensils were delivered up to the sanctuary (Josh. vi, 21, 24). At times (when the wants of the army made it desirable?) the cattle was spared, and, like other spoils, divided among the warriors (Josh. viii, 26 sq.; Deut. ii, 34 sq.; iii, 6 sq.). Finally, in some cities merely the living things were destroyed (Josh. x, 28, 30, 32, 37, 39, 40), but the cities themselves were spared. Those who were guilty of any sort of violation of the laws of the anathema were put to death (Josh. vii, 11 sq.; see vi, 18; Deut. xiii, 17; Caesar, Bell. Gall. vi, 17). In the anathema pronounced by a zealous enforcer of the law (Ezra x, 8) against the property of such Jews as had married foreign wives and refused to divorce them, the banishment of such persons themselves was comprehended. It does not appear, however, whether their property was destroyed or (as H. Michaelis understood) given to the priests; the latter case would be inconsistent with a strict interpretation of Deut. xiii, 16. See ANATHEMA.—We translate from Winer, s. v. Bann.

(2.) Different from this is the Ban of the later Jews, mentioned in the New Testament as a sort of ecclesiastical punishment (for heresy), Luke vi, 22 (ἀποποιήσω); John ix, 22; xii, 42; xvi, 2 (ἀποσυνάγωγον γίνεσθαι or ποιῆν), viz., the exclusion of a Jew from the congregation, and all familiar intercourse with others, by a resolution. "Excommunicated" (מַעֲדֵל , me-nudch') and "excommunication" (מַעֲדָה , me-nudh' y) are also frequent terms in the Mishna (Taanith, iii, 8; Moed Katan, iii, 1). Stones were thrown (a mark of dishonor) over the graves of those who died in excommunication (Eduyoth, v, 6. The excommunicated person was not permitted to enter the Temple by the common door with others, but was admitted by a separate one (Mibloth, ii, 2). He was also prohibited from shaving during the time of his excommunication (Moed. Kat. iii, 1; see Selden, Jus Nat. et Gent. iv, 8 sq.). There is mention in the Gemara, as well as in other rabbinical writings, of another sort of excommunication, כְּרֵמ, che' rem (the person thus excommunicated was called כְּרֵמָה, mucharam'), more severe than the נִדְבָּי, nidbay. The difference between the two—according to Maimonides—was, [1,] that the nidbay was valid only for the thirty days following its date, and was pronounced without accusing; but the cherem was always connected with a curse: [2,] that cherem could be pronounced only by several, at least ten, members of the congregation; but the nidbay even by a single Israelite (e. g. by a rabbi): [3,] that the mucharam was excluded from all intercourse with others; but it was permitted to converse with the mevuleh at a distance of four cubits, and his household was not subjected even to this restriction. According to the Gemara, the latter was compelled to wear a mourning dress, in order to be distinguished outwardly from others. Elias Levita (in Tishi, under כְּרֵמָה) and later rabbis speak of a third and still higher degree of excommunication, שְׁמַטָּה, shammata', excommunication (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 2463 sq.), by which an obdurate sinner was delivered up to all sorts of perdition. It does not appear, however, that older Talmudists used this word in a sense different from nidbay, [the formula declarations quoted by Maimonides in the case of the latter, however, is לֵת הִמָּה בְּיָמֵי שְׁמַטָּה, let him be in "shammata,"] (see Selden, De Synedr. i, 7, p. 64 sq.; Ugolino, in Pfeiffer's Antiq. Ebr. iv; Thesaur. p. 1294); or perhaps it was the generic term for excommunication (see Danz, in Meuschen, N. T. Talm. p. 615 sq.), and the hypothesis of Elias seems, in fine, to have been founded upon a whimsical etymology of the word shammata (שָׁמַטָּה, there, and מָוֶת, the death). But it may even be questioned whether nidbay and cherem were distinguished from each other in the age of Jesus, or in the first centuries after the destruction of Jerusalem, in the sense asserted by Maimonides. In general, it is not improbable that there were even then degrees of excommunication. The formal exclusion from the Hebrew congregation and nationality is mentioned already by Ezra x, 8 (see above). In the passages of John foregoing a minor excommunication is spoken of; while in that of Luke, without doubt, a total exclusion is understood; even if we take merely the ἀποκείρισεν in this sense, or (with Lücke, Commentar zum Ev. Joh. ii, 387) we suppose that there is a gradation in the passage, so that ἀποκείρισεν refers to כְּרֵמָה, cherem, and ἐκείρισεν to שְׁמַטָּה. Many were of the opinion that the highest degree of excommunication, שְׁמַטָּה, according to the classification of Elias Levita, is to be found in the formula παράκλιονα τῶν Σαταῖν (1 Cor. v, 5; 1 Tim. i, 20). But there is no firm historical ground for such explanation, and the above expression should be explained rather from the usual idiomatic language of the apostle Paul, according to which it cannot mean, surely, a mere excommunication, as has been satisfactorily proved by Platt (Vorles. üb. d. Br. an die Kor. i, 102 sq.), and concurred in by later commentators. See DEVIL. Finally, it is not less improbable that, in Rom. ix, 3, ἀνάθεμα ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ should refer to the Jewish excommunication (as was asserted of late by Tholuck and Rückert; see Fritzsche, in loc.). See EXECUTION. (For the Jewish excommunication in general, see Carpov, Appar. p. 554 sq.; Witsii Miscell. ii, p. 47 sq.; Vitringa, De synag. vet. p. 739 sqq.; Pfeiffer, Antiq. Ebr. c. 22; Bindrim, De gradib. excommunicat. ap. Hebr. in Ugolini Thesaur. xxvi; Otho, Lexic. Robb. p. 212 sq.; Beer, in the Hall. Encyklop. xvi, 278 sq.; [the last very uncritical.]) See EXCOMMUNICATION.

Accuser (לְשׁוֹן, lashon', in Hiiph. "accuse," Prov. xxx, 10; and other terms signifying to slaver; more properly denoted by some form of the verb רִיב, rib, to plead a cause, also in defence; Sept. and N. T. ἀντίτακος, "adversary," or κατηγορος, prosecutor). (1.) The original word, which bears this leading signification, means one who has a cause or matter of contention; the accuser, opponent, or plaintiff in any suit (Judg. xii, 2; Matt. v, 25; Luke xii, 58). We have little information respecting the manner in which causes were conducted in the Hebrew courts of justice, except from the rabbinical authorities, who, in matters of this description, may be supposed well informed as to the later customs of the nation. See TRIAL. Even from these we learn little more than that great care was taken that, the accused being deemed innocent until convicted, he and the accuser should appear under equal circumstances before the court, that no prejudicial impression might be created to the disadvantage of the defendant, whose interests, we are told, were so anxiously guarded, that any one was allowed to speak whatever he knew or had to say in his favor, which privilege was withheld from the accuser (Lewis, Origines Hebraeae, i, 68). See ADVOCATE. (2.) The word is also applied in Scripture, in the general sense, to any adversary or enemy (Luke xviii, 3; 1 Pet. v, 8). In the latter passage there is an allusion to the old Jewish opinion that Satan was the accuser or calumniator of men before God (Job i, 6 sq.; Rev. xii, 10 sq.; comp. Zech. iii, 1). In this application the forensic sense was still retained, Satan being represented as laying to man's charge a breach of the law, as in a court of justice, and demanding his punishment. —Kitto, s. v. See SATAN.

Aceldama (Ἀκελδამά, from the Syro-Chaldaic חֶבְלֵי דַמָּא, chebal' dema, field of the blood, as it is explained in the text, ἀγορὴ αἱματος, see Critica Biblica, ii, 447), the field purchased with the money for which Judas betrayed Christ, and which was appropriated as a place of burial for strangers—that is, such of the numerous visitors at Jerusalem as might die during their stay, while attending the festivals (Matt. xxvii, 8; Acts i, 19; the slight discrepancy between these passages has been unduly magnified by Alford, Comment. in loc. post.; see Olshausen, Comment. iii, 61, Am. ed.). It was previously "a potter's field." The field now shown as Aceldama lies on the slope of the hills beyond the valley of Hinnom, south of Mount Zion. This is obviously the spot which Jerome points out (Onomast. s. v. Acheldamach) as lying on the south (Eusebius, on the north) of Zion, and which has since been mentioned (although with some variation) by almost every one who has described Jerusalem. Sandys describes it (Relation of a Journey, p. 187), and relates the common story that the Empress Helena caused 270 ship-loads of its flesh-consuming mould to be taken to Rome, to form the soil of the Campo Santo, to which the same virtue is ascribed. Castella affirms that great quantities of the wondrous mould were removed by divers Christian princes in the time of the Crusades, and to this source assigns the similar sarcophagic properties claimed not only by the Campo Santo at Rome, but by the cemetery of St. Innocents at Paris, by the cemetery at Naples (Le Sainct Voyage de Hierusalem, 1603, p. 150; also Roger, p. 160), and by that of the Campo Santo at Pisa. This plot seems to have been early set apart by the Latins, as well as by the Crusaders, for a place of burial for pilgrims (Jac. de Vitriaco, p. 64). The chapel-house is mentioned by Maundeville (Travels, 1322, p. 175, Bohn's ed.) as belonging to the Knights Hospitallers. Sandys shows that, early in the seventeenth century, it was in the possession of the Armenians. Roger (La Terre Sainte, p. 161) states that they bought it for the burial of their own pilgrims, and ascribes the erection of the chapel-house to them. They still possessed it in the time of Maundrell, or, rather, rented it, at a sequin a day, from the Turks. Corpses were still deposited there; and the traveller observes that they were in various stages of decay, from which he conjectures that the grave did not make that quick dispatch with the bodies committed to it which had been reported. "The earth, hereabouts," he observes, "is of a chalky substance; and the plot of ground was not above thirty yards long by fifteen wide; and a moiety of it was occupied by the chapel-house, which was twelve yards high" (Journey, p. 136). Richardson (Travels, p. 567) affirms that bodies were thrown in as late as 1818; but Dr. Robinson alleges that it has the appearance of having been for a much longer time abandoned: "The field or plat is not now marked by any boundary to distinguish it from the rest of the hill-side; and the former chapel-house, now a ruin, is all that remains to point out the site. . . . An opening at each end enabled us to look in; but the bottom was empty and dry, excepting a few bones much decayed" (Biblical Researches, i, 524; comp. Wilde's Stories of the Mediterranean, 1844; Barclay's City of the Great King, p. 207). Its modern name is Hak el-damm. It is separated from no enclosure; a few venerable olive-trees (see Salzmann's photograph, "Champ du sang") occupy part of it, and the rest is covered by the "chapel-house." a ruined square edifice—half built, half excavated—perhaps originally a church (Pauli, Cod. Diplom. i, 23), but which the latest conjectures (Schultz, Williams, and Barclay) propose to identify with the tomb of Ananus (Joseph. War, v, 12, 2). It is said (Kraft, Topogr. p. 193) to contain the graves of several German pilgrims; but the intimation (Ritter, Erdk. xv, 463) that a pottery still exists near this spot does not seem to be borne out by other testimony. (See, on the subject generally, Schlegel, De agro Sanguinis, Hamb. 1705; Wörger, Hakeldama, in Menclitic Theaur. p. 222.)—KITTO, s. v. See POTTER'S FIELD.

Acéphali (ἀκεφαλῆ), literally, those who have no chief. The term is applied to various classes of persons (see Biedermann, De Accephalis, Freiberg, 1751). 1. To those at the Council of Ephesus who refused to follow either St. Cyril or John of Antioch. 2. To certain heretics in the fifth century who denied, with Eutyches, the distinction of natures in Jesus Christ, and rejected the Council of Chalcedon. About the year 482 the Emperor Zeno endeavored to extinguish these religious dissensions by the publication of an edict of union, called Henoticon. The more moderate of both parties subscribed the decree, but the object was generally unsuccessful. The Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria was among those who signed the decree; which so greatly displeased many of his party that they separated from him, and were denominated Accephali, that is, without a head. See MONOPHYSITES and HENOTICON. These Accephali were condemned in the synod of Constantinople, 536. 3. To bishops exempt from the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of their patriarch. 4. To the Flagellants (q. v.).

Acesius, a Novatian bishop, present at Nicea, in 325, who agreed with the decisions of the council concerning the time for celebrating Easter, and the doctrine of the consubstantiality of the Son, but nevertheless refused to communicate with the other bishops. When the emperor asked of him his reason for so doing, he replied (according to the heresy of Novatian) that he could not communicate with those who had fallen after baptism. "Then, Acesius," answered Constantine, "set up a ladder for yourself, and mount up to heaven alone."—Soc. Eccl. Hist. lib. i, cap. 10; Soz. Eccl. Hist. lib. i, cap. 22.

Achabāra (Ἀχάβαρα), a name designating a certain rock (Ἀχάβαρον πέτρα) mentioned by Josephus (War, ii, 20, 6) as one of the spots in Upper Galilee fortified by him on the approach of the Romans under Cestius; probably the same place with the Chabare (Χαβάρη, prob. by erroneously annexing the initial a to the preceding word, see Ireland, Palrest. p. 705, a suggestion followed by Hudson and Havercamp, who write Ἀχάβαρη), mentioned likewise by Josephus (Life, 37) as a place of naturally great strength. Ireland (ib. p. 512) thinks it is identical with a place called Abbara (אבבארה) by Hottinger, situated between Tiberias and Zephath (Sepphoris?), and perhaps also the residence of the Abbarites (אבבאריים אבבארי) mentioned in the Gemara (Baba Metsia, lxxxiv, 2). But the place named by Hottinger would lie in Lower Galilee. The cliff in question (associated in both passages of Josephus with Jamnia, or Jamnith, and Meroth) appears to have been some eminence of Middle Galilee; probably (as suggested by Schwarz, Palrest. p. 188) the Tell Akhbarah (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 281), about two miles south-east of Safed, having a fine spring (Ritter, Erdk. xvi, 687, 771).

A'chad (Heb. Achad, אַחַד, the "constr." of אֶחָד, one, v. r. Achath, אַחַת, id.), thought by some to be the name of a heathen deity mentioned in the difficult phrase, Isa. lxvi, 17, אֶחָד אֶחָד אֶחָד, after one (of them) in the midst, Sept. καὶ ἑνὶ τοῦ προσηγορίας, Vulg. post junctum intrinsecus, Auth. Vers. "behind one (tree) in the midst." According to Gesenius (Commentar, in loc.), the phraseology is susceptible of three interpretations: (a) "One after another in the midst;" (b) "After Achad in the midst;" (c) "After one (of their number) [i. e. a priest leading the idolatrous rites] in the midst," a rendering which he prefers (comp. Rosenmüller, Scholion in loc.). In favor of the allusion to a heathen deity is only the slender analogy with the name Adad, as a Syrian deity. See HADAD. (See Mill, De Idolo אַחַד, in his Dissert. S. lect. Lugd. Bat. 1743, p. 137-166; Döderlein, Philol. Abhandl. v. d. Gott Achad, in his Verm. Abhandl. Halle, 1755, pt. iii.) See IDOLATRY.

Achai'a (Ἀχαια, derivation uncertain), a region of Greece, which in the restricted sense occupied the north-western portion of the Peloponnesus, including Corinth and its isthmus (Strabo, vii, p. 438 sq.). By the poets it was often put for the whole of Greece, whence Ἀχαιοί, Achaans, i. e. Greeks. The cities of the narrow slip of country, originally called Achaia, were confederated in an ancient league, which was renewed in B.C. 280 for the purpose of resisting the Macedonians. This league subsequently included several of the other Grecian states, and became the most powerful political body in Greece; and hence it was natural for the Romans to apply the name of Achaia to the Peloponnesus and the south of Greece, when they took Corinth and destroyed the league in B.C. 146 (Pausan. vii, 16, 10). Under the Romans, Greece was divided into two provinces, Macedonia and Achaia, the former of which included Macedonia proper, with Illyricum, Epirus, and Thessaly; and the latter, all that lay southward of the former (Cellar, i, p. 1170, 1022). It is in this latter acceptance that the name of Achaia is always employed in the New Testament (Acts xviii, 12, 16; xix, 21; Rom. xv, 26; xvi, 25; 1 Cor. xvi, 15; 2 Cor. i, 1; ix, 2; xi, 10; 1 Thess. i, 7, 8). In the division of the provinces by Augustus between the emperor and the senate in B.C. 27, Achaia was made a senatorial province (Strabo, xvii, p. 840), and, as such, was governed by proconsuls (Dion. Cass. liii, p. 704). In A.D. 16 Tiberius changed the two into one imperial province under procurators (Tacit. Annal. i, 76); but Claudius restored them to the senate and to the proconsular form of government (Suet. Claud. 25). Hence the exact and minute propriety with which Luke expresses himself in giving the title of proconsul (ἀντιπρόστος, "deputy") to Gallio (q. v.), who was appointed to the province (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v.) in the time of Claudius (Acts xviii, 12). (See generally Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.)

Achaïcus (Ἀχαικός, an Achaean), a Christian of Corinth, who, with Fortunatus, was the bearer of Paul's first epistle to the Church there, to whom he kindly commends them as having rendered him personal assistance (1 Cor. xvi, 17, subscription; comp. ver. 15, 16), A. D. 54.

A'chan (Heb. Akan', אָכָן, prob. troubler; Sept. Ἀχάν in Josh. xxii, 20, elsewhere Ἀχάω), a son of Carmi, called also ACHAR (1 Chron. ii, 7), in commemoration of his crime and awful doom, as related in Josh. vii (see Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.). The city of Jericho, before it was taken, was put under that awful ban, of which there are other instances in the early Scripture history, whereby all the inhabitants (excepting Rahab and her family) were devoted to destruction, all the combustible goods to be consumed by fire, and all the metals to be consecrated to God (see Deut. vii, 16, 23-26). This vow of devotion was rigidly observed by all the troops when Jericho was taken, save by one man, Achan, a Judahite, who could not resist the temptation of secreting an ingot of gold, a quantity of silver, and a costly Babylonish garment, which he buried in his tent, deeming that his sin was hid. The Israelites were defeated, with serious loss, in their first attack upon Ai; and as Joshua was well assured that this humiliation was designed as the punishment of a crime which had incalculated the whole people, he took immediate measures to discover the criminal by means of the lot (q. v.). The conscience-stricken offender then confessed his crime to Joshua; and his confession being verified by the production of his ill-gotten treasure, the people hurried away not only Achan, but his tent, his goods, his spoil, his cattle, his children, to the valley (hence afterward called) of Achor (q. v.), near Jericho, where they stoned him, and all that belonged to him; after which the whole was consumed with fire, and a cairn of stones raised over the ashes, B. C. 1618. (See Pyle, Sermons, iii, 185; Saurin, Disc. Hist. iii, 78; Simmons, Works, ii, 574; Buddicom, Christ. Evol. ii, 350; Origen, Opp. ii, 415). The severity of this act, as regards the family of Achan, has provoked some remark (see A. Clarke and Keil, in loc.). Instead of vindicating it, as is generally done, by the allegation that the members of Achan's family were probably accessories to his crime after the fact, we prefer the supposition that they were included in the doom by one of those stern, vehement impulses of semi-martial vengeance to which the Jewish (like all Oriental) people were exceedingly prone, and which, though extreme (comp. Deut. xxiv, 16), was permitted (for the terms "all that he hath" did not necessarily prescribe it) as a check to a cupidity that tended so strongly both to mutiny and impiety.—Kitto. See ACCUSED.

A'char (Heb. Akar', אָכָר, troubler; Sept. Ἀχάρ), the son of Carmi, who was punished for violating the anathema respecting Jericho (1 Chron. ii, 7); elsewhere (Josh. xxii, 20) called ACHAN (q. v.).

Achashdarpemim. See SARAP.

Achashteranim. See MULE.

Achaz (Matt. i, 9), elsewhere ANAZ (q. v.).

Ach'bor (Heb. Akbor', אָכְבֹּר, gnawing, i. q. mouse; Sept. Ἀχὼβωρ, v. r. in Jer. and Chron. Ἀχὼβωρ), the name of two men.

1. An Idumean, father of Baal-hanan, one of the Edomitish kings (Gen. xxxvi, 38; 1 Chron. i, 49), B. C. prob. considerably ante 1619.

2. The son of Michaiah, and one of the courtiers whom Josiah sent to Huldah to inquire the course to be pursued respecting the newly-discovered book of the law (2 Kings xxii, 12, 14), B. C. 623. In the parallel passage (2 Chron. xxxiv, 20) he is called ABDON, the son of Micah. His son Elhanan was a courtier of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxvi, 22; xxxvi, 12).

Achery, JOHN LUKE D', a learned Benedictine, of the congregation of Saint Maur, born at St. Quentin, in Picardy, 1609. At a very early age he entered the order of St. Benedict, and devoted himself to study, and his whole after life was passed in entire abstraction from the world. He died at the abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, in April, 1685. To the labors of this learned writer we owe the publication of many MSS. which, but for him, would probably have still remained buried in the libraries. His principal published works are the following: 1. S. Barnabe Epistola Græce et Latine, Hugonis Menardi notis illustrata (Paris, 1645); 2. Leonfranci Cantuar. Episcopi Opera, together with Chronicon Beccense; D. Heluani et A. priorum Beccensium Abbatum; S. Augustini Anglorum Apostoli vita; duo de Eucharistia Tractatus Hugonis Lincolnensis Epis. et Durandi abbat. Troarumensis, adversus Berengarium (Paris, 1648, fol.); 3. Judicium Asceticorum, etc. (Paris, 1671, 4to, 2d ed.); 4. Acta Sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti in secularium classes distributa. Although D'Achery made the necessary collections for this work, it was published with notes and observations by Mabillon, after his death, at various periods [see ACTA SANCTORUM]; 5. Veterum aliquot Scriptorum qui in Gallia Bibliothecis delituerant, maxime Benedictinorum, Spicilegium. Published at Paris, at different periods, from 1655 to 1677, by different printers, in 13 vols. 4to. A new and improved edition was published by M. de la Barre, at Paris, in 1723, 3 vols. fol., with this title, Spicilegium, sive Collectio veterum aliquot Scriptorum qui in Gallia Bibliothecis delituerant, olim editum opera A. studio D. Lucæ d'Achery, etc., ed. Baluze, Martene, et de la Barre. This collection contains a vast number of works of different authors, Acts and Canons of Councils, Histories, Chronicles, Lives of Saints, Letters, Poems, and Documents, which had not previously appeared. The obligations of subsequent scholars have been so great to the indefatigable industry of d'Achery, that almost every one who has treated of the antiquities of mediæval and modern European history has been obliged to acknowledge the debt due to him.

Achiach'arus (Ἀχιάχαραος, for Heb. אֲחִיָּאֵרָאֵרֹס, brother of the following, perh. i. q. posthumous or latest), the son of Anael (or Ananieh), and the uncle of Tobit (Tob. i, 21), as also of Nasbas (Tob. xi, 18). He had experienced ingratitude at the hands of Aman (Tob. xiv, 10), but became the cup-bearer and vizier of Sarchedon (Tob. i, 22), and befriended Tobit (Tob. ii, 10). See MORDECAI.

Achias (Lat. id.), for the Gr. text is no longer extant; prob. for Ahijah), a person named as son of Phinees (Phinehas), and father of Achitub (Ahitub) in the list of sacerdotal ancestors of Esdras or Ezra (2 [Vulg. 4] Esdr. i, 2); but, as the parallel list (Ezra vii, 3) gives no corresponding name, it is either an interpolation or, perhaps, a corruption for the ANMAAZ of 1 Chron. vi, 8, 9.

Achilles Tatius. See TATIUS.

Achim (Ἀχίμ, perh. for אָחִיָּם, Jachin [a contracted form of Jehoiachin], which the Sept., in 1 Chron. xxiv, 17, Græcizes Ἀχίμ [so the Vatican, but other texts have Ἰαχίμ]), the son of Sadoc and father of Eleazar, among the paternal ancestors of Christ (Matt. i, 14), B. C. long ante 40, and post 410. See GENEALOGY (OF CHRIST).

A'chior (Ἀχίωρ, for Heb. Achior', אָחִיֹּר, brother [i. e. full] of light; comp. Num. xxxiv, 27, where the Sept. has Ἀχίωρ for Ahihu], apparently reading אֲחִישׁ), the name given in the Apocrypha as that of the sheik of the Ammonites, who joined Holofernes with auxiliary troops during his expedition into Egypt, and who, when called upon to account for the opposition made by the inhabitants of Bethulia to that general, did so in a speech recounting the history of the country, and the national abhorrence of foreign idolatry (Judith v). According to the narrative, this so incensed the haughty general and his associates that they demanded the life of Achior by exposure to his enemies, who thereupon befriended and preserved him (chap. vi) till he was eventually released on the death of Holofernes, and then embraced Judaism (chap. xiv). See JUDITH.

A'chish (Heb. Akish', אֲחִישׁ, perhaps angry; Sept. Ἀκίς v. r. Ἀχίσις), a name which, as it is found applied to two kings of Gath, was perhaps only a general title of royalty, like "Abimelech" (q. v.), another Philistine kingly name, with which, indeed, it is interchanged in the title of Psa. xxxiv.

1. A Philistine king of Gath, with whom David sought refuge from Saul (1 Sam. xxi, 10-15). By this act he incurred imminent danger; for he was recognised and spoken of by the officers of the court as one whose glory had been won at the cost of the Philistines. This filled David with such alarm that he feigned himself mad when introduced to the notice of Achish, who, seeing him "scrabbling upon the doors of the gate, and letting his spittle fall down upon his beard," rebuked his people sharply for bringing him to his presence, asking, "Have I need of madmen, that ye have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence? Shall this fellow come into my house?" B.C. 1061. After this David lost no time in quitting the territories of Gath (see Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.). This prince is elsewhere called ABIMELECH (Psa. xxxiv, title), possibly a corruption for "Achish the king" (אֲחִישׁ מֶלֶךְ). David's conduct on this occasion has been illustrated by the similar proceeding of some other great men, who feigned themselves mad in difficult circumstances—as Ulysses (Cic. Off. iii, 26; Uygin. f. 56, Schol. ad Lycophr. 818), the astronomer Meton (Elian, Hist. xiii, 12), L. Junius Brutus (Liv. i. 56; Dion. Hal. iv. 68), and the Arabian king Bacha (Schultens, Auth. Vet. Itanasa, p. 555). See MAD.

The same Philistine king of Gath is probably meant by Achish, the son of Maach, to whom, some time afterward, when the character and position of David became better known, and when he was at the head of not less than 600 resolute adherents, he again repaired with his troop, and by whom he was received in a truly royal spirit, and treated with a generous confidence (1 Sam. xxvii, 1-4), of which David took rather more advantage than was creditable to him by making excursions from the city of Ziklag, which had been assigned him, against the neighboring nomades, under pretence of carrying on depredations upon Judah (1 Sam. xxvii, 5-12), B.C. 1054. In the final conflict with Saul, although the confidence of Achish remained so strong in David that he proposed to appoint him captain of his body-guard, the courtiers revived the old reminiscences against him with such force that the king was compelled to give him leave of absence—a circumstance that spared David a participation in the fatal battle (1 Sam. xxviii, 1, 2; xxxix, 2-11), B.C. 1053.—Kitto, s. v. See DAVID.

2. Another king of Gath, the son of Maachah, to whom the two servants of Shimei fled, and thereby occasioned their master the journey which cost him his life (1 Kings ii, 39, 40), B.C. cir. 1012.

Ach'itob (Αχιτωβ), the Græcized form (1 Esdr. viii, 2; 2 Esdr. i, 1) of the name of ΑΧΙΤΟΥ (q. v.).

Achlahmah. See AMETHIA.

Ach'metha (Heb. Achmethel', אַחְמֶתָה, Ezra vi,

2; Sept. Ἀμαζά, Vulg. Ecbatana), the ECBATANA of classical writers (ῥὰ Ἐκβάτανα, 2 Macc. ix, 3; Judith xi, 1; Tob. v, 9; Josephus, Ant. x, 11, 7; xi, 4, 6; also, in Greek authors, Ἐκβάτανα and Ἀγβάτανα), a city in Media. The derivation of the name is doubtful (see Gesenius, Theas. Heb. p. 70); but Major Rawlinson (Geogr. Journal, x, 134) has left little question that the title was applied exclusively to cities having a fortress for the protection of the royal treasures. The ancient orthography of this name is traced by Lassen (Jud. Biblioth. iii, 56) in the Sanscrit ayadhana, i. e. ἰπποστασία, stable. In Ezra we learn that, in the reign of Darius Hystaspis, the Jews petitioned that search might be made in the king's treasure-house at Babylon for the decree which Cyrus had made in favor of the Jews (Ezra v, 17). Search was accordingly made in the record-office ("house of the rolls"), where the treasures were kept at Babylon (vi, 1); but it appears not to have been found there, as it was eventually discovered "at Achmetha, in the palace of the province of the Medes" (vi, 2). Josephus (Ant. x, 11, 7; xi, 4, 6), while retaining the proper name of Ecbatana, yet (like the Sept., which adds the generic name πόλις) employs the word βάρει to express the Chaldee ܒܝܬܐ, Birthea ("the palace"), which is used as the distinctive epithet of the city (Ezra vi, 2).

In Judith i, 2-4, there is a brief account of Ecbatana, in which we are told that it was founded by Arphaxad (Phraortes), king of the Medes, who made it his capital. It was built of hewn stones, and surrounded by a high and thick wall, furnished with wide gates and strong and lofty towers. Herodotus ascribes its foundation to Darius, in obedience to whose commands the Medes erected "that great and strong city, now known under the name of Agbatana, where the walls are built circle within circle, and are so constructed that each inner circle overtops its outer neighbor by the height of the battlements alone. This was effected partly by the nature of the ground—a conical hill—and partly by the building itself. The number of the circles was seven, and within the innermost was the palace of the treasury. The battlements of the first circle were white, of the second black, of the third scarlet, of the fourth blue, of the fifth orange; all these were brilliantly colored with different pigments; but the battlements of the sixth circle were overlaid with silver, and of the seventh with gold. Such were the palace and the surrounding fortification that Darius constructed for himself; but he ordered the mass of the Median nation to construct their houses in a circle around the outer wall" (Herodot. i, 98). It is contended by Rawlinson (Geogr. Jour. x, 127) that this story of the seven walls is a fable of Sabaean origin—the seven colors mentioned being precisely those employed by the Orientals to denote the seven great heavenly bodies, or the seven climates in which they revolve.

Thus Ecbatana has been usually identified with the present Hamadân (see Journal of Education, ii, 305), which is still an important town, and the seat of one of the governments into which the Persian kingdom is divided. It is situated in north lat. 34° 53', east long. 40°, at the extremity of a rich and fertile plain, on a gradual ascent, at the base of the Elwund mountains, whose higher summits are covered with perpetual snow. Some remnants of ruined walls of great thickness, and also of towers of sun-dried bricks, afford the only positive evidence of a more ancient city than the present on the same spot. Although still declining, it has a population of about 25,000, and contains excellent and well-supplied bazaars, and numerous khans of rather a superior description—it being the great centre where the routes of traffic between Persia, Mesopotamia, and Persia converge and meet. Its own manufactures are chiefly in leather. Many Jews reside here, claiming to be descended from those of the captivity who remained in Media. Benjamin of Tudela says that in his time the number was 50,000.

Rabbi David de Beth Hillel (Travels, p. 85-87, Madras, 1832) gives them but 200 families. The latest authority (J. J. Benjamin, Eight Years in Asia and Africa, Hamover, 1859, p. 204) reckons them at 500 families. They are mostly in good circumstances, having fine houses and gardens, and are chiefly traders and goldsmiths. They speak the broken Turkish of the country, and have two synagogues. They derive the name of the town from "Hamon" and "Mele," and say that it was given to that foe of Mordecai by King Ahasuerus. In the midst of the city is a tomb, which is in their charge, and which is said to be that of Mordecai and Esther. It is a plain structure of brick, consisting of a small cylindrical tower and a dome (the whole about twenty feet high), with small projections or wings on three sides. An inscription on the wall in bass-relief describes the present tomb as having been built by two devout Jews of Kashan, in A.D. 714. The original structure is said to have been destroyed when Hamadan was sacked by Timour. As Ecbatana was anciently the summer residence of the Persian court, it is probable enough that Mordecai and Esther died and were buried there (see Kinnear's Persia, p. 126; Morier's Second Journey, p. 264 sq.; Southgate's Tour, ii, 102 sq.; Buckingham, Assyria, i, 284 sq.; McCulloch's Gazetteer, s. v. Hamadan).—Kitto, s. v.

The door of the tomb is very small, and consists of a single stone of great thickness, turning on its own pivot from one side. On passing through the little portal, the visitor is introduced into a small arched chamber, in which are seen the graves of several rabbis, some of which may contain the bodies of the first rebuilders of the tomb, after the destruction of the original one by Timour. A second door, of very confined dimensions, is at the end of this vestibule, by which the entrance is made into a large apartment on hand; and knees, and under the concave stand two sarcophagi, made of very dark wood, curiously and richly carved, with a line of Hebrew inscription running round the upper ledge of each. Other inscriptions, in the same language, are cut on the walls, while one of the most ancient, engraved on a white marble slab, is let into the wall itself. This slab is traditionally alleged to have been preserved from the ruins of the edifice destroyed by Timour, with the sarcophagi in the same consecrated spot. This last inscription is as follows: "Mordecai, beloved and honored by a king, was great and good. His garments were as those of a sovereign. Ahasuerus covered him with this rich dress, and also placed a golden chain around his neck. The city of Susa (or Shushan) rejoiced at his honors, and his high fortune became the glory of the Jews." The inscription which encompasses the sarcophagus of Mordecai is to the following effect: "It is said by David, Preserve me, O God! I am now in thy presence. I have cried at the gate of heaven that thou art my God, and what goodness I have received from thee, O Lord! Those whose bodies are now beneath, in this earth, when animated by thy mercy, were great; and whatever happiness was bestowed upon them in this world came from thee, O God! Their griefs and sufferings were many at the first, but they became happy because they always called upon thy name in their miseries. Thou liftedst me up, and I became powerful. Thine enemies sought to destroy me in the early times of my life; but the shadow of thy hand was upon me, and covered me as a tent from their wicked purposes.—Mordecai." The following is the inscription carved round the sarcophagus of Esther: "I praise thee, O God, that thou hast created me. I know that my sins merit punishment, yet I hope for mercy at thy hands; for whenever I call upon thee, thou art with me; thy holy presence secures me from all evil. My heart is at ease, and my fear of thee increases. My life became, through thy goodness, at the last, full of peace. O God! do not shut my soul out from thy divine presence. Those whom thou lovest never feel the torments of hell. Lead me, O merciful Father, to the life of life, that I may be filled with the heavenly fruits of Paradise.—Esther" (Ker Porter's Travels, ii, 88 sq.). See ESTHER.

Ecbatana, or Hamadan, is not without other local traditions connected with sacred history. On the mountain Orontes, or Elwund, the body of a son of King Solomon is pretended to be buried, but what son is not mentioned. It is a large square platform, a little raised, formed by manual labor out of the native rock, which is ascended by a few rugged steps, and is assuredly no covering of the dead. It is a very ancient piece of workmanship, but how it came to be connected with a son of the Jewish monarch does not appear. The Jewish natives of Hamadan are credulous as to the reputed story, and it is not unlikely that it was originally a mountain altar to the sun, illustrating what we often read in Scripture respecting the idolatrous sacrificial worship in "high places." The natives believe that certain ravines of the mountain produce a plant which can transform all kinds of metal into gold, and also cure every possible disease. They admit that no one had ever found it, but their belief in its existence is nevertheless unshaken. They also have a fabulous legend respecting a stone on the side of this mountain, which reminds the English reader of the celebrated story of Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves in the Arabian Nights. This stone contains an inscription in cabalistic characters, unintelligible to every one who has hitherto looked on it; but it is believed that if any person could read the characters aloud an effect would be produced which will shake the mountain to its centre, it being the protecting spell of an immense hidden treasure; and these characters once pronounced, would procure instant admittance from the genii of this subterranean cavern, and the wealth it contains would be laid at the feet of the fortunate invoker of this golden "Sesame!" See ECHTANATA.

History mentions another Ecbatana, in Palestine, at the foot of Mount Carmel, toward Ptolemais, where Cambyses died (Herodot. iii, 64; Plin. v, 19). It is not mentioned by this or any similar name in the Hebrew writings. (See Reiland, Palast, p. 745.)

A'chor (Heb. Akor, אָכּוֹר, trouble; Sept. Ἀχόρ), the name of a valley (צָרְיָה, Sept. ζάραρχε, κοιλία, Έμικ) not far from Jericho, given in consequence of the trouble occasioned to the Israelites by the sin of Achan (q. v.), who was stoned to death and buried there (Josh. vii, 24, 26). It was known by the same name in the time of Jerome (Onomast. s. v.). The prophets more than once allude to it typically in predicting the glorious changes under the Messiah, either on account of its proverbial fertility (Isa. xlv, 10) or by way of contrast with the unfortunate entrance of the Israelites near this pass into Canaan on their first approach (Hos. ii, 15). It was situated on the boundary of Judah and Benjamin, between the stone of Ben-Bonan and Debir, south of Gilgal (Josh. xv, 7), and was probably the same now called (see Zimmerman's Map Wady Dabir, running into the Dead Sea east of Ain Jehair (Robinson's Researches, ii, 254). See THIBE. Thomson (Land and Book, ii, 185) says vaguely that "it runs up from Gilgal toward Bethel;" but this is inconsistent with the above notices of location (comp. Keil, Comment. on Josh., p. 201). See CHEBETH.

Ach'sa, a less correct mode (1 Chron. ii, 49) of Anglicizing the name ACHSAH (q. v.).

Ach'sah (Heb. Aksah, אַכְסָה, anklet, Sept. Ἀχσά), the daughter of Caleb (and apparently his only daughter, 1 Chron. ii, 49, "Achsa"), whose hand her father offered in marriage to him who should lead the attack on the city of Debir, and take it, B.C. 1612. The prize was won by his nephew Othniel; and as the bride was conducted with the usual ceremony to her future home, she alighted from the ass which she rode, and sued her father for an addition of springs of water (as being peculiarly necessary, Stanley, Palest. p. 161) to her dower in lands, which were situated in the southern part of Judah. See GULLOTH. It is probable that custom rendered it unusual, or at least ungracious, for a request tendered under such circumstances by a daughter to be refused, and Caleb accordingly bestowed upon her "the upper and the nether springs" (Josh. xv 16-19; Judg. i 9-15)—Kitto, s. v.

Ach'shaph (Heb. Akshaph, אַחְשָׁפַח, fascination: Sept. Αχσάφ), a royal city of the Canaanites, in the northern part of Palestine (Josh. xi, 1), whose king was overthrown by Joshua (Josh. xii, 20). It was situated on the eastern boundary of the tribe of Asher, and is named between Beten and Alammelech (Josh. xix, 25). By some (see Reland, Palest. p. 543) it has been regarded as the same as Achziv, but this is mentioned separately (Josh. xix, 29). By others (e. g. Hammesveld, iii, 237) it has been assumed to be the same as Acho or Acre, and Schwarz (Palest. p. 191) thinks it is the modern village Kefr-Yusif, five miles north-east of that town; but this region is too far west for the Biblical notices. Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Ἀκσάφ) locate it at the foot of Mount Tabor, eight miles from Diocæsarea, but they have evidently confounded it with Chesulboth (see Keil's Comment. on Josh. xi, 1). Dr. Robinson is probably correct in identifying it with the ruined village Kesaf, around a large tree, two miles north-east of Kabrikah, a little south of the Litany, and nearly midway between the Mediterranean and the Upper Jordan (new ed. of Researches, iii, 55).

Achterfeldt, JOHANN HEINRICH, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, born 1788, at Wesel; died at Bonn, 1864. He was ordained priest in 1813; and, in 1817, was appointed professor of theology at the seminary of Braunsberg, from which he was called, in 1826, to the chair of dogmatics at the university of Bonn. He was an intimate friend of Professor Hermes (q. v.), and after the death of the latter published his famous work on Systematic Theology (Christl.-Katholische Dogmatik, 1831). Achterfeldt was regarded, with his colleague Braun, as the leader of the Hermesian School (q. v.); and when the system of Hermes was condemned by Rome, and he refused to comply with the demands of Rome, he was suspended from his chair. He wrote Lehrbuch der Christl.-Kathol. Glaubens- und Sittenlehre (Braunsberg, 1825); Katechismus der Christl.-Katholischen Lehre (Braunsberg, 1826); and was, after 1832, one of the editors of a theological and philosophical quarterly (Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Katholische Theologie), the chief organ of the Hermesian School.—Pierc, i, 88; Vapereau, p. 14.

Ach'zib (Heb. Akziv, אַחְצִיב, falshood; Sept. Ἀχζιβ, but in Mic. παρωα and Vulg. mendacium), the name of two places, sometimes Latinized Achziv.

1. A town in the plain of Judah, adjoining the Highlands, mentioned between Keilah and Maresbah (Josh. xv, 41). It appears to have proved faithless to the national cause on the Assyrian invasion (Mic. i, 14); hence this passage contains a play on the name: "the houses of Achziv (אַחְצִיב) shall be a lie (אֲשֶׁר)!" It is probably the same as the CHEZIB in Canaan where Shelah was born (Gen. xxxviii, 5), and perhaps also the CHOZERA where his descendants were finally located (1 Chron. iv, 22). In the time of Eusebius, Onomast. s. v. Xaziv) it was a deserted village near Eleutheropolis toward Adullam. From the associated localities, also, it appears to have been situated not far north-east of the former.

2. A maritime city assigned to the tribe of Asher

(Josh. xix, 29), but from which the Israelites were never able to expel the Phœnicians (Judg. i, 31). According to Eusebius (Onom. s. v. Ἀχζιβ) it was 9 (according to the Jerusalem Itinerary 12) Roman miles north of Aecho or Ptolemais. In the Talmud (Shebi'ith, vi, 1; Challah, iv, 8) it is called Kezib (כְּזִיב), and in later times Eclippi (τὰ Ἐκίπια, Josephus, War. i, 13, 4; Ptol. v, 15; Pliny, v, 17), from the Aramaean pronunciation (כְּזִיבָא). Josephus also (Ant. v, 1, 22) gives the name as Aché or Actippus (Ἀκί . . . ἢ καὶ Ἀκτιπός). In the vicinity (at the mouth of the Nahr Herdawil, comp. Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii, 233) was the Casale Huberti of the Crusaders (Ritter, Erzk. xvi, 782). It was first identified by Maudrell (Journey, March 21) in the modern es-Zib (comp. Vit. Salad. p. 98), on the Mediterranean coast, about ten miles north of Acre (Robinson's Researches, iii, Append. p. 153; new ed. iii, 628). It stands on an ascent close by the sea-side, overlooking the ancient Roman road, and is a small place with a few palm-trees rising above the dwellings (Pococke, East. ii, 115; Richter, Wolff. p. 70; Irby and Mangles, p. 196; Buckingham, Palest. i, 99; Legh, in Mach-michael's Journey, p. 250; De Sauley's Narrative, i, 66; comp. Lightfoot, Opp. ii, 219; Fuller, Miscel. p. 4, 15; Cellarii Nott. ii, 481; Reland, Palest. p. 544; Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 674). It has evident traces of antiquity, but could never have been a large city (Thomson's Land and Book, i, 471).

Ac'ipha (Ἀκίβᾶ, but most copies Ἀκίφᾶ, for Heb. Chakipha חַקִּיפָה), the head of one of the families of Nethinim (ἑπιούροισι, "temple-servants") that returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 31); evidently the ΗΑΚΥΦΙΑ (q. v.) of the parallel lists (Ezra ii, 51; Neh. vii, 53).

Ac'itho (Ἀκίθων, v. r. Ἀκίθων, while other copies omit entirely, perh. for Heb. hak-katon, חַקִּיטֹן, the little; or [as Fritzsche thinks, Handb. in loc.] for Ahitub, which some copies of the Gr. with the Syr. and Ital. have), the son of Eliu and father of Raphaim, among the ancestors of Judith (Judith viii, 1).

Ackermann, PETER FOURER, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, born Nov. 17, 1771, at Vienna; died Sept. 9, 1831, at Klosterneuburg. He was ordinary professor of Old-Testament language, literature, and theology at Vienna, and choir master of the monastery or cathedral of Klosterneuburg. He was the author of an Introductio in libros sacros I. T. scribas academiæ accommodata (Vien, 1825), and an Archæologia biblica breviter exposita (Vienna, 1826), both of which works are not much more than revised editions of Jahn expurgated, so as to rescue them from the Roman Index into which they had been put by Pius VII. His commentary on the Minor Prophets, Trophone Minores perpetua annotatione illustrati (Vienna, 1830), has some value, on account of the extracts it gives from older writers of the Roman Catholic Church.

Acœmêtæ (ἀκομηταί, watchers), an order of monks instituted at the beginning of the fifth century by Alexander, a Syrian monk (Bürger, De Acœmētis, Schneeberg, 1686). They were divided into three classes, who performed divine service in rotation, and so continued, night and day, without intermission. They were condemned by a synod held at Rome in 534 for maintaining that Mary was not the mother of God.—Helyot, Ordres Relig. i, 4 sq.

Acôlyth or Acolyte (ἀκόλυθος, follower), the name of an inferior order of clergy or servants. It is not known in the Greek Church, but appears to be of very ancient establishment in the Latin Church, since mention is made of it in the epistles of Cyprian. Their office in the ancient Church was to light the candles and to pour the wine intended to be consecrated into the proper vessels; to wait upon the bishops and their officers, presenting to them the sacerdotal vestments; and to accompany the bishop everywhere, acting as witnesses of his conduct. At present their duties in the Papal Church are to attend upon the deacon and sub-deacon at the altar, to make ready the wine and water at mass, to carry the thurible, and to light and carry the candles, especially at the chanting of the Gospel. At Rome there are three kinds of Acolyths: the Acolyths of the palace, palatini, who wait on the pope; those who serve the churches, stationarii, when they are stationed; and regimentarii, who serve with the deacons in different quarters of the city. The order of Acolytes is the fourth of the ordines minores, through which a Romish priest must pass. For a full account of the office and its functions, see Boissonnet, D'et. des Rites, i, 87; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. iii, ch. iii.

Acontius or Aconzio, JAMES, a native of Trent, and the intimate friend of Francis Botti, a Roman. They both quitted Italy on account of their religion, having both left the communion of the Church of Rome. Botti, who left first, waited for Acontius at Basle; this was in the year 1557. Hence they went together to Zurich, where they parted, and Acontius, after visiting Strasburg, journeyed into England, where he was well received by queen Elizabeth, who employed him as an engineer. He was a member of the Dutch congregation in Austin-Friars, but falling under the suspicion of "Anabaptistical and Arian principles," proceedings were taken against him before Grindal, bishop of London, who sentenced him to be refused the Holy Sacrament, and forbade the Dutch congregations to receive him. He died in 1566, according to Nicéron. He inclined toward moderation and principles of tolerance in matters of religion. Arminius styled him "divinum prudentiæ ac moderatiōnis lumen." He wrote D' Method, hoc est, de recte in-stigandorum tradendæque Scientiarum ratione (8vo, Basle, 1558); Strategemata Satanae (8vo, Basle, 1565. Transl. into French, 4to. There is also an English translation of the four first books, London, 1648).—Richard and Giraud, Bib. Sacr.; New General Biographical Dictionary, i, 30; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Acosta, Gabriel (afterward URELL), a Portuguese, of Jewish extraction, born at Oporto, and brought up in the Roman Catholic Church. About the age of twenty-two he began to entertain doubts first as to the doctrine of indulgences, and, finally, as to the truth of Christianity; and being unable to satisfy himself, he returned to the religion of his ancestors, became a Jew, retired from Portugal to Amsterdam, and was circumcised. He soon, however, became disgusted with the Pharisaism of the Jews of Amsterdam, and advocated a doctrine like that of the ancient Sadducees. He wrote in the Portuguese language a treatise entitled "The Traditions of the Pharisees compared with the written Law" (Amsterd. 1621), which so exasperated the Jews that they accused him of atheism before the civil tribunals. His book was confiscated, he was imprisoned ten days, and fined 300 guilders. He was also expelled from the Jewish synagogue. After seven years he submitted to a painful penance, and was readmitted, though it does not appear that he really changed his views. He died, according to Fabricius, in 1647, whether by suicide or not is uncertain. He left an autobiography which fell into the hands of Limborch, and was reprinted in 1847 (Uriel Acosta's Selbstbiographie, Lat. n. Deutsch, Leipzig). His life afforded Gutzkow the material for a novel, "The Sadducees in Amsterdam" (1834), and for a drama, "Uriel Acosta" (Leips, 1847).—Jellinek, Ueber Acosta's Leben und Lehre (Zerbst, 1847).

Acosta, Joseph, a Spanish Jesuit, born about 1539, appointed provincial of the Jesuits in Peru, and died rector of the university of Salamanca in 1600. He wrote The Natural and Moral History of the Indies (Seville, 1590, 4to); a treatise De Christo Revelato libri novem (Lugd. 1592, 8vo); De Promulgatione Evangelii apud Barbaros (Cologne, 1596, 8vo).

Acra (Ἄκρα), a Greek word, signifying a summit or citadel, in which sense its Hebraized form Chakra (שָׁכָרָה) also occurs in the Syriac and Chaldaic (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 818). Hence the name of Acra was acquired by the eminence north of the temple at Jerusalem, on which a citadel was built by Antiochus Epiphanes, to command the holy place (1 Macc. iii, 45; iv, 2, 41; vi, 18, 26, 32; ix, 52 sq.; x, 6; xi, 41; 2 Macc. iv, 12, 27, etc.). It thus became, in fact, the Acropolis of Jerusalem (see Michaelis, in Macc. p. 30 sq.; Crome, in the Hall. Encycl. ii, 291 sq.). Josephus describes this eminence as semicircular (see Reland, Palæst. p. 852); and reports that when Simon Maccabæus had succeeded in expelling the Syrian garrison, he not only demolished the citadel, but caused the hill itself to be levelled, that no neighboring site might thenceforth be higher than or so high as that on which the temple stood. The people had suffered so much from the garrison, that they willingly labored day and night, for three years, in this great work (Ant. xiii, 6, 6; War. v, 4, 3). At a later period the palace of Helena, queen of Adiabene, stood on the site, which still retained the name of Acra, as did also, probably, the council-house, and the repository of the archives (War. vi, 6, 3; see also Descript. Urbis Jerusalemæ, per J. Heydenum, lib. iii, cap. 2).—Kitto, s. v.

A good deal of controversy has lately arisen as to the position of this eminence, Dr. Robinson (Bib. Res. i, 414; new ed. iii, 207-211) strongly contending for the sloping eminence now occupied by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and others (especially Williams, Holy City, ii, 25, 49) placing Acra more northwardly from the temple. The latter position, in the middle of the Mohammedan quarter, on the whole, seems best to accord with the present state of the surface and the ancient notes of place (see Strong's Harmony and Expos. of the Gospel's, Append. ii, p. 4, 5); especially with Josephus's statements (War. v, 4, 1) respecting the valley of the Tyropæon (q. v.). See JERUSALEM.

A place by the name of Acra (Ἄκρα) is mentioned by Josephus (War. ii, 2, 2) as having been taken by Simon Maccabæus, in connection with Gazara, Jeppa, and Jamma; which some suppose to mean Ekron (by a change of reading), while others take the word in the ordinary sense of tower. The passage is evidently parallel with 1 Macc. xiv, 7, where Simon is said, after having taken Gazara and Bethsura, to have cleansed "the tower" (ἄκρα); which, by a comparison with chap. xiii, 49, appears to mean no other than the above fortress in Jerusalem. See BARRIS.

For the Acra or Acre (Hebraized אַכְרָה by Benjamin of Tudekla) of the Crusades, see ACCUO.

Acrabattinè (Ἀκραβᾶτινῆ sc. χώρα), the name of two regions in Palestine.

1. A district or toparchy of Judæa, extending between Shechem (Nablous) and Jericho eastward, being about 12 miles long (see Reland, Palæst. p. 192). It is mentioned by Josephus (War. ii, 12, 4; 20, 4; 22, 2; iii, 3, 4, 5), and doubtless took its name from a town called Acra, mentioned by Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. Ἀκραβᾶτινῆ; Jerome corruptly "Acra"), see Clerici ed. Amst. 1707, p. 17, note 5) as a large village 9 Roman miles east of Neapolis, on the road to Jericho; probably the same found by Dr. Robinson under the name Akrabeh (Researches, iii, 103), and described as a considerable town, finely situated on the slope of a fertile hill, with a mosque (new ed. of Researches, iii, 296, 297) and a ruined fort (Van de Velde, Narrative, ii, 394-397).

2. Another district of Judæa toward the southern end of the Dead Sea, occupied by the Edomites during the captivity (1 Macc. v, 3, Auth. Vers. "Arabattine;" comp. Joseph. Ant. xii, 8, 1). It is supposed to have taken its name from the MAALEH-ACRABBIM (q. v.) of Num. XXXIV, 4; Josh. XV, 3, which lay in this vicinity.

Acra'bim. See MAALEH-ACRABBIM.

Acree is put by our translators (Isa. v, 10) for אֶרֶץ, ter'ced, which properly means a yoke, i. e. as much land as a yoke of oxen can plough in a day. So the Latin jugum, an acre, from jugum, a yoke. See MEASURE. In I Sam. xiv, 14, the word "acre" is supplied in our translation after אֶרֶץ, a furrow which is omitted (see margiu).

Acree. See ACCHO.

Acrostic (from ἀκρον, extremity, and ἀρχος, verse). The word commonly signifies the beginning of a verse; but it is sometimes taken for the end or close of it. It ordinarily signifies an ode in which the initial letters of the verses in their order spell a certain word or sentence. In this form acrostics do not occur in the Bible. There are certain parts of the poetical compositions of the Old Testament, however, in which the successive verses or lines in the original begin with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet; these may be called alphabetical acrostics. For instance, in Psalm cxix, there are as many stanzas or strophes as there are letters in the alphabet, and each strophe consists of eight double lines, all of which, in each case, begin with that letter of the alphabet corresponding to the place of the strophe in the Psalm—that is, the first eight lines begin each with א, Alph, the next eight with ב, Beth, and so on. See ARCEADARIAN. Other Psalms have only one verse to each letter, in its order, as Psalms xxv, xxxiv. In others, again, as Psalms cxi, cxii, each verse is divided into two parts, and these the hemistichs follow the alphabetical arrangement, like the whole verses of the last mentioned Psalms. The Lamentations of Jeremiah are mostly acrostic, some of the chapters repeating each letter one or more times. The last chapter of Proverbs also has the initial letters of its last twenty-two verses in alphabetical order. See POETRY.

The term acrostic is used in ecclesiastical history to describe a certain mode of performing the psalmody of the ancient Church. A single person, called the precentor, commenced the verse, and the people joined with him at the close. We find also the words hypopsalmi and dispsalmi, likewise ἀκροειδιον and ἐψήμιον, almost synonymous with acrostic, used to describe the same practice. They do not always mean the end of a verse, but sometimes what was added at the end of a psalm, or something repeated in the middle of it, e. g. the phrase "for his mercy endureth forever," repeated or chanted by the congregation. The Gloria Patri is by some writers called the epode or acrotelic, because it was always sung at the end of the psalm (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. i, xiv).

Acta Martyrum (Acts of the Martyrs), the title of the record of the lives and actions of martyrs kept in the ancient Church for the edification of the faithful. Whenever a Christian was apprehended, the accusation, defence, and verdict were noted in these Acts. Some of the martyrs also wrote accounts of their own sufferings, or this was done for them by a regular officer of the Church acting as notary, who took down the facts in a prescribed form; and these reports were also designated as acta martyrum or martyrum. Comp. CALENDARIA; MARTYROLOGIA; MENSIÓN; MENOLOGIUM. The oldest are those referring to the death of St. Ignatius (q. v.), Bishop of Antioch (died 107), and of Polycarp (q. v.) (died about 165), both of which are given in Dressel's and Hefele's editions of the Patres Apostolici. The oldest collection of Acts of the Martyrs was compiled by the Church historian Eusebius, in his two works de Martyribus Palestine and Synagoge Martyrum. The latter, a martyrology of the Church universal, was lost as early as the end of the sixth century; the former has reached us as an appendix to the eighth book of the author's Church history. A second large collection of 12 volumes was in existence at Constantinople in the ninth century, and probably formed the basis of the work of Siméon Metaphrastes, de Actis Sanctorum, in the tenth century. In the Latin Church a catalogue of martyrs, containing the names of martyrs from different countries arranged according to the days on which they were commemorated in the mass, as also the place and the day, but not the details, of their martyrdom, was, at the close of the sixth century, in extensive use. It was, though without good reason, ascribed to Jerome. The particular churches used to add to this general catalogue of martyrs their local calendars, a circumstance which explains the diversity of the different copies of this work still extant (ed. by Fr. Mar. Florentinius, Lucæ, 1668 sq.; d'Achery, Spicileg. ed. Nor. ii, p. 27, according to a manuscript of the French convent Gellou, written about 804; J. B. Sallerius, Act. Sanctorum, June tom. vi, according to copies of Reichenau, St. Ulric's at Augsburg, Corvey, etc.). While this work excludes all historical accounts of the lives of martyrs, giving only their names and the place and day of their martyrdom, there are indications that detailed historical works were also compiled at an early period. A council at Carthage 397 permits the reading of the Passiones Martyrum on the days of their commemoration, besides the reading-lessons from the Scriptures. Pope Gelasius, on the contrary, excludes this kind of literature from ecclesiastical use, on the ground that the names of the authors were unknown, and that infidels, heretics, and unlearned persons (idiotæ) had inserted many superfluous and improper things, a conclusive proof of the untrustworthy condition in which this literature, even at that early time, was found. The heads of the monastic orders were in general very urgent in recommending to their monks the reading of the Gesta Martyrum, the history of their sufferings. Besides the two classes of works just named, there was a third class, the so-called Vite Patrum, whose object was more literary than edifying, and some of which belong among the most valuable sources of the early Church history. To this class of works belong the very valuable history of Severin, by his disciple Eupippius, the biographies of Columban, Gallus, etc. Collections of accounts of this kind are extant by Palladius (about 420), in his Historia Lausiacæ (Λαυσιακῶν); by Heraclides, in his Paradisi, s. de Vitæ Patrum; by Johannes Moschus (died about 620), the author of the lives of the monks, under the title Λαυριώων, Λαυριωάριων, or Νεῶς Παπῶν. These works are designated in the Greek Church under the name of Γεροντικῶν, Κλίμακας, Λαυσιακά, and Παρηγοῦν (q. v.), about 901, of whose biographies of saints we have 122 left, while a much larger number have been erroneously ascribed to him. In the Latin Church we have the 14 hymns of Prudentius (q. v.), entitled Peristephanon s. de Coronis et Passionibus Martyrum; the Collationes Patrum, by Cassian (q. v.); and several historical works of Gregory of Tours (q. v.), as de Miraculis, Vite Patrum, de Gloria Martyrum. The biographical material contained in this class of works was gradually worked into the martyrologies. That known under the name of Bede is mostly restricted to statistical statements; yet a copy of it at the beginning of the ninth century received considerable additions from Florus, a sub-deacon at Lyons. Considerable additions to the martyrologies were also made by Iribanus Maurus (q. v.); Ato, archbishop of Vienna, about 860; Usuard, a monk at Paris (875); and Notker (died 912). This enlargement of the ancient martyrologies forms the transition to the legends of the Middle Ages, which are generally nothing but ecclesiastical novels, and have no claim whatever to credibility. The "Acts of the Martyrs" had, moreover, gradually been enlarged into "Acts of the Saints," as other saints than martyrs had been added to the catalogues of the latter. See ACTA SANCTORUM. The most valued collection is Ruinart's Acta Martyrum sincera (Paris, 1689, fol.; 2d ed. Amst. 1713, fol.; B. Galura, Augsb. 1802, 3 vols. 8vo). It is more critical than most Roman biographies, but nevertheless contains many incredible legends. A large collection was also published by the learned Stephen Evodius Assemanni, under the title Acta Sanctorum Martyrum Orientalium et Occidentalium (Rome, 1748, 2 vols. fol.).—Herzog, i, 100; Wetzer and Welte, i, 88. See MARTYROLOGY.

Acta Sanctorum (Acts of the Saints), the title given to collections of the lives of martyrs [see ACTA MARTYRUM] and of saints in the ancient Church.

(1.) We first find the title Acta Sanctorum in Eusebius (fourth century). In consequence of an edict of Diocletian, of the year 303, which commanded the destruction of all the Christian records, a great gap was created in the records of the Church, which was afterward filled with legends and traditions, abounding in errors, omissions, and exaggerations. Collections of the Acta Sanctorum, principally for edification, were made in the Vite Patrum, probably by Jerome of Dalmatia; by Gregory of Tours in the sixth century; in the Synaxarium (q. v.) of the Greek Church, in the eighth century, by John of Damascus; by Simeon Metaphrastes in the tenth century; in the Golden Legend of Jacob of Voragine in the thirteenth, which went through 71 editions from 1474 to 1500; and in the Catalogus Sanctorum of Peter de Natalibus (Vicenza, 1493). A more critical treatment is found in the Sanctorum of Boninus Mombritius (Venice, 1474, 2 vols.); in Lipman, Vite Sanctor. (Rome, 1551-1566, 8 vols.); and particularly in Ruinart, Acta Martyrum sincera (Paris, 1689, fol.). Compare MARTYROLOGY.

(2.) The most celebrated collection of the Acta Sanctorum is that commenced by Bollandus, and still continued by a society of Jesuits. It is one of the most remarkable works ever produced, whether regarded as to the labor and time spent upon it, or to the comparative worthlessness of its matter. It has been two hundred years in progress, has reached the fifty-fifth folio volume, and is still in progress. This stupendous undertaking originated with Rosweyde, a Jesuit, who announced his intention in a Festus Sanctorum quorum rite in Belgicis bibliothecis manuscripte asservantur (Antwerp, 1607); but he died in 1629, before any part was printed. After his death his materials came into the hands of Johannes Bollandus, who established correspondence with all parts of Europe, in order to obtain information from every possible source. In 1635 he associated with himself Godefridus Henschenius; and these two published at Antwerp in 1643 the first two volumes, in folio, under the title of "Acta Sanctorum quotquot toto orbe coluntur vel à Catholicis Scripserunt celebrantur." These volumes contain the lives of the saints who are commemorated by the Roman Church in the month of January only. In 1658 three more volumes appeared, embracing February. After this, Daniel Papebrochius was associated as coeditor; but Bollandus himself died, Sept. 12, 1665, before the vol. for March appeared. As the work proceeded, other editors were appointed, and generation after generation sank into the grave during its long progress. It would occupy too much time and space to enumerate the separate labor of each. The work itself was published in the following order: January, 2 vols. 1643; February, 3 vols. 1658; March, 3 vols. 1668; April, 3 vols. 1675; May (with a Propylæum), 8 vols. 1685-1688; June, 6 vols. 1695-1715; July, 7 vols. 1719-1731; August, 6 vols. 1733-1743; September, 8 vols. 1746-1762; October, vol. i, 1765; ii, 1768; iii, 1770; iv, 1780; v, 1786; vi, 1791; this volume ended at the 15th of October (see Welch, Bibl. Theol. iii, 657 sq.). The work was stopped by the suppression of the Jesuits, and it appeared to be altogether extinguished by the French Revolution; but in 1838 it revived, and there was printed at Namur a prospectus, De prosecutione operis Bollandianum quod ACTA SANCTORUM inscribitur. In 1845 appeared vol. vii of October, in two parts—the first containing the saints of the 15th of October; the second the saints of the 16th. New editions of the first 4 volumes of October appeared in 1859 and 1860. The work is still in progress, and the Jesuits receive for its continuation an annual stipend from the Belgian government. Some idea of its vast extent may be gathered from the fact that the lives of more than 2000 saints remain, and that 50 more vols. fol. may be expected to complete the work.

The editors are as follow, with the number of years and volumes on which they were engaged: Jo. Bollandus (died 1665), 34 years, 8 vols.; Godefr. Henschenius (died 1681), 46 years, 24 vols.; Daniel Papebrochius (died 1714), 55 years, 19 vols.; Conrad Janninius (died 1723), 44 years, 13 vols.; Franc. Baertius (died 1719), 38 years, 10 vols.; Joan. Bapt. Sollerius (died 1740), 38 years, 12 vols.; Joan. Pinus (died 1749), 35 years, 14 vols.; Guil. Cuperus (died 1741), 21 years, 11 vols.; Petrus Boschius (died 1736), 15 years, 7 vols.; Joan. Stillingus (died 1762), 25 years, 11 vols.; Constant. Suyskenus (died 1771), 26 years, 11 vols.; Joan. Perierus (died 1762), 15 years, 7 vols.; Urban. Stickernus (died 1753), 2 years, 1 vol.; Joan. Limpennus (retired 1750), 9 years, 3 vols.; Joan. Veldius (retired 1747), 5 years, 2 vols.; Joan. Cleus (retired 1760), 7 years, 3 vols.; Corn. Bueus (died 1801), 33 years, 6 vols.; Jacob. Bueus (died 1808), 32 years, 6 vols.; Joseph Guesquierus (died 1802), 10 years, 4 vols.; Ignat. Hubenus (died 1782), 10 years, 1 vol. The renewal of the work was undertaken in 1838 by Jo. Bapt. Boone, Joseph. Vandermoere, Prosper Coppens, and Joseph. Vanhecke, Jesuits of the college of St. Michael at Brussels. The first 42 vols., coming down to Sept. 14, were reprinted at Venice in 1734 sq.; but in inferior style. A new edition of the entire work has been commenced by Ceirmandet, in 1863. (Paris, tom. i, p. 821, embracing the first eleven days of January). See SAINTS.

Acts of the APOSTLES (Ἡράσεις τῶν Ἀποστόλων), the fifth book of the New Testament, and the last of those properly historical. It obtained this title at a very early period, though sometimes the epithet holy was prefixed to apostles, and sometimes also it was reckoned among the gospels, and called the Gospel of the Holy Ghost, or the Gospel of the Resurrection. (See, generally, Dr. Tregelles, in Horne's Introd. last ed. iv, 476 sq.)

I. Authorship.—The Acts were evidently written by the same author as the third Gospel (comp. Luke i, 1-4, with Acts i, 1), and tradition is firm and constant in ascribing them to Luke (Irenæus, Adv. Hær. lib. i, c. 31; iii, 11; Clemens Alexand. Strom. v, p. 588; Tertullian, Adv. Marcion. v, 2; De Incm. c. 10; Origen, apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi, 23, etc.). Eusebius himself ranks this book among the ἀπολογαίμων. (H. E. iii, 25). The fact that Luke accompanied Paul to Rome (xxviii), and was with him there (Col. iv, 14; Phil. 24), favors the supposition that he was the writer of the narrative of the apostle's journey to that city.

See PAUL. The identity of the writer of both books is strongly shown by their great similarity in style and idiom, and the usage of particular words and compound forms. (See Tholuck, in the Stud. u. Krit. 1839, iii; Klostermann, Uebers. Lucanar., Gott, 1866.) The only parties in primitive times by whom this book was rejected were certain heretics, such as the Marcionites, the Severians, and the Manichæans, whose objections were entirely of a dogmatical, not of a historical nature (so those of Baur and his school). At the same time we find Chrysostom complaining that by many in his day it was not so much as known (Hom. i. in Act. s. init.). Perhaps, however, there is some rhetorical exaggeration in this statement; or it may be, as Kuinöl (Proleg. in Acta App. Comment. iv, 5) suggests, that Chrysostom's complaint refers rather to a prevalent omission of the Acts from the number of books publicly read in the churches (see Salmeron, De libri Actorum auctoritate, in his Opera, vol. xii).

II. Source of Materials.—The writer is for the first time introduced into the narrative in ch. xvi, 11, where he speaks of accompanying Paul to Philippi. He then disappears from the narrative until Paul's return to Philippi, more than two years afterward, when it is stated that they left that place in company (xx, 6), from which it may be justly inferred that Luke spent the interval in that town. From this time to the close of the period embraced by his narrative he appears as the companion of the apostle. For the materials, therefore, of all he has recorded from ch. xvi, 11, to xxviii, 31, he may be regarded as having drawn upon his own recollection or on that of the apostle. To the latter source also may be confidently traced all he has recorded concerning the earlier events of the apostle's career; and as respects the circumstances recorded in the first twelve chapters of the Acts, and which relate chiefly to the Church at Jerusalem and the labors of the apostle Peter, we may readily suppose that they were so much matter of general notoriety among the Christians with whom Luke associated, that he needed no assistance from any other merely human source in recording them. Some of the German critics (see Zeller, Die Apostelgesch. nach ihrem Inhalt u. Ursprung kritisch untersucht., Stuttg. 1854) have labored hard to show that he must have had recourse to written documents, in order to compose those parts of his history which record what did not pass under his own observation, and they have gone the length of supposing the existence of a work in the language of Palestine, under the title of "Acts of Cephas" or his "Preaching" (אֲפֹסְתָא דְּקֵפָא אוֹ אֲפֹסְתָא דְּבָרַי), of which the apocryphal book of the same title (Πράξεις Πέτρον or Κήρυγμα Πέτρον), mentioned by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vii, p. 736) and Origen (Comment. in Joh. p. 298), was an interpolated edition (Heinrichs, Proleg. in Acta App. p. 21; Kuinöl, Proleg. p. 5). All this, however, is mere ungrounded supposition; and such Hebrew editions, if they at all existed, must have been versions from the Greek (Reiland, Palæst. p. 1038). See PETER.

III. Design.—A prevalent opinion is, that Luke, having in his Gospel given a history of the life of Christ, intended to follow that up by giving in the Acts a narrative of the establishment and early progress of his religion in the world. That this, however, could not have been his design, is obvious from the very partial and limited view which his narrative gives of the state of things in the Church generally during the period through which it extends. As little can we regard this book as designed to record the official history of the Apostles Peter and Paul, for we find many particulars concerning both these apostles mentioned incidentally elsewhere, of which Luke takes no notice (comp. 2 Cor. xi; Gal. i, 17; ii, 11; 1 Pet. v, 13. See also Michaelis, Introduction, iii, 328; Hänlein's Einführung, iii, 150). Heinrichs, Kuinöl, and others are of opinion that no particular design should be ascribed to the evangelist in composing this book beyond that of furnishing his friend Theophilus with a pleasing and instructive narrative of such events as had come under his own personal notice, either immediately through the testimony of his senses or through the medium of the reports of others; but such a view savors too much of the lax opinions which these writers unhappily entertained regarding the sacred writers to be adopted by those who regard all the sacred books as designed for the permanent instruction and benefit of the Church universal. Much more deserving of notice is the opinion of Hänlein, with which that of Michaelis substantially accords, that "the general design of the author of this book was, by means of his narratives, to set forth the co-operation of God in the diffusion of Christianity, and along with that, to prove, by remarkable facts, the divinity of the apostles and the perfectly equal right of the Gentiles with the Jews to a participation in the blessings of that religion" (Einführung, iii, 156. Comp. Michaelis, Introduction, iii, 30). Perhaps we should come still closer to the truth if we were to say that the design of Luke in writing the Acts was to supply, by select and suitable instances, an illustration of the power and working of that religion which Jesus had died to establish. In his Gospel he had presented to his readers an exhibition of Christianity as embodied in the person, character, and works of its great founder; and having followed him in his narration until he was taken up out of the sight of his disciples into heaven, this second work was written to show how his religion operated when committed to the hands of those by whom it was to be announced "to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem" (Luke xxiv, 47). Hence, as justly stated by Baumgarten in his work on the Acts, Jesus, as the already exalted king of Zion, appears, on all suitable occasions, as the ruler and judge of supreme resort; the apostles are but his representatives and instruments of working. It is He who appoints the twelfth witness, that takes the place of the fallen apostle (chap. i, 24); He who, having received the promise from the Father, sends down the Holy Spirit with power (chap. ii, 33); He who comes near to turn the people from their iniquities and add them to the membership of his Church (chap. ii, 47; iii, 26); He who works miracles from time to time by the hand of the apostles; who sends Peter to open the door of faith to the Gentiles; who instructs Phillip to go and meet the Ethiopian; who arrests Saul in his career of persecution, and makes him a chosen vessel to the Gentiles; in short, who continually appears, presiding over the affairs of his Church, directing his servants in their course, protecting them from the hands of their enemies, and in the midst of much that was adverse, still giving effect to their ministrations, and causing the truth of the gospel to grow and bear fruit. We have therefore in this book, not merely a narrative of facts which fell out at the beginning of the Christian Church, in connection more especially with the apostolic agency of Peter and Paul, but we have, first of all and in all, the ever-present, controlling, administrative agency of the Lord Jesus Christ himself, shedding forth the powers of his risen life, and giving shape and form to his spiritual and everlasting kingdom.

IV. Time and place of Writing.—These are still more uncertain. As the history is continued up to the close of the second year of Paul's imprisonment at Rome, it could not have been written before A.D. 56; it was probably, however, composed very soon after, so that we shall not err far if we assign the close of the year 58 as the period of its completion. Still greater uncertainty hangs over the place where Luke composed it; but as he accompanied Paul to Rome, perhaps it was at that city and under the auspices of the apostle that it was prepared. Had any considerable alteration in Paul's circumstances taken place before the publication, there can be no reason why it should not have been noticed. And on other accounts also this time was by far the most likely for the publication of the book. The arrival in Rome was an important period in the apostle's life; the quiet which succeeded it seemed to promise no immediate determination of his cause. See THEOPHILUS.

V. Style.—This, like that of Luke's Gospel, is much purer than that of most other books of the New Testament. The Hebraisms which occasionally occur are almost exclusively to be found in the speeches of others which he has reported. These speeches are indeed, for the most part, to be regarded rather as summaries than as full reports of what the speaker uttered; but as these summaries are given in the speaker's own words, the appearance of Hebraisms in them is as easily accounted for as if the addresses had been reported in full. His mode of narrating events is clear, dignified, and lively; and, as Michaelis observes, he "has well supported the character of each person whom he has introduced as delivering a public harangue, and has very faithfully and happily preserved the manner of speaking which was peculiar to each of his orators" (Introduction, iii, 332). See LUKE.

VI. Contents.—Commencing with a reference to an account given in a former work of the sayings and doings of Jesus Christ before his ascension, its author proceeds to acquaint us succinctly with the circumstances attending that event, the conduct of the disciples on their return from witnessing it, the outpouring on them of the Holy Spirit according to Christ's promise to them before his crucifixion, and the amazing success which, as a consequence of this, attended the first announcement by them of the doctrine concerning Jesus as the promised Messiah and the Saviour of the world. After following the fates of the mother-church at Jerusalem up to the period when the violent persecution of its members by the rulers of the Jews had broken up their society and scattered them, with the exception of the apostles, throughout the whole of the surrounding region, and after introducing to the notice of the reader the case of a remarkable conversion of one of the most zealous persecutors of the Church, who afterward became one of its most devoted and successful advocates, the narrative takes a wider scope and opens to our view the gradual expansion of the Church by the free admission within its pale of persons directly converted from heathenism, and who had not passed through the preliminary stage of Judaism. The first step toward this more liberal and cosmopolitan order of things having been effected by Peter, to whom the honor of laying the foundation of the Christian Church, both within and without the confines of Judaism, seems, in accordance with our Lord's declaration concerning him (Matt. xvi, 18), to have been reserved, Paul, the recent convert and the destined apostle of the Gentiles, is brought forward as the main actor on the scene. On his course of missionary activity, his successes and his sufferings, the chief interest of the narrative is thenceforward concentrated, until, having followed him to Rome, whither he had been sent as a prisoner to abide his trial, on his own appeal, at the bar of the emperor himself, the book abruptly closes, leaving us to gather further information concerning him and the fortunes of the Church from other sources.—KITTO, s. v. See PAUL.

VII. History.—While, as Lardner and others have very satisfactorily shown (Lardner's Credibility, Works, i; Biscoe, On the Acts; Paley's Horæ Paulinæ; Benson's History of the First Planting of Christianity, ii, etc.), the credibility of the events recorded by Luke is fully authenticated both by internal and external evidence, very great obscurity attaches to the chronology of these events (see Davidson's Introd. to the N. T., ii, 112 sq.; Alford's Greek Test., ii, Proleg. p. 23 sq.; Meyer, Commentar., 3d ed. pt. iii, s. fin.).

The following is probably the true order of events in the Acts (see Math. Quar. Review, 1856, p. 499 sq.). For further discussion, see Burton, Attempt to ascertain the Chronology of the Acts (Lond. 1830); Anger, De temporibus in Actis Apostolorum ratione (Lips. 1834); Greswell, Dissert. ii, 1, etc.; Wordsworth, Greek Test., pt. 2; Wieseler, *Chron. d. ap. Acts, SPIRITIOUS OR APOCRYPHAL, ancient writings purporting to have been written by or respecting our Saviour, his disciples, etc. Of these several are still extant; others are only known by the accounts in ancient authors (Hase, Hist. of Chr. Church, p. 96, 102). See CANON (of Scripture).

ACTS OF CHRIST, SPIRITIOUS. Several sayings attributed to our Lord, and alleged to be handed down by tradition, may be included under this head, as they are supposed by some learned men to have been derived from histories no longer in existence (comp. Luke i, 1). See APOCRYPHA.

(1.) The only saying of this kind apparently genuine is the beautiful sentiment cited by Paul (Acts xx, 35), "It is more blessed to give than to receive," to which the term apocryphal has been sometimes applied, inasmuch as it is not contained in any of the Gospels extant (so Gausen, in his Theopneustia, Engl. tr. 1842). Heimsius is of opinion that the passage is taken from some lost apocryphal book, such as that entitled, in the Recognitions of Clement, "the Book of the Sayings of Christ," or the pretended Constitutions of the Apostles. Others, however, conceive that the apostle does not refer to any one saying of our Saviour's in particular, but that he deduced Christ's sentiments on this head from several of his sayings and parables (see Matt. xix, 21; xxv; and Luke xvi, 9). But the probability is that Paul received this passage by tradition from the other apostles.

(2.) There is a saying ascribed to Christ in the Epistle of Barnabas, a work at least of the second century: "Let us resist all iniquity, and hate it;" and again, "So they who would see me, and lay hold on my kingdom, must receive me through much suffering and tribulation;" but it is not improbable that these passages contain merely an allusion to some of our Lord's discourses.

(3.) Clemens Romanus, the third bishop of Rome after St. Peter (or the writer who passes under the name of Clement), in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, ascribes the following saying to Christ: "Though ye should be united to me in my bosom, and yet do not keep my commandments, I will reject you, and say, Depart from me, I know not whence ye are, ye workers of iniquity." This passage seems evidently to be taken from Luke's gospel, xiii, 25, 26, 27.

There are many similar passages which several eminent writers, such as Grabe, Mill, and Fabricius, have considered as derived from apocryphal gospels, but which seem, with greater probability, to be nothing more than loose quotations from the Scriptures, which were very common among the apostolical Fathers.

There is a saying of Christ's, cited by Clement in the same epistle, which is found in the apocryphal Gospel of the Egyptians: "The Lord, being asked when his kingdom should come, replied, When two shall be one, and that which is without as that which is within, and the male with the female neither male nor female." See GOSPELS (SPURIOUS).

We may here mention that the genuineness of the Second Epistle of Clement is itself disputed, and is rejected by Eusebius, Jerome, and others; at least Eusebius says of it, "We know not that this is as highly approved of as the former, or that it has been in use with the ancients" (Hist. Eccles. iii, 38, Cruse's tr. 1842). See CLEMENT.

(4.) Eusebius, in the last chapter of the book just cited, states that Papias, a companion of the apostles, "gives another history of a woman who had been accused of many sins before the Lord, which is also contained in the Gospel according to the Nazarenes." As this latter work is lost, it is doubtful to what woman the history refers. Some suppose it alludes to the history of the woman taken in adultery; others, to the woman of Samaria. There are two discourses ascribed to Christ by Papias preserved in Irenæus (Adversus Hæres. v, 33), relating to the doctrine of the Millennium, of which Papias appears to have been the first propagator. Dr. Grabe has defended the truth of these traditions, but the discourses themselves are unworthy of our blessed Lord.

(5.) There is a saying ascribed to Christ by Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho, which has been supposed by Dr. Cave to have been taken from the Gospel of the Nazarenes. Mr. Jones conceives it to have been an allusion to a passage in the prophet Ezekiel. The same father furnishes us with an apocryphal history of Christ's baptism, in which it is asserted that "a fire was kindled in Jordan." He also acquaints us that Christ worked, when he was on earth, at the trade of a carpenter, making ploughs and yokes for oxen.

(6.) There are some apocryphal sayings of Christ preserved by Irenæus, but his most remarkable observation is that Christ "lived and taught beyond his fortieth or even fiftieth year." This he founds partly on absurd inferences drawn from the character of his mission, partly on John viii, 57, and also on what he alleges to have been John's own testimony delivered to the presbyters of Asia. It is scarcely necessary to refute this absurd idea, which is in contradiction with all the statements in the genuine gospels. There is also an absurd saying attributed to Christ by Athenagoras (Legat. pro Christianis, cap. 28).

(7.) There are various sayings ascribed to our Lord by Clemens Alexandrinus and several of the fathers.

One of the most remarkable is, "Be ye skilful money-changers." This is supposed to have been contained in the Gospel of the Nazarenes. Others think it is an early interpolation into the text of Scripture. Origen and Jerome cite it as a saying of Christ's.

(8.) In Origen, Contra Celsum, lib. i, is an apocryphal history of our Saviour and his parents, in which it is reproached to Christ that he was born in a mean village, of a poor woman who gained her livelihood by spinning, and was turned off by her husband, a carpenter. Celsus adds that Jesus was obliged by poverty to work as a servant in Egypt, where he learned many powerful arts, and thought that on this account he ought to be esteemed as a god. There was a similar account contained in some apocryphal books extant in the time of St. Augustine. It was probably a Jewish forgery. Augustine, Epiphanius, and others of the fathers, equally cite sayings and acts of Christ, which they probably met with in the early apocryphal gospels.

(9.) There is a spurious hymn of Christ's extant, ascribed to the Priscillianists by St. Augustine. There are also many such acts and sayings to be found in the Koran of Mahomet, and others in the writings of the Mohammedan doctors (see Toland's Nazarenes).

(10.) There is a prayer ascribed to our Saviour by the same persons, which is printed in Latin and Arabic in the learned Selden's Commentary on Eutychius's Annals of Alexandria, published at Oxford, in 1650, by Dr. Pococke. It contains a petition for pardon of sin, such as is sufficient to stamp it as a forgery.

(11.) There is a curious letter said to have been written to our Saviour by Agbarus (or Abgarus), king of Edessa, requesting him to come and heal a disease under which he labored. The letter, together with the supposed reply of Christ, are preserved by Eusebius. This learned historian asserts that he obtained the documents, together with the history, from the public registers of the city of Edessa, where they existed in his time in the Syriac language, from which he translated them into Greek. See ABBARUS.

These letters are also mentioned by Ephraem Syrus, deacon of Edessa, at the close of the fourth century. Jerome refers to them in his comment on Matt. x, and they are mentioned by Pope Gelasius, who rejects them as spurious and apocryphal. They are, however, referred to as genuine by Evagrius and later historians. Among modern writers the genuineness of these letters has been maintained by Dr. Parker (in the preface to his Demonstration of the Law of Nature and the Christian Religion, part ii, § 16, p. 235); by Dr. Cave (in his Historia Literaria, vol. i, p. 23); and by Grabe (in his Spicilegium Patrum, particularly p. 319). On the other hand, most writers, including the great majority of Roman Catholic divines, reject them as spurious. Mr. Jones, in his valuable work on the Canonical Authority of the New Testament, although he does not venture to deny that the Acts were contained in the public registers of the city of Edessa, yet gives it, as a probable conjecture, in favor of which he adduces some strong reasons, drawn from internal evidence, that this whole chapter (viz. the 13th of the first book) in the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius is itself an interpolation. See EPISTLES (SPURIOUS).

(12.) The other apocryphal history related by Evagrius, out of Procopius, states that Agbarus sent a limner to draw the picture of our Saviour, but that not being able to do it by reason of the brightness of Christ's countenance, our Saviour took a cloth, and laying it upon his divine and life-giving face, he impressed his likeness on it." This story of Christ's picture is related by several, in the Second Council of Nice, and by other ancient writers, one of whom (Leo) asserts that he went to Edessa, and saw "the image of Christ, not made with hands, worshipped by the people." This is the first of the four likenesses of Christ mentioned by ancient writers. The second is that said to have been stamped on a handkerchief by Christ, and given to Veronica, who had followed him to his crucifixion. The third is the statue of Christ, stated by Eusebius to have been erected by the woman whom he had cured of an issue of blood, and which the learned historian acquaints us he saw at Casarea Philippi (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii, 18). Sozomen and Cassiodorus assert that the emperor Julian took down this statue and erected his own in its place. It is, however, stated by Asterius, a writer of the fourth century, that it was taken away by Maximinus, the predecessor of Constantine. The fourth picture is one which Nicodemus presented to Gamaliel, which was preserved at Berytus, and which having been crucified and pierced with a spear by the Jews, there issued out from the side blood and water. This is stated in a spurious treatise concerning the passion and image of Christ, falsely ascribed to Athanasius. Eusebius, the historian, asserts (l. c.) that he had here seen the pictures of Peter, Paul, and of Christ himself, in his time (see also Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. v, 21). That such relics were actually exhibited is therefore indubitable, but their genuineness is quite another question. They were probably of a piece with the papal miracles and pious frauds of superstitious times. —KITTO, s. v. See JESUS CHRIST.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, SPURIOUS. Of these several are extant, others are lost, or only fragments of them have come down to us. Of the following we know little more than that they once existed. They are here arranged chronologically:—(1.) The Preaching of Peter, referred to by Origen (in his Commentary on St. John's Gospel, lib. xiv), also referred to by Clemens Alexandrinus. (2.) The Acts of Peter, supposed by Dr. Cave to be cited by Serapion. (3.) The Acts of Paul and Thecla, mentioned by Tertullian (Lib. de Baptismo, cap. xvii). This is, however, supposed by some to be the same which is found in a Greek MS. in the Bodleian Library, and has been published by Dr. Grabe (in his Spicil. Patrum Sæcul. I.). (4.) The Doctrine of Peter, cited by Origen ("Proem." in Lib. de Princip.). (5.) The Acts of Paul (id. de Princip. 1, 2). (6.) The Preaching of Paul, referred to by St. Cyprian (Tract. de non iterando Baptismo). (7.) The Preaching of Paul and Peter at Rome, cited by Lactantius (De vera Sap. iv, 21). (8.) The Acts of Peter, thrice mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii, 3); "as to that work, however, which is ascribed to him, called 'The Acts' and the 'Gospel according to Peter,' we know nothing of their being handed down as Catholic writings, since neither among the ancient nor the ecclesiastical writers of our own day has there been one that has appealed to testimony taken from them." (9.) The Acts of Paul (ib.). (10.) The Revelation of Peter (ib.). (11.) The Acts of Andrew and John (ib. cap. 25). "Thus," he says, "we have it in our power to know . . . those books that are adduced by the heretics, under the name of the apostles, such, viz., as compose the gospels of Peter, Thomas, and Matthew, . . . and such as contain the Acts of the Apostles by Andrew and John, and others of which no one of those writers in the ecclesiastical succession has condescended to make any mention in his works; and, indeed, the character of the style itself is very different from that of the apostles, and the sentiments and the purport of those that are advanced in them deviating as far as possible from sound orthodoxy, evidently proves they are the fictions of heretical men, whence they are to be ranked not only among the spurious writings, but are to be rejected as altogether absurd and impious." (12.) The Acts of Peter, John, and Thomas (Athanasius, Synops. § 76). (13.) The Writings of Bartholomew the Apostle, mentioned by the pseudo-Dionysius. (14.) The Acts, Preaching, and Revelation of Peter, cited by Jerome (in his Catal. Script. Eccles.). (15.) The Acts of the Apostles by Seleucus (id. Epist. ad Chrom., etc.). (16.) The Acts of Paul and Thecla (id. Catal. Script. Eccles.). (17.) The Acts of the Apostles, used by the Ebionites, cited by Epiphanius (Adversus Hæres. § 16). (18.) The Acts of Leucius, Lentius, or Lenticus, called the Acts of the Apostles (Augustin. Lib. de Fid. c. 38). (19.) The Acts of the Apostles, used by the Manichees. (20.) The Revelations of Thomas, Paul, Stephen, etc. (Gelasius, de Lib. Apoc. apud Gratianum. Distinct. 15, c. 3).

These may be added the genuine Acts of Pilate, appealed to by Tertullian and Justin Martyr, in their Apologies, as being then extant. Tertullian describes them as "the records which were transmitted from Jerusalem to Tiberius concerning Christ." He refers to the same for the proof of our Saviour's miracles. —KITTO, s. v. See ACTS OF PILATE.

The following are the principal spurious Acts still extant:—(1.) The Acts of Paul and Thecla, said to have been written by a disciple of St. Paul, and who (according to Tertullian, De Bap. cap. xvii, and Jerome, De Scrip. cap. vi), when convicted by John the Evangelist of having falsified facts, confessed that he had done so, but through his love for his master Paul. These Acts were rejected as uncanonical by Pope Gelasius. They were printed, together with some that follow, at London (in English) in 1821, 8vo, under the title "Apocryphal New Testament" (see Fabricius, Cod. Apoc. N. T. ii, 794). (2.) Acts of the Twelve Apostles, falsely attributed to Abdias of Bablyon. See ABDIAS. These Acts are said to have been written by him in Hebrew, translated into Greek by Eutropius, and into Latin by Julius Africanus, and were published by Lazius, at Basle, in 1551 (Fabric. ii, 388). It is a work full of the most extravagant fables, and bears internal evidence of having been written after the second century. (3.) Acts of St. Peter, or, as the work is sometimes designated, Receptionum libri 10, attributed falsely to Clemens Romanus. (4.) The Acts or Voyages (Periodi) of St. John, mentioned by Epiphanius and Augustine, is probably that which we now have as the Acts of St. John among those attributed to Abdias.

There exist also the following (for which see each name in its place):—The Creed of the Apostles; The Epistles of Barnabas, Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp; The Shepherd of Hermas; The Acts of Pilate (spurious), or the Gospel of Nicodemus; The Constitutions of the Apostles; The Canons of the Apostles; The Liturgies of the Apostles; St. Paul's Epistle to the Laodiceans; St. Paul's Letters to Sinuca.

Besides these there are some others still more obscure, for which see Cotelierius's Ecclesie Græcæ Monumenta (Paris, 1677-92); Fabricius, Codex Apocryphus, N. T.; Du Pin, History of the Canon of the New Testament (London, 1699); Grabe's Spicilegium Patrum (Oxford, 1714); Lardner's Credibility, etc.; Jones's New and Just Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament; Birch's Anctarium (Hafniae, 1804); Thilo's Acta St. Thomæ (Lips. 1823), and Codex Apocryphus, N. T. (Lips. 1852). Tischendorf has published in the original Greek the following apocryphal Acts (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Lips. 1841, 8vo), several of which had not before been edited: "Acts of Peter and Paul;" "Acts of Paul and Thecla;" "Acts of Barnabas, by Mark;" "Acts of Philip" (ed. princeps); "Acts of Andrew;" "Acts of Andrew and Matthew;" "Acts and Martyrdom of Matthew" (ed. princeps); "Acts of Thomas;" "Consummation of Thomas" (ed. pr.); "Acts of Bartholomew" (e. p.); "Acts of Thadæus" (e. p.); "Acts of John" (e. p.). See CANON.

ACTS OF PILATE. The ancient Romans were scrupulously careful to preserve the memory of all remarkable events which happened in the city; and this was done either in their "Acts of the Senate" (Acta Senatus), or in the "Daily Acts of the People" (Acta Diurna Populi), which were diligently made and kept at Rome (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Acta Diurna). In like manner it was customary for the governors of provinces to send to the emperor an account of remarkable transactions that occurred in the places where they resided, which were preserved as the Acts of their respective governments. Indeed, this would naturally occur in the transmission of their returns of administration (rationes), a copy of which was also preserved in the provincial archives (Cicero, ad Fam. iii, 17; v, 20). In conformity with this usage, Eusebius says, "Our Saviour's resurrection being much talked of throughout Palestine, Pilate informed the emperor of it, as likewise of his miracles, of which he had heard; and that, being raised up after he had been put to death, he was already believed by many to be a god" (Evel. Hist. lib. ii, c. 2). These accounts were never published for general perusal, but were deposited among the archives of the empire, where they served as a fund of information to historians. Hence we find, long before the time of Eusebius, that the primitive Christians, in their disputes with the Gentiles, appealed to these Acts of Pilate as to most undoubted testimony. Thus, Justin Martyr, in his first Apology for the Christians, which was presented to the Emperor Antoninus Pius and the senate of Rome, about the year 140, having mentioned the crucifixion of Jesus Christ and some of its attendant circumstances, adds, "And that these things were so done, you may know from the Acts made in the time of Pontius Pilate." Afterward, in the same Apology, having noticed some of our Lord's miracles, such as healing diseases and raising the dead, he says, "And that these things were done by him you may know from the Acts made in the time of Pontius Pilate" (Justin Martyr, Apol. Pr. p. 65, 72, ed. Benedict.).

Tertullian, in his Apology for Christianity, about the year 200, after speaking of our Saviour's crucifixion and resurrection, and his appearance to the disciples and ascension into heaven in the sight of the same disciples, who were ordained by him to publish the Gospel over the world, thus proceeds: "Of all these things relating to Christ, Pilate himself, in his conscience already a Christian, sent an account to Tiberius, then emperor" (Tertull. Apolog. c. 21). The same writer, in the same treatise, thus relates the proceedings of Tiberius on receiving this information: "There was an ancient decree that no one should be received for a deity unless he was first approved by the senate. Tiberius, in whose time the Christian religion had its rise, having received from Palestine in Syria an account of such things as manifested the truth of his' (Christ's) "divinity, proposed to the senate that he should be enrolled among the Roman gods, and gave his own prerogative vote in favor of the motion. But the senate rejected it, because the emperor himself had declined the same honor. Nevertheless, the emperor persisted in his opinion, and threatened punishment to the accusers of the Christians. Search your own Commentaries, or public writings; you will there find that Nero was the first who ragged with the imperial sword against this sect, when rising most at Rome" (Tertull. Apolog. c. 5).

These testimonies of Justin and Tertullian are taken from public apologies for the Christian religion, which were presented either to the emperor and senate of Rome, or to magistrates of public authority and great distinction in the Roman empire. See PILATE.

Acu'á (rather Acu'á, 'Acu'á' by erroneous transcription for 'Acu'á', Acu'á, 1 Esdr. v, 31), the progenitor of one of the families of the temple-servants (israh'el'ím, i. e. Nethinim), said to have returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 30); evidently the AKKUB (q. v.) of the parallel texts (Ezra ii, 45, or, rather, ver. 42; comp. Neh. vii, 48, where the name is not found).

A'cub (rather Acuph, 'Acu'á' v. r. 'Acu'á', Acum; both corruptions for Bas'zof'w'), another head of the Nethinim that returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v, 31); evidently the BAKBUK (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 51; Neh. vii, 53).

Aczib. See ACHZIB.

Ad, according to Arabian traditions, was the son of Udh, or Uz (the grandson of Shem, Gen. x, 23), and the progenitor of a powerful tribe called the Adites, who settled in Er-Ram, or Sandy Arabia (Abulda, Hist. Anticislam. p. 17, ed. Fleischer). Like the other kindred tribes of those early times, the Adites soon abandoned the true worship of God, and set up four idols whom they worshipped: Sakia, whom they imagined to supply rain; Hafesha, who preserved them from all foreign and external dangers; Razka, who provided them with food; and Sabema, who restored them from sickness to health (Sale's Koran, p. 122, note). It is said that God commissioned the prophet Hud or Heber to attempt their reformation, but, remaining obstinate in their idolatry, they were almost all destroyed by a suffocating wind. The few who escaped retired with the prophet Hud to another place. Before this severe punishment they had been visited with a dreadful drought for four years, which killed their cattle, and reduced them to great distress (see D'Herbelot, Bibl. Or. s. v. Houd). They are often mentioned in the Koran, and some writers, on the authority of that work, affirm that they were of gigantic stature. See ARABIA.

Adad, the Græcized form of the name of the idol Hadad (Josephus, Ant. viii, 5, 2); also a less correct form of the name of King Hadad (1 Kings xi, 17, original). See HADAD.

Ad'adah (Heb. Adalah, אֲדָאָה, from the Syr., fistral, or perhaps, by reduplication, ban-lary; Sept. Αἰαία, v. r. Αοριή), a town in the southern part of the tribe of Judah, mentioned between Dimonah and Kedesh (Josh. xv, 22); probably situated in the portion afterward set off to Simoon (Josh. xix, 1-9). It is possibly the village Gadda mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Γαῖα), lying on the eastern border of Daroma, opposite the Dead Sea. But see GADDAH. M. de Sauley believes that he passed some ruins by this name on his way from the southern end of the Dead Sea to Hebron on the high ground after leaving Wady es-Zoweirah (Narrative, i, 360, 430).

A'dah (Heb. Adah, אֲדָה, ornament; Sept. Αἰά), the name of two women.

1. The first named of the two wives of the Cainite Lamech, and mother of Jabal and Jubal (Gen. iv, 19, 20, 23). B. C. cir. 3600.

2. The first of the three wives of Esau, being the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and the mother of Eli-phaz (Gen. xxxvi, 2, 4, 10, 12, 16). B. C. 1964. She is elsewhere confounded with BASHMATH (Gen. xxvi, 34). See ESAU.

Adai'ah (Heb. Adayah, אֲדַיָּה, adorned by Jehorah, once in the prolonged form Adaya'hu, אֲדַיָּהוּ, 2 Chron. xxxiii, 1), the name of several men.

1. (Sept. Αἰαία v. r. Αἰά.) The son of Ethni and father of Zerah, of the Levitical family of Gershon, in the ancestry of Asaph (1 Chron. vi, 40); apparently the same with IDDIO, the son of Joah (ver. 21). B. C. cir. 1530. See ASAPH.

2. (Sept. Αἰαία v. r. Αἰαία.) A son of Shimbi, and chief Benjamite resident at Jerusalem before the captivity (1 Chron. viii, 21), B. C. long post 1612.

3. (Sept. Αἰαία, v. r. Αἰά.) The father of Maaseiah, which latter was a "captain of hundred" during the protectorate of Jehoiahi (2 Chron. xxxiii, 1). B. C. ante 877. He is apparently the same as JUDA the son of Joseph and father of Simoon, among Christ's maternal ancestry (Luke iii, 30). See GENEALOGY.

4. (Sept. Εἰαία v. r. Ιεῖα.) The father of Jedidiah and maternal grandfather of King Josiah, a native of Bosath (2 Kings xxii, 1). B. C. ante 648.

5. (Sept. Αἰαία v. r. Αἰαία.) A son of Joiarib and father of Hazaiah, of the tribe of Judah (Neh. xi, 5). B.C. considerably ante 536.

6. A priest, son of Jerolam, who held a prominent post in defending the three temple while building (1 Chron ix, 12, Sept. Σαβία v. r. 'Acaia; Neh. xi, 12, 'Acaia, B.C. 518.

7. (Sept. 'Acaia.) A "son" of Bani, an Israelite who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra x, 29), B.C. 459.

8. (Sept. 'Acaia v. r. 'Acaia.) Another of the "sons" of Bani, who did likewise (Ezra x, 39), B.C. 459.

Adalbert. See ADELBERT.

Adalbert, archbishop of Prague, was born of a princely Slavonic family, about the year 956, at Prague. His parents sent him to Magdeburg to enter upon his studies under the archbishop Adalbert, who gave him his own name at confirmation. Upon his return into Bohemia, touched by the death-bed remorse of Dietmar, bishop of Prague, for not having led a life of greater piety and activity, he at once assumed a penitential dress, praying fervently and giving great alms. In 983 he was elected bishop of Prague with the unanimous consent of the people. He made great efforts to promote the spiritual welfare of his flock, which was in a fearful state of immorality: among the laity polygamy, and among the clergy incontinence were general. Had he been less impatient, he might doubtless have accomplished much more than he did. Finding all his labor in vain, he left his see in 989 by permission of Pope John XV, and retired into the monastery of St. Boniface, at Rome. He was, however, constrained to return to his bishopric, which he again quitted for his monastic retreat; and again was on the point of returning to it, when, finding his people set against him, he finally forsook it, in order to preach the Gospel in Prussia, where he suffered martyrdom, April 23, 997 (after making many converts at Dantzie and in Pomerania), at the hands of seven assassins, whose chief was an idol-priest, and who pierced him with seven lances. Since that period Adalbert has been the patron saint of Poland and Bohemia. For a graphic account of him, see Neander, Light in Dark Places, 272. The Martyrologies commemorate him on the 23d of April.—Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 322; Butler, Lives of Saints, April 23.

Adalbert, archbishop of Bremen and Hamburg, was descended from a noble Saxon family. He served as subdeacon to archbishop Hermann for several years, and himself received that office in 1013 from Henry III, who in 1046 he accompanied to Rome. There he barely failed of election to the papal throne. Pope Leo IX, in whose behalf he had spoken in the synod at Mentz in 1049, made him in 1050 his legate in the North. Adalbert intended, with the support of the Emperor Henry, to convert the archdiocese of Bremen into a northern patriarchate, which was to be independent of Rome, and embrace the sees of Northern Germany, of Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and England. Henry III compelled the pope, Clement II (one of the three German popes who were in succession elevated to the papal throne by Henry), to recognize Adalbert as his peer. A bull is still extant in which the pope addressed Adalbert with "Vos," while generally the popes addressed every bishop with "Tu" (hence the principle, Popei nominem russit). But this was all ended by a bull of Pope Leo IX, recognizing Adalbert as apostolic vicar, but demanding fealty to the Roman see. During the minority of the Emperor Henry IV he usurped, together with archbishop Hanno of Cologne, the administration of the empire. His ambition and violence made him so obnoxious to the German princes that, in 1066, they forcibly separated him from the emperor; but in 1069 he regained his former power, and kept it until his death, March 16, 1072.—Adam Bremensis, Gesta Han-

Adalagus, archbishop of Hamburg and Bremen, lived during the reigns of the three emperors Otho (the last of whom died 1002), and enjoyed great influence at court, where he held the office of chancellor. After the victory which Otho I gained over the Danes, he established three episcopal sees in Jutland, viz., Sleswick, Ripen, and Arhusen. He baptized Harold, king of Denmark, and sent missionaries among the northern nations.—Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. x, pt. i, ch. i, § 7.

Adalgar, a Benedictine monk of Corby, and the companion of Rembertus, or Rheimburtus, whom he succeeded, in 888, in the archiepiscopal chair of Hamburg and Bremen. The archbishop of Cologne claimed supremacy over Cologne, and Pope Formosus cited Adalgar to appear at Rome to prove his rights to the archbishopric, but he refused both to attend in person and to send a deputy. The investigation was intrusted to the archbishop of Mayence, who decided against Adalgar, who was placed among the lowest bishops. The archbishopric was restored by a bull of Sergius III, A.D. 905. Adalgar established a seminary of priests for the propagation of the Gospel in the North, and died May 9, 909, after holding the see for nineteen years.

Adalhard, abbot of Corbie, born about 753, died in 826. He was a son of Count Bernard, and a relative of Charles Martel. He was one of the first to oppose the pretensions of the nobility, and to preach openly that the laws must be equally obeyed by patricians and commoners. Charlemagne confided to him important missions, and appointed him his delegate at the Council of Rome in 809. After the death of this emperor he fell into disfavor, having been represented by the nobility to Louis the Debonair as an ambitious demagogue. Mabillon promised to publish the 52 sermons of Adalhard, but did not keep his promise. His Statuta Corbiensis ecclesie was published, but very incorrectly, by d'Achery. Many other writings of Adalhard are still scattered and unedited. Some extracts of his Liberulus de Ordine Palatii were given by Hincmar. See Radbert, Vita S. Adalhardi abbatis Corbiensis, 1617.—Hoefler, Biog. Générale, i, 218.

Adali'a (Heb. Adalya', אַדְיָא, probably of Persian origin; Sept. Βαολ' v. r. Βαβία, Vulg. Adalya'), the fifth of the ten sons of Haman slain by the Jews under the royal edict at Shushan (Esth. ix, 8), B.C. 473.

Ad'am (Heb. Adam', אָדָם, red [see EDOM]; hence אָדָם, the ground, from the ruddiness of flesh and of clayey soil, see Gesenius, Theo. Heb. p. 24, 25; comp. Josephus, Ant. ii, 1; Jonathan's Targum on Gen. ii, 7; Leusden, Onomast. s. v.; Marek, Hist. Paradisi, ii, 5), the name of a man and a place.

1. The first man, whose creation, fall, and history are detailed by Moses in Gen. ii-v, being in fact the same Hebrew word usually rendered "man" (including nomem also, Gen. v, 1, 2), but often used distinctively with the article (אָדָם, ha-Adam', "the man," Sept. and N. T. 'Aclm', Josephus 'Aclm', Ant. i, 1, 2), as a proper name (comp. Tobit viii, 6). It seems at first thought somewhat strange that the head of the human family should have received his distinctive name from the affinity which he had, in the lower part of his nature, to the dust of the earth—that he should have been called Adam, as being taken in his bodily part from adamah, the ground; the more especially as the name was not assumed by man himself, but imposed by God, and imposed in immediate connection with man's destination to bear the image of God: "And God said, Let us make man (Adam) in our image, after our likeness," etc. This apparent incongruity has led some, in particular Richers (Die Schöpfungs-, Paradieses- und Sündfluthgeschichte, p. 163), to adopt another etymology of the term—to make Adam a derivative of amoh (אָמֹה, to be like, to resemble). Delitzsch, however (System der Bibl. Psychologie, p. 49), has objected to this view, both on grammatical and other grounds; and though we do not see the force of his grammatical objection to the derivation in question, yet we think he puts the matter itself rightly, and thereby justifies the received opinion. Man's name is kindred with that of the earth, adamah, not because of its being his characteristic dignity that God made him after his image, but because of this, that God made after his image one who had been taken from the earth. The likeness to God man had in common with the angels, but that, as the possessor of this likeness, he should be Adam—this is what brought him into union with two worlds—the world of spirit and the world of matter—rendered him the centre and the bond of all that had been made, the fitting topstone of the whole work of creation, and the motive principle of the world's history. It is precisely his having the image of God in an earthen vessel, that, while made somewhat lower than the angels, he occupies a higher position than they in respect to the affairs of this world (Psa. viii, 5; Heb. ii, 5).

I. History.—In the first nine chapters of Genesis there appear to be three distinct histories relating more or less to the life of Adam. The first extends from Gen. i, 1 to ii, 3, the second from ii, 4 to iv, 26, the third from v, 1 to the end of ix. The word (אָדָמָה) at the commencement of the latter two narratives, which is rendered there and elsewhere generations, may also be rendered history. The style of the second of these records differs very considerably from that of the first. In the first the Deity is designated by the word Elohim; in the second he is generally spoken of as Jehovah Elohim. The object of the first of these narratives is to record the creation; that of the second to give an account of paradise, the original sin of man, and the immediate posterity of Adam; the third contains mainly the history of Noah, referring, it would seem, to Adam and his descendants, principally in relation to that patriarch. The first account of the creation of man is in general terms, the two sexes being spoken of together (ch. i, 27) as a unit of species; whereas in the second, or resumptive account, the separate formation of the man and the woman is detailed. This simple consideration reconciles all apparent discrepancy between the two narratives.—Smith, s. v. See GENESIS.

The representation there given is that Adam was absolutely the first man, and was created by the direct agency of God; that this act of creation, including the immediately subsequent creation of Eve, was the last in a series of creative acts which extended through a period of six literal days. See CREATION. This Scriptural account is, of course, entirely opposed to the atheistic hypothesis, which denies any definite beginning to the human race, but conceives the successive generations of men to have run on in a kind of infinite series, to which no beginning can be assigned. Such a theory, originally propounded by heathen philosophers, has also been asserted by the more extreme section of infidel writers in Christian times. But the voice of tradition, which, in all the more ancient nations, uniformly points to a comparatively recent period for the origin of the human family, has now received conclusive attestations from learned research and scientific inquiry. Not only have the remains of human art and civilization, the more they have been explored, yielded more convincing evidence of a period not very remote when the human family itself was in infancy, but the languages of the world also, when carefully investigated and compared, as they have of late been, point to a common and not exceedingly remote origin. This is the view of Sir William Jones, and, later, of Bunsen also. The same conclusion substantially is reached by Dr. Donaldson, who, after stating what has already been accomplished in this department of learning, expresses his conviction, on the ground alone of the affinities of language, that "investigation will fully confirm what the great apostle proclaimed in the Areopagus, that God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth" (New Cratylus, p. 19). The position is still further confirmed by the results that have been gained in the region of natural science. The most skilful and accomplished naturalists—such as Cuvier, Blumenbach, Pritchard—have established beyond any reasonable doubt the unity of the human family as a species (see particularly Pritchard's History of Man); and those who have prosecuted geological researches, while they have found remains in the different strata of rocks of numberless species of inferior animals, can point to no human petrifications—none, at least, but what appear in some comparatively recent and local formations—a proof that man is of too late an origin for his remains to have mingled with those of the extinct animal tribes of preceding ages. Science generally can tell of no separate creations for animals of one and the same species; and while all geologic history is full of the beginnings and the ends of species, "it exhibits no genealogies of development" (Miller's Testimony of the Rocks, p. 201). That, when created, man must have been formed in full maturity, as Adam is related to have been, was a necessity arising from the very conditions of existence. It has been discovered, by searching into the remains of preceding ages and generations of living creatures, that there has been a manifest progress in the succession of beings on the surface of the earth—a progress in the direction of an increasing resemblance to the existing forms of being, and in particular to man. But the connection between the earlier and the later, the imperfect and the perfect, is not that of direct lineage or parental descent, as if it came in the way merely of natural growth and development. The connection, as Agassiz has said in his Principles of Zoology, "is of a higher and immaterial nature; it is to be sought in the view of the Creator himself, whose aim in forming the earth, in allowing it to undergo the successive changes which geology has pointed out, and in creating successively all the different types of animals which have passed away, was to introduce man upon the surface of our globe. Man is the end toward which the animal creation has tended from the first appearance of the first paleozoic fishes."—Fairbairn, s. v. See GEOLOGY.

The Almighty formed Adam out of the dust of the earth, breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and gave him dominion over all the lower creatures (Gen. i, 26; ii, 7), B.C. 4172. He created him in his own image [see PERFECTIO], and, having pronounced a blessing upon him, placed him in a delightful garden, that he might cultivate it and enjoy its fruits. See EDEN. At the same time, however, he gave him the following injunction: "Of the tree of knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat; for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." The first recorded exercise of Adam's power and intelligence was his giving names to the beasts of the field and fowls of the air, which the Lord brought before him for this purpose. The examination thus afforded him having shown that it was not good for man to be alone, the Lord caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and while he remained in a semi-conscious state took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh; and of the rib thus taken from man he made a woman, whom he presented to him when he awoke. See EVE. Adam received her, saying, "This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man." See MARRIAGE.

This woman, being seduced by the tempter, persued her husband to eat of the forbidden fruit (comp. Theuer, De Adamo lapsu, dirortium c. Eva cogitante, Jen. 1759). When called to judgment for this transgression before God, Adam blamed his wife, and the woman blamed the serpent-tempter. God punished the tempter by degradation and dread [see SERPENT]; the woman by painful travail and a situation of submission; and the man by a life of labor and toil—of which punishment every day witnesses the fulfilment. See FALL. As their natural passions now became irregular, and their exposure to accidents grew, God made a covering of skin for Adam and for his wife. He also expelled them from his garden to the land around it, where Adam had been made, and where was to be their future dwelling; placing at the east of the garden a flame, which turned every way, to prevent access to the tree of life (Gen. iii).—Calmet, s. v. See DEATH.

It is not known how long Adam and his wife continued in Paradise: some think many years; others not many days; others not many hours. Shortly after their expulsion Eve brought forth Cain (Gen. iv, 1, 2). Scripture notices but three sons of Adam, Cain, Abel, and Seth (q. v.), but contains an allusion (Gen. v, 4) to "sons and daughters;" no doubt several. He died B. C. 3242, aged 930 (see Brückner, Ob Adam wirklich üb. 900 J. alt geworden, Aurich, 1799). See LOXGEVITY.

Such is the simple narrative of the Bible relative to the progenitor of the human race, to which it only remains to add that his faith doubtless recognised in the promise of "the woman's seed" that should "bruise the serpent's head" the atoning merits of the future Redeemer. See MESSIAH. Whatever difficulties we may find in the Scriptural account, we accept it as a literal statement of facts, and shall therefore dismiss the rationalistic theories and speculations to which it has given rise. The results are of the utmost importance to mankind, and the light that the Bible thus sheds upon the origin of the race and the source of human depravity is of inestimable value even in a historical and philosophical point of view. II. The question of the unity of the human race, or the descent of the race from a single pair, has given rise to much discussion of late, after it had been thought to be finally settled. It may be stated thus: "Did the Almighty Creator produce only one man and one woman, from whom all other human beings have descended? or did he create several parental pairs, from whom distinct stocks of men have been derived? The question is usually regarded as equivalent to this: whether or not there is more than one species of men? But we cannot, in strict fairness, admit that the questions are identical. It is hypothetically conceivable that the adorable God might give existence to any number of creatures, which should all possess the properties that characterize identity of species, even without such differences as constitute varieties, or with any degree of those differences. But the admission of the possibility is not a concession of the reality. So great is the evidence in favor of the derivation of the entire mass of human beings from one pair of ancestors, that it has obtained the suffrage of the men most competent to judge upon a question of comparative anatomy and physiology.

"(1.) The animals which render eminent services to man, and peculiarly depend upon his protection, are widely diffused—the horse, the dog, the hog, the domestic fowl. Now of these, the varieties in each species are numerous and different, to a degree so great that an observer ignorant of physiological history would scarcely believe them to be of the same species. But man is the most widely diffused of any animal. In the progress of ages and generations, he has naturalized himself to every climate, and to modes of life which would prove fatal to an individual man suddenly transferred from a remote point of the field. The alterations produced affect every part of the body, internal and external, without extinguishing the marks of the specific identity.

"(2.) A further and striking evidence is, that when persons of different varieties are conjugally united, the offspring, especially in two or three generations, becomes more prolific, and acquires a higher perfection in physical and mental qualities than was found in either of the parental races. From the deepest African black to the finest Caucasian white, the change runs through imperceptible gradations; and, if a middle hue be assumed, suppose some tint of brown, all the varieties of complexion may be explained upon the principle of divergence influenced by outward circumstances. Mr. Poinsett saw in South America a fine healthy regiment of spotted men, quite peculiar enough to be held by Professor Agassiz a separate race. And why were they not? Simply because they were a known cross-breed between Spaniards and Indians. Changes as great are exhibited by the Magyars of Europe, and by the Ulster Irish, as quoted by Miller. Sir Charles Lyell was of opinion that a climatic change was already perceptible in the negro of our Southern states. Professor Cabell (Testimony of Modern Science, etc.) ably and clearly sustains the doctrine that propagability is conclusive proof of sameness of species. He denies, on good authority, that the mulatto is feeble or less prolific than either unmixed stock. He furnishes abundant proof of the barrenness of hybrids. The fact that the connection of different varieties of the human species produces a prolific progeny, is proof of oneness of species and family. This argument, sustained by facts, can hardly be considered less than demonstration.

"(3.) The objection drawn from the improbability that the one race springing from a single locality would migrate from a pleasanter to a worse region is very completely dispatched. Ample causes, proofs, facts, and authorities are furnished to show that, were mankind now reduced to a single family, only time would be wanting, even without civilization, to overspread the earth. European man and European-American man, as all history agrees, came from Asia. Whence came our aboriginal men? As Professor Cabell shows, they came by an antipodal route from the same Asia. Pursue the investigation, and the clue of history will lead our tremulous feet to about the Mosiac cradle of man.

"(4.) Ethnology, or rather Glottology, the gradually perfecting comparison of languages, is bringing us to the same point. The unscientific attempt to trace the striking analogies of languages to the mere similarity of human organs, and the still more unscientific attempt of Professor Agassiz to attribute them to a transcendental mental unity in races sprung from different original localities, look like desperation. Meanwhile, comparison is educing wonderful yet rarely demonstrative laws, and laws are guiding threads converging to unity.

"(5.) Another argument is derived from the real mental unity of the universal human soul. Races differ, indeed, in mental power, as do individuals, widely, even in the same family. But there is the same programme of mental philosophy for all. The same intellect, affections, instincts, conscience, sense of superior divine power, and susceptibility of religion. For the European, the Esquimaux, the Hottentot, there is the same power in the cross of Christ.

"(6.) Finally, Geology, with her wonderful demonstration of the recent origin of man, proves the same thing. The latest attempts to adduce specimens of fossil man have been failures. Not far back of the period that our best and somewhat hypothetical calculations from Mosaic chronology would assign, Geology fixes the birth of man.

"The conclusion may be fairly drawn, in the words of the able translators and illustrators of Baron Cuvier's great work: 'We are fully warranted in concluding, both from the comparison of man with inferior animals, so far as the inferiority will allow of such comparison, and, beyond that, by comparing him with himself, that the great family of mankind loudly proclaim a descent, at some period or other, from one common origin.'

"Thus, by an investigation totally independent of historical authority, we are brought to the conclusion of the inspired writings, that the Creator 'hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth' (Acts xvii, 26)." The more recent authorities on this question are: Prichard, Researches into the Physiological History of Mankind (London, 4 vols. 8vo, 1836-44); also Natural History of Man (London, 3d ed. 8vo, 1848); Bachman, Unity of the Human Race (Charleston, 1850, 8vo); Smyth, Unity of the Races (New York, 1850); Johnes, Philological Proofs of the Unity of the Human Race (London, 1846); Met. Natūra (Gött. 1776, 8vo); Quatrefages, in Rev. des Deux Mondes, 1861; and the article MAN.

III. The original capacities and condition of the first human pair have also formed the subject of much discussion. It will be found, however, that the best conclusions of reason on this point harmonize fully with the brief Scriptural account of the facts as they were.

I. It is evident, upon a little reflection, and the closest investigation confirms the conclusion, that the first human pair must have been created in a state equivalent to that which all subsequent human beings have had to reach by slow degrees, in growth, experience, observation, imitation, and the instruction of others; that is, a state of prime maturity, and with an infusion, so to speak, of knowledge and habits, both physical and intellectual, suitable to the place which man had to occupy in the system of creation, and adequate to his necessities in that place. Had it been otherwise, the new beings could not have preserved their animal existence, nor have held rational converse with each other, nor have paid to their Creator the homage of knowledge and love, adoration and obedience; and reason clearly tells us that the last was the noblest end of existence. The Bible coincides with this dictate of honest reason, expressing these facts in simple and artless language: "And Jehovah God formed the man [Heb. the Adam], dust from the ground [ha-adamah], and blew into his nostrils the breath of life; and the man became a living animal" (Gen. ii, 7). Here are two objects of attention, the organic mechanism of the human body, and the vitality with which it was endowed. (a.) The mechanical material, formed (moulded, or arranged, as an artificer models clay or wax) into the human and all other animal bodies, is called "dust from the ground." This expression conveys, in a general form, the idea of earthly matter, the constituent substance of the ground on which we tread. To say that of this the human and every other animal body was formed, is a position which would be at once the most easily apprehensible to an uncultivated mind, and which yet is the most exactly true upon the highest philosophical grounds. We now know, from chemical analysis, that the animal body is composed, in the inscrutable manner called organization, of carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, nitrogen, lime, iron, sulphur, and phosphorus. Now all these are mineral substances, which in their various combinations form a very large part of the solid ground. (b.) The expression which we have rendered "living animal" sets before us the organic life of the animal frame, that mysterious something which man cannot create nor restore, which baffles the most acute philosophers to search out its nature, and which reason combines with Scripture to refer to the immediate agency of the Almighty—"in him we live, and move, and have our being."

2. The Scripture narrative also declares that "God created man in his own image: in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them" (Gen. i, 27). The image (resemblance, such as a shadow bears to the object which casts it) of God is an expression which breathes at once primitive simplicity and the most recondite wisdom; for what term could the most cultivated and copious language bring forth more suitable to the purpose? It presents to us man as made in a resemblance to the Author of his being, a true resemblance, but faint and shadowy; an outline, faithful according to its capacity, yet infinitely remote from the reality: a distant form of the intelligence, wisdom, power, rectitude, goodness, and dominion of the Adorable Supreme. As to the precise characteristics of excellence in which this image consists, theologians have been much divided. Tertullian (Adv. Marc. ii, 5, 6) placed it in the faculties of the soul, especially in the power of choice between good and evil. Among the fathers generally, and the schoolmen after them, there were many different theories, nor are the later theologians at all more unanimous. Many unnecessary disputes would have been avoided by the recognition of the simple fact that the phrase the image of God is a very comprehensive one, and is used in the Bible in more than one sense. Accordingly, the best writers speak of the image of God as twofold, Natural and Moral.

(a.) Natural.—The notion that the original resemblance of man to God must be placed in some one quality is destitute of proof either from Scripture or reason; and we are, in fact, taught that it comprises also what is so far from being essential that it may be both lost and regained. (1.) When God is called "the Father of Spirits," a likeness is suggested between man and God in the spirituality of their nature. This is also implied in the striking argument of St. Paul with the Athenians: "Forasmuch, then, as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device;" plainly referring to the idolatrous statues by which God was represented among heathens. If likeness to God in man consisted in bodily shape, this would not have been an argument against human representations of the Deity; but it imports, as Howe well expresses it, that "we are to understand that our resemblance to him, as we are his offspring, lies in some higher, more noble, and more excellent thing, of which there can be no figure; as who can tell how to give the figure or image of a thought, or of the mind or thinking power?" In spirituality, and, consequently, immateriality, this image of God in man, then, in the first instance, consists. (2.) The sentiment expressed in Wisdom ii, 23, is an evidence that, in the opinion of the ancient Jews, the image of God in man comprised immortality also.

"For God created man to be immortal, and made him to be an image of his own eternity;" and though other creatures were made capable of immortality, and at least the material human frame, whatever we may think of the case of animals, would have escaped death had not sin entered the world; yet, without admitting the absurdity of the "natural immortality" of the human soul, that essence must have been constituted immortal in a high and peculiar sense, which has ever retained its prerogative of continued duration amid the universal death not only of animals but of the bodies of all human beings. There appears also a manifest allusion to man's immortality, as being included in the image of God, in the reason which is given in Genesis for the law which inflicts death on murderers: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man." The essence of the crime of homicide is not confined here to the putting to death the mere animal part of man; and it must, therefore, lie in the peculiar value of life to an immortal being, accountable in another state for the actions done in this, and whose life ought to be specially guarded for this very reason, that death introduces him into changeless and eternal relations, which were not to be left to the mercy of human passions. (3.) The intellectual faculties of man form a third feature in his natural likeness to God. Some, indeed (e. g. Philo), have placed the whole likeness in the voûc, or rational soul. (4.) The will, or power of choice and volition, is the last of these features. They are all essential and ineffaceable. Man could not be man without them.

(b.) Moral.—(1.) There is an express allusion to the moral image of God, in which man was at first created, in Colossians iii, 10: "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of Him that created him;" and in Ephesians iv, 24: "Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." In these passages the apostle represents the change produced in true Christians by the Gospel, as a "renewal of the image of God in man; as a new or second creation in that image;" and he explicitly declares, that that image consists in "knowledge," in "righteousness," and in "true holiness." (2.) This also may be finally argued from the satisfaction with which the historian of the creation represents the Creator as viewing the works of his hands as "every good," which was pronounced with reference to each of them individually, as well as to the whole: "And God saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good." But, as to man, this goodness must necessarily imply moral as well as physical qualities. A rational creature, as such, is capable of knowing, loving, serving, and living in communion with the Most Holy One. Adam, at first, did or did not exert this capacity; if he did not, he was not very good—not good at all.

3. On the intellectual and moral endowments of the progenitor of the human race, extravagant views have been taken on both sides. (a.) In knowledge, some have thought him little inferior to the angels; others, as furnished with but the simple elements of science and of language. The truth seems to be that, as to capacity, his intellect must have been vigorous beyond that of any of his fallen descendants; which itself gives us very high views of the strength of his understanding, although we should allow him to have been created "lower than the angels." As to his actual knowledge, that would depend upon the time and opportunity he had for observing the nature and laws of the objects around him; and the degree in which he was favored with revelations from God on moral and religious subjects. The "knowledge" in which the Apostle Paul, in the passage quoted above from Colossians iii, 10, places "the image of God" after which man was created, does not merely imply the faculty of understanding, which is a part of the natural image of God, but that which might be lost, because it is that in which we may be "renewed." It is, therefore, to be understood of the faculty of knowledge in right exercise; and of that willing reception, and firm retaining, and hearty approval of religious truth, in which knowledge, when spoken of morally, is always understood in the Scriptures. We may not be disposed to allow, with some, that Adam understood the deep philosophy of nature, and could comprehend and explain the sublime mysteries of religion. The circumstance of his giving names to the animals is certainly no sufficient proof of his having attained to a philosophical acquaintance with their qualities and distinguishing habits, although we should allow their names to be still retained in the Hebrew, and to be as expressive of their peculiarities as some expositors have stated. Sufficient time appears not to have been afforded him for the study of the properties of animals, as this event took place previous to the formation of Eve; and as for the notion of his acquiring knowledge by intuition, this is contradicted by the revealed fact that angels themselves acquire their knowledge by observation and study, though, no doubt, with great rapidity and certainty. The whole of this transaction was supernatural; the beasts were "brought" to Adam, and it is probable that he named them under a Divine suggestion. That his understanding was, as to its capacity, deep and large beyond any of his posterity, must follow from the perfection in which he was created; and his acquisitions of knowledge would, therefore, be rapid and easy. It was, however, in moral and religious truth, as being of the first concern to him, that we are to suppose the excellency of his knowledge to have consisted. "His reason would be clear, his judgment uncorrupted, and his conscience upright and sensible." The best knowledge would, in him, be placed first, and that of every other kind be made subservient to it, according to its relation to that. The apostle adds to knowledge "righteousness and true holiness;" terms which express, not merely freedom from sin, but positive and active virtue.

Sober as these views of man's primitive state are, it is not, perhaps, possible for us fully to conceive of so exalted a condition as even this. Below this standard it could not fall; and that it implied a glory, and dignity, and moral greatness of a very exalted kind, is made sufficiently apparent from the degree of guilt charged upon Adam when he fell; for the aggravating circumstances of his offence may well be deduced from the tremendous consequences which followed.

(b.) As to Adam's moral perfection, it has sometimes been fixed at an elevation which renders it exceedingly difficult to conceive how he could fall into sin at all. On the other hand, those who deny the doctrine of our hereditary depravity, delight to represent Adam as little superior in moral perfection and capability to his descendants. But if we attend to the passages of Holy Writ above quoted, we shall be able, on this subject, to ascertain, if not the exact degree of his moral endowments, yet that there is a certain standard below which they cannot be placed. Generally, he was made in the image of God, which we have already proved, is to be understood morally as well as naturally. To whatever extent it went, it necessarily excluded all which did not resemble God; it was a likeness to God in "righteousness and true holiness," whatever the degree of each might be, and excluded all admixture of unrighteousness and unholiness. Man, therefore, in his original state, was sinless, both in act and in principle.

4. The rabbis and the Arabians relate many absurd traditions about Adam's personal beauty, endowments, etc., and such are still current among the Eastern nations. An account of many of them may be found in Bayle (s. v.).

5. That Adam was a type of Christ is plainly affirmed by Paul, who calls him "the figure of him who was to come." Hence our Lord is sometimes called, not inaptly, the second Adam. This typical relation stands sometimes in similitudo, sometimes in contrast. Adam was formed immediately by God, as was the humanity of Christ. In each the nature was spotless, and richly endowed with knowledge and true holiness. Both are seen invested with dominion over the earth and all its creatures; and this may explain the eighth Psalm, where David seems to make the sovereignty of the first man over the whole earth, in its pristine glory, the prophetic symbol of the dominion of Christ over the world restored. Beyond these particulars fancy must not carry us; and the typical contrast must also be limited to that which is stated in Scripture or supported by its allusions. Adam and Christ were each a public person, a federal head to the whole race of mankind; but the one was the fountain of sin and death, the other of righteousness and life. By Adam's transgression "many were made sinners" (Rom. v. 14-19). Through him, "death passed upon all men, because all have sinned" in him. But he thus prefigured that one man, by whose righteousness the "free gift comes upon all men to justification of life." The first man communicated a living soul to all his posterity; the other is a quickening Spirit, to restore them to newness of life now, and to raise them up at the last day. By the imputation of the first Adam's sin, and the communication of his fallen, depraved nature, death reigned over those who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression; and through the righteousness of the second Adam, and the communication of a divine nature by the Holy Spirit, favor and grace shall much more abound in Christ's true followers unto eternal life.—Watson, Theol. Dict. s. v.; Hunter, Sac. Biog. p. 8; Williams, Characters of O. T. i; Kurtz, Hist. of Old Cor. § 21, 22. See FALL and REDEMPTION.

2. (Sept. Adām, but most copies omit; Vulg. Adam.) A city at some distance from the Jordan, to which (according to the text, אדם, in Adam), or beyond which (according to the margin, אדם, "from Adam," as in our version), the overflow of the waters of that stream extended in its annual inundation, at the time when the Israelites passed over (Josh. iii. 16). The name of the city (red) may have been derived from the alluvial clay in the vicinity (comp. 1 Kings vii. 46). It has been incorrectly inferred from the above text that the city Adam was located east of the river, whereas it is expressly stated to have been beside (אדם) Zarethan (q. v.), which is known to have been on the west bank, not far from Bethshean (1 Kings iv. 12). It hence appears that the "heap" or accumulation of waters above the Israelites' crossing-place, caused by the stoppage of the stream, reached back on the shore and many miles up the river, over the secondary banks of the Ghor, on which Zarethan stood, as far as the higher ground on which Adam was located (see Keil, Comment. in loc.); probably the ridge immediately north of Bethshean, which closes the plain of the Jordan in this direction.

Adam of Bremen, born in Upper Saxony, came to Bremen in 1067, and was made magister scholarum in 1069—hence often named Magister. He died about the year 1076. (See Asmussen, De fontibus Adamii Bremensis, Kilion, 1834.) He wrote the Ges. a Hannoniburgensis ecclesia pontificum, which is our chief source of information for the Church history of Northern Europe from 788 to 1072, the period over which it extends. The best edition is that of Lappenberg, in the Monumenta Germaniæ (ed. Pertz, tom. vii, p. 266-289); also published separately, "in usum scholarum" (Hanover, 1846). The best treatise on his life, his trustworthiness as a historian, and his sources of information, is the introduction of Lappenberg to his edition. Corrections of some of his statements may be found in N. Comm. Soc. Goett. I, ii, 126 sq.; and in Stapfhorst, Hist. Eccles. Hamburg.

Adam, Melchior, born in Silesia, obtained about 1600 the headship of a college, and finally a professorship in the University of Heidelberg. His chief works are Vita Germanorum Philosophorum, Theologorum, etc. (Heidelberg, 1615-'20, 4 vols. 8vo), and Decades duæ continentes ritus Theologorum exterorum Principum (Franc. 1618, 8vo), published together, under the title Dignorum laude rituum immortalitas (Francf. 1653, 5 vols. 8vo, and 1706, fol.)—a great repository, from which compilers of church history and of biographical dictionaries have since drawn their materials. He died in 1622 at Heidelberg.

Adam, Thomas, born at Leeds, 1701, was rector of Winttingham, England, fifty-eight years, and died 1784. He was a sensible and voluminous writer: his "Works" (Lond. 1822, 3 vols. 8vo) contain a Paraphrase on the Romans, Lectures on the Church Catechism, and a number of Sermons. His Life, with his Exposition of the Gospels, was published in London in 1837 (2 vols. 8vo).

Ad'amah (Heb. Adamah, אדם, ground, as often; Sept. Αδάμ v. r. Αγαθή, Vulg. Elenia), a fortified city of Naphtali, mentioned between Chinnereth and Ramah (Josh. xix. 36); probably the same as ADAMI (q. v.) of the same tribe (ver. 33). Schwarz, however (Palest. p. 183), thinks it is the present village Dama, situated, according to him, 5 English miles W.N.W. from Safed; but no such name is given by other travellers.

Adamannus or Adamnanus, a Scotto-Irish priest and monk, made in 679 abbot of Hy. In 701 he was sent on a mission to Alfred, king of Northumberland, and on his return endeavored in vain to induce his countrymen to observe Easter after the Roman fashion, which he had learned in England. He then passed over into Ireland, where he persuaded nearly all the people to follow the Roman custom. From Ireland he returned to Hy, and having again tried, but with as little success, to bring his monks round to his newly-adopted views, he died there, aged 80, in 704. He edited a Life of St. Columba, in three books, which is given by Canisius, tom. v. part ii, p. 562 (or in the new ed. tom. i, p. 680); also De Locis Terræ Sanctæ, libri 3, published by Serarius, at Ingolstadt, 1619, and by Matillon, in his Sac. Bened. iii, part ii, p. 502. He is also said to have written a book, De Paschæ Legitimâ, and some canons. See Sir James Ware's Irish Writers, lib. i, cap. iii, p. 35.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 679; Bede, Hist. lib. v, cap. xvi.

Adamant, a term vaguely used to describe any very hard stone, and employed in the Auth. Vers. in Ezek. iii. 9; Zech. vii. 12, as the rendering of שֹׁהַד (shamir), elsewhere (Jer. xvii, 1) rendered DIAMOND (q. v.). Αδάμας, Eccles. xvi. 16, in some copies.

Ad'ami (Heb. Adami, אדם, reddish; Sept. Αδάμι, Vulg. Adami), a city near the border of Naphtali, mentioned between Zaanaim and Nekeb (Josh. xix. 33). The best interpreters (e. g. Rosenmüller, Keil, in loc.) join this with the following name, Nekeb (אדם), i. q. in the lollow; so the Vulg. que est Nekeb, but the Sept. distinguishes them, καὶ Νάκεβ), as if an epithet of the same place; although the Jerusalem Talmud (Megillah, lxx, 1) makes them distinct, and calls the former Damin (אדם), which Schwarz (Palest. p. 181) supposes identical with a "village Dami 5 English miles west of the S.W. point of the Sea of Tiberias," meaning the ruined site Dameh (Robinson, Recherches, iii, 237), falling on the limits of Naphtali. See TRIBE. The place appears to be the same elsewhere (Josh. xix. 36) called ADAMAH (q. v.), and the enumeration in ver. 38 requires the collocation Adami-nekeb as one locality. See NEKEB.

Adamites, 1, a sect of heretics in Northern Africa in the second and third centuries. They pretended to the primitive innocence which Adam had before the fall; and, in imitation of his original condition, they appeared naked in their religious assemblies, which they called Paradises. The author of this abominable heresy was a certain Prodicus, a disciple of Carpocrates (August. De Hæres. 31). 2. A similar heresy, under the same name, appeared in Bohemia in the fifteenth century. (See Picard, Cérémonies Religieuses, fig. 215.) Their founder was a Frenchman, John Picard, after whom they were also called Picardists. From France they spread over a large portion of Germany, especially over Bohemia and Moravia. Their chief seat was a fort on an island of the river Lusincz, from whence they frequently set out for plundering and murdering. Fiska suppressed them in 1421. For a long time they seemed to be extinct, but in 1781, when Joseph II issued his patent of toleration, the Adamites came again forward and claimed toleration of their principles and meetings. But when they made known the character of both, the government speedily suppressed them. Also this time their extinction was only apparent, and in 1849, after the publication of the edict of toleration, they again showed themselves in public, especially in the district of Chrudim, Bohemia. In five villages they were very numerous, and in one, Stradun, they even succeeded in making many converts. All their members belong to the (Czechic (Slavonian) nationality, and are mostly mechanics or peasants. They deny the existence of a personal God, but assume a Supreme Power (Moc) which has created the world, which henceforth exists through itself. Every Adamite claims a spirit who cleanses him from sins. They reject sacraments and worship, but expect a saviour (Marokan) from whose appearance they hope the realization of their communistic ideas. Their meetings and the public confession of their principles have been again suppressed by the government, but they are known still to exist in secret. Adams, Eliphalet, an eminent Congregational minister, was born at Dedham, Mass., March 26, 1677, and graduated at Harvard College in 1694. After preaching in various places for ten years without settlement, he was ordained pastor of the church in New London, Conn., February, 1709, and died April, 1753. He was a man of learning, and was very much interested in the Indians, whose language he had acquired. He published a number of occasional sermons.—Allen, Amer. Biog.; Sprague, Annals, i, 234.

Adams, Hannah, was born at Medfield, near Boston, in 1756. She learned Greek and Latin from students who lodged in her father's house. In 1784 she published a View of all Religions, which went through several editions in America, and was reprinted in England. In her fourth edition she changed the title to Dictionary of Religions. She also published a History of the Jews (Boston, 1812). Her History of New England appeared in 1799. She died at Brookline, Mass., Nov. 15, 1831.

Adams, Jasper, D.D., President of Charleston College, S. C., was born at Medway, Mass., Aug. 27, 1793, graduated at Brown University in 1815, and studied theology at Andover. In 1819 he was made professor of mathematics at Brown University, and was ordained a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the same year. In 1824 he became President of Charleston College, but in 1826 he removed to the charge of Geneva College, in New York. In 1828 he returned to Charleston, and managed the institution till 1836, when he left it in a highly prosperous state. After preparing and publishing a system of Moral Philosophy (New York, 1838, 8vo), he was for two years chaplain at the West Point Academy, and then removed to Pendleton, S. C., where he died, Oct. 25, 1841. Besides the "Moral Philosophy," he published a number of occasional sermons and addresses.—Sprague, Annals, v, 641.

Adams, John, was the only son of Hon. John Adams, of Nova Scotia, and was graduated at Harvard College in 1721. He was pastor at Newport, but dismissed, 1730. He died at Cambridge in 1740. He was distinguished for his genius and piety, and is said to have been master of nine languages. A small volume of his poems was published at Boston in 1745.—Allen, Amer. Biog.; Sprague, Annals, i, 350.

Adams, Samuel, M.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1766, and practised medicine till mature years, holding infidel opinions in regard to Christianity. After his conversion, in 1813, he entered the Ohio Conference in 1818 as a travelling minister, and devoted himself to the ministry fifteen years. He died at Beaver, Pa., March 6, 1832.—Minutes of Conferences, ii, 214.

Adams, Thomas, a pious and learned English divine, rector of St. Bennet's, London, was sequestered for his loyalty, and died before the Restoration. He was a great favorite with Southey, who says that "he had all the oddity and felicity of Fuller's manner." His Works, chiefly sermons, were published in 1630 (fol. Lond.). His Exposition of St. Peter was reprinted in 1839 (imp. 8vo, London).

Adams, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Fairfax Co., Va., June 29, 1785. Educated in a pious household, he was converted at an early age, and commenced preaching in 1813, in Kentucky, whither his family had removed. His mind, naturally vigorous, was cultivated by assiduous study, and he became one of the most acceptable and useful preachers of the Kentucky Conference, of which he was a member from 1814 to the time of his death. For many years he was secretary of the Conference. He died in 1836.—Minutes of Conferences, ii, 406.

Adamson, Patrick, archbishop of St. Andrews, and one of the most learned writers of the 16th century, was born at Perth, in 1513. At the age of 23 he went abroad as private tutor, and narrowly escaped death at Bourges at the time of the massacre of Paris. He lived in concealment seven months, during which time he translated into Latin verse the Book of Job, and wrote the tragedy of Herod, also in Latin verse. In 1573 he returned to Scotland, became minister of Paisley, and was soon raised to the archbishopric of St. Andrews, the accepting of which brought him into continual discredit and affliction till his death, in great poverty, in 1591. His Works were printed at London in 1619.

Ad'ar, the name of a month and also of a place. See also ADDAR.

1. (Heb. and Chald. Adar', אָדָר, targe; Esth. iii, 7, 13; viii, 12; ix, 1, 15, 17; xix, 21; Ezra vi, 15; Sept. Αδάριον.) The sixth month of the civil and the twelfth of the ecclesiastical year of the Jews (comp. 1 Macc. vii, 43); from the new moon of March to that of April; or, according to the rabbins, from the new moon of February to that of March. The name was first introduced after the captivity, being the Macedonian Dystius (Δύστιος). (See Michaelis, Gram. Arab. p. 25; Suppl. p. 25; Golius, in Lex. ad Alfery. p. 17, 24; Hyde, De rel. vet. Pers. p. 63.) The following are the chief days in it which are set apart for commemoration: The 7th is a fast for the death of Moses (Deut. xxxiv, 5, 6). There is some difference, however, in the date assigned to his death by some ancient authorities. Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 49) states that he died on the first of this month; which also agrees with Midrash Megillath Esther, cited by Reland (Antiq. Hebr. iv, 10); whereas the Talmudic tracts Kiddushim and Sotah give the seventh as the day. It is at least certain that the latter was the day on which the fast was observed. On the 9th there was a fast in memory of the contention or open rupture of the celebrated schools of Hillel and Shammai, which happened but a few years before the birth of Christ. The cause of the dispute is obscure (Wolf's Biblioth. Hebr. ii, 826). The 13th is the so-called "Fast of Esther." Iken observes (Antiq. Hebr. p. 150) that this was not an actual fast, but merely a commemoration of Esther's fast of three days (Esth. iv, 16), and a preparation for the ensuing festival. Nevertheless, as Esther appears, from the date of Haman's edict, and from the course of the narrative, to have fasted in Nisan, Buxtorf adduces from the rabbins the following account of the name of this fast, and of the foundation of its observance in Adar (Synag. Jud. p. 554); that the Jews assembled together on the 13th, in the time of Esther, and that, after the example of Moses, who fasted when the Israelites were about to engage in battle with the Amalekites, they devoted that day to fasting and prayer, in preparation for the perils trial which awaited them on the morrow. In this sense, this fast would stand in the most direct relation to the feast of Purim. The 15th was also, "by a common decree," appointed as a festival in memory of the death of Nicanor (2 Macc. xv, 36). The 14th and 15th were devoted to the feast of Purim (Esth. ix, 21). See PURIM. In case the year was an intercalary one, when the month of Adar occurred twice, this feast was first moderately observed in the intercalary Adar, and then celebrated with full splendor in the ensuing Adar. See VE-ADAR. The former of these two celebrations was then called the lesser, and the latter the great Purim. Horne has erroneously stated (Introduction, iii, 177) that these designations apply to the two days of the festival in an ordinary year. For the Scripture lessons of this month, see Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 8.—Kitto, s. v. See CALENDAR; MONTH.

2. (Heb. Addar', אָדָר, splendor, otherwise threshing-floor; Sept. Ἀδάρᾶ, apparently mistaking the appended אָ local for a part of the word; Vulg. Addar) a contracted form (Josh. xv, 3) of the name elsewhere (Num. xxxiv, 4) written HAZAR-ADDAR (q. v.). See also ATAROTH-ADDAR.

Adarconim. See DARIC.

Adargazerin. See TREASURER.

Ad'asa (Ἀδασά), a village of Judæa, where Judas the Maccabee slew the Assyrian general Nicanor (1 Macc. vii, 40, 45), and where he was himself afterward slain by the generals of Antiochus (Josephus, War, iii, 6). It was situated, according to Josephus (Ant. xii, 10, 5), 30 stadia from Bethoron, and, according to Jerome (Onomat. s. v.), not far from Gopna, but was hardly the HADASHAH (q. v.) of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv, 37). See LAISH.

Adashim. See LENTIL.

Adauctus, an Italian and steward of certain of the royal domains, in a city of Phrygia, the name of which is unknown. He perished during the persecution of Diocletian, about 303. His memory is celebrated by the Latin church on the 7th of February; by the Greeks, October 3d.—Eusebius, Ecl. Hist. viii, 11; Butler, Lives of Saints, Feb. 7.

Ad'be'el (Heb. אֲדָבֵעֵל, אָדָבֵעֵל, prob. miracle of God, the first member being by Syriasm for אָדָבֵעֵל, finger; or progeny of God, the first member being Arab. adb, offspring; Sept. Ναβζεϊλ [Josephus Ἀβζεϊνοϋ, Ant. i, 12, 4], Vulg. Adbeel), the third named of the twelve sons of Ishmael, and head of an unknown Arabian tribe (Gen. xxv, 13; 1 Chron. i, 29). B.C. post 2061. See ARABIA.

Ad'dan (Heb. Addan', אָדָדָן; Sept. Ἰδάν), another form (Ezra ii, 59) of the name (Neh. vii, 61) ADDON (q. v.).

Ad'dar (Heb. Addar', אָדָדָר, ample or splendid, otherwise [from the Chald. אָדָדָר] threshing-floor; Sept. Ἀπίδ v. r. Ἀδίρ, Vulg. Addar), a son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 3); elsewhere (Gen. xlvii, 24) called ARD (q. v.). See also ATAROTH-ADDAR; HAZAR-ADDAR.

Adder, in the general sense of a venomous serpent [see SERPENT], is the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of the following Heb. words in certain passages: אָדָדָר (alshub', perhaps so called from coiling and lying in wait), an asp, or other venomous reptile, only found in Psa. cxl, 3; אָדָדָר (pe'then, probably from twisting itself), an equally indefinite term for a riper or venomous serpent, Psa. lviii, 4; xci, 13 (elsewhere "asp," Deut. xxxii, 33; Job xx, 14, 16; Isa. xi, 8); אָדָדָר (siphon', so called from hissing), a basilisk, or other poisonous serpent, Prov. xxiii, 32 (elsewhere "cockatrice," Isa. xi, 8; lix, 5; Jer. viii, 17; like the kindred אָדָדָר, tse'pha, Isa. xiv, 29); אָדָדָר (shephiphon', so called from creeping), apparently an adder, or small speckled venomous snake, occurs only in Gen. xlix, 17. Few, if any, of these terms are descriptive of a particular species of serpent, although special traits are given in connection with some of them that enable us to make an approximation toward their identification with those described by modern naturalists. See SNAKE. The terms adder and viper are nearly interchangeable in modern science, the latter being strictly the name of a genus of serpents having the head covered with scales. See VIPER. The true adders are classed under the sub-genus Lerous, and are of several species, properly distinguished by the granular scales of the head, sometimes with larger scales intermixed, and having nostrils of a moderate size. See ASP.

Ad'di (אָדָדִי, probably for Heb. אָדָדִי, ornament, as in Exod. xxxiii, 4, etc.), the name of one or two men.

1. An Israelite, several of whose descendants, on returning from Babylon, married heathen women (1 Esdr. ix, 31); for which the parallel text (Ezra x, 30) has more correctly PALIATH-MOAB (q. v.).

2. The son of Cosam and father of Melchi (i. e. probably Maaseiah, 2 Chron. xxxiv, 8) in the maternal ancestry of Christ (Luke iii, 28). B.C. ante 623.

Addison, JOSEPH, one of the most eminent of British writers, was the son of Dean Addison, and was born at Milston in 1672. He was educated at the Charter House and at the colleges of Queen's and Magdalen at Oxford. Of his contributions to general literature we do not speak. In the course of his writings in the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, appeared a series of papers, afterward collected, and often reprinted, under the title of "Addison's Evidences of the Christian Religion." In his latter years he projected a paraphrased version of the Psalms of David, of which he gave a beautiful specimen in his metrical translation of Psalm xxiii: "The Lord my pasture shall prepare," etc. But a long illness prevented the completion of this design. Addison died at Holland House, Kensington, June 17th, 1719. During his lingering decay he sent for a young nobleman of very irregular life and of loose opinions to attend him; and when the latter, with great tenderness, requested to receive his last injunctions, Mr. Addison told him, "I have sent for you that you may see how a Christian can die." The best edition of his Works is that of Bishop Hurd (Lond. 1711, 6 vols. 8vo).—Jones, Chr. Biog. p. 5.

Ad'do (אָדָדוֹ, comp. Addon), the "father" of the prophet Zechariah (1 Esdr. vi, 1), called in the genuine text (Ezra v, 1) IDDO (q. v.).

Ad'don (Heb. Addon, אָדוֹן, low or lord, or perhaps i. q. Iddo; Sept. Ἰδδὸν), the second of three persons mentioned in Neh. vii, 61, who, on returning from the captivity to Palestine, were unable to "show their father's house or their seed, whether they were of Israel," B.C. 536. This probably means that they were unable to furnish such undeniable legal proof as was required in such cases. And this is in some degree explained by the subsequent (v. 63) mention of priests who were expelled the priesthood because their descent was not found to be genealogically registered. These instances show the importance which was attached to their genealogies by the Jews. See GENEALOGY. In Ezra ii, 59, he is called ADDAN, but in 1 Esdr. v, 36, his name is contained in CHARA-ATHALAR. According to others, this is the name of a place in the land of the captivity, like Tel-melah and Tel-haresha preceding; but the names Cherub and Immer immediately adjoining appear to be those of men, and the Masoretic punctuation rather favors the distinction of these three names as residents of the two places just named.

Ad'dus, a name twice occurring in the Apocrypha, but in both cases by interpolation.

1. (Αἰδούε, perhaps for Addon.) One of the "children of Solomon's servants," whose sons are said to have returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v, 34); but the genuine text (Ezra ii, 51) has no such name.

2. (Ἰαδούε, as if for Jaddua.) A priest, after the captivity, who is said to have married a daughter of Berzelus, and hence assumed his name (1 Esdr. v, 38); evidently a corruption for BARZILLAI (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 61).

Adelaide, a city and capital of South Australia, which had, in 1855, a population of 20,000 souls and 15 churches. It is the see of a bishop of the Church of England, as well as of a Roman Catholic bishop. The former was established in 1847, and had, in 1859, 39 clergymen, among whom were 1 dean, 1 archdeacon, and 4 honorary canons. Adelaide had also an Episcopalian literary institution, called St. Peter's Collegiate School. See Clergy List for 1860 (London, 1860, 8vo).

Adelbert [Aldebert or Adaibert], a priest and irregular bishop of the eighth century, who obtained great celebrity from his piety and zeal, and from his strifes in ecclesiastical matters with Boniface, the (so-called) apostle of Germany. Our knowledge of him is derived mostly from the account of his adversary, Boniface, who paints him in dark colors; but the truth seems to be that he had much more of the spirit of the Gospel than was usual in his times. He opposed, for instance, pilgrimages to Rome, and advised sinners to "seek relief from the omnipresent God, or from Christ alone." Boniface charged him with various superstitious practices, and he was condemned by the Synod of Soissons, 744.—Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 56; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. viii, pt. ii, ch. v, § 2.

Adelm or Adhelm. See ALDHELM.

Adeodatus, Pope, a Roman by birth, the son of Jovinian, succeeded Vitalianus in the papal chair, April 11, 672; governed four years, two months, and six days, and died June 17, 676. Nothing remains to us of Pope Adeodatus but his letters (Labbe, Concilia, vi, 523). See also EDEN.

A'der (Heb. E'der, אֶדֶר, in pause A'der, אֶדֶר, a flock, i. q. Eder; Sept. Ἄδερ v. r. Ἐδερ), a chief Benjamite, "son" of Beriah, resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 15), B.C. ante 588.

Adessenarii, or Impanators, a sect in the 16th century, who believed in the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist, but not in the full Roman dogma on that subject. The name is derived from the Latin word Adesse, "to be present." They held the so-called doctrine of impanation, scil. "non adesse in Eucharistia Humanum seu Carnem Christi Corpus sumptum ex

B. Virgine Matre sed Corpus panaceum assumptum a Verbo." See IMPANATION.

Adiabēnē (Ἀδίαβηνή, sc. χώρα, probably from the river Zab or Diab), the principal of the six provinces into which Assyria was divided. Pliny (Hist. Nat. v, 12) and Ammianus (xxiii, 6, § 20) comprehend the whole of Assyria under this name, which, however, properly denoted only the province which was watered by the rivers Diab and Adiab, or the Great and Little Zab (Dhab), which flow into the Tigris below Nineveh (Mosul), from the north-east. The queen of this region, Helena, and her son Izates, who became converts to Judaism, are very often named by Josephus (Ant. xx, 2, 4; War. ii, 16, 19; v, 4, 6, 11).

Adiaphōra (ἀδιάφορα), things indifferent. In ethics the term has been applied to actions neither expressly commanded nor prohibited by the moral law, which may or may not be done. The question whether such actions are possible, is affirmed by the Stoics, and, among the Scholastics, by Dun Scotus, but denied by Thomas Aquinas. At the time of the Reformation it gave rise to the Adiaphoristic Controversy (q. v.). The Pietists of the 17th and 18th centuries and the philosophers Wolf and Fichte rejected it. Modern writers on ethics generally agree with Schleiermacher, who (Phil. Schriften, ii, 418) shows that this distinction can and ought to exist in state law, but cannot in the court of conscience. See, generally, Schmid, Adiaphora, wissenschaftlich und historisch untersucht (Leipzig, 1809).

Adiaphoristic Controversies. I. A dispute which arose in 1548 among the Lutheran reformers. The Augsburg Interim (q. v.) gave great offence to the Lutherans, as well as to the pope. Melancthon, Camerarius, Bugenhagen, and other divines were summoned by the Elector Maurice of Saxony to consider how far the Interim might be adopted in Germany. They decided that in "things indifferent" (in rebus adiaphoris) the emperor might be obeyed; and they prepared the "Leipzig Interim," as a formula concordie and rule, especially, for the churches of Saxony. While it professed to yield no point of Protestant faith, it admitted the use of some of the Roman ceremonies, e. g. confirmation, use of candles, gowns, holidays, etc., matters which Melancthon considered adiaphora. The strict Lutherans charged their opponents (and justly) with Romanizing, not merely in things indifferent, but also in matters of faith; e. g. with granting that the pope is head of the Church, even though non jure divino; allowing that there are seven sacraments; admitting the use of extreme unction, and of other ceremonies. The controversy was continued with great bitterness until the adoption of the Augsburg Formula Concordie, 1555; but the topics of the Interim afforded matter for internecine strife among the Protestant theologians long after. See, generally, Schmid, Controversia de Adiaphoris (Jen. 1807).—Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xvi, § 3, pt. ii, ch. i; Planck, Geschichte der Protestant. Theol. i, p. 151-248; iii, p. 801-804, addit. on second Adiaphor. Controversy; Hase, Ch. Hist. § 348, 351. Compare FLACIUS; INTERIM; MELANCTHON; SYNERGISTIC CONTROVERSY.

II. A second controversy, called "Adiaphoristic," arose among the Pietists and their opponents. The former urged an abandonment of such secular amusements as dancing, playing (especially at cards), joking, visiting theatres, etc. See PIETISM.

Ad'ida (Ἀδιδά, Josephus also Ἰδιδά or Ἰδιδά, probably of Heb. origin; Vulg. Adidus), a fortified town in the tribe of Judah (1 Macc. xii, 38), which Simon Maccabæus set up "in Sephela" (ἐν τῇ Σεφίλη), and made it strong with bolts and bars. Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) says that Sephela was the name given in his time to the open country about Eleutheropolis (see Reland, Palæst. p. 187). This Adida is probably the "Adida over against the plain," where Simon Maccabæus encamped to dispute the entrance into Judea of Tryphon, who had treacherously seized on Jonathan at Ptolemais (1 Macc. xiii, 13). Josephus (Ant. xiii, 6, 4) adds that this Adia was upon a hill, before which lay the plains of Judea. It is scarcely (see Reland, Palest. p. 546) the same as Adithaim (Josh. xv, 36), but may be the ancient Adatha (Ἀδαθά of Eusebius, Onomast. s. v. Ἀδαθαίρ) and the modern Eddis (Schwarz, Palest. p. 102), near Gaza. See ADITHAIM. It was apparently here that Aretas defeated Alexander (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15, 2). Lightfoot, however, contrives to multiply the place mentioned in the Maccabees and Josephus into four or five different towns (see Chorog. Decad. § 3). Another place of the name of Adida, mentioned by Josephus (War. iv, 9, 1) as having been garrisoned by Vespasian, is thought by Cellarius (Geogr. Ant. p. 338) to have been near Jericho; but Reland (Palest. p. 546) argues that it was precisely in the opposite direction from Jerusalem, perhaps identical with the HADID (q. v.) of Ezra ii, 32.—Kittó.

Adiél (Heb. Adiél, אֲדִיֵּאל, ornament of God), the name of three men.

1. (Sept. Ἀδιήλ v. r. Ἰδιήλ.) The father of Azmaveth, which latter was treasurer under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxviii, 25). B. C. ante 1014.

2. (Sept. Ἰδιήλ v. r. Ἰδιήλ.) One of the family-heads of the tribe of Simeon, who seem to have dispossessed the aborigines of Gedor (1 Chron. iv, 36), B. C. cir. 711.

3. (Sept. Ἀδιήλ.) A priest, son of Jahzerah and father of Maasiai, which last was one of those most active in reconstructing the Temple after the captivity (1 Chron. ix, 12). B. C. ante 536.

Adin (Heb. Adin, אֲדִין, effeminate, as in Isa. xlvii, 8; Sept. Ἀδιν, Ἀδίν, Ἰδίν, Ἰδίν), the head of one of the Israelitish families, of which a large number (454, according to Ezra ii, 15, but 653, according to Neh. vii, 20—the discrepancy being occasioned by an error in the hundreds, and the including or excluding of himself) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (B. C. 536) and fifty more (with Ebed the son of Jonathan) under Ezra (B. C. 453, Ezra viii, 6). He appears to have been the same with one of those who subscribed the religious covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x, 16, B. C. cir. 410). His name occurs in the parallel passages of the Apocrypha (Ἀδινός, 1 Esdr. v, 14; Ἀδιν, 1 Esdr. viii, 32).

Adina (Heb. Adina, אֲדִינָה, delicate; Sept. Ἀδινά), son of Shiza, a Reubenite, captain of thirty of his tribesmen, and second of the sixteen additional to the thirty-seven principal warriors of David (1 Chron. xi, 42), B. C. 1045.

Adino (Heb. Adino, אֲדִינוֹ, perhaps for אֲדִינָה, i. q. Adina; Sept. Ἀδινός, vulg. tenerimus), a name that occurs in the common version of 2 Sam. xxiii, 8, as one of the mighty men of King David. Instead of the confused translation, "The Tachmonite that sat in the seat, chief among the captains; the same [was] Adino the Eznite, [he lifted up his spear] against eight hundred, whom he slew at one time," the margin translates: "Joshebaseth the Tachmonite, head of the three [captains]," etc., which makes the sense no better, unless (by placing the pause after אֲדִינוֹ) we transpose the words "the same was," like the Sept., which translates, "Jebosthe the son of Thecemani [v. r. the Canaanite], he [was] ruler of the third. Adino the Asonite, he brandished his sword," etc. But this still distinguishes Joshebeam and Adino as two men, whereas the list seems to require but one. The marginal reading on this text conforms it to that of the parallel passage (1 Chron. xi, 11), which has, "Joshebeam, a Hachmonite, the chief of the captains; he lifted up his spear," etc. See JASHEBEAM. Gesenius renders the words translated "the same [was] Adino the Eznite" by "the brandishing of his spear [fell]." It is clear that these words are not proper names, although their grammatical construction is not very easy. The meaning, according to the above view, omitting the words supplied in the common version, would be, "Joshebaseth the Tachmonite, chief of the three, he brandished it, his spear, against," etc. This seems the best mode of disposing of this difficult passage, which others resolve by supposing some corruption in the text. See EZNITE.

Adinus (Ἰαδινός), one of the LEVITES who interpreted the law as read by Ezra (1 Esdr. ix, 48); evidently a corruption for JAMIN (q. v.) of the genuine text (Neh. viii, 7).

Adite. See AD.

Adithaim (Heb. Adithaim, אֲדִיתַיִם, double prey or double ornament; Sept. Ἀδιθαίμ, but some copies omit; Vulg. Adithaim), a town in the plain of Judah, mentioned between Sharaim and Gerah (Josh. xv, 36). Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) mentions two places of the name of Adatha (Ἀδαθά, Jerome, Aditha and Adia), one near Gaza, and the other near Diospolis (Lydda); the former being commonly supposed to be the same with Adithaim, and the latter with Hadid; and probably corresponding respectively to the two places called Adida (q. v.) by Josephus. Schwarz (Palest. p. 102) accordingly thinks that Adithaim is represented by the modern village Eddis, 5 Eng. miles east of Gaza (comp. Robinson's Researches, ii, 370 sq.); but this is too far from the associated localities of the same group [see TURNE], which require a position not far from Monissin, a village with traces of antiquity, about 5 miles south of Ekron (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 114).

Adjuration (the verb is expressed by אָדַן, adab, in Hiph., to cause to swear, as rendered in 1 Kings viii, 31; 2 Chron. vi, 22; also אָדַן, shaba, in Hiph., to make swear, or charge with an oath, as often rendered; Gr. ἰσχυρίζω, to bind by oath), a solemn act or appeal, whereby one man, usually a person vested with natural or official authority, imposes upon another the obligation of speaking or acting as if under the solemnity of an oath (1 Sam. xiv, 24; Josh. vi, 26; 1 Kings xxii, 16; 2 Chron. xviii, 15). See SWEAR.

(1.) A striking example of this occurs in the N. T., where the high-priest calls upon Christ, in the presence of the Sanhedrim, to avow his character as the Messiah (Matt. xxvi, 63; Mark v, 7; see Acts xix, 13; comp. 1 Thess. v, 27). An oath, although thus imposed upon one without his consent, was not only solemn, but binding in the highest degree; and when connected with a question, an answer appears to have been compulsory, and, if false, chargeable with perjury. Thus our Saviour, who had previously disdained or declined to reply to the charges brought against him, now could not avoid an answer. The impropriety, however, of thus extorting truth must be evident; and in the case of Christ it was an outrage against the commonest principle of judicial fairness, by which a prisoner is never to be put in a position to inculcate himself. But the hierarchy, having failed to elicit any reliable evidence that would condemn Jesus, at last resorted to this base method of compelling him to declare his Messiahship, with a view to convict him upon his own testimony. See JESUS.

(2.) The term also occurs (Acts xix, 13) with reference to the expulsion of demons. See EXORCIST.

(3.) In the Roman Church, an act by means of which the name of God, or some other holy thing, is made use of, in order to induce any one to do what is required of him. An adjuration is said to be express when the majesty of God, or any one of his attributes, is interposed for the purpose, as adjuro te per Dominum; implicit, when not the majesty of God, but any one of his more marked productions is made use of, as adjuro te per Evangelium Christi. See OATH.

Adlai (Heb. Adlay, אֲדַלַי, just; Sept. Ἀδλαί v. r.

'Adā and 'Adā'ā, Vulg. Adli), the father of Shaphat, which latter was herdsman under David (1 Chron. xxvii, 29). B.C. ante 1014.

Ad'mah (Heb. Admah, אֲדָמָה, properly earth; Sept. Ἀδάμ, but Ἀδαίμ in Hos.), one of the five cities in the vale of Siddim (Gen. x, 19), which had a king of its own (Gen. xiv, 2, 8). It was destroyed along with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. xix, 24; Dent. xxix, 23; Hos. xi, 8). Near the south-west end of the Dead Sea, M. De Sauney passed through a place marked with the effects of volcanic agency, called el Thamah, where his guides assured him were ruins of a city anciently overthrown by the Almighty (Narrative, i, 425); but its identification with Admah needs corroboration. Reland (Palæst. p. 545) is inclined to infer, from the constant order of the names, that it was situated between Gomorrah and Zeboim; but even these sites are so uncertain that we can only conjecture the locality of Admah somewhere near the middle of the southern end of the Dead Sea. See SODOM.

Ad'matha (Heb. Admatha, אֲדָמָתָה, prob. from Persic thma, "the highest," and ta-data, "given;" i. q. Theodore; Sept. Ἀδμαθᾶ, but most copies omit; Vulg. Admatha), the third named of the seven princes or courtiers of Xerxes (Esth. i, 14), B.C. 483.

Admedera, a town, according to the Pentinger Table, on the route from Damascus to Palmyra; located by Ritter (Ersk. xvii, 1457) at Kuteifih, but, according to Van de Velle (Memoir, p. 282), to be found at the present Jubb-Adim, between Yabrud (Jerbrud) and Saidnaya.

Admission, (1) a term in use among English and Scotch Presbyterians, to denote the service and act by which a minister is publicly introduced into a new charge. (2) in the Church of England, when the bishop accepts a candidate presented for a benefice as sufficient, he is said to admit him. The canon and common law allow the bishop twenty-eight days after presentation, during which to examine him and inquire into his life and doctrine. A bishop may refuse to admit the candidate presented on account of perjury, schism, heresy, or any other crime on account of which he might be deprived. Bastardy, without a dispensation, is a just cause of refusal, but not so the fact of the person presented being the son of the last incumbent—the canon ne filius succedat patri not having been received in England; still, if the bishop refuse on this account, and the patron thereupon present another, the former nominee has no remedy. When the bishop refuses to admit he is bound, within a reasonable period, to send notice to the lay patron in person.

Admoni. See RUDY.

Admonition, an act of discipline much used in the ancient Church: the first step toward the recovery or expulsion of delinquents. In case of private offences it was performed, according to the evangelical rule, privately; in case of public offence, openly before the Church. If either of these sufficed for the recovery of the fallen person, all further proceedings in a way of censure ceased; if they did not, recourse was then had to excommunication (Tit. iii, 10; 1 Thess. v, 14; Eph. iii, 4; Matt. iii, 18). Bingham, Orig. Evl. bk. xvi, ch. ii, § 6. It is still exercised in the Methodist Episcopal Church (Discipline of M. E. Church, pt. iii, ch. i, § 5).

Admonitionists, a name given by the High Church party to Field, Cartwright, and other Puritans in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who sent in two "Admonitions to the Parliament," 1571, in which were set forth the abuses of the hierarchy and the grievances under which non-subscribing Protestants labored (Neal, Hist. of Puritans, i, 188).

Ad'na (Heb. Adna, אֲדָנָה, pleasure; Sept. Ἐδνῆ, but in Neh. Mavnāṭ), the name apparently of two men.

1. A chief-priest, son of Harim, and contemporary with Joiakim (Neh. xii, 15), B.C. cir. 500.

2. An Israelite of the sons (i. e. inhabitants) of Pareth-moab, who divorced the Gentile wife married by him after the captivity (Ezra x, 30), B.C. 459.

Ad'nah (Heb. Adnah, אֲדָנָה, i. q. Adna), the name of two men.

1. A chiliarch of the tribe of Manasseh, who joined David at Kizlag (1 Chron. xii, 20, where the text has erroneously אֲדָנָה, Adnah; Sept. Ἐδνᾶ, Vulg. Ednas), B.C. 1054.

2. (Sept. Ἐδνᾶς, Vulg. Ednas.) A Judahite, and principal general under Jehoshaphat, with a force of 300,600 (?) men (2 Chron. xvii, 14), B.C. cir. 908.

Ado, St., archbishop of Vienne, France, born about 800, made archbishop in 860, and noted for his zeal in reforming the morals of the people and in enforcing Church discipline. He died 875. His memory is celebrated by the Roman Church on Dec. 16. His principal works are a Martyrologium (Paris, 1648, fol.; also, with notes, ed. Georgius, Rome, 1745, 4to) and a Breviarium Chronicorum de 6 Mundi Œtatibus (Basil, 1568; also in Bibl. Max. Patr. 16, 768).

Ad'onai (Heb. Adonay, אֲדֹנָי, prob. my master, in the plur. form for the sake of intensity; see Gesenius, Theb. Heb. p. 329; Sept. Κέφαος, Vulg. Dominius, Auth. Vers. "Lord," not in small capitals; but "God," when that term has just preceded as a translation of Jehovah), a term employed in the Heb. Scriptures by way of eminence to God, especially (in the Pentateuch always) where he is submissively or reverently addressed in his character of sovereign; frequently with other titles added. See Jehovah. The simple form אֲדֹנָי, Adonay (either with or without suffixes), is spoken of an owner or possessor in general, e. g. of property (1 Kings xvi, 21), of slaves (Gen. xxiv, 14, 27; xxxix, 2, 7); hence, of kings, as rulers over their subjects (Isa. xxvi, 13), and of husbands, as lords of their wives (Gen. xviii, 12); also of God, as proprietor of the world (Josh. iii, 13; Exod. xxiii, 17; Psa. cxiv, 7). It is also used of a ruler or governor (Gen. xlv, 8); and hence as a title of respect in addressing, e. g. a father (Gen. xxxi, 35), a brother (Num. xii, 11), a royal consort (1 Kings i, 17, 18), and especially kings or nobles (2 Sam. xiv, 9; 1 Kings iii, 17). The plural is employed in a similar manner. The distinctive form, Adonai, never has the article; it is twice applied by God to himself (Job xxviii, 28, where, however, many copies have "Jehovah;" Isa. viii, 7, where, however, the expression may be only the prophet's); a circumstance that may have arisen from the superstition of the Jews, who always point the sacred name Jehorah with its vowels, and even substitute it for that name in reading, so that in some cases it appears to have supplanted it in the text (Dan. ix, 3, 7, 8, 9, 15, 16, 19). It seems to have been written peculiarly (אֲדֹנָי) to distinguish it from the regular form (אֲדֹנָי), which nevertheless occurs in its ordinary sense, once with a plur. sense (Gen. xix, 2), but elsewhere as a sing. (Gen. xviii, 3; xix, 8). See Lord.

Adon'i-be'zek (Heb. Adon'i-Be'zek, אֲדֹנִי־בֶזֶק, lord of Bezek; Sept. Ἀδωνιβέζεκ), a chieftain of Bezek (q. v.), who had subdued seventy of the petty kingdoms around him, and, after barbarously cutting off their thumbs and great toes, had compelled them to gather their food under his table (Judg. i, 5-7). Elated with this success, he ventured, at the head of the confederate Canaanites and Perizzites, to attack the army of the tribes of Judah and Simeon, after the death of Joshua; but was himself defeated, captured, and served in the same manner as he had treated his own captives—a fate which his conscience compelled him to acknowledge as a righteous retribution for his inhumanity. He died of these wounds at Jerusalem, whither he was taken, B.C. cir. 1590. (See Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.; and comp. Elian, Var. Hist. ii, 9.)

Adoni'cam (1 Esdr. viii, 39). See ADONIKAM.

Adoni'jah (Heb. Adoniyah', אֲדוֹנִיָּהוּ, my lord is Jehovah, otherwise lord [i. e. warshipper, comp. אֲדוֹנָי of Jehovah, also in the prolonged form Adoniyah'au, אֲדוֹנִיָּהוּ אֲוִי, 1 Kings i, 8, 17, 24, 25, 41–51; ii, 13–24; 2 Chron. xvii, 8; Sept. Ἀδωνιάς, but in 2 Sam. iii, 4; 1 Chron. iii, 2, Ἀδωνία; in Neh. x, 16, Ἀδωνία v. r. Ἀδωνά, Ἀδωνία), the name of three men. See also TOB-ADONIAH.

1. The fourth son of David, and his second by Hagith; born while his father reigned over Judah (2 Sam. iii, 4). B.C. cir. 1050. According to Oriental usages, Adonijah might have considered his claim superior to that of his eldest brother Amnon, who was born while his father was in a private station; but not to that of Absalom, who was not only his elder brother, and born while his father was a king, but was of royal descent on the side of his mother. When, however, Amnon and Absalom were both dead, he became, by order of birth, the heir-apparent to the throne. But this order had been set aside in favor of Solomon, who was born while his father was king of all Israel. Unawed by the example of Absalom (q. v.), Adonijah took the same means of showing that he was not disposed to relinquish the claim of primogeniture which now devolved upon him (comp. Josephus, Ant. vii, 14, 4). But it does not appear to have been his wish to trouble his father as Absalom had done; for he waited till David appeared at the point of death, when he called around him a number of influential men, whom he had previously gained over, and caused himself to be proclaimed king. In all likelihood, if Absalom had waited till a similar opportunity, Joab and Abiathar would have given him their support; but his premature and unnatural attempt to dislodge his father disgusted these friends of David. This danger was avoided by Adonijah; but his plot was, notwithstanding, defeated by the prompt measures taken by David, who, at the instance of Nathan and Bathsheba, directed Solomon to be at once proclaimed king, with solemn coronation by Zadok, and admitted to the real exercise of the sovereign power. Adonijah then saw that all was lost, and fled to the altar [see ASYLUM], which he refused to leave without a promise of pardon from King Solomon. This he received, but was warned that any further attempt of the same kind would be fatal to him (1 Kings i, 5–53), B.C. cir. 1015. Accordingly, when, some time after the death of David, Adonijah covertly endeavored to reproduce his claim through a marriage with Abishag (q. v.), the virgin widow of his father, his design was at once penetrated by the king, by whose order he was instantly put to death (1 Kings ii, 13–25), B.C. cir. 1012. See SOLOMON. Far from looking upon this as “the most flagrant act of despotism since Doeg massacred the priests at Saul’s command” (Newman, Hebrew Monarchy, ch. iv), we must consider that the clemency of Solomon, in sparing Adonijah till he thus again revealed a treasonable purpose, stands in remarkable contrast with the almost universal practice of Eastern sovereigns. Any one of these, situated like Solomon, would probably have secured his throne by putting all his brothers to death, whereas we have no reason to think that any of David’s sons suffered except the open pretender Adonijah, though all seem to have opposed Solomon’s claims; and if his execution be thought an act of severity, we must remember that we cannot expect to find the principles of the Gospel acted upon a thousand years before Christ came, and that it is hard for us, in this nineteenth century, altogether to realize the position of an Oriental king in that remote age. (See Niemeyer, Charakterist. iv, 349 sq.; Kitto, Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.)—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to assist in teaching the law to the inhabitants of Judah (2 Chron. xvii, 8), B.C. 909.

3. A chief Israelite after the captivity (Neh. x, 16); probably the same elsewhere (Ezra ii, 13; viii, 13; Neh. vii, 18) called ADONIKAM (q. v.).

Adoni'ram [many Adon'ikam] (Heb. Adonikam', אֲדוֹנִיקָם, probably, whom the Lord sets up: Sept. Ἀδωνικὰμ), one, whose retainers, to the number of 666, returned (B.C. 506) to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 13), besides himself (Neh. vii, 18), and somewhat later (B.C. 459) his three immediate descendants, with 60 male followers (Ezra viii, 13). In the Apocryphal text (1 Esdr. viii, 39) his name is once Anglicized Adoniticam (Ἀδωνικὰμ, comp. Ἀδωνικὰμ, 1 Esdr. v, 14). He appears (from the identity of the associated names) to have been the ADONIAH who joined in the religious covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. x, 16), B.C. 410.

Adoni'ram (Heb. Adoniram', אֲדוֹנִירָם, lord of height, i. e. high lord: Sept. Ἀδωνιράμ), a person mentioned as receiver-general of the imposts [see TAX] in the reigns of David (1 Kings iv, 6, where he is said to have been the son of Abda; 2 Sam. xx, 24, where he is called ADORAM, by contraction), Solomon (1 Kings iv, 14), and Rehoboam (1 Kings xii, 18, where he is called ADORAM; 2 Chron. x, 18, where he is called HADORAM, q. v.), for an extended term (B.C. 1014–973), during which he had rendered himself, as well as the tribute itself, so odious to the people (comp. 1 Kings xii, 4), in sustaining the immense public works of Solomon (q. v.), that, when Rehoboam rashly sent him to enforce the collection of the taxes, the exasperated populace rose upon him and stoned him to death, as a signal for the revolt under Jeroboam (1 Kings, xii, 18).

Adōnis (Ἀδωνίς, prob. from a Phœnician form of the Heb. אֲדוֹנִי, lord), was, according to Apollodorus (iii, 14, 3), the son of Cinyrus and Medane, or, according to other accounts (Hesiod and Panyasis in Apollod. ut sup. 14), of Phœnix and Alpheisbea, or of an Assyrian king, Theias, by his own daughter, Smyrna, who was changed into a myrrh-tree (σμύρνα) in endeavoring to escape her father’s rage on discovering the incest. The beauty of the youth made him a favorite with Venus, with whom he was permitted to spend a portion of each year after his death, which occurred from a wound by a wild boar in the chase. (See Smith’s Dict. of Class. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.) This event was celebrated by a yearly festival, originally by the Syrians, who called a river near which the fatal accident occurred (Reland, Palæst. p. 269) by his name (Robinson’s Researches, new ed. iii, 606), and thence by all the nations around the Mediterranean. See Brann, Selecta Sacra, p. 376 sq.; Fickenscher, Erklär. d. Mythos Adonis (Gotha, 1800); Groddeck, Ueb. d. Fest des Adonis, in his Antiquar. Versuche (Lemberg, 1800), p. 83 sq.; Moimichen, De Adonide Phœnicum (Hafn. 1702); Maurer, De Adonide ejusque cultu (Erlang. 1782).

The Vulg. gives Adonis as a rendering for Tammuz or Thammuz (תַּמְזוּז; Sept. Θαμμοῦζ), a Syrian deity, for whom the Hebrew idolatresses were accustomed to hold an annual lamentation (Ezek. viii, 14). This idol was doubtless the same with the Phœnician Adon or Adonis, and the feast itself such as they celebrated. Silvestre de Sacy thinks that the name Tammuz was of foreign origin, and probably Egyptian, as well as the god by whom it was borne. In fact, it would probably not be difficult to identify him with Osiris, from whose worship his differed only in accessories. The feast held in honor of Tammuz was solstitial, and commenced with the new moon of July, in the month also called Tammuz. It consisted of two parts, the one consecrated to lamentation, and the other to joy; in the days of grief they mourned the disappearance of the god, and in the days of gladness celebrated his discovery and return. Adonis or Tammuz appears to have been a sort of incarnation of the sun, regarded principally as in a state of passion and suffering, in connection with the apparent vicissitudes in its celestial position, and with respect to the terrestrial metamorphoses produced, under its influence, upon vegetation in advancing to maturity. (See Lucian, De Dea Syria, § vii, 19; Selden, De Diis Syris, ii, 31; Creuzer, Symbölik, iv, 3.) See TAMMUZ.

Adonists, critics who maintain that the Hebrew points ordinarily annexed to the consonants of the word Jehovah are not the natural points belonging to that word, but to the words Adonai (q. v.) and Elohim; and that they are applied to the consonants of the ineffable name Jehovah, to warn the readers that, instead of the word Jehovah, which the Jews were forbid to pronounce, they are always to read Adonai. They are opposed to Jehovists, who maintain the opposite view. See JEHOVAH.

Adon'i-ze'dek (Heb. Adonî-Tse'dek, אֲדֹנֵי צֶדֶק, lord of justice, i. e. just lord; Sept. Ἀδωνιάδης v. r. Ἀδωνιάδης, Vulg. Adonisedec), the Canaanitish king of Jerusalem when the Israelites invaded Palestine (Josh. x, 1, 3), B.C. 1618. After Jericho and Ai were taken, and the Gibeonites had succeeded in forming a treaty with the Israelites, Adonizedek was the first to rouse himself from the stupor which had fallen on the Canaanites (Josh. i, 9-11), and he induced the other Amoritish kings of Hebron—Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon—to join him in a confederacy against the enemy. They did not, however, march directly against the invaders, but went and besieged the Gibeonites, to punish them for the discouraging example which their secession from the common cause had afforded. Joshua no sooner heard of this than he marched all night from Gilgal to the relief of his allies; and falling unexpectedly upon the besiegers, soon put them to utter rout. The pursuit was long, and was signalized by Joshua's famous command to the sun and moon, as well as by a tremendous hail-storm, which greatly distressed the fugitive Amorites. See JOSHUA. The five kings took refuge in a cave, but were observed, and by Joshua's order the mouth of it was closed with large stones, and a guard set over it, until the pursuit was over. When the pursuers returned, the cave was opened, and the five kings brought out. The Hebrew chiefs then set their feet upon the necks of the prostrate monarchs—an ancient mark of triumph, of which the monuments of Persia and Egypt still afford illustrations. See TRIUMPH. They were then slain, and their bodies hung on trees until the evening, when (comp. Deut. xxi, 23) they were taken down and cast into the cave, the mouth of which was filled up with large stones, which remained long after (Josh. x, 1-27). The severe treatment of these kings by Joshua has been censured and defended with equal disregard of the real circumstances, which are, that the war was avowedly one of extermination, no quarter being given or expected on either side; and that the war-usages of the Jews were neither worse nor better than those of the people with whom they fought, who would most certainly have treated Joshua and the other Hebrew chiefs in the same manner had they fallen into their hands. (Simeon's Works, ii, 592.)—Kitto. See CANAANITES.

Adoptianists or Adoptivi, a sect which originated with Elipandus, archbishop of Toledo, and his instructor, Felix, bishop of Urgel, in Spain. They taught that Jesus Christ, as to his human nature, was not the natural, but merely the adopted Son of God, whence they were called Adoptivi or Adoptiani. This error was brought before the Council of Narbonne in 791; but it does not appear that Felix, who was present, was then condemned, as was the case at Ratissbon in the following year, at Frankfort in 794, and at Urgel in 799. The Adoptian doctrine had existed before in the East, but this development of it in Spain seems to have been aboriginal there, though it is not impossible that Felix may have seen some of the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia (q. v.).

By the use of the term Adoptio this school wished to mark the distinction of proper and improper in reference to the Son. They made use of the illustration that, as a son cannot have two fathers, but may have one by birth and the other by adoption, so in Christ a distinction must be made between his proper sonship and his sonship by adoption. Still, they regarded as the important point the different relation in which Christ is called the Son of God according to his divine or his human nature. The former relation marked something founded in the nature of God, the second something that was founded not in his nature, but in a free act of the Divine will, by which God assumed human nature into connection with himself. Accordingly Felix distinguished between how far Christ was the Son of God and God according to nature (natura, genere), and how far he was so by virtue of grace, by an act of the Divine will (gratia, voluntate), by the Divine choice and good pleasure (electione, placito); and the name Son of God was given to him only in consequence of his connection with God (nuncupative); and hence the expressions for this distinction, secundum naturam and secundum adoptionem. The sect is fully treated by Walch, Historia Adoptianorum (Götting, 1755, 8vo). See also Neander, History of Dogmas, 337, 432, 442 (transl. by Ryland, Lond. 1858, 2 vols. 12mo). Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 156, 157; Hase, Ch. Hist. § 169; Mosh. Ch. Hist. bk. iii, c. viii, pt. ii, ch. v, § 3. See ELIPANDUS; FELIX.

Adoption (viobertia, Rom. viii, 15, 23; ix, 4; Gal. iv, 5; Eph. i, 5), the placing as a son of one who is not so by birth or naturally.

1. Literal.—The practice of adoption had its origin in the natural desire for male offspring, the operation of which is less marked in those countries where the equalizing influences of high civilization lessen the peculiar privileges of the paternal character, and where the security and the well-observed laws by which estates descend and property is transmitted withdraw one of the principal inducements to the practice, but was peculiarly prevalent in the patriarchal period. The law of Moses, by settling the relations of families and the rules of descent, and by formally establishing the Levirate law, appears to have put some check upon this custom. The allusions in the New Testament are mostly to practices of adoption which then existed, but not confined to the Romans. In the East the practice has always been common, especially among the Semitic races, although the additional and peculiar stimulus which the Hebrews derived from the hope of giving birth to the Messiah was inapplicable to cases of adoption. But, as the arrangements of society became more complicated, some restrictions were imposed upon the power of adoption, and certain public forms were made necessary to legalize the act: precisely what these were, in different ages, among the Hebrews, we are mostly left to gather from the analogous practices of other Eastern nations. For the practice had ceased to be common among the Jews by the time the sources of information became more open; and the culpable facility of divorce in later times rendered unnecessary those adoptions which might have arisen, and in earlier times did arise, from the sterility of a wife. Adoption was confined to sons; the case of Esther affords the only example of the adoption of a female; for the Jews certainly were not behind any Oriental nation in the feeling expressed in the Chinese proverb, "He is happiest in daughters who has only sons" (Mém. sur les Chinois, x, 149).

1. The first instances of adoption which occur in Scripture are less the acts of men than of women, who, being themselves barren, give their female slaves to their husbands, with the view of adopting the children they may bear. Thus Sarah gave her handmaid Hagar to Abraham; and the son who was born, Ishmael, appears to have been considered as her son as well as Abraham's until Isaac was born. In like manner Rachel, having no children, gave her handmaid Billah to her husband, who had by her Dan and Naphtali (Gen. xxx, 5-9); on which his other wife, Leah, although she had sons of her own, yet fearing that she had left off bearing, claimed the right of giving her handmaid Zilpah to Jacob, that she might thus increase their number; and by this means she had Gad and Asher (Gen. xxx, 9-13). In this way the child was the son of the husband, and, the mother being the property of the wife, the progeny must be her property also; and the act of more particular appropriation seems to have been that, at the time of birth, the handmaid brought forth her child "upon the knees of the adoptive mother" (Gen. xxx, 3). In this case the vicarious bearing of the handmaid for the mistress was as complete as possible; and the sons were regarded as fully equal in right of heritage with those by the legitimate wife. This privilege could not, however, be conferred by the adoption of the wife, but by the natural relation of such sons to the husband. Sarah's case proves that a mistress retained her power, as such, over a female slave whom she had thus vicariously employed, and over the progeny of that slave, even though by her own husband (Gen. xxi, 10).

Still earlier Abraham appears to have adopted a house-born slave, his faithful and devoted steward Eliezer, as a son (Gen. xv, 2)—a practice still very common in the East. A boy is often purchased young, adopted by his master, brought up in his faith, and educated as his son; or if the owner has a daughter, he adopts him through a marriage with that daughter, and the family which springs from this union is counted as descended from him. But house-born slaves are usually preferred, as these have never had any home but their master's house, are considered members of his family, and are generally the most faithful of his adherents. This practice was very common among the Romans, and is more than once referred to by Paul (Rom. viii, 15; 1 Cor. ii, 12); the transition from the condition of a slave to that of a son, and the privilege of applying the tender name of "father" to the former "master," affording a beautiful illustration of the change which takes place from the bondage of the law to the freedom and privileges of the Christian state.

As in most cases the adopted son was considered dead to the family from which he sprung, the separation of natural ties and connections was avoided by this preference of slaves, who were mostly foreigners or of foreign descent. For the same reason the Chinese make their adoptions from children in the hospitals who have been abandoned by their parents (Mém. sur les Chinois, vi, 325). The Tartars prefer to adopt their near relatives—nephews or cousins, or, failing them, a Tartar of their own banner (ib. iv, 136). In like manner Jacob adopted his own grandsons Ephraim and Manasseh to be counted as his sons (Gen. xlviii, 6). The object of this remarkable adoption was, that, whereas Joseph himself could only have one share of his father's heritage along with his brothers, the adoption of his two sons enabled Jacob, through them, to bestow two portions upon his favorite son. The adoption of Moses by Pharaoh's daughter (Exod. ii, 1-10) is an incident rather than a practice; but it recalls what has just been stated respecting the adoption of outcast children by the Chinese.

A man who had only a daughter often married her to a freed slave, and the children were counted as those of the woman's father, or the husband himself is adopted as a son. Thus Sheshan, of the tribe of Judah, gave his daughter to Jarha, an Egyptian slave (whom, as the Targum premises, he no doubt liberated on that occasion): the posterity of the marriage are not, however, reckoned to Jarha, the husband of the woman, but to her father, Sheshan, and as his descendants they take their heritage and station in Israel (1 Chron. ii, 34 sq.). So Machir (grandson of Joseph) gave his daughter in marriage to Hezron, of the tribe of Judah. She gave birth to Segub, who was the father of Jair (q. v.). This Jair possessed twenty-three cities in the land of Gilead, which came to him in right of his grandmother, the daughter of Machir; and he acquired other towns in the same quarter, which made up his possessions to threescore towns or villages (1 Chron. ii, 21-24; Josh. xiii, 9; 1 Kings iv, 13). Now this Jair, though of the tribe of Judah by his grandfather, is, in Num. xxxii, 41, counted as of Manasseh, because through his grandmother he inherited the property, and was the lineal representative of Machir, the son of Manasseh. This case illustrates the difference between the pedigree of Christ as given by Matthew and that in Luke—the former being the pedigree through Joseph, his supposed father, and the latter through his mother, Mary. This opinion [see GENEALOGY] supposes that Mary was the daughter of Heli, and that Joseph is called his son (Luke iii, 23) because he was adopted by Heli when he married his daughter, who was an heiress, as has been presumed from the fact of her going to Bethlehem to be registered when in the last stage of pregnancy. Her heirship, however, is not essential to this relation, and her journey may rather have been in order to continue under the protection of her husband during such a period of suspicion.

By the time of Christ the Jews had, through various channels, become well acquainted with the more remarkable customs of the Greeks and Romans, as is apparent particularly from the epistles of Paul. In John viii, 36, "If the son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed," is supposed by Grotius and other commentators to refer to a custom in some of the cities of Greece and elsewhere, called ἀιελφοθεσια, whereby the son and heir was permitted to adopt brothers and admit them to the same rights which he himself enjoyed. But it seems more likely that the reference was to the more familiar Roman custom, by which the son, after his father's death, often made free such as were born slaves in his house (Theophil. Antecessor, Institut. Imp. Justinian. i, 6, 5). In Rom. viii, 23, υιοθεσιαν ἀπεκδεχόμενοι, "anxiously waiting for the adoption," the former word appears to be used in a sense different from that which it bears in ver. 15, and to signify the consummation of the act there mentioned, in which point of view it is conceived to apply to the twofold ceremony among the Romans. The one was the private act between the parties; and if the person to be adopted was not already the slave of the adopter, this private transaction involved the purchase of him from his parents when practicable. In this manner Caius and Lucius were purchased from their father Agrippa before their adoption by Augustus. The other was the public acknowledgment of that act on the part of the adopter, when the adopted person was solemnly avowed and declared to be his son. The peculiar force and propriety of such an allusion in an epistle to the Romans must be very evident. In Gal. iv, 5, 6, there is a very clear allusion to the privilege of adopted slaves to address their former master by the endearing title of Abba, or father. Selden has shown that slaves were not allowed to use this word in addressing the master of the family to which they belonged, nor the corresponding title of Mama, mother, when speaking to the mistress of it (De Succ. in Bona Defunct. secund. Hebr. c. iv).—Kitto, s. v.

2. The Roman custom of adoption, by which a person, not having children of his own, might adopt as his son one born of other parents, was a formal act, effected either by the process named adrogatio, when the person to be adopted was independent of his parent, or by adoptio, specifically so called, when in the power of his parent. The effect of it was that the adopted child was entitled to the name and sacra privata of his new father, and ranked as his heir at law; while the father, on his part, was entitled to the property of the son, and exercised toward him all the rights and privileges of a father. In short, the relationship was to all intents and purposes the same as existed between a natural father and son. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Adoption.)—Smith, s. v.

3. The custom of adoption is still frequent in the East. Lady Montague says (Letter xlii), "There is one custom peculiar to their country, I mean adoption, very common among the Turks, and yet more among the Greeks and Armenians. Not having it in their power to give their estate to a friend or distant relation, to avoid its falling into the grand seignior's treasury, when they are not likely to have any children of their own, they choose some pretty child of either sex among the meanest people, and carry the child and its parents before the cadi, and there declare they receive it for their heir. The parents at the same time renounce all future claim to it; a writing is drawn and witnessed, and a child thus adopted cannot be disinherited. Yet I have seen some common beggars that have refused to part with their children in this manner to some of the richest among the Greeks (so powerful is the instinctive affection that is natural to parents); though the adopting fathers are generally very tender to those children of their souls, as they call them. Methinks it is much more reasonable to make happy and rich an infant whom I educate after my own manner, brought up (in the Turkish phrase) upon my knees, and who has learned to look upon me with a filial respect, than to give an estate to a creature without merit or relation to me."

Among the Mohammedans the ceremony of adoption is sometimes performed by causing the adopted to pass through the shirt of the person who adopts him. Hence, to adopt is among the Turks expressed by saying: "to draw any one through one's shirt;" and they call an adopted son Akhret Oglu, the son of another life, because he was not begotten in this (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. 43). Something like this is observable among the Hebrews: Elijah adopts Elisha by throwing his mantle over him (1 Kings xix, 19); and when Elijah was carried off in a fiery chariot, his mantle, which he let fall, was taken up by Elisha, his disciple, his spiritual son, and adopted successor in the office of prophet (2 Kings ii, 15). It should be remarked, also, that Elisha asks not merely to be adopted (for that he had been already), but to be treated as the elder son, to have a double portion (the elder son's prerogative) of the spirit conferred upon him. See INVESTITURE.

There is another method of ratifying the act of adoption, however, which is worthy of notice, as it tends to illustrate some passages in the sacred writings. The following is from Pitts: "I was bought by an old bachelor; I wanted nothing with him; meat, drink, and clothes, and money, I had enough. After I had lived with him about a year, he made his pilgrimage to Mecca, and carried me with him; but before we came to Alexandria, he was taken sick, and thinking verily he should die, having a woven girdle about his middle, under his sash (which they usually wear), in which was much gold, and also my letter of freedom (which he intended to give me when at Mecca), he took it off, and bid me put it on about me, and took my girdle, and put it on himself. My patron would speak, on occasion, in my behalf, saying, My son will never run away. He seldom called me any thing but son, and bought a Dutch boy to do the work of the house, who attended upon me, and obeyed my orders as much as his. I often saw several bags of his money, a great part of which he said he would leave me." This circumstance seems to illustrate the conduct of Moses, who clothed Eleazar in Aaron's sacred vestments when that high-priest was about to be gathered to his fathers; indicating thereby that Eleazar succeeded in the functions of the priesthood, and was, as it were, adopted to exercise that dignity. The Lord told Shebna, captain of the temple, that he would deprive him of his honorable station, and substitute Eliakim, son of Hilkiah (Isa. xxii, 21): "I will clothe him with thy robe, saith the Lord, and strengthen him with thy girdle, and I will commit thy government into his hand." And Paul in several places says, that Christians "put on the Lord Jesus; that they put on the new man," to denote their adoption as sons of God (Rom. xiii, 14; Gal. iii, 27; Ephes. iv, 24; Col. iii, 10; comp. John i, 12; 1 John iii, 2). See SON. When Jonathan made a covenant with David, he stripped himself of his girdle and his robe and put them upon his friend (1 Sam. xviii, 3).—Taylor's Calmet, s. v.

II. Figurative.—Adoption in a theological sense is that act of God's free grace by which, upon our being justified by faith in Christ, we are received into the family of God, and entitled to the inheritance of heaven.

1. In the New Testament, adoption appears not so much a distinct act of God, as involved in, and necessarily flowing from, our justification; so that at least the one always implies the other. Nor is there any good ground to suppose that in the New Testament the term adoption is used with special reference to the civil practice of adoption by the Greeks, Romans, or other heathens, and, therefore, these formalities are illustrative only so far as they confirm the usages among the Jews likewise. The apostles, in using the term, appear rather to have had before them the simple view, that our sins had deprived us of our sonship, the favor of God, and the right to the inheritance of eternal life; but that, upon our return to God, and reconciliation with him, our forfeited privileges were not only restored, but greatly heightened through the paternal kindness of God. They could scarcely be forgetful of the affecting parable of the prodigal son; and it is under the same view that Paul quotes from the Old Testament, "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty" (2 Cor. vi, 18).

(1.) Adoption, then, is that act by which we who were alienated, and enemies, and disinherited, are made the sons of God and heirs of his eternal glory. "If children, then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ" (Rom. viii, 17); where it is to be remarked that it is not in our own right, nor in the right of any work done in us, or which we ourselves do, though it should be an evangelical work, that we become heirs; but jointly with Christ, and in his right.

(2.) To this state belong, freedom from a servile spirit, for we are not servants, but sons; the special love and care of God, our Heavenly Father; a filial confidence in him; free access to him at all times and in all circumstances; a title to the heavenly inheritance; and the spirit of adoption, or the witness of the Holy Spirit to our adoption, which is the foundation of all the comfort we can derive from those privileges, as it is the only means by which we can know that they are ours.

(3.) The last-mentioned great privilege of adoption merits special attention. It consists in the inward witness or testimony of the Holy Spirit to the sonship of believers, from which flows a comfortable persuasion or conviction of our present acceptance with God, and the hope of our future and eternal glory. This is taught in several passages of Scripture:

[1.] Rom. viii, 15, 16, "For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God." In this passage it is to be remarked, (a.) That the Holy Spirit takes away "fear," a servile dread of God as offended. (b.) That the "Spirit of God" here mentioned is not the personified spirit or genius of the Gospel, as some would have it, but "the Spirit itself," or himself; and hence he is called (Gal. iv, 6) "the Spirit of his Son," which cannot mean the genius of the Gospel. (c.) That he inspires a filial confidence in God, as our Father, which is opposed to "the fear" produced by the "spirit of bondage." (d.) That he excites this filial confidence, and enables us to call God our Father, by witnessing, bearing testimony with our spirit, "that we are the children of God."

[2.] Gal. iv, 4-6, "But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons; and because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." Here, also, are to be noted, (a.) The means of our redemption from under (the curse of) the law, the incarnation and sufferings of Christ. (b.) That the adoption of sons follows upon our actual redemption from that curse, or, in other words, upon our pardon. (c.) That upon our being pardoned, the "Spirit of the Son" is "sent forth into our hearts," producing the same effect as that mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans, viz., filial confidence in God, "crying, Abba, Father."

[3.] To these texts are to be added all those passages, so numerous in the New Testament, which express the confidence and the joy of Christians, their friendship with God, their confident access to him as their God, their entire union and delightful intercourse with him in spirit. (See Watson, Institutes, ii, 69; Dwight, Theology, vol. iii.)

2. In the early fathers, adoption seems to have been regarded as the effect of baptism. The Romanist theologians generally do not treat of adoption as a separate theological topic, nor, indeed, does their system admit it. According to the old Lutheran theology (Apol. iv, 140; Form. Conc. iv, 631; Gessner, 118; Hutter, loc. 12), adoption takes place at the same time with regeneration and justification, justification giving to the sinner the right of adoption, and regeneration putting him in the possession and enjoyment of this right. The certainty of one's adoption, and of the inheritance warranted by it, are counted among the attributes of the new birth. Pietism (q. v.) caused an approximation of the Lutheran theology to that of the Reformed Church, which, from the beginning, had distinguished more strictly between regeneration and adoption. The expressions of the Reformed theologians differed, however, greatly. Usually they represented adoption as the effect or as the fruit of justification. Sometimes, however, as co-ordinate, but always as subsequent to regeneration. Rationalism (q. v.) threw aside the biblical conception of adoption as well as that of regeneration. Bretschneider explains it as the firm hope of a moral man for everlasting bliss after this life. Schleiermacher speaks of adoption as a constitutive element of justification, but explains it, on the whole, as identical with the putting on of a new man, and regards it as a phase in the phenomenology of the Christian consciousness. Lange (Christliche Dogmatik, § 97) regards the new birth as the transformation of the individual life into a divine human life, and finds it in the union of justification and faith. Adoption, as the result of the new birth, appears to him as a substantial relation with God and an individualized image of God according to his image in Christ. Güder, in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, thinks that the words of the Bible conceal treasures which theological science has not yet fully succeeded in bringing to light, and that adoption must be brought into an organic connection not only with justification, but with the new birth—the latter not to be taken merely in a psychological, but in a deeper mystical sense. See ASSURANCE; CHILDREN OF GOD.

Ado'ra. (1 Macc. xiii, 20). See ADORAIM.

Adora'im (Heb. Adora'im, אֲדוֹרַיִם, two mounds or dwellings; Sept. Ἀδοραῖμ v. r. Ἀδοραῖ), a town, doubtless in the south-west of Judah, since it is enumerated along with Hebron and Mareshah as one of the cities fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi, 9). Under the name of Adora it is apparently mentioned in the Apocrypha (Ἀδορα, 1 Macc. xiii, 20), and also often by Josephus (Ἀδορα or Ἀδορα, Ant. viii, 10, 1; xiii, 6, 5; 15, 4; War, i, 2, 6; 8, 4), who usually connects it with Maressa, as cities of the later Idumæa (see Reland, Palest. p. 547). It was captured by Hyrcanus at the same time with Maressa, and rebuilt by Gabinius (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 9, 1; xiv, 5, 3). Dr. Robinson discovered the site under the name of Dura, a large village without ruins, five miles W. by S. from Hebron, on the eastern slope of a cultivated hill, with olive-groves and fields of grain all around (Researches, iii, 2-5; comp. Schwarz, Palest. p. 113).—Kittó.

Ado'ram (Heb. Adoram, אֲדוֹרָם, a contracted form of Adoniram; Sept. Ἀδοράμ v. r. Ἀδοράμ), the officer in charge of the tribute under Solomon and Rehoboam (2 Sam. xx, 24; 1 Kings xii, 18); elsewhere (1 Kings iv, 6) called ADONIRAM (q. v.).

Adoration, an act of worship to a superior being; strictly due to God alone, but performed to other objects also, whether idols or men. The word "adore" may be derived from (manum) ad os (mittere), or the custom of kissing the hand in token of respect. The Greek term προσκύνησις implies the prostration of the body as a sign of reverence. See WORSHIP.

1. The Hebrew forms of adoration or worship were various; putting off the shoes, standing, bowing, kneeling, prostration, and kissing (Exod. iii, 5; Josh. v, 15; Psa. ii, 12; Gen. xli, 40-43; xliii, 26-28; Dan. ii, 46; Matt. xxvii, 9; Luke vii, 38; Rev. xix, 20). See ATTITUDES. In this last sense the term (in its Latin signification as above) is descriptive of an act of worship alluded to in Scripture: "If I had beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon, walking in brightness; and my heart had been secretly enticed, or my mouth had kissed my hand; this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge" (Job xxxi, 26-28); a passage which clearly intimates that kissing the hand was considered an overt act of worship in the East (see Kiesling, in the Miscell. Lips. Nov. ix, 595 sq.). See ASTROLOGY. So Minutius Felix (De Sacrific. cap. 2, ad fin.) remarks, that when Cæcilius observed the statue of Serapis, "according to the custom of the superstitious vulgar, he moved his hand to his mouth, and kissed it with his lips." The same act was used as a mark of respect in the presence of kings and persons high in office or station. Or rather, perhaps, the hand was not merely kissed and then withdrawn from the mouth, but held continuously before or upon the mouth, to which allusion is made in such texts as Judg. xviii, 10; Job xxi, 5; xxix, 9; xl, 4; Ps. xxxix, 9; in which "laying the hand upon the mouth" is used to describe the highest degree of reverence and submission; as such this posture is exhibited on the monuments of Persia and of Egypt.—Kitto, s. v. See SALUTATION.

The acts and postures by which the Hebrews expressed adoration bear a great similarity to those still in use among Oriental nations. To rise up and suddenly prostrate the body was the most simple method; but generally speaking, the prostration was conducted in a more formal manner, the person falling upon the knee, and then gradually inclining the body until the forehead touched the ground. The various expressions in Hebrew referring to this custom appear to have their specific meaning: thus שָׁפַח (naphal), to fall down, פִּיטְרוּ describes the sudden fall; כָּרַע (kara', to bend, κίπτω), bending the knee; כָּדַל (kadal', to stoop, κύντω), the inclination of the head and body; and, lastly, שָׁחָה (shachah), to bow, προσκυνεῖν , complete prostration; the term שָׁגַח (sigal', to prostrate one's self, Isa. xlv, 15, 17, 19; xlvii, 6) was introduced at a late period as appropriate to the worship paid to idols by the Babylonians and other Eastern nations (Dan. iii, 5, 6). Such prostration was usual in the worship of Jehovah (Gen. xvii, 3; Psa. xcv, 6); but it was by no means exclusively used for that purpose; it was the formal mode of receiving visitors (Gen. xviii, 2), of doing obeisance to one of superior station (2 Sam. xiv, 4), and of showing respect to equals (1 Kings ii, 29). Occasionally it was repeated three times (1 Sam. xx, 41), and even seven times (Gen. xxxiii, 3). It was accompanied by such acts as a kiss (Exod. xviii, 7), laying hold of the knees or feet of the person to whom the adoration was paid (Matt. xxviii, 9), and kissing the ground on which he stood (Psa. lxxii, 9; Mic. vii, 17). Similar adoration was paid to idols (1 Kings xix, 18); sometimes, however, prostration was omitted, and the act consisted simply in kissing the hand to the object of reverence (as above) in the manner practised by the Romans (Plin. xxviii, 5; see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Adoratio), or in kissing the statue itself (Hos. xiii, 2). The same customs prevailed at the time of our Saviour's ministry, as appears not only from the numerous occasions on which they were put in practice toward himself, but also from the parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. xviii, 26), and from Cornelius's reverence to Peter (Acts x, 25), in which case it was objected to by the apostle, as implying a higher degree of superiority than he was entitled to, especially from a Roman, to whom it was not usual.—Smith, s. v.

2. The adoration performed to the Roman and Grecian emperors consisted in bowing or kneeling at the prince's feet, laying hold of his purple robe, and then bringing the hand to the lips. Some attribute the origin of this practice to Constantius. Bare kneeling before the emperor to deliver a petition was also called adoration. It is particularly said of Diocletian that he had gems fastened to his shoes, that divine honors might be more willingly paid him by kissing his feet. And this mode of adoration was continued till the last age of the Greek monarchy. The practice of adoration may be said to be still subsisting in England in the custom of kissing the king's or queen's hand.

3. Adoration is also used in the court of Rome in the ceremony of kissing the pope's feet. It is not certain at what period this practice was introduced into the Church; but it was probably borrowed from the Byzantine court, and accompanied the temporal power. Baronius pretends that examples of this homage to the popes occur so early as the year 204. These prelates, finding a vehement disposition in the people to fall down before them and kiss their feet, procured crucifixes to be fastened on their slippers, by which stratagem the adoration intended for the pope's person is supposed to be transferred to Christ. Divers acts of this adoration we find offered even by princes to the pope, and Gregory XIII claims this act of homage as a duty.

Adoration properly is paid only to the pope when placed on the altar, in which posture the cardinals, conclavists, alone are admitted to kiss his feet. The people are afterward admitted to do the like at St. Peter's church; the ceremony is described at large by Guicciardini.

4. In the Roman worship it is said that "to adore the cross, the saints, relics, and images, is to prostrate one's self before them, and to pay them a lower degree of worship, inferior to that which is due to God alone." Adoration is paid to the Host (q. v.) on the theory that Christ is bodily present in the Eucharist. See IMAGES.

In the Greek communion they pay, says Dr. King, a secondary adoration to the Virgin Mary and the saints, but they deny that they adore them as believing them to be gods; the homage paid to them is, as they define it, only a respect due to those who are cleansed from original sin and admitted to minister to the Deity. Adrammelech (Heb. Adramme'lek, אֲדַרְמֶלֶךְ , prob. for אֲדַרְמֶלֶךְ מֶלֶךְ , glory of the king, i. e., of Moloch; Sept. Ἀδραμῆλεχ), the name of a deity, and also of a man. See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS.

1. An idol worshipped by the sacrifice of children in the fire, in connection with Anammelech, by the inhabitants of Sepharvaim, who were transported to Samaria by the king of Assyria (2 Kings xvii, 31). Selden (De Diis Syris, ii, 9) has confounded the two idols, being misled by a corrupt reading of the text (אֲדַרְמֶלֶךְ , god, instead of אֲדַרְמֶלֶךְ , gods of, as in the margin). The above etymology (making the name equivalent to the splendid king), first proposed by Jurieu (Hist. des cultes, iv, 653) favors the reference of this divinity to the sun, the moon perhaps being denoted by the associated Anammelech (as the female companion of the sun, comp. Rawlinson's Herodotus, i, 611), in general accordance with the astrological character of Assyrian idolatry (Gesenius, Comment. üb. Jesaias, ii, 327 sq.), and seems preferable to the Persian derivation (i. q. adar or azar, fire) proposed by Reland (De vet. ling. Pers. 9). The kind of sacrifice has led to the conjecture (Lette, De idolo Adrammelech, in the Bibl. Brevenus. nor. fasc. i, p. 41 sq.) that Saturn is meant; but Selden (De Diis Syris, i, 6) and others have identified him with Moloch, chiefly on the ground that the sacrifice of children by fire, and the general signification of the name, are the same in both (see Gregorius, Feurgötzen d. Samaritaner, Lauban, 1754). Little credit is due to the rabbinical statements of the Bab. Talmud, that this idol was worshipped under the form of a peacock, or, according to Kimchi, that of a mule (Carpoz, Apparatus, p. 516); but it is probable that the former notion may have arisen from a confusion with some other ancient idol of the Assyrians of that form. The Yezidees, or so-called devil-worshippers of the same region, appear to retain a striking vestige of such a species of idolatry in their sacred symbol called Melek Ta'is, or king peacock, a name by which they personify Satan, the chief object of their reverence (Layard's Nineveh, 1st ser. i, 245; 2d ser. p. 47).

2. A son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. Both he and Sharezar were probably the children of slaves, and had therefore no right to the throne. Sennacherib, some time after his return to Nineveh, from his disastrous expedition against Hezekiah, was put to death by them while worshipping in the temple of his god Nisroch; having accomplished this crime, they fled for safety to the mountains of Armenia, and their brother Esarhaddon succeeded to the throne (2 Kings xix, 37; Isa. xxxvii, 38; comp. 2 Chron. xxxii, 21), B. C. 680.

See SENNACHERIB. Moses Chorenensis (p. 60) calls him Adramelus; so also, Abydenus (in Euseb. Chron. Armen. i, 53), who makes him the son and murderer of Nergal, Sennacherib's immediate successor (see Hitzig, Begriff d. Kritik, p. 194 sq.); while, according to Alexander Polyhistor (in Euseb. Chron. Arm. i, 43), Sennacherib was assassinated by his son Irdunusimus. Col. Rawlinson (Outlines of Assyrian History, also in the Lond. Athenaeum, March 18 and April 15, 1854) thinks he has deciphered the names of two Assyrian kings called Adrammelech, one about 300 and the other 15 years anterior to Sennacherib; but neither of them can be the one referred to in Scripture.

Adramyt'tium (Ἀδραμύττιον or Ἀδραμύττειον [also Ἀραμύττιον, see Poppo's Theogd. ii, 441 sq.; and Adramytteos, Plin. v, 32], in the N. T. only in the adj. Ἀδραμύττινός, Adramyt'tine), a city of Asia Minor, on the coast of Mysia, (Æolis, according to Mela, i, 18), and at the head of an extensive bay (Sinus Adramyttenus) facing the island of Lesbos and at the foot of Mount Ida. See MITYLENE. Strabo (xiii, p. 606) and Herodotus (vii, 42) make it an Athenian colony (comp. Pausan. iv, 27, 5; Xenoph. Anab. vii, 8, 8; Livy, xxxvii, 19). Stephanus Byzantinus follows Aristotle, and mentions Adramys, the brother of Croesus, as its founder (hence the name). This last is more probably the true account, especially as an adjacent district bore the name of Lydia. According, however, to Eustathius and other commentators, the place existed before the Trojan war, and was no other than the Pedusos of Homer (Ilin. v, 33). Thucydides (v, 1; viii, 108) also mentions a settlement made here by those inhabitants of Delos who had been expelled by the Athenians, B.C. 422. The city became a place of importance under the kings of Pergamus, and continued so in the time of the Roman power, although it suffered severely during the war with Mithridates (Strabo, 605). Under the Romans it was the seat of the Conventus Juridicus for the province of Asia (q. v.), i. e. the court-town of the district (Pliny, v, 32). It is mentioned in Scripture only (Acts xxvii, 2) from the fact that the ship in which Paul embarked at Cæsarea as a prisoner on his way to Italy, belonged to Adramyttium (πλοῖον Ἀδραμύττινόν v. r. Ἀραμύττινόν, see Wetstein in loc.). It was rare to find a vessel going direct from Palestine to Italy. The usual course, therefore, was to embark in some ship bound to one of the ports of Asia Minor, and there go on board a vessel sailing for Italy. This was the course taken by the centurion who had charge of Paul. Ships of Adramyttium must have been frequent on this coast, for it was a place of considerable traffic. It lay on the great Roman road between Assos, Troas, and the Hellespont on one side, and Pergamus, Ephesus, and Miletus on the other, and was connected by similar roads with the interior of the country. The ship of Adramyttium took them to Myra, in Lycia, and here they embarked in an Alexandrian vessel bound for Italy (see Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, ii, 310). Some commentators (Hammond, Grotius, Witsius, etc.) strangely suppose that Adrametum (see Tachucke, ad Mel. i, 7, 2) in Africa (Plin. v, 3; Ptol. iv, 3; Appian, Syr. xxxiii, 47; comp. Shaw, Trav. p. 96 sq.) was the port to which the ship belonged. Adramyttium is still called Edromit or Adramiti (Fellows, Asia Minor, p. 39; comp. Pococke, Trav. II, ii, 16). It is built on a bill, contains about 1000 houses, and is still a place of some commerce (Turner, Tour, iii, 265). The general appearance of the place, however, is poor, the houses being meanly built, and inhabited principally by Greek fishermen (Büsching, Erdbesch. v, 1, 91). From medals struck in this town, it appears that it celebrated the worship of Castor and Pollux (Acts xxviii, 11), as also that of Jupiter and Minerva (whose effigies appear in the preceding cut).

A' dria, or Adriatic SEA (Ἀδριακ., Acts xxvii, 27), the modern Gulf of Venice (Forbiger, Alte Geogr. ii, 13 sq.). It derives its name from the city Adria, in Cisalpine Gaul, on the river Po, now called Adri. The name Adriatic is now confined to the gulf lying between Italy on one side and the coasts of Dalmatia and Albania on the other (comp. Pliny, iii, 16, 29). But in Paul's time it extended to all that part of the Mediterranean between Crete and Sicily (Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.). Thus Ptolemy (iii, 16) says that Sicily was bounded on the east by the Adriatic, and that Crete was bounded by the Adriatic on the west; and Strabo (ii, p. 185; vii, p. 488) says that the Ionian Gulf was a part of what was in his time called the Adriatic Sea (comp. Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg. p. 103, 168, ed. Bernharly; Josephus, Life, 3). This obviates the necessity of finding the island of Melita (q. v.), on which Paul was shipwrecked, in the present Adriatic gulf (Hackett's Comment. in loc.). See STURWRECK. On the modern navigation, see M'Culloch's Gazetteer, s. v.

Adrian, Emperor. See HADRIAN.

Adrian, abbot of the monastery of Neridan, near Naples. Pope Vitalian selected him to fill the vacant see of Canterbury, but he refused, and induced the pope to select Theodore instead, promising that he would accompany him. Accordingly Theodore was consecrated in 668; and upon their arrival in England, after a very long journey, Adrian was made abbot of the monastery of St. Augustine at Canterbury. By their united efforts the Church in England was brought into strict conformity with that of Rome. He died January 6th, 709.—Bede, Hist. Eccl. iv, 1; Hook, Eccl. Biog. i, 66.

Adrian I. Pope, elected in the room of Stephen III, Feb. 9th, 772. He was a man of large mental endowments and great perseverance, and all his powers were studiously devoted to the enlargement of the papal power. Charlemagne, after defeating Desiderius and destroying the power of the Longobards in Italy in 774, went to Rome, where Adrian received him with high honors, acknowledging him king of Italy and patrician of Rome. Charlemagne, in turn, confirmed the grants made by Pepin to the Roman See, and added also Ancona and Benevento. In a letter to Charlemagne, Adrian flatters him with the title of norus Christianissimus Constantinus. Charlemagne visited Rome again in 787, when Adrian christened his son Pepin. In the same year, upon the invitation of the Empress Irene of Constantinople, Adrian sent legates to the Second Ecumenical Synod of Nice, by which image-worship was sanctioned. See NICE. In 794 he sent legates to the synod of Frankfort, which was presided over by Charlemagne, and condemned the Adoptianists (q. v.), but also image-worship, although Adrian, in a letter to the king (Mansi, xiii, p. 795), had declared, "Si quis sanctas imagines Domini nostri Jesu Christi et ejus genericis atque omnium sanctorum secundum St. Patrum doctrinam venerari nuberit, anathema sit." Adrian wrote against the theological opinions of Felix of Urgel, and through his endeavors the Gregorian chant and rite were introduced, first at Metz, and subsequently in other churches of the empire. His fame is tarnished (see Rudolph, De Calice Canonum quem Adrianus I. Carolo Magno debet, Erl. 1777) by the use which he made of the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals (q. v.). He died Dec. 26, 795, having occupied the see twenty-three years. In spite of his dispute with Charlemagne about image-worship, and also of the fact that he attempted a reply to the "Caroline books" (q. v.) in his Libellus responsorius ad Carolum Magnum pro Synodo Nic. II. It is certain that Charlemagne was greatly distressed by his death. His Isagoge SS. Litterarum may be found in the Critici Sacri, vol. viii.—Hoefcr, Biographie Générale, s. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, v, 447.

II. Pope, a native of Rome, elected Dec. 14th, 867, at the age of seventy-five, having twice before refused the pontificate. His term of office was almost wholly occupied in disputes with Lothaire, Charles the Bald, and the Greek Church. In the war of Charles the Bald against Louis II, Adrian declared in favor of the latter, and threatened every one with the "censure of the apostolic vengeance" (apostolica uttione censura) who should dare to invade the country "contrary to the divine and the apostolical will." This papal interference in secular affairs was, however, sternly opposed by Archbishop Hincmar (q. v.) of Rheims. In letters to Charles the Bald and the synod of Duziacum (871), which had deposed Bishop Hincmar of Laon, notwithstanding his appeal to the pope, Adrian put forth the claim that bishops should be only deposed by the pope, not by particular synods. Charles the Bald remonstrated, however, so energetically against this claim, that Adrian endeavored to gain his object by flatteries instead of threats. Adrian was called upon to act as arbiter between the Patriarch Photius of Constantinople and his opponent Ignatius. Adrian deposed Photius in a synod at Rome, and he sent delegates to the synod of Constantinople (869), which repeated the sentence against Photius. During the pontificate of Adrian a synod was held at Rome which prohibited the marriage of priests. He died Nov. 25, 872.—Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, v, 448.

III. Pope, a Roman, elected March 1, 884, and occupied the see only a year and four months. He was the first pope to change his name, having been called Agapetus before his elevation to the papal see. A decree is also attributed to him which provides that the emperor shall not meddle in the election of a pope. The Emperor Basilus urged him to admit the right of Photius to the see of Constantinople, and to admit him into communion, but Adrian steadily refused. He died July 8, 885.

IV. Pope, an Englishman named Nicholas Breakspere, who raised himself from actual beggary and servitude to the highest place of dignity in the Church. He was a servant in the monastery of St. Rufus, near Avignon, and subsequently became its abbot in 1137. When the monks denounced him to Pope Eugene III for his severity, the pope, a disciple of Bernard of Clairvaux, made him a cardinal, and legate to Norway. He possessed learning, eloquence, and generosity, but, at the same time, an extreme attachment to the privileges of the papal chair. In the year 1154, December 4, he was elected pope, and received the felicitations of Henry II of England, whose ambassadors were accompanied by the monks of St. Alban's, whom he mildly rebuked for having rejected him from their society in his youth on account of his ignorance. In the following year he placed under an interdict the city of Rome, because the followers of Arnold of Brescia had wounded a cardinal. The Romans were compelled to expel Arnold, who fell into the hands of Frederic Barbarossa, and the latter was prevailed upon by the pope to deliver Arnold over to him. Adrian then met the emperor at Lutri, and compelled him to hold his stirrup. Frederic accompanied the pope to Rome, and was crowned emperor (1155). Adrian also excommunicated King William of Sicily as a usurper of church property, raised his subjects against him, and put himself at the head of an army against the king. The latter finally had to consent to receive his kingdom as a papal fief. A letter of Adrian's to the emper-ror and the German bishops, in which he stated that he had conferred the crown upon the emperor, and that the emperor had received benefices from him, led to a new conflict between him and the emperor, in which the German bishops generally sided with the emperor. Adrian, on his part, complained of the exactions of the imperial commissioners who were sent to administer justice at Rome without his participation; he maintained that the patrimony of the Church should be exempt from paying foederum, or feudal tribute to the emperor; and, lastly, he claimed the restitution of the lands and revenues of Countess Matilda, of the duchy of Spoleti, and even of Corsica and Sardinia. Thus arose that spirit of bitter hostility between the popes and the house of Hohenstauffen, which lasted until the utter extinction of the latter. The pope was on the point of excommunicating the emperor when he died, September 1, 1159, so poor that he commended the support of his mother to the church of Canterbury. He transferred the pontifical see first to Orvieto, and afterward to Anagni, where he resided until his death. He was the founder of the penny tribute to the papal chair in Ireland. He was also the author of dispensations concerning the accumulation of ecclesiastical benefices, and the residence-duty of the beneficariate, and the originator of papal mandates. Adrian probably did as much to extend the papal power as any other pope except perhaps Gregory VII.—Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, v, 449; English Cyclopædia; Raumer, Geschichte der Hohenstauffen.

V. Pope, Othobon, of Fieschi. Was a native of Genoa, the son of Theodore of Fieschi, nephew of Pope Innocent IV. Having taken orders, he obtained, by the influence of his family, many valuable preferments, and was made a canon of Placenza, and archdeacon of Rheims, Parma, and Canterbury. In the latter capacity he held a synod in the church of St. Paul at London in 1268, where the Thirty-six Constitutions, known as those of Othobon, were published. On the 12th of July, 1276, he was elected pope, but was carried off by a sudden illness on the 18th of August in the same year, before his consecration.—Biog. Univ. vol. i; Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, i, 110.

VI. Pope, born at Utrecht, in 1459, of very humble parents, who could not afford to educate him. He was placed, however, in one of the charitable foundations at Louvain, and was soon distinguished for piety and diligence in study. He was professor of theology, and subsequently chancellor of the university of Louvain. In 1507 he was appointed tutor to Charles V, who was ever after his friend, and aided in raising him to the papal chair (Roesch, Jets over Paus Adrian II Utrecht, 1836; Hoeller, Die deutschen Päpste). He had, in 1517, been created cardinal by Leo X, and on his death Adrian was elected pope, January 9, 1522, at a time when all Germany was in the flame of the Lutheran Reformation. Adrian set himself to reform the clergy, and to put down the Reformation. In his letter to the Diet of Nuremberg, 1522, in which he urged that Luther should be cut off as Huss and Jerome had been, he still admitted that Luther's charges against the corruptions of the Church were just. "Confess," said he to the legate, "without disguise, that God hath permitted this schism and this persecution for the sins of mankind, and above all for those of the priests and prelates of the Church. . . . ; for we know that many scandalous things have been done in this holy see, abuses of spiritual matters, and excesses in ordinances and decrees which have emanated from it," etc. He always refused to advance his own relations to any dignity in the Church. After filling the papal chair during twenty months, he died, September 14, 1523. He was greatly hated by the Romans, whom his dislike to all luxuries and vain expenses offended. In December, 1515, when the death of Ferdinand the Catholic was considered to be imminent, Adrian was sent by Charles to Castile, and authorized to take possession of the kingdom in the name of Charles as soon as Ferdinand should die. On the death of Ferdinand, January 23, 1516, Cardinal Ximenez, who, in the will of Ferdinand, had been appointed regent of Spain until the arrival of Charles, disputed the claims of Adrian, but finally compromised the matter by agreeing with him upon a joint administration until they should hear from Charles. Charles decided that Ximenez should remain regent, and that Adrian should be regarded as his ambassador. In the same year (1516) Adrian was made, through the influence of Ximenez, bishop of Tortosa, in Spain, and grand inquisitor of Aragon. The relations of Ximenez and Adrian were, however, not always friendly, Adrian striving to obtain a greater influence upon the administration of the kingdom than Ximenez permitted; and when, in 1517, Adrian was made a cardinal, Ximenez endeavored to make him quit Castile altogether. After the death of Ximenez, November 8, 1517, Adrian was appointed by Charles regent of Spain. On the death of Pope Leo X, Adrian, through the influence of Charles, was made his successor. Adrian greatly misunderstood the character of the Reformation, maintaining that no one seriously believed in the doctrines of the Reformers, and that a removal of the corruption in the Church would put an end to the reform agitation. He proposed to Erasmus to write against Luther. To please Duke George of Saxony, he canonized Bishop Benno of Misnia. Adrian was the author of Quæstiones Quodlibeticæ, printed at Louvain (1515, Paris, 1516 and 1531), Epistolæ, and Disputationes in lib. quartum Magistri Sententiarum, which last work, when pope, he caused to be reprinted, without making any alteration in the opinion he had originally expressed on the papal infallibility, viz., "The pope may err even in that which belongs to the faith." A collection of historical papers relating to him may be found in Burmann, Hadrrianus VI (Utrecht, 1727, 4to). Ranke gives a very favorable sketch of him (History of the Papacy, i, 75 sq.).—Mosheim, Ch. Hist., cent. xvi, § 1, ch. ii.; Jovius, Vita Hadriani VI, in his Vite Viror. Illustr., ii, 221; Daus, De Hadriano VI (Jen. 1813).

Adrianists, a name given to certain disciples of Simon Magus, who flourished about A.D. 34. Their name and memory have been preserved by Theodoret, but he gives no account of their origin. It is probable that they were a branch of the Simonians, and took their name from some prominent and active disciple. (See Walch, Hist. der Ketzerei, i, 160.)

Adrichomius, CHRISTIAN, a Roman Catholic theologian of Holland, born at Delft in 1533, died at Cologne on June 20, 1585. His most celebrated work is the Theatrum Terre Sanctæ, with geographical maps (Colon, 1590), containing very minute descriptions of places mentioned in Scripture, drawn chiefly from the writings of the Fathers and the classics.—Dupin, Eccl. Writers, 16th cent.

Adriël (Heb. Adriel, אֲדְרִיֵּאל, *fi*ock of God; Sept. Ἀδριήλ, Ἐδριήλ), a son of Barzillai the Meholathite. Saul gave him in marriage his daughter Merab, who had been originally promised to David (1 Sam. xviii, 19), B.C. cir. 1062. The five sons sprung from this union were taken to make up the number of Saul's descendants, whose lives, on the principle of blood-revenge, were required by the Gibeonites to avenge the cruelties which Saul had exercised toward their race (2 Sam. xxi, 8). See GIBEONITE. In this passage the name of Michal occurs as the mother of these sons of Adriel; but as it is known that Merab was the wife of Adriel, and that Michal never had any children (2 Sam. vi, 23), there only remains the alternative of supposing either that Michal's name has been substituted for Merab's by some ancient copyist, or that the word which properly means bare (קַדְדָּה, qaladah', Sept.

ἐρέκε, Vulg. generat) should be rendered brought up or educated, as in the Auth. Vers. after the Targum. The Jewish writers conclude that Merab died early, and that Michal adopted her sister's children, and brought them up for Adriel (Rab. Talm. Sanhed. xix, 2); but the word קַדְדָּה will not bear this interpretation.—Kitto, s. v. See MICHAL.

Adu'el (Ἀκούϊαλ, prob. for Adiel, q. v.), the son of Gabael, and father of Ananiel, in the ancestry of Tobit (Tob. i, 1).

Adul'lam (Heb. Adullam', אַדּוּלָלָם, prob. justice of the people; Sept. Ὀδολλάμ, Odollam); and so in the Apocrypha, 2 Macc. xii, 38, and Josephus, Ant. viii, 10, 1; but Adullam', Ἀδολλαίμ in Ant. vi, 12, 3), an old city (Gen. xxxviii, 1, 12, 20) in the plain country of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv, 35), and one of the royal cities of the Canaanites (Josh. xii, 15). It was one of the towns which Rehoboam fortified (2 Chron. xi, 7; Micah i, 15), and is mentioned after the captivity (Neh. xi, 30; 2 Macc. xii, 38). Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) state that it existed in their time as a large village, ten miles to the east of Eleutheropolis, by which (unless, as Keland thinks, Palest. p. 547, they confound it with Eglon) they probably mean north-east (Keil, Comment. in loc. Josh.; Schwarz, Palest. p. 87), possibly at el-Keishum, near Timnath (comp. Gen. xxxviii, 12); or perhaps (as Tobler, Drit. Wanderung. p. 150) at the present village Beit Ula (Van de Velde, Memoir. p. 282). It is evident that Adullam was one of the cities of "the valley" or plain between the hill country of Judah and the sea; and from its place in the lists of names (especially 2 Chron. xi, 8), it appears to have been not very far from the Philistine city of Gath.

This circumstance would suggest that the CAVE OF ADULLAM (2 Sam. xxiii, 13; 1 Chron. xi, 15), to which David withdrew immediately from Gath (1 Sam. xxii, 1), was near the city of that name (see Stanley, Palestine, p. 254, note). But there is no passage of Scripture which connects the city and the cave, and it is certainly not in a plain that one would look for a cave capable of affording a secure retreat to 400 men; nor has any such cave been found in that quarter. It is therefore far from improbable that the cave of Adullam was in the mountainous wilderness in the east of Judah toward the Dead Sea, where such caves occur, and where the western names (as Carmel) are sometimes repeated. Accordingly, we actually find in this very region the name Dhullam, belonging to a tribe of Arabs who encamp here for pasturage, but properly belong to a more western district around Beer-sheba (Robinson's Researches, ii, 473), and whose predatory character well befits the ancient notoriety of the spot (De Sauley's Narrative, i, 434, 435). May not this same nomadic habit have transferred the name of the city to the cave in former times likewise? This view is favored by the fact that the usual haunts of David were in this quarter (1 Chron. xi, 15); whence he moved into the land of Moab, which was quite contiguous, whereas he must have crossed the whole breadth of the land, if the cave of Adullam had been near the city of that name. Tradition (William of Tyre, D-Bello Sacro, xv, 6) fixes the cave on the borders of the Dead Sea, about six miles south-east of Bethlechem, in the side of a deep ravine (Wady Khureitun) which passes below the Frank mountain on the south (Robinson's Researches, ii, 175). It is an immense natural cavern, the mouth of which can be approached only on foot along the side of the cliff. Irby and Mangles, who visited it without being aware that it was the reputed cave of Adullam, state that it "runs in by a long, winding, narrow passage, with small chambers or cavities on either side. We soon came to a large chamber with natural arches of great height; from this last there were numerous passages, leading in all directions, occasionally joined by others at right angles, and forming a perfect labyrinth, which our guides assured us had never been perfectly explored, the people being afraid of losing themselves. The passages are generally four feet high by three feet wide, and were all on a level with each other. There were a few petrifications where we were; nevertheless the grotto was perfectly clean, and the air pure and good" (Travels, p. 340, 341). It seems probable that David, as a native of Bethlehem, must have been well acquainted with this remarkable spot, and had probably often availed himself of its shelter when out with his father's flocks. Dr. Thomson, who explored it to some extent, thinks that it corresponds to the Biblical account of David's fastness (Land and Book, ii, 427). Others (as Stanley, Palestine, p. 254) think the cave in question was one of the numerous excavations found in the soft lime-stone hills along the eastern edge of the "plain" of Judah, particularly those at Deir Dabbin (Van de Velde, Narrative, ii, 156, 157); but these are evidently artificial, being apparently enlargements of naturally small crevices for the purpose of magazines of grain (Robinson, Researches, ii, 352-354, 395, 396).—Kitto, s. v. See CAVE (of Adulam); ODOLLAM.

Adul'amite (Heb. Adullami', אַדּוּלָמִי, Sept. Ὀδωλλαμίτης), probably an inhabitant of the city called ADULLAM (Gen. xxxviii, 1, 12, 20).

Adul baptism. See BAPTISM.

Adultery (some form of the verb אָדַל, naqah', μοιχεία), commonly denotes the sexual intercourse of a married woman with any other man than her husband, or of a married man with any other woman than his wife. See MARRIAGE.

1. Nature of the Crime.—1. Jewish.—Among the Hebrews, as in other Oriental nations, adultery was the act whereby any married man was exposed to the risk of having a spurious offspring imposed upon him. An adulterer was, therefore, any man who had illicit intercourse with a married or betrothed woman; and an adulteress was a betrothed or married woman who had intercourse with any other man than her husband. An intercourse between a married man and an unmarried woman was simply fornication—a great sin, but not, like adultery, involving the contingency of polluting a descent, of turning aside an inheritance, or of imposing upon a man a charge which did not belong to him. Adultery was thus considered a great social wrong, against which society protected itself by much severer penalties than attended an unchaste act not involving the same contingencies.

This Oriental limitation of adultery is intimately connected with the existence of polygamy. If a Jew associated with a woman who was not his wife, his concubine, or his slave, he was guilty of unchastity, but committed no offence which gave a wife reason to complain that her legal rights had been infringed. If, however, the woman with whom he associated was the wife of another, he was guilty of adultery—not by infringing his own marriage covenant, but by causing a breach of that which existed between this woman and her husband (Michaelis, Mosaisches Recht, art. 259; Jahn's Archæologie, Th. i, b. 2, § 183).

2. Roman.—It seems that the Roman law made the same important distinction with the Hebrew between the infidelity of the husband and of the wife, by defining adultery to be the violation of another man's bed (violatio tori alieni); so that the infidelity of the husband could not constitute the offence. The more ancient laws of Rome, which were very severe against the offence of the wife, were silent as to that of the husband (Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq.). See WIFE.

3. Spiritual.—Adultery, in the symbolical language of the Old Testament, means idolatry and apostasy from the worship of the true God (Jer. iii, 8, 9; Ezek. xvi, 32; xxiii, 37; also Lev. ii, 22). Hence an adulteress meant an apostate Church or city, particularly "the daughter of Jerusalem," or the Jewish Church and people (Isa. i, 21; Jer. iii, 6, 8, 9; Ezek. xvi, 22; xxiii, 7). This figure resulted from the primary one, which describes the connection between God and his separated people as a marriage between him and them (Jer. ii, 2; iii, 14; xiii, 27; xxxi, 32; Hos. viii, 9). By an application of the same figure, "an adulterous generation" (Matt. xii, 39; xvi, 4; Mark viii, 38) means a faithless and impious generation. See FORNICATION.

II. Trial of Adultery.—The Mosaic trial of the suspected wife by the bitter water, called the water of jealousy (Num. v, 11-31)—the only ordeal in use among the Israelites, or sanctioned by their law—is to be regarded as an attempt to mitigate and bring under legal control an old custom which could not be entirely abrogated. The forms of Hebrew justice all tended to limit the application of this test. (1.) By prescribing certain facts presumptive of guilt, to be established on oath by two witnesses, or a preponderating but not conclusive testimony to the fact of the woman's adultery. (2.) By technical rules of evidence which made proof of those presumptive facts difficult (see the Talmudical tract Sotah, vi, 2-5). (3.) By exempting certain large classes of women (all, indeed, except a pure Israelitess married to a pure Israelite, and some even of them) from the liability. (4.) By providing that the trial could only be before the great Sanhedrim (Sotah, i, 4). (5.) By investing it with a ceremonial at once humiliating and intimidating, yet which still harmonized with the spirit of the whole ordeal as recorded in Num. v; but, (6), above all, by the conventional and even mercenary light in which the nuptial contract was latterly regarded. (See Simon, Works, ii, 1.)

When adultery ceased to be capital, as no doubt it did, and divorce became a matter of mere convenience, it would be absurd to suppose that this trial was continued; and when adultery became common, as the Jews themselves confess, it would have been impious to expect the miracle which it supposed. If ever the Sanhedrim were driven by force of circumstances to adopt this trial, no doubt every effort was used, nay, was prescribed (Sotah, i, 5, 6), to overawe the culprit and induce confession. Nay, even if she submitted to the trial, and was really guilty, some rabbis held that the effect on her might be suspended for years through the merit of some good deed (Sotah, iii, 4-6). Besides, moreover, the intimidation of the woman, the man was likely to feel the public exposure of his suspicious odious and repulsive. Divorce was a ready and quiet remedy; and the only question was, whether the divorce should carry the dowry and the property which she had brought, which was decided by the slight or grave character of the suspicions against her (Sotah, vi, 1; Gemara, Kethuboth, vii, 6; Ugolino, Uxor Heb. c. vii). If the husband were incapable, through derangement, imprisonment, &c., of acting on his own behalf in the matter, the Sanhedrim proceeded in his name as concerned the dowry, but not as concerned the trial by the water of jealousy (Sotah, iv, 6). See JEALOUSY.

This ordeal was probably of the kind which we still find in Western Africa, the trial by red water, as it is called, although varying among different nations in minute particulars, and a comparison of the two may suggest the real points of the evil which the law on Moses was designed to rectify, and the real advantages which it was calculated to secure. This ordeal is in some tribes confined to the case of adultery, but in others it is used in all crimes. In Africa the drink, in cases of proper ordeal, is poisonous, and calculated to produce the effects which the oath imprecates; whereas the "water of jealousy," however unpleasant, was prepared in a prescribed manner, with ingredients known to all to be perfectly innocuous. It could not, therefore, injure the innocent; and its action upon the guilty must have resulted from the consciousness of having committed a horrible perjury, which crime, when the oath was so solemnly confirmed by the draught, and attended by such awful imprecations, was believed to be visitable with immediate death from heaven. On the Gold Coast the ordinary oath-drink (not poisonous) is used as a confirmation of all oaths, not only oaths of purgation, but of accusation, or even of obligation. In all cases it is accompanied with an imprecation that the fetish may destroy them if they speak untruly, or do not perform the terms of their obligation; and it is firmly believed that no one who is perjured under this form of oath will live an hour (Villault; Bosman). Doubtless the impression with respect to this mere oath-drink is derived from observation of the effects attending the drink used in the actual ordeal; and the popular opinion regards such an oath as of so solemn a nature that perjury is sure to bring down immediate punishment. The red water, as an ordeal, is confined to crimes of the worst class. These are murder, adultery, witchcraft. Perhaps this arises less from choice than from the fact that such crimes are not only the highest, but are the least capable of that direct proof for which the ordeal is intended as a substitute. A party is accused; if he denies the crime, he is required to drink the red water, and, on refusing, is deemed guilty of the offence. The trial is so much dreaded that innocent persons often confess themselves guilty in order to avoid it. And yet the immediate effect is supposed to result less from the water itself than from the terrible oath with which it is drunk. So the person who drinks the red water invokes the fetish to destroy him if he is really guilty of the offence with which he is charged. The drink is made by an infusion in water of pieces of a certain tree or of herbs, and, if rightly prepared, the only chance of escape is the rejection of it by the stomach, in which case the party is deemed innocent, as he also is if, being retained, it has no sensible effect, which can only be the case when the priests, who have the management of the matter, are influenced by private considerations or by reference to the probabilities of the case, to prepare the draught with a view to acquittal. The imprecations upon the accused if he be guilty are repeated in an awful manner by the priests, and the effect is watched very keenly. If the party seems affected by the draught, like one intoxicated, and begins to foam at the mouth, he is considered undoubtedly guilty, and is slain on the spot; or else he is left to the operation of the poisonous draught, which causes the belly to swell and burst, and occasions death. (Barhot, p. 126; Bosman, p. 148; Artus, in De Bry, vi, 62; Villault, p. 191; Corry's W'indward Coast, p. 71; Church Missionary Paper, No. xvii; Davis's Journal, p. 24.) See POISON.

Traces of a similar ancient custom may be produced from other quarters. Hesiod (Theogon. 755-95) reports that when a falsehood had been told by any of the gods, Jupiter was wont to send Iris to bring some water out of the river Styx in a golden vessel; upon this an oath was taken, and if the god swore falsely, he remained for a whole year without life or motion. There was an ancient temple in Sicily, in which were two very deep basins, called Delli, always full of hot and sulphurous water, but never running over. Here the more solemn oaths were taken; and perjurers were immediately punished most severely (Diod. Sic. xi, 67). This is also mentioned by Aristotle, Silius Italicus, Virgil, and Macrobius; and from the first it would seem that the oath was written upon a ticket and cast into the water. The ticket floated if the oath was true, and sunk if it was false. In the latter case the punishment which followed was considered as an act of divine vengeance (q. v.). See OATH.

The trial for suspected adultery by the bitter water amounted to this, that a woman suspected of adultery by her husband was allowed to repel the charge by a public oath of purgation, which oath was designedly made so solemn in itself, and was attended by such awful circumstances, that it was in the highest degree unlikely that it would be dared by any woman not supported by the consciousness of innocence. And the fact that no instance of the actual application of the ordeal occurs in Scripture affords some countenance to the assertion of the Jewish writers, that the trial was so much dreaded by the women that those who were really guilty generally avoided it by confession; and that thus the trial itself early fell into disuse. And if this mode of trial was only tolerated by Moses, the ultimate neglect of it must have been desired and intended by him. In later times, indeed, it was disputed in the Jewish schools, whether the husband was bound to prosecute his wife to this extremity, or whether it was not lawful for him to connive at and pardon her act, if he were so inclined. There were some who held that he was bound by his duty to prosecute, while others maintained that it was left to his pleasure (Sotah, xvi, 2). From the same source we learn that this form of trial was finally abrogated about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem (see Wagenseil's Sotah, containing a copious commentary, with full illustrations of this subject, from rabbinical sources, Altdorf, 1674). The reason assigned is, that the men themselves were at that time generally adulterous, and that God would not fulfil the imprecations of the ordeal oath upon the wife while the husband was guilty of the same crime (John viii, 1-8). See ORDEAL.

III. Penalties of Adultery.—1. Jewish.—By excluding from the name and punishment of adultery the offence which did not involve the enormous wrong of imposing upon a man a supposititious offspring, in a nation where the succession to landed property went entirely by birth, so that a father could not by his testament alienate it from any one who was regarded as his son, the law was enabled, with less severity than if the inferior offence had been included, to punish the crime with death. It is still so punished wherever the practice of polygamy has similarly operated in limiting the crime—not, perhaps, that the law expressly assigns that punishment, but it recognises the right of the injured party to inflict it, and, in fact, leaves it, in a great degree, in his hands. Now death was the punishment of adultery before the time of Moses; and, if he had assigned a less punishment, his law would have been inoperative, for private vengeance, sanctioned by usage, would still have inflicted death. But by adopting it into the law, those restrictions were imposed upon its operation which necessarily arise when the calm inquiry of public justice is substituted for the impulsive action of excited hands. Thus death would be less frequently inflicted; and that this effect followed seems to be implied in the fact that the whole Biblical history offers no example of capital punishment for the crime. Indeed, Lightfoot goes farther, and remarks, "I do not remember that I have anywhere, in the Jewish Pandect, met with an example of a wife punished for adultery with death. There is mention (in the Talmud, Seneh, 242) of the daughter of a certain priest burned for committing fornication in her father's house; but she was not married" (Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. xix, 8). Eventually, divorce superseded all other punishment. There are, indeed, some grounds for thinking that this had happened before the time of Christ, and we throw it out as a matter of inquiry, whether the Scribes and Pharisees, in attempting to entrap Christ in the matter of the woman taken in adultery (see infra), did not intend to put him between the alternatives of either declaring for the revival of a practice which had already become obsolete, but which the law was supposed to command, or of giving his sanction to the apparent infraction of the law, which the substitution of divorce involved (John viii, 1-11). In Matt. v, 32, Christ seems to assume that the practice of divorce for adultery already existed. In later times it certainly did; and Jews who were averse to part with their adulterous wives were compelled to put them away (Maimon, in Gerushin, c. ii). In the passage just referred to our Lord does not appear to render divorce compulsory, even in case of adultery; he only permits it in that case alone, by forbidding it in every other. See DIVORCE.

In the law which assigns the punishment of death to adultery (Lev. xx, 10), the mode in which that punishment should be inflicted is not specified, because it was known from custom. It was not, however, strangulation, as the Talmudists contend, but stoning, as we may learn from various passages of Scripture (e. g. Ezek. xvi, 38, 40; John viii, 5); and as, in fact, Moses himself testifies, if we compare Exod. xxxi, 14; xxxv, 2, with Num. xv, 35, 36. If the adulteress was a slave, the guilty parties were both scourged with a leathern whip, the number of blows not exceeding forty. In this instance the adulterer, in addition to the scourging, was subject to the further penalty of bringing a trespass offering (a ram) to the door of the tabernacle, to be offered in his behalf by the priest (Lev. xix, 20-22). Those who wish to enter into the reasons of this distinction in favor of the slave may consult Michaelis (Mosaïsches Recht, art. 264). We only observe that the Moslem law, derived from old Arabian usage, only inflicts upon a slave, for this and other crimes, half the punishment incurred by a free person.—Kitto, s. v. See SLAVERY.

The system of inheritances, on which the polity of Moses was based, was threatened with confusion by the doubtful offspring caused by this crime, and this secured popular sympathy on the side of morality until a far advanced stage of corruption was reached. Yet, from stoning being made the penalty, we may suppose that the exclusion of private revenge was intended. It is probable that, when that territorial basis of polity passed away—as it did after the captivity—and when, owing to Gentile example, the marriage tie became a looser bond of union, public feeling in regard to adultery changed, and the penalty of death was seldom or never inflicted. Thus, in the case of the woman brought under our Lord's notice (John viii), it is likely that no one then thought of stoning her, in fact, but there remained the written law ready for the purpose of the caviller. It is likely, also, that a divorce in which the adulteress lost her dower [see DOWER], and rights of maintenance, etc. (Gemara, Kethuboth, cap. vii, 6), was the usual remedy suggested by a wish to avoid scandal and the excitement of commiseration for crime. The word παρὰ τὴν ἑαυτῆς ("make a public example," Matt. i, 19) probably means to bring the case before the local Sanhedrin, which was the usual course [see TRIAL], but which Joseph did not propose to take, preferring repudiation (Buxtorf, De Spons. et Divort. iii, 1-4), because that could be managed privately (ἄσθρα).—Smith, s. v.

2. Roman.—As the Roman civil law defined adultery to be "the violation of another man's bed," the husband's incontinence could not constitute the offence. The punishment was left to the discretion of the husband and parents of the adulteress, who, under the old law, could be put to death. The most usual mode of taking revenge against the man offending was by mutilating, castrating, or cutting off the nose or ears. The punishment assigned by the lex Julia de adulteris, instituted by Augustus, was banishment, or a heavy fine. It was decreed by Antoninus, that to sustain a charge of adultery against a wife, the husband who brought it must be innocent himself. The offence was not capital until made so by Constantine, in imitation of the Jewish law. Under Maerinus, adulterers were burnt at the stake. Under Constantianus and Constans they were burnt, or sewed up in sacks and thrown into the sea. But the punishment was mitigated, under Leo and Marcian, to perpetual banishment or cutting off the nose; and, under Justinian, the wife was only to be scourged, lose her dower, and be shut up in a monastery; or, at the expiration of two years, the husband might take her back again; if he refused, she was shaven, and made a nun for life. Theodosius instituted the shocking practice of public constipation, which, however, he soon abolished.

3. Other ancient Nations.—The punishment of cutting off the nose brings to mind the passage in which the prophet Ezekiel (xxiii, 25) after, in the name of the Lord, reproving Israel and Judah for their adulteries (i. e. idolatries) with the Assyrians and Chaldeans, threatens the punishment, "they shall take away thy nose and thy ears," which Jerome states was actually the punishment of adultery in those nations. One or both of these mutilations, most generally that of the nose, were also inflicted by other nations, as the Persians and Egyptians, and even the Romans; but we suspect that among the former, as with the latter, it was less a judicial punishment than a summary infliction by the aggrieved party (En. vi, 496). It would also seem that these mutilations were more usually inflicted on the male than the female adulterer. In Egypt, however, cutting off the nose was the female punishment, and the man was beaten terribly with rods (Diod. Sic. i, 89, 90). The respect with which the conjugal union was treated in that country in the earliest times is manifested in the history of Abraham (Gen. xii, 19). See HAREM.

The Greeks put out the eyes of the adulterers. In Crete adulterers were covered with wool as an emblem of their effeminacy, and carried in that dress to the magistrate's house, where a fine was imposed on them, and they were deprived of all their privileges and their share in public business. See PUNISHMENT.

4. Modern.—Among savage nations at the present day the penalties of adultery are generally severe. The Mohammedan code pronounces it a capital offence. It is one of the three crimes which the prophet directs to be expiated by the blood of a Mussulman. In some parts of India it is said that any woman may prostitute herself for an elephant, and it is reputed no small glory to have been rated so high. Adultery is stated to be extremely frequent in Ceylon, although punishable with death. Among the Japanese and some other nations it is punishable only in the woman. On the contrary, in the Marian Islands, the woman is not punishable, but the man is, and the wife and her relations waste his lands, burn him out of his house, etc. Among the Chinese it is said that adultery is not capital; parents will even make a contract with the future husbands of their daughters to allow them the indulgence.

In Portugal an adulteress was condemned to the flames; but the sentence was seldom executed. By the ancient laws of France this crime was punishable with death. Before the Revolution the adulteress was usually condemned to a convent, where the husband could visit her during two years, and take her back if he saw fit. If he did not choose to receive her again by the expiration of this time, her hair was shaven, she took the habit of the convent, and remained there for life. Where the parties were poor she might be shut up in a hospital instead of a convent. The Code Napoleon does not allow the husband to proceed against his wife in case he has been condemned for the same crime. The wife can bring an action against the husband only in case he has introduced his paramour into the house where she resides. An adulteress can be imprisoned from three months to two years, but the husband may prevent the execution of the sentence by taking her back. Her partner in guilt is liable to the same punishment. Castration was the punishment in Spain. In Poland, previous to the establishment of Christianity, the criminal was carried to the market-place, and there fastened by the testicles with a nail; a razor was laid within his reach, and he had the option to execute justice on himself or remain where he was and die. The Saxons consigned the adulteress to the flames, and over her ashes erected a gibbet, on which her paramour was hanged. King Edmund the Saxon ordered adultery to be punished in the same manner as homicide; and Canute the Dane ordered that the man should be banished, and the woman have her ears and nose cut off. In the time of Henry I it was punished with the loss of the eyes and genitals. Adultery is in England considered as a spiritual offence, cognizable by the spiritual courts, where it is punished by fine and penance. The common law allows the party aggrieved only an action and damages. In the United States the punishment of adultery has varied materially at different times, and differs according to the statutes of the several states. Adultery is, moreover, very seldom punished criminally in the United States.

5. Ecclesiastical.—Constantine qualified adultery as a sacrilege which was to be punished with death. His successors went further, and placed it on a level with parricide. But the definition of adultery remained, in general, confined to the infidelity of the wife and her accomplice, and for a long time the Church did not succeed in establishing with the Romanic nations the conviction that the infidelity of either party deserved an equal punishment. This principle was, on the other hand, carried through in the codes of most of the Christian Germanic States. The penalty was in all cases very severe, and, if there were aggravating circumstances, death. Later, especially since the eighteenth century, the penalty was reduced in all legislations to imprisonment. The canon law punished both adulterer and adulteress with excommunication, and a clergyman who was an accomplice with imprisonment for lifetime. Protestant churches, which are not impeded in the exercise of their jurisdiction by a connection with the state, generally exclude persons guilty of adultery from church membership; while state churches are mostly prevented, in this case as in others, from taking any measures. See DECALOGUE.

According to the canons of the Roman Church a clerk guilty of adultery was punishable by deposition and perpetual imprisonment in a monastery. Since the Reformation clerks have been deprived of their benefices for the sin of adultery. (See Stillingleet, Ecc. Cases, p. 82.) See CELIBACY.

In the opinion of the Oriental Churches the marriage tie is broken by the sin of adultery, so that the husband of an adulterous wife may marry again during her lifetime. This opinion is founded on Matt. xix, 9. The contrary doctrine is taught by the Western Churches (Augustine, lib. ii, de Adult. Conjug. cap. 13). See Tebbis, Scripture Doctrine of Adultery and Divorce (Lond. 1822, 8vo). Compare MATRIMONY.

IV. Adulteress in the Gospel.—A remarkable example under the Jewish law in cases of this offence occurs in the account of the "woman taken in adultery" (γυνή ἐν μοιχείᾳ κατειλημένη), given by one of the evangelists (John vii, 53, to viii, 11), from which some have even erroneously inferred that our Saviour regarded her act as venial—a view that is ably refuted by Paley (Moral Philosophy, vol. i). It is true, great doubts exist as to the genuineness of the entire passage (see the dissertations of Dettmers, Vivlicia abſerriac, etc., Frukt. ad V. 1793; Staudlin, Pericope de adultera veritus et authentia defenditur, Gotting, 1806), as it is omitted in very many of the early MSS. and versions, and greatly corrupted in others (see Tischendorf, 7th ed. in loc.), and rejected by numerous critics of note; yet, as it is retained in some good texts and editions, and as its presence cannot be explained by ascetic or monkish predilections (since it is not only without a trace of the rigor of these, but appears so lax in its doctrine as to involve serious difficulty in its adjustment to the ethics of all who could have been the authors of the interpolation), it seems to present strong claims to being true history, if not entitled to its place in the evangelical narrative (see Tregelles, Account of the Text of the N. T. p. 236-242). See the arguments and advocates on both sides in Kuinöl, Comment. in loc. See JOURN.

From this narrative, many have supposed that the woman's accusers were themselves guilty of the crime (at that time very common, Mark viii, 38; comp. Matt. xix, 10) which they alleged against her; and as it was not just to receive the accusations of those who are guilty of the evil of which they accuse others, our Lord dismissed them with the most obvious propriety. But it seems enough to suppose that the consciences of these witnesses accused them of such crimes as restrained their hands from punishing the adulteress, who, perhaps, was guilty, in this instance, of a less enormous sin than they were conscious of, though of another kind. It may be, too, that their malevolent design to entrap our Lord was appealed to by him, and was no slight cause of their confusion, if they wished to found a charge which might affect his life. Their intended murder was worse than the woman's adultery; especially if, as there is reason to believe, the woman had suffered some violence. See STROIXO.

Adum'mim (Heb. אֲדֻמִּיִּם, אֲדֻמִּיִּם, the red ones; Sept. Ἀδαμμίμ), a place on the border between Judah and Benjamin [see TRIBE], and apparently an ascending road between Gilgal (and also Jericho) and Jerusalem, "on the south side of the 'torrent'" (Josh. xv, 7; xviii, 17), which is the position still occupied by the road leading up from Jericho and the Jordan valley to Jerusalem (Robinson, Researches, ii, 288), on the south face of the gorge of the Wady Kelt. See MAALEH-ADUMMIM. Most commentators take the name to mean the place of blood (Heb. דָּם, and follow Jerome, who finds the place in the dangerous or mountainous part of the road between Jerusalem and Jericho (in his time called corruptly Maledomin; in Greek, Ἀναβα; in Latin, Ascensus rufforum sive robentium), and supposes that it was so called from the frequent effusion of blood by the robbers, by whom it was much infested. Others (see Keil, Comment. p. 365) attribute the name to the color of the rocks; these, however, are of white limestone. It is probably of a date and significance far more remote, and is rather derived from some tribe of "red men" [see EBOM] of the earliest inhabitants of the country (see Stanley, Palrest. p. 416 note), doubtless themselves banditti likewise. The character of the road was so notorious, that Christ lays the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke x) upon it; and Jerome informs us that Adummin or Adommim was believed to be the place where the traveller (taken as a real person) "fell among thieves." He adds that it was formerly a village, but at that time in ruins, and that a fort and garrison was maintained here for the safeguard of travellers (Onomast. s. v. Adommim, and in Epist. Paula). The travellers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries noticed the ruins of a castle, and supposed it the same as that mentioned by Jerome (Zualart, iv, 30); but the judicious Nau (Voyage Nouveau de la Terre-Sainte, p. 349) perceived that this castle belonged to the time of the Crusades. Not far from this spot was a khan, called the "Samaritan's khan" (le Khan du Samaritain), in the belief that it was the "inn" to which the Samaritan brought the wounded traveller. The travellers of the present century mention the spot and neighborhood nearly in the same terms as those of older date; and describe the ruins as those of "a convent and a khan" (Hardy, 193). They all represent the road as still infested by robbers, from whom some of them (as Sir F. Henniker) have not escaped without danger. The place thus indicated is about eight miles from Jerusalem, and four from Jericho. Dr. Robinson probably means the same by the ruined Khan Hudhrur (or another a little south of it) on the way between Jerusalem and Jericho (Researches, ii, 122); and Schwarz speaks of seeing "a very high, rocky hill composed entirely of pyrites, called by the Arabs Tell Adam, six English miles E.N.E. of Jerusalem" (Palest. p. 95), apparently the ruined locality, Kulat ed-Dem, observed by Schultz (Ritter, Erdk. xv, 493) about half way on the descent to Jericho (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 282, and Map).—Kitto, s. v.

Advent (Lat. advēntus, sc. Redemptoris), signifies the coming of our Saviour. The name is applied to the season (four weeks in the Roman, Lutheran, and English Churches, six weeks in the Greek Church) preceding Christmas. The origin of this festival as a Church ordinance is not clear. The first notice of it as such is found in the synod of Lerida (A.D. 524), at which marriages were interdicted from the beginning of Advent until Christmas. Cæsarius of Arles (A.D. 542) has two sermons on Advent, fully implying its ecclesiastical celebration at that time. The four Sundays of Advent, as observed in the Romish Church and the Church of England, were probably introduced into the calendar by Gregory the Great. It was common from an early period to speak of the coming of Christ as fourfold: his "first coming in the flesh," his coming at the hour of death to receive his faithful followers (according to the expressions used by St. John), his coming at the fall of Jerusalem (Matt. xxiv, 30), and at the day of judgment. According to this fourfold view of the Advent, the "gospels" were chosen for the four Sundays, as was settled in the Western Church by the Homiliarium of Charlemagne. The festival of Advent is intended to accord in spirit with the object celebrated. As mankind were once called upon to prepare themselves for the personal coming of Christ, so, according to the idea that the ecclesiastical year should represent the life of the founder of the Church, Christians are exhorted during this festival to look for a spiritual advent of Christ. The time of the year, when the shortening days are hastening toward the solstice—which almost coincides with the festival of the Nativity—is thought to harmonize with the strain of sentiment proper during Advent. In opposition, possibly, to heathen festivals, observed by ancient Romans and Germans, which took place at the same season, the Roman Church ordained that the four weeks of Advent should be kept as a time of penitence, according to the words of Christ, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." During these weeks, therefore, public amusements, marriage festivities, and dancing are prohibited, fasts are appointed, and sombre garments used in religious ceremonies. The Protestant Church in Germany abstains from public recreations and celebrations of marriage during Advent, but fasting is not enjoined. The Church of England and Protestant Episcopal Church observe Advent, but do not prescribe fasts. Advent begins on the first Sunday after November 26, i. e. the Sunday nearest St. Andrew's Day. In the sixth century, the Eastern and Western Churches (following the Nestorians) made Advent the beginning of the Church year instead of Easter. (See Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xxi, ch. ii, § 4; Procter, On Common Prayer, p. 268.) See CHRISTMAS.

ADVENT, SECOND. See MILLENNIUM.

Adventists, the name of a recent sect of Millenarians, which owes its origin to William Miller, from whom they are frequently called Millerites. About 1833 Miller began to teach that the "Second Advent" of the Lord would occur in 1843. He soon found disciples; among whom was Joseph V. Himes, a member of the "Disciples of Christ" (q. v.), who had a great deal of energy and proselyting spirit. He commenced a journal called The Signs of the Times, and, later, the Advent Herald, to disseminate the doctrines of the sect. Multitudes of people, chiefly of the ignorant, became believers; and, at the time appointed, it is said that thousands were out all night, waiting, in anxiety, for "the coming of the Lord," according to the prediction of the leaders of the sect. They were disappointed, of course, but many still gave credit to new predictions, fixing the time at new periods. As these successive times arrived, the predictions still failed, and many of the believers fell off. There is still in existence, however, a sect bearing the name Adventists, who look for the "coming of the Lord," but who do not fix dates as definitely as Messrs. Miller and Himes used to do. A large camp-meeting of Adventists has for many years been annually held at Wilbraham.

As to doctrine, they differ from the Evangelical Churches generally only in their peculiar belief in the personal coming of Christ, and his bodily reign with the saints on the earth. They have no regular creed or form of discipline. It is a common belief among the Adventists that the wicked will be annihilated. Their numbers are estimated at 20,000. See MILLENNARIANS.—American Christian Record, p. 21.

Adversary, in Heb. properly שָׂטָן, satan' (i. e. Satan, as it signifies, when with the article), an opponent, e. g. in war, a foe (1 Kings v, 18; xi, 14; xxiii, 25; 1 Sam. xxix, 4), in the forum, a plaintiff (Psa. cix, 6; comp. Zech. iii, 1, 2), or generally a resister (2 Sam. xix, 23), as one that blocks the way (Num. xxii, 23; comp. ver. 32). In Greek properly ἀντίδικος, one who speaks against us, e. g. in a suit, the complainant (Matt. v, 25; Luke xii, 50); or, generally, an enemy (Luke xviii, 3), specially, the Devil (1 Pet. v, 8). See ACCUSER.

Advocate (Παράκλητος, PARACLETE), one who pleads the cause of another; also one who exhorts, defends, comforts, prays for another. It is an appellation given to the Holy Spirit by Christ (John xiv, 16; xv, 26; xvi, 7) [see COMFORTER], and to Christ himself by an apostle (1 John ii, 1; see also Rom. viii, 34; Heb. vii, 25).

In the forensic sense, advocates or pleaders were not known to the Jews [see TRIAL] until they came under the dominion of the Romans, and were obliged to transact their law affairs after the Roman manner. Being then little conversant with the Roman laws and with the forms of the jurists, it was necessary for them, in pleading a cause before the Roman magistrates, to obtain the assistance of a Roman lawyer or advocate who was well versed in the Greek and Latin languages (Otti Spicil. Crim. p. 325). In all the Roman provinces such men were found who devoted their time and labor to the pleading of causes and the transacting of other legal business in the provincial courts (Lamprid. Vit. Alex. Scr. c. 44). It also appears (Cic. pro Cælio, c. 30) that many Roman youths who had devoted themselves to forensic business used to repair to the provinces with the consuls and prætors, in order, by managing the causes of the provincials, to fit themselves for more important ones at Rome. Such an advocate was Tertullus, whom the Jews employed to accuse Paul before Felix (Acts xxiv, 1); for although Πήτωρ, the term applied to him, signifies primarily an orator or speaker, yet it also denotes a pleader or advocate (Kuinoł, Comment., and Bloomfield, Recess Synopt. ad Act. xxiv, 2).—Ët-to, s. v. See ACCUSEE.

Advocate of the Church (Advocatus Ecclesie), the patron or defender of the rights of a church or monastery, was formerly called Patronus or Advocatus bonorum Ecclesie. Spelman distinguishes two sorts of advocates of churches: 1. The advocatus causarum, who was granted by the prince to defend the rights of the Church at law. He appeared in the secular courts as the representative of the bishop, but only in cases involving the temporalities of his church. In all personal causes, civil or criminal, the bishop was answerable to the ecclesiastical synod alone. 2. The advocatus soli, or advocate of the territory, which office was hereditary. These offices were first intrusted to canons, but afterward were held even by monarchs. The advocates set over single churches administered justice in secular affairs in the name of the bishops and abbots, and had jurisdiction over their whole dioceses. In case of necessity they defended the property of the clergy by force of arms. In the courts of justice they pleaded the cause of the churches with which they were connected. They superintended the collection of the tithes and other revenues of the Church, and enjoyed, on the part of the convents, many benefices and considerable revenues. After a time these advocates and their assistants becoming a burden to the clergy and the people under their charge, who began to suffer severely from their avarice, the churches began to get rid of them. Urban III labored to deliver the Church from these oppressors, but found, in 1186, the German prelates, in connection with the Emperor Frederick I, opposed to it. Under the Emperor Frederick II, however, most of the German churches succeeded in abolishing these offices by the grant of large sums of money and of various immunities. See Paullini, De Advocatis (Jen. 1686); Knorre, Kirchen-Vögte, in the Hall. Anzeig. 1750; Miller, De Advocatiis (Giesl. 1768); Gallade, De Advocatis (Heidelb. 1768); Wundt, De Advocatiis (ib. 1773). See WARDEN.

Advocatus Diaböli (Devil's Advocate), the person appointed at Rome to raise doubts against the genuineness of the miracles of a candidate for canonization (q. v.), to expose any want of formality in the investigation of the miracles, and to assail the general merits of the candidate, whose cause is sustained by an Advocatus Dei (God's Advocate). It is said that in the beginning of the seventeenth century the canonization of Cardinal Borromeo was almost prevented by the accusations of the devil's advocate.

Advowson (from advocatus), the right of patronage to a church or ecclesiastical benefice. He who has the advowson is called the patron, from his obligation to defend the rights of the church from oppression and violence. Advowsons are either, 1. Presentative, where the patron presents his clerk to the bishop or other ordinary to be instituted, and the bishop commands the archdeacon to induct him; 2. Collative, where the advowson lies in the ordinary, and within his jurisdiction, in which case no presentation is needed, but the ordinary collates or institutes the clerk and sends him to the proper officer to be inducted; 3. Donative, where the benefice is exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary, and visitable by the king only, or some other secular patron, who puts his clerk into possession by virtue of an instrument under his hand and seal, without institution, or induction, or examination by the ordinary. The greater part of the benefices in the Church of England are presentative. They are often put up for sale, much to the disgrace of the Church and the nation. See ENGLAND, CHURCH OF.

Adytum (from ἀδύτων, inaccessible), the shrine or inner room of a sacred building; hence applied in later times to the penetralia of the Temple at Jerusalem, which were accessible to the priests alone, especially the sanctuary, or "holy place," and still more to the "holy of holies," or inmost chamber. Ecclesiastical writers also employ it metaphorically to denote the recesses of the heart or spiritual nature, and sometimes to designate the deeper mysteries of divine truth. See AGON.

Ædi'as (Αἰθίας, for Elias), one of the "sons" of Ela, who divorced his Gentile wife (1 Esdr. ix, 27), evidently the ELIAN (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 26).

Ægidius, an eminent prelate, was born at Rome, A. D. 1247, of the illustrious race of Colonna, and carefully educated under Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura. He became an Augustinian Eremitic monk. Philip the Bold brought him to Paris to be tutor to his son. He afterward taught philosophy and theology for many years in the university of Paris with so great fame that he was styled doctor fundatissimus, theologorum princeps. He was a very voluminous writer, but many of his writings remain in MS. Among those published are: De Peccato Originali (printed at Oxford, 4to, 1479); Questiones Metaphysicæ (Venice, 1501); Lacubrationes de P. Lombardi Sententiis (Basil, 1623). In 1292 he was made general of his Augustinian order; in 1296 bishop of Bourges. In 1316 he died.—Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xiii, pt. ii, ch. ii, § 44.

Ælfric, archbishop of Canterbury, raised to that see in 996, was a laborious scholar, to whom we are indebted for much of our present knowledge of Anglo-Saxon literature. He wrote a Treatise of the Old and New Testaments in Saxon; also a Paschal Homily in Latin and Saxon; in the latter of which he declares himself against the papal doctrine of transubstantiation. Many of his works exist, it is said, in MS., and some few have been published, one in Saxon, viz. Tract. de V. et N. Testamento; and others in Latin, viz. the Paschal Homily. Also two letters, one to Wulfstan, bishop of Sherborne or Salisbury; the other to Wulfstan, archbishop of York, on the same subject, printed at London in 1566, 1623, and 1638. There is, moreover, in the Coll. of Councils (Wilkies, i, 250, and Labbe, ix, 1003), a letter of this archbishop to Wulfstan, containing a sort of ritual for priests.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 980.—London, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Ælfric, partly contemporary with the last, and with him, apparently, educated by Ethelwold, who was at the time abbot of Abingdon. On the removal of Ethelwold to the see of Winchester, in 963, Ælfric succeeded him at Abingdon. He died in 1005, and was buried at Abingdon. By many he is believed to have been the same with the last-mentioned Ælfric, and the question is involved in extreme obscurity; it is most probable, however, that they were different persons. The reader will find much in elucidation in Cave (anno 980).—London, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Æneas (Αἰνέας, a different form for the classical Ænéas), a paralytic of Lydda, cured by Peter (Acts ix, 33, 34), A.D. 32.

Ænéas, GAZÆUS, a sophist and disciple of Hierocles, converted to Christianity about the year 487. He testifies that he heard the African confessors, whose tongues Hunneric, the king of the Vandals, had caused to be cut out, speak. He wrote the Dialogue called Theophrastus, de Animarum Immortalitate et Corporis Resurrectione, which was printed at Basle, 1516; and has since appeared both in Greek and Latin, in different editions, with the version of Wolfius and the Notes of Gaspard Barthius. It is given in the Bibl. Max. Patr. viii, 649; also in Galland, x, 627.—Cave, Hist. Litt. anno 487; Landon, Ecl. Dict. s. v.

Ænéas, bishop of Paris (843-877). About the year 863, taking part in the controversy with Photius, he wrote a treatise entitled Liber adversus Objectiones Græcorum, which is given by D'Achery, Spicil. i, 113.—Cave, Hist. Litt. anno 859; Dupin, Ecl. Script. c. ix; Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 567.

Ænon (Αἰνών, from Chald. ܐܢܘܢ, Enarav', fountains; Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 1601), the name of a place near Salim, where John baptized (John iii, 23); the reason given, "because there was much water (ἕκαρα πολλά, many waters) there," would suggest that he baptized at the springs from which the place took its name. Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) places it eight Roman miles south of Scythopolis (Bethshean), and fifty-three north-east of Jerusalem; and it was evidently (comp. John iii, 26 with i, 28) on the west side of the Jordan (contrary to Kuinöl and Lampe in loc.; after Zorn, De Ænone, in his Opusc. ii, 71-94; also in Ugolini Thesaur. vii), but not necessarily in Judæa (as Wieseler, Chronol. Synop. p. 248). See the curious speculations of Lightfoot (Cent. Chorog. 1, 2, 3, 4). Dr. Robinson's most careful search, on his second visit (new ed. of Reserches, iii, 353), failed to discover any trace of either name or remains in the locality indicated by Eusebius; but a Salim has been found by him to the east of and close to Nablus, where there are two very copious springs (ib. ii, 279; iii, 298). This position agrees with the requirements of Gen. xxxiii, 18. See SHALEM. In favor of its distance from the Jordan is the consideration that, if close by the river, the evangelist would hardly have drawn attention to the "much water" there. Dr. Barclay is disposed to locate Ænon at Wady Farah, a secluded valley about five miles to the N.E. of Jerusalem, running into the great Wady Focar immediately above Jericho; but the only grounds for this identification are the copious springs and pools with which W. Farah abounds, and also the presence of the name Solan or Selwin, the appellation of another valley close by (City of the Great King, p. 558-570).—Smith. See SALIM.

Æon (αἰών, an age), originally, the life or duration of any person or thing. In the system of Gnosticism we find the term used to signify spiritual beings who emanated from the Deity, and who presided over the various periods of the history of the world. See GNOSTICS.

Æpinus, JOHANNES, originally named Hoch, was born in 1499, in the province of Brandenburg, and studied at Wittenberg, where he imbibed the principles of the Reformers. In 1529 he was appointed pastor at Hamburg, and for many years he contributed to further the cause of the Reformation by preaching, writing, and travelling. He took part against Melancthon in the Adiaphoristic controversy (q. v.), but was very moderate and kind in his views and statements. He wrote a work de Purgatorio, and died 1553.—Adami, Vita Theol.

Æra, a series of years used for chronological purposes, dating from some well-known event. See EPOCH.

I. The ancient Jews made use of several æras in their computations: 1. From Gen. vii, 11, and viii, 13, it appears that they reckoned from the lives of the patriarchs, or other illustrious persons. 2. From their departure out of Egypt, and the first institution of their polity (Exod. xix, 1; Num. i, 1; xxxiii, 38; 1 Kings vi, 1). 3. Afterward, from the building of the temple (1 Kings ix, 10; 2 Chron. viii, 1), and from the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel. 4. From the commencement of the Babylonian captivity (Ezek. i, 1; xxxiii, 21; xl, 1), and, perhaps, also in their return, and the dedication of the second temple. In process of time they adopted, 5, the Æra of the Seleucide, which, in the books of Maccabees is called the Æra of the Greeks, and the Alexandrian Æra; it began from the year when Seleucus Nicanor attained the sovereign power; that is, about 312 years before the birth of Jesus Christ. This æra continued in general use among the Orientals, with the exception of the Mohammedans, who employed it, together with their own æra, from the flight of Mohammed. The Jews had no other epoch until A.D. 1040, when, being expelled from Asia by the caliphs, they began to date from the Creation, though still without entirely dropping the Æra of the Seleucide. 6. They were accustomed, also, to reckon their years from the years when their princes began to reign. Thus, in 1 Kings xv, 1; Isa. xxxvi, 1; and Jer. i, 2, 3, we have traces of their anciently computing according to the years of their kings; and, in later times (1 Macc. xiii, 42; xiv, 27), according to the years of the Asmonean princes. Of this mode of computation we have vestiges in Matt. ii, 1; Luke i, 5; and iii, 1. 7. Ever since the compilation of the Talmud, the Jews have reckoned their years from the creation of the world, which they fix at B.C. 3761. (See Reland, Antiq. Hebr.; Schulzii Compend. Arch. Hebr.; Jahn, Arch. Bibl.) See CHRONOLOGY.

II. The ancient Heathens used the following æras: 1. The Æra of the First Olympiad is placed in the year of the world 3228, and before the Vulgar Æra 776. 2. The taking of Troy by the Greeks, in the year of the world 2820, and before Christ 1884. 3. The voyage undertaken for the purpose of bringing away the golden fleece, in the year of the world 2700. 4. The foundation of Rome, in B.C. 753. 5. The Æra of Nalonnassar, in B.C. 747. 6. The Æra of Alexander the Great, or his last victory over Darius, B.C. 330. 7. The Julian Æra, from B.C. 45. 8. In a great part of India, the Æra of Sulwanah, from A.D. 78. 9. In the later Roman empire, the Æra of Diocletian, from A.D. 284. 10. Among the Mohammedans, the Hegira, from A.D. 622. 11. Among the modern Persians, the Æra of Yezdegerd, from A.D. 632. See AGE.

III. The Christians for a long time had no æra of their own, but followed those in common use in the several countries. 1. In the western part of the Roman empire the Consular Æra remained in use until the sixth century after Christ. Frequently, also, the years were counted from the accession of an emperor to the throne. 2. The Æra Diocletiana, beginning with the accession of Diocletian to the throne (284), came into use first, and became very common in Egypt. The Christians who used it gave to it the name Æra Martyrum, on account of the great number of those who suffered martyrdom under the reign of that emperor. It is still used by the Abyssinians and Copts. 3. In the days of Constantine the custom arose to count the years according to Indictions. A cycle of indiction is a period of fifteen years, and the first year of the first cycle is generally considered to correspond with the year 313 of the Christian Æra. This æra was very common in the Middle Ages. 4. The Æra Hispanica was in use in Spain from the 6th until the 14th century, when it gave way to the Dionysian Æra. It begins with the year 38 B.C., i.e. the year following the conquest of Spain by Augustus. 5. The Æra of the Seleucide, or Macedonian Æra, begins, according to the computation generally followed, with September 1, B.C. 312, the epoch of the first conquests of Seleucus Nicator in Syria. It is still used in the church year of the Syrian Christians. 6. The Æra of Antioch, which was adopted to commemorate the victory of Cæsar on the plains of Pharsalia, begins with Sept. 1, B.C. 49, according to the computation of the Greeks, but 11 months later according to that of the Syrians. It is followed by Evagrius in his Ecclesiastical History. 7. The Æra of the Armenians begins with the year A.D. 552, in which the Armenians, at the council of Tíben, separated from the main body of the Eastern Church by rejecting the council of Chalcedon. 8. The Æra of Constantinople, or Byzantine Æra, begins with the creation of the world, which it fixes 5508 years before the Christian or Vulgar Æra. It is still in use among the Albanians, Servians, and modern Greeks. 9. The most common æra among Christians is the Dionysian Æra (Æra Dionysiana), so called after Dionysius Exiguus (q. v.), who proposed it in the sixth century. It counts the years from the birth, or rather the conception of Christ, designating the January of the year in the December of which Christ was born, as the January of the first year post Christum. Christ, according to this calculation, was born at the close of the first year "post incarnationem" (i. e. the conception). As the first year post Christum, Dionysius assumes the year 754 from the foundation of Rome, an opinion which has long ago been shown to be incorrect. See NATIVITY. The Dionysian Æra was adopted in Rome as early as the middle of the 6th century. The first public transaction which was dated according to it is the Concilium German. a. 742; and the first sovereign who used it is Charlemagne. In the 11th century it was adopted by the popes, since which time its use in the Western Church has been universal.

Ærè, a city noted in the Antonine Itinerary on the way from Damascus to Scythopolis (Bethshean); identified, from an inscription found in its extensive ruins, with the Sammaim of Abulfeda (Tabula Syriæ, ed. Kochler, p. 97), now Sonoucin, a large Moslem village in the district of Jedar (Ritter, Erdk. xv, 812-817). See ASHTEROTH-KARNAÏM.

Ærians, a sect which arose about the middle of the fourth century, being the followers of Ærius (who must be distinguished from Arius and Actius), a monk and a presbyter of Sebastia, in Pontus. He is charged by Epiphanius with being an Arian, or Semi-Arian, without just ground. The real cause, perhaps, of the accusation against him was his attempt to reform the Church, by maintaining that a presbyter or elder differs not in order and degree from a bishop; and by rejecting prayers for the dead, with certain fasts and festivals then superstitiously observed. Epiphanius attributes the zeal of Ærius to his being disappointed of the bishopric of Sebaste, which was conferred on his friend Eustathius; but the statements of Epiphanius are evidently colored by his personal prejudice against Ærius. His followers were driven from the churches, and out of all the towns and villages, and were obliged to assemble in the woods, caverns, and open defiles. The sect was still in existence at the time of Augustine.—Epiphanius, Adv. Hæres. lvi; Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 342, 343; Bingham, b. xv, ch. 3; Lardner, Works, iv, 179; Walch, Hist. d. Ketzer. iii, 321.

Ætians, a branch of Arians, named from Actius of Antioch, one of the most zealous defenders of Arianism, who, after being servant to a grammarian, of whom he learned grammar and logic, was ordained deacon, and at last bishop, by Eudoxus, patriarch of Constantinople (about A.D. 356). He wrote about 300 theological treatises, one of which has been preserved by Epiphanius, who reports that he held that the Son was of a nature inferior to the Father (κρετόνος, και ἕξ οὐκ ἄνωτον, and ἀνόμοτος τῷ πατρὶ και ἑτεροόσιος); that the Holy Spirit was but a creature, made by the Father and the Son before all other creatures. Socrates (Ch. Hist. ii, 35) says that, though his "doctrines were similar to those of the Arians, yet, from the abstruseness of his arguments, which they could not comprehend, they pronounced him a heretic." He was said to be well versed in the Aristotelian logic. His doctrine and his disciples were condemned by the Council of Seleucia, A.D. 359.—Sozomen, Ch. Hist. iii, 14; Theodoret, ii, 24; Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 399, 409; Cave, Hist. Lit. æno 359; Lardner, Works, iii, 584; Walch, Hist. d. Ketzerien, ii, 660. See ANOMŒANS.

Affection, in a philosophical sense, refers to the manner in which we are affected by any thing for a continuance, whether painful or pleasant; but in the most common sense it may be defined to be a settled bent of mind toward a particular being or thing. It holds a middle place between disposition on the one hand and passion on the other. It is distinguishable from disposition, which, being a branch of one's nature originally, must exist before there can be any opportunity to exert it upon any particular object; whereas affection can never be original, because, having a special relation to a particular object, it cannot exist till the object has once at least been presented. It is also distinguishable from passion, which, depending on the real or ideal presence of its object, vanishes with its object; whereas affection is a lasting connection, and, like other connections, subsists even when we do not think of the object. See DISPOSITION and PASSION.

The affections, as they respect religion, may be defined to be the "vigorous and sensible exercises of the inclination and will of the soul toward religious objects." Whatever extremes Stoics or enthusiasts have run into, it is evident that the exercise of the affections is essential to the existence of true religion. It is true, indeed, "that all affectionate devotion is not wise and rational; but it is no less true that all wise and rational devotion must be affectionate." The affections are the springs of action; they belong to our nature, so that, with the highest perceptions of truth and religion, we should be inactive without them. They have considerable influence on men in the common concerns of life; how much more, then, should they operate in those important objects that relate to the Divine Being, the immortality of the soul, and the happiness or misery of a future state! The religion of the most eminent saints has always consisted in the exercise of holy affections. Jesus Christ himself affords us an example of the most lively and vigorous affections; and we have every reason to believe that the employment of heaven consists in the exercise of them. In addition to all which, the Scriptures of truth teach us that religion is nothing if it occupy not the affections (Deut. vi, 4, 5; xxx, 6; Rom. xii, 11; 1 Cor. xiii, 13; Psa. xxvii, 14).

A distinction, however, must be made between what may be merely natural and what is truly spiritual. The affections may be excited in a natural way under ordinances by a natural impression (Ezek. xxxiii, 32), by a natural sympathy, or by the natural temperament of our constitution. It is no sign that our affections are spiritual because they are raised very high, produce great effects on the body, excite us to be very zealous in externals, to be always conversing about ourselves, etc. These things are often found in those who are mere professors of religion (Matt. vii, 21, 22).

Now, in order to ascertain whether our affections are excited in a spiritual manner, we must inquire whether that which moves our affections be truly spiritual; whether our consciences be alarmed, and our hearts impressed; whether the judgment be enlightened, and we have a perception of the moral excellency of divine things; and, lastly, whether our affections have a holy tendency, and produce the happy effects of obedience to God, humility in ourselves, and justice to our fellow-creatures. Consult Lord Kaimes' Elements of Criticism, ii, 517; Edwards' On the Affections; Pike and Hayward's Cases of Conscience; Watts' Use and Abuse of the Passions; M'Laurin's Essays, § 5 and 6, where this subject is ably handled; Jeremy Taylor's Works, ii, 114, 164; Buck.

Affendofulo, CALER, a Jewish rabbi, who flourished at Adrianople, Belgrade, and Constantinople in the present century. The name Affendofulo is a compound of the Turkish effendi and the Greek παιδαγωγος (son). He wrote a commentary (אֲפֵנְדוֹפּוּלוֹ הַבְּנֵי הַבְּנֵי) on the Song of Solomon and Psalm cxvi, with introductions and epilogues to each section, having reference to the divergence of the Karaites from the Rabbins (Vienna, 1830, 4to), besides two other works of a polemical character.—See Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaica, i, 20, 21.

Affinity (designated in Hebrew by some form of the verb אָחַז, chathan, 'to give in marriage') is relationship by marriage, as distinguished from consanguinity, which is relationship by blood.

1. Marriages between persons thus related, in various degrees, which previous usage, in different conditions of society, had allowed, were forbidden by the law of Moses. These degrees are enumerated in Lev. xviii, 7 sq. The examples before the law are those of Cain and Abel, who, as the necessity of the case required, married their own sisters. Abraham married Sarah, the daughter of his father by another wife; and Jacob married the two sisters Leah and Rachel. In the first instance, and even in the second, there was an obvious consanguinity, and only the last offered a previous relationship of affinity merely. So also, in the prohibition of the law, a consanguinity can be traced in what are usually set down as degrees of affinity merely. The degrees of real affinity interdicted are, that a man shall not (nor a woman in the corresponding relations) marry, (1), his father's widow (not his own mother); (2), the daughter of his father's wife by another husband; (3), the widow of his paternal uncle; (4), nor his brother's widow if he has left children by her; but, if not, he was bound to marry her to raise up children to his deceased brother. See LEVITATE LAW. The other restrictions are connected with the condition of polygamy, and they prohibit a man from having, (1), a mother and her daughter for wives at the same time, (2), or two sisters for wives at the same time. These prohibitions, although founded in Oriental notions, adapted to a particular condition of society, and connected with the peculiarities of the Levitical marriage law, have been imported wholesale into our canon law. The fitness of this is doubted by many; but as, apart from any moral or sanitary questions, the prohibited marriages are such as few would, in the present condition of Occidental society, desire to contract, and such as would be deemed repugnant to good taste and correct manners, there is little real matter of regret in this adoption of the Levitical law. Indeed the objections have arisen chiefly from a misunderstanding of the last of the above prohibitions, which, under permitted polygamy, forbade a man to have two sisters at once—an injunction which has been construed under the Christian law, which allows but one wife, to apply equally to the case of a man marrying the sister of a deceased wife. The law itself is rendered in our version, "Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, to vex her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other in her lifetime" (Lev. xviii, 18). Clear as this seems, it is still clearer if, with Gesenius and others, we take the word אֲחֵי, tsarav, rendered to vex, to mean to rival, as in the Sept., Arabic, and Vulgate. The Targum of Jonathan, the Mishna, and the celebrated Jewish commentators Jarchi and Ben Gerson, are satisfied that two sisters at once are intended; and there seems an obvious design to prevent the occurrence of such unseemly jealousies and contentions between sister-wives as embittered the life of the patriarch Jacob. The more recondite sense has been extracted, with rather ungentle violence to the principles of Hebrew construction, by making "vex her" the antecedent of "in her lifetime," instead of "take her sister to her, in her lifetime." Under this view it is explained that the married sister should not be "vexed" in her lifetime by the prospect that her sister might succeed her. It may be safely said that such an idea would never have occurred in the East, where unmarried sisters are far more rarely than in Europe brought into such acquaintance with the husband of the married sister as to give occasion for such "vexation" or "rivalry" as this. Yet this view of the matter, which is completely exploded among sound Biblical critics, has received the sanction of several Christian councils (Concil. Illiber. can. 61; Aurac. can. 17; Auzer. can. 30), and is perhaps not calculated to do much harm, except under peculiar circumstances, and except as it may prove a snare to some sincere but weak consciences. It may be remarked that, in those codes of law which most resemble that of Moses on the general subject, no prohibition of the marriage of two sisters in succession can be found. (See Westhead, Marriage Code of Israel, Lond. 1850; Critici Sac. Theol. Nor. i, 379.)—KITTO, s. v. See MARRIAGE.

2. The substance of the Levitical law is adopted in England, and may be found in the "table of degrees" within which persons may not marry, which was set forth by Archbishop Parker in 1563, and was confirmed by can. cxix of the synod of London, 1604. See INCEST.

3. According to the Roman canon law, affinity arises from marriage or from an unlawful intercourse between the one party and the blood relations of the other party; but in either case it is necessary that copula sit completa (S. Thomas, 4to, dist. 41, qu. 1, art. 1). Persons related to each other may contract affinity, as the husband with the relations of his wife, without the relations of the parties becoming bound together by any affinity; e. g. two brothers may marry two sisters, a father and his son may marry a mother and her daughter. The impediment of affinity, arising from marriage consummated, extends canonically, as in natural relationship, to the fourth degree inclusive. The impediment of affinity arising ex coitu illicito only extends to the second degree (Conc. Trid. sess. 21, de reform. cap. 4). It is ruled in the Latin Church that the pope cannot dispense in the first degree of affinity in the direct line, but he can in the indirect; thus he can grant a dispensation to a man to marry his brother's widow. See CONSANGUINITY.

Affirmative (Gr. ἀσβεβαίωμα, ἐπίσχυριζωμα, etc.). Among the Jews the formula of assent or affirmation was אָמַן אָמַן אָמַן, av' irac, thou hast said, or thou hast rightly said. It is stated by Aryda and others that this is the prevailing mode in which a person expresses his assent, at this day, in Lebanon, especially when he does not wish to assert any thing in express terms. This explains the answer of our Saviour to the high-priest Caiaphas (Matt. xxvi, 64), when he was asked whether he was the Christ, the son of God (see also Matt. xxvi, 25, and comp. John xviii, 37). Instances occur in the Talmud; thus, "A certain man was asked, 'Is Rabbi dead?' He answered, 'Ye have said:' on which they rent their clothes"—taking it for granted from this answer that it was so (Jerusalem Talmud, Kidain, xxxii, 2).—All readers even of translations are familiar with a frequent elegance of the Scriptures, or rather of the Hebrew language, in using an affirmative and negative together, by which the sense is rendered more emphatic: sometimes the negative first, as Psa. cxviii, 17, "I shall not die, but live," etc.; sometimes the affirmative first, as Isa. xxxviii, 1, "Thou shalt die, and not live." In John i, 20, there is a remarkable instance of emphasis produced by a negative being placed between two affirmatives, "And he confessed, and denied not, but confessed, I am not the Christ."—Kitto. See OATH.

Affre, DENIS AUGUSTE, archbishop of Paris, was born at St. Romé du Tarn, 1793. He became in 1811 professor of philosophy at Nantes; and, after having been, in 1816, ordained priest, in 1818 was made professor of theology at the seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris; in 1821, vicar-general of the diocese of Luçon; in 1823, vicar-general at Amiens; in 1834, canon and honorary vicar-general of Paris. In 1839 he was appointed coadjutor of the bishop of Strasburg, but, before entering upon his episcopal duties at Strasburg, he was, after the death of Archbishop Quelen, of Paris, appointed one of the three vicars capitular of the diocese, and in 1840 appointed by Louis Philippe archbishop of Paris. He had several conflicts with the government of Louis Philippe, especially upon the emancipation of the Church and school from the state. During the insurrection of 1848, he climbed upon a barricade in the Place de la Bastille, carrying a green bough in his hand, as a messenger of peace, and wished to persuade the insurgents to lay down their arms. He had scarcely uttered a few words when the insurgents and the troops commenced firing again, and he fell, mortally wounded by a musket ball, coming apparently from a window above. He was carried by the insurgents into the house of a priest, and the next day was removed to his palace, where he died, June 27, 1848. On the 28th of June the National Assembly passed the following resolution: "The National Assembly considers it a duty to proclaim the sentiments of religious gratitude and of profound grief which all hearts have felt at the saintly and heroic death of the archbishop of Paris." His writings include Traité de l'administration des Paroisses (1827); Traité des écoles primaires (1826); Traité des appels comme d'abus; Suppément temporelle du Pape (1829, in the Gallican interest); Propriété des biens ecclésiastiques; Essai sur les Hiéroglyphes Egyptiens (1834, maintaining the insufficiency of the system of Champollion to explain the hieroglyphics); Introduction Philosophique à l'Étude du Christianisme. See Biographies of Archbishop Affre by Henry de Riancy, and Abbé Cruice (subsequently bishop of Marseilles).

Afghanistan, a country of Asia. Its area is estimated at 225,000 square miles, and its population at about 4,000,000, most of whom are Mohammedans, belonging partly to the Soonite and partly to the Shiite sect. Hindoos, Christians, and Jews are tolerated. There are besides two Indian sects, which have adherents in India, the Sufis, who hold pantheistic views, and the Mullah Fukkis, who are freethinkers. The clergy (Mullah) are, at the same time, also teachers. Schools, in which reading and the Mohammedan religion are taught, are found in almost every village. The Presbyterian Mission in Northern India has directed its attention also to the neighboring Afghans, and established, in 1856, the first mission among them. Their missionary, the Rev. Isidor Löwenthal (q. v.), took up his residence at Peshawur, and entered at once with ardor upon his work. Having acquired the difficult language of the Afghans, the Pushtoo, he translated and published in it the New Testament. The first native convert was baptized by him in 1859.—Pierer; News of the Churches, 1859. See ASIA.

Afra, martyr of Augusta Vindelicorum (Augsburg), is reported to have been originally a common prostitute, but Rettberg (Kircheng. Deutschlands, i, 144) denies it. When the persecution in the time of Diocletian and Maximianus Heronius reached Augsburg, Afra was seized and carried before Gaius the judge, as a Christian; when Gaius could by no means prevail upon her to deny the faith, he condemned her to be burned alive, which sentence was speedily executed (the 7th of August, 304) upon her, continually, during her agony in the flames, glorifying and blessing God. Her festival is kept on the 5th of August.—Butler, Lives of Saints, iii, 327.

Africa, one of the four principal divisions of the globe, and the third in magnitude. The origin of its name is uncertain. Its general form is triangular, the northern part being the base, and the southern extremity the vertex. Its length may be reckoned about 70 degrees of latitude, or 4990 miles; and its greatest breadth something more than 4090 miles. Until the late researches of Livingstone and Barth, its interior was almost unknown.

Only very rough estimates can be made of the population of Africa. They vary from 60,000,000 to 200,000,000 and more. Most of the recent discoveries indicate, however, the existence of a dense population in the interior of Africa, and favor the highest estimates of the aggregate population. The natives are partly negroes, comprising the negroes proper, the Caffres, Betchuanas, Foolaas, Fellatas, Hottentots, Bushmen, etc.; partly Caucasians, among whom belong the Copts, Moors, Barbarians, Arabs, Abyssinians, Nubians, etc. Malays are to be found in Madagascar, and numerous Europeans have settled in the European colonies.

Until the beginning of the present century a very large portion of Africa was yet entirely unknown to the civilized world. The Arabs, who had extended their rule in Africa in the 7th century, conquered the whole of the northern coast, and became acquainted with the western coast as far as the Senegal, and the eastern coast nearly as far as the Cape of Good Hope. For a better knowledge of the western coast we are indebted to the Portuguese, who, after the expulsion of the Moors from their country, pursued them to Africa, and gradually advanced southward on the western coast. Steadily pushing forward, they circumnavigated, in 1497, under Vasco de Gama, the Cape of Good Hope, and soon after explored the south-eastern shore. The Portuguese were soon followed by English travellers (since 1550), who considerably contributed to a better knowledge of the entire coast. But the interior still remained an unknown land; and even the bold travellers who were sent out by the African Society of London (established in 1788) could not overcome the immense obstacles, and many of them, as Ledyard, Lucas, Houghton, Mungo Park, Horneemann, and Röntgen, lost their lives.

Since the beginning of the present century the explorations into the interior of Africa have grown rapidly in number and in importance. The progress of the French rule in Algeria and in Senegambia, the increased prosperity of the English colonies, the success of the numerous missionary societies, many of whose missionaries, as Livingstone, Moffat, Knoblecher, Kraff, and Isenberg, belong among the chief explorers of the interior, the construction of the Suez Canal, and the efforts made by European governments and the Geographical Societies of London, Paris, Berlin, etc., have given a wonderful impulse to the exploration of the interior. Important discoveries have quickly succeeded each other; and quite recently (1862) even the great problem of many centuries, the discovery of the sources of the Nile, has been successfully solved by Captains Grant and Speke. All these discoveries and explorations have an important bearing upon the prospects of Christianity, for they give us a better knowledge of the religious views of the natives, of their habits and their languages, and thus teach the missionaries and the missionary societies what they have to overcome.

The political divisions of Africa are much more numerous than those of any other of the grand divisions of the earth's surface. On the north we have the empire of Morocco, the French province of Algeria, the pashaliks of Tunis, Tripoli, and Barca, and the oasis of Fezzan, dependencies of the Turkish empire; Egypt, a vice-royalty of the Turkish empire, though in a state of quasi independency. On the east, Nubia and Kordofan, dependencies of Egypt; the empire of Abyssinia, which has been recently enlarged by the subjection of a number of savage tribes; the countries bordering on the Gulf of Aden and the Indian Ocean, and stretching south-westward for more than 1000 miles. The names of the principal countries are Adel, Ajan, Berbera, Zanguebar, and Mozambique, the coast of which is held by the Portuguese. East of Mozambique is the populous island of Madagascar. In South Africa Great Britain has several important colonies. Cape Colony is the oldest of these, and occupies the southern portion of the continent; above it, on the south-east, are Caffraria, Natal, and the Zulu country; west of these, and separated from them by the Kalamba Mountains, are the Orange River and Transvaal republics, composed mostly of Dutch settlers and their Hottentot or Bechuana dependants. On the west coast, north of the Orange River, and extending about 300 miles into the interior, is the Hottentot country; and lying between this and the Transvaal republics is the land of the Bechuanas. North of the Hottentot country is Lower Guinea, a country composed of numerous chieftaincies and some Portuguese colonies. Among the best known of these chieftaincies are Angola, Congo, and Loango. Between this and the eastern coast lies a vast tract, varying in width from ten to twenty-eight degrees of longitude, and extending from nearly ten degrees above to sixteen degrees below the equator, almost wholly unexplored by Europeans. Upper Guinea, long known as the slave coast, is occupied by several native states, the largest being the kingdom of Dahomey. North of these is that region known formerly as Soudan and Nigritia, composed of numerous and constantly changing states (Bornou, Timbuctoo, etc.), part of them Mohammedan, and part pagan. Turning again northward, we find the republic of Liberia and the British colony of Sierra Leone, both settled in great part by free negroes. Lying between this and the Great Desert is the country of Senegambia; the larger portion has already become a dependency of France. England has a settlement, Bathurst, at the mouth of the Gambia. The Great Desert, which extends eastward from this country to the confines of Egypt and Nubia, is inhabited by tribes of Arab, or half Arab origin.

1. Biblical Notices.—Africa was peopled principally by Ham, or his descendants; hence it is called the "land of Ham" in several of the Psalms. See HAM. Mizraim peopled Egypt (Gen. x, 6, 13, 14), and the Pathrusim, the Naphtuhim, the Casluhim, and the Ludim, peopled other parts; but the situations they occupied are not now known distinctly. It is thought that many of the Canaanites, when expelled by Joshua, retired into Africa; and the Mohammedans believe that the Amalekites, who dwelt in ancient times in the neighborhood of Mecca, were forced from thence by the kings descended from Zioram.—Pococke, Spec. Hist. Arab. See CANAANITE.

The necessary information relative to those places in Africa which are spoken of in Scripture will be found under their respective names, ABYSSINIA, ALEXANDRIA, EGYPT, ETHIOPIA, LIBYA, CYRENE, etc.

II. Early Christian Church in Africa.—The continent of Africa, in the ancient Church, contained: 1. The Exarchate of Africa Proper. This contained, in Africa Proconsularis, fourteen dioceses; in Numidia, fifteen; in Mauritania, eighteen; in Tripoli, five. A list of these is given, from the Notitia of Leo, by Bingham (Orig. Eccles. bk. ix, ch. vii; see also ch. ii, § 5).

2. The Patriarchate of Alexandria, called also the Egyptian Patriarchate. It comprehended Libya, Pen-tapolis, Egypt, from Tripolis to the Red Sea, and Abyssinia, and contained more than a hundred Episcopal sees. Thus the whole of the north of Africa was, in the early ages, Christian. In the fifth century the Vandals, who were Arians, founded an empire there. The worst enemies, however, of the Church in Africa were the Saracens, or Oriental Arabs, who, in the seventh and eighth centuries, overran the country, and almost entirely extinguished the light of Christianity. The ancient sees which still remain are filled by Coptic prelates [see COPTS], the chief of whom is the patriarch of Alexandria, and dependent upon him is the abuna, or patriarch of the Abyssinians. Of the ancient sees, although the names are known to us, the situation is entirely lost, owing to the change wrought in the names of places by the Arabs. Little, then, can be said of the geography, and as little of the chronology, of these bishoprics; for, as to the former, all that we know is the provinces in which they were situated; as to the latter, we have no proofs of the most ancient before the third century, and of very few later than the seventh.—Bingham, Orig. Ecc. ix, 7. See ABYSSINIA; ALEXANDRIA; ETHIOPIA; CARTHAGE.

III. The Roman Catholic Church.—The circumnavigation of Africa in the fifteenth century led to conquests of the Portuguese and Spaniards, and, in connection with them, to the establishment of Roman Catholic missions. In Western Africa the population of several entire kingdoms [see ANGOLA; CONGO], and of a large number of islands, became, at least nominally, connected with the Roman Church. In Eastern Africa, Mozambique and the islands Bourbon and Mauritius were the principal missionary fields. In Northern Africa several bishoprics were established in the Spanish possessions. The establishment of the French dominion in several parts of Western and Northern Africa, especially in Algeria, likewise enlarged greatly the territory of the Roman Catholic Church and improved its prospects. Also in the English possessions a considerable Roman Catholic population gradually gathered, especially among the Irish immigrants. Great efforts were also made by the Roman missionaries to effect a union of the Copts and Abyssinians with their Church, but without much permanent success. See COPTS; ABYSSINIA. Repeatedly Roman missionaries penetrated farther into the interior, but no great results have as yet been obtained. In 1859 there was, outside of the possessions of Christian nations and of Tunis, Tripolis, and Egypt, only one vicariate apostolic for the Gallas.

IV. The Protestant Missions.—Protestantism got a firm footing in Africa after the beginning of the seventeenth century, in the possessions of the Dutch, English, and Danes. The foundation of another Protestant state was laid in 1823 by the establishment of the negro republic Liberia, whose growth and prospective influence is entirely under the control of Protestant Christianity. See LIBERIA. Missionary operations among the natives were commenced in South Africa, in 1737, by the Moravians. Their early operations, however, were greatly embarrassed by the Dutch colonial government, and, for fifty years (1744 to 1792), entirely interrupted. During all this time nothing was done for the conversion of the pagans. The London Missionary Society established its first mission in 1795, the Wesleyan Missionary Society in 1814. In 1820 a mission was established by the Glasgow Missionary Society, a union of members of the Established Church of Scotland and Dissenters. In 1838 this union was dissolved, the members of the Established Church retaining the old name, and the Dissenters taking the name of the Glasgow African Missionary Society. After the division in the Church of Scotland in 1843, the Glasgow Missionary Society became merged in the foreign mission scheme of the Free Church of Scotland. The Glasgow African Missionary Society transferred its operations, in 1847, to the care of the United Presbyterian Church. The first missionaries of the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society came to Africa in 1822, and commenced, in 1830, their present mission among the Bechuanas. The American Board resolved in 1834 on a mission among the Zulus, which was commenced in 1835. The Rhemish Missionary Society sent to Africa, in 1829, four graduates of their Mission Seminary at Barmen. Most of the flourishing stations founded by it are within the limits of the territory of the Dutch Boers. The operations of the Berlin Society commenced in 1833; those of the Norwegian Missionary Society, near Port Natal, in 1853. In West Africa the first efforts to introduce the Gospel were singularly disastrous. Attempts made by the Moravians in 1736, and by several English societies since 1795, had soon to be relinquished as hopeless. A permanent settlement was effected by the Church Missionary Society in 1801, which has been very successful, and is still extending its operations on every side. A bishop for Sierra Leone was consecrated in 1852. The English Baptist Missionary Society established in 1841 a flourishing mission at the island of Fernando Po, but it was almost entirely suppressed in 1858 by a new Spanish governor. The missions of the Wesleyan Missionary Society of England commenced as early as 1796, but until 1811 there was only one missionary. They have since become the most flourishing among all the Protestant missions in West Africa. The missions of the American Baptist Missionary Union, in Liberia and among the Basas, commenced in 1821; those of the (American)

Presbyterian Board, in Liberia, in 1832; of the American Board, at Cape Palmas, in 1834; of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in Liberia, in 1833; of the Southern Baptist Convention of America, in Liberia and Yoruba, in 1853; of the American Missionary Association in the Sherbro country, in 1842; of the Basle Missionary Society, at the Gold Coast, in 1828; and of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, at Cape Palmas, in 1836. A new interest in the missions of Western Africa was awakened in England by the return of Dr. Livingstone, and an enlargement of the missionary operations resolved upon. In Eastern Africa, the island of Madagascar was visited in 1818 by missionaries of the London Missionary Society, and a large number of the natives were converted to Christianity. But the premature death of King Radama in 1828 put a stop to the progress of Christianity, and, in 1836, the mission schools were closed and the missionaries driven from the island. The persecution lasted until the death of Radama's widow, Ranavalona, and the accession to the throne of Radama II in 1861, under whom Christianity was again tolerated, and began to make new progress. The assassination of Radama in 1863 had no influence on the legal condition of the Christians, who, in 1864, were supposed to number about 7000. See MADAGASCAR. In Abyssinia, German missionaries of the Basle society have labored in behalf of Protestantism since 1830, without, however, achieving any permanent result. See ABYSSINIA. Egypt has some flourishing churches, schools, and benevolent institutions for the Protestant residents of foreign countries, and the United Presbyterians of America sustain there a prosperous mission. See EGYPT.

V. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The entire population of the Cape Verde, St. Thomas, and Prince's Islands (Portuguese), of the Spanish Presidios and Guinea Islands, and of the French island of Bourbon, belong to the Roman Catholic Church. The same is the case with a majority of the population of the English island of Mauritius and of the European population in Algeria. In Angola and Benguela the Portuguese claim dominion over 657,000, in Mozambique, over 300,000 subjects; but with the decline of the Portuguese power also, the connection of the natives with the Roman Church has to a great extent ceased. Angola had, in 1837, only 6 priests, Mozambique only 3. See also EGYPT and ABYSSINIA. The Roman Church had, in 1859, 5 bishops in the Portuguese possessions, 2 in the French, 1 in the English, 2 in the Spanish; and 12 vicariats apostolic, viz., 2 in Egypt (1 Latin and 1 Copt), 1 in Tunis, 1 in Abyssinia, 1 for the country of the Gallas, 2 for the Cape of Good Hope, 1 for the two Guineas, 1 for Sierra Leone, 1 for Madagascar, 1 for Natal. See ALGERIA.

The African missions of the Roman Church are mostly supported by the General Missionary Society for the Propagation of Faith. There are, besides, special missionary societies for Africa in France and Austria. The Church of England had, in 1864, the following dioceses: Capetown, Grahamstown, Sierra Leone, St. Helena, Natal, Zambesi, Orange River, Niger, the last three of which are outside of the British dominions. These bishoprics constitute the "Ecclesiastical Province of South Africa," with the Bishop of Capetown as metropolitan. The Wesleyan Methodists, in 1864, had 6 missionary districts (Cape of Good Hope, Grahamstown, Natal, Sierra Leone, Gambia, and the Gold Coast), 75 circuits, 204 chapels, 366 other preaching places, 95 missionaries and assistant missionaries, 17,955 members, 18,059 scholars in schools, and 76,485 attendants on public worship. The missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Western Africa are organized into an Annual Conference, which, in 1864, had 19 travelling preachers, 1351 members, 142 probationers, 36 local preachers, 98 native members, 20 schools, 1334 scholars, and 19 churches.

The statistics of the other missionary societies were given by the Journal of Missions, in 1859, as follows:

Other Christian denominations are found only in Egypt and Abyssinia (q. v.). Jews are numerous in all Northern Africa, especially in Morocco, where, before the persecution in 1859, they counted over 300,000 souls. Mohammedanism prevails in Egypt, Tunis, Tripolis, Algeria, Morocco, Fez, and also throughout Soudan. Dieterici estimated this part of the population at about 100 million souls. The rest are pagans. The following table, taken from Schen's Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859, presents the statistics of the Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Christian population in the various portions of Africa:

VI. Literature.—The religious aspects of the subject are treated in the following works: Sanchez, Hist. Eccles. Africane (Madrid, 1784); Morelli, Africa Christiana (Brescia, 1816, Götting, 1820); Münster, Primordia Eccles. Africane (Hafn, 1829); Löscher, De patrum Africanor. meritis (Rochlitz, 1712); Kellner, Nord-Afrika's Relig. in the Deutsches Magaz. v. 256 sq.; Von Gerlach, Gesch. d. Ausbrüt. d. Christenth. in Süd-Afrika (Berl. 1832). The most recent geographical information is contained in Livingstone's Travels in S. Africa (Lond. 1857, N. Y. 1858); Zambesi (Lond. and N. Y. 1865); Barth's Travels in N. and Cent. Africa (Lond. and N. Y. 1857-1859); Krapf's Trav. and Missions in Eastern Africa (Lond. and N. Y. 1860); Burton, *Lake Regions of Cent. African Methodist Episcopal Church, a body of Christians composed entirely of colored people in the United States and Canada.

I. History.—The early Methodists labored zealously for the welfare of the Africans, both slaves and free, in the United States. Multitudes of them became Methodists, and thousands are now in the fellowship of the Methodist Episcopal Church (q. v.), which, at its General Conference of 1864, organized two new conferences, consisting exclusively of colored members. In 1816, a number of these Methodists, believing that they could be freer and more useful in a separate communion, called a convention in Philadelphia, which, in April of that year, organized the "African Methodist Episcopal Church." The Rev. Richard Allen (q. v.) was elected first bishop, and was ordained by five presbyters. He served until his death in 1831. In 1828 the Rev. M. Brown was also elected bishop. In 1836 the Rev. E. Waters was ordained bishop. The growth of the Church has been steady, and many of its preachers have been men of ability. It had, in 1858, 8 conferences: Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Ohio, Indiana, New England, Missouri. In 1856 the Canada Conference was organized as a separate body. The civil war which broke out in the United States in 1861, and the gradual destruction of slavery, greatly enlarged the territory of this Church and added to its membership. In May, 1864, the Quadrennial General Conference of the Church was held at Philadelphia, simultaneously with the General Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church and of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. The General Conference was visited by a deputation from the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, to reciprocate this act of fraternal sentiment, appointed in its turn a committee, consisting of five members, to visit the latter body. A committee was also appointed to mature, with a similar committee appointed by the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, a plan of union of these two denominations, to be laid before the next General Conferences of both.

On June 14, 1864, twenty-five delegates of this Church met, with an equal number of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, at Philadelphia, to consider the terms upon which the two bodies could unite. The session of the joint convention was entirely harmonious. All the arrangements for the consummation of a union were perfected, and all were satisfied that at the next meeting of the General Conferences of the two Churches in 1865 the union would be effected.

On May 15, 1865, Bishop Payne reorganized the South Carolina Annual Conference of the A. M. E. Church. This Church was first established in Charleston forty years ago. Among those concerned in the movement was Morris Brown, the second bishop of the connection. The church then founded existed in prosperity for six years, worshipping in a house erected by themselves, when the African M. E. Church as a separate organization was overthrown, and ever since, until the breaking out of the rebellion, the colored people were compelled to worship with the whites, and were brought under the pastoral care of the white pastors. Upon the fall of Charleston, Bishop Payne proceeded to that city, and, the laws of South Carolina to the contrary notwithstanding, reorganized an Annual Conference.

II. Doctrines.—The doctrines are the same as those of the Methodist Episcopal Church (q. v.).

III. Government.—The bishops preside in the conferences and station the ministers; they are styled "Right Reverend." The General Conference is composed of travelling preachers of two years' standing, and of local preachers delegated by the Annual Conference, in the ratio of one to every five travelling preachers. Its sessions are quadrennial. The Annual Conference consists of all the travelling preachers in full connection, and of all local preachers who have been licensed a certain period, and can pass a satisfactory examination. In other respects the government resembles that of the M. E. Church.

IV. Statistics.—From the reports made at the General Conference of 1864 on the constitution of the Church, it appears that in that year the real estate and church property was estimated at about $2,000,000, located in the New England States, the North-western States, in Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, South Carolina, and California. The membership of the connection was about 50,000; the number of those attending the Church, 300,000; local preachers, 1000; travelling preachers, 500; ordained ministers, 200; and 3 bishops. Missions had been established in nearly all of the states above named, and the number of missionaries was about 20. The Church had about 1200 day-schools, and 1000 teachers of color, educated at the various institutions of learning in the United States and Canada. Sunday-schools had been established in connection with nearly all of the meeting-houses. They were attended by about 200,000 children, and some 200,000 volumes of Sunday-school books were used. The highest literary institution of the denomination is Wilberforce University, which is under the control of the General Conference, and located three miles north of Xenia, Green County, Ohio. It had, in 1864, about 100 students. There are also seminaries at Baltimore, Columbus (O.), Alleghany, and Pittsburg. The school near Columbus has a farm of 172 acres. There are two religious papers, the Christian Recorder, a weekly, issued by the Book Concern at Philadelphia, and the Repository.

African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, a religious denomination composed entirely of colored Methodists.

I. History.—This denomination originated in the secession, in 1820, of the Zion congregation of African Methodists, in the city of New York, from the Methodist Episcopal Church. The congregation assigned as the cause of its separation some resolutions passed by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in 1820, concerning Church government. Zion congregation was soon joined by several other congregations, and in 1821 the first Annual Conference was held in the city of New York, which was attended by 22 ministers, and reported the number of members connected with the Conference as being 1426. For seven more years successively an Annual Conference was convened, each of which appointed its president. At the Annual Conference of 1838, the Rev. Christopher Rush was elected permanent superintendent for four years. In 1847 the denomination had 2 general superintendents, 4 annual conferences (New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore), 75 travelling ministers, from 150 to 200 local preachers and exhorters, 5000 lay members, 50 churches, and many congregations without churches, in 11 states of the Union, the District of Columbia, and Nova Scotia. The General Conference of 1864, held at Philadelphia, declared in favor of a union with the African Methodist Episcopal Church (q. v.).

II. Doctrines.—The doctrines are the same as those of the Methodist Episcopal Church (q. v.).

III. Government.—The highest functionaries of the Church are general superintendents, who are elected to their office every four years by the suffrage of the members of the General Conference. They may be re-elected at the expiration of their term. The General Conference meets every four years, and is composed of all the travelling ministers of the connection. The Annual Conference is composed of all the travelling ministers of a district. See Rev. Christopher Rush's Hist. of the African Methodist Church (N. Y.).

Africanus, JULIUS (called by Suidas Sextus Julius), was an intimate friend of Origen, an eminent Christian chronographer, and flourished about the year 220. Having been attracted by the fame of Hercules, a celebrated philosopher, and pupil of Origen, he came to Alexandria to study with him, but he seems to have lived chiefly at Nicopolis (the ancient Emmaus), in Palestine, and to have exerted himself for its restoration; for which purpose, in 220, he made a visit to Antoninus Heliogabalus, to obtain from him permission that the walls of the ruined city should be rebuilt. According to one writer (Hebedjesu, Cat. lib. Chald. xv, 18), he was bishop of Nicopolis. He died about 232. Africanus wrote a chronological work in five sections under the title of Pentabiblos—a sort of universal history, composed to prove the antiquity of true religion and the novelty of paganism. Fragments of this chronology are extant in the works of Eusebius, Syncellus, Malala, Theophanes, Cedrenus, and in the "Chronicon Paschale." The "Pentabiblos" commences with the creation, B.C. 5499, and closes with A.D. 221. The chronology of Africanus places the birth of Christ three years before the commencement of our era. But under the reign of Diocletian ten years were taken from the number which had elapsed, and thus the computation of the Churches of Alexandria and Antioch were reconciled. According to Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. ed. nova, viii, 9), there exists at Paris a manuscript containing an abstract of the "Pentabiblos." Scaliger has borrowed, in his edition of Eusebius, the chronology of Africanus extant in "Geo. Syncelli Chronographia ab Adamo ad Diocletianum," à Jac. Goar" (Gr. et Lat., Paris, 1652, fol.). Africanus wrote a learned letter to Origen, in which he disputes the authenticity of the apocryphal history of Susannah (Basle, Gr. and Lat. 1674, 4to). A great part of another letter of Africanus to Aristides, reconciling the disagreement between the genealogies of Christ in Matthew and Luke, is extant in Eusebius (bk. vi, ch. xxxi).

It is believed that Africanus was still a pagan when he wrote his work entitled Cestus (Κεστός, girdle of Venus), in which he treats of agriculture, medicine, physics, and especially the military art. Hebedjesu, in his catalogue of Chaldean works, mentions a commentary on the N. T. by Africanus, bishop of Emmaus. Finally, a translation of the work of Abdias of Babylon, entitled Historia certaminis apostolici, has been attributed to Africanus, but probably erroneously.

The fact of a man so learned and intelligent as the chronographer Africanus being a Christian, refutes the error of those who think that all Christians in the first centuries of our era were illiterate. The criticisms of Africanus upon the apocryphal books seem to attest that he did not receive the canonical writings of the New Testament without previous examination; and, from his manner of reconciling the different genealogies of Christ, it appears certain that he recognised the authenticity of the Gospels in which they occur.—Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 220; Lardner, Works, ii, 457.

Afternoon (אַחֲרָהּ הַיּוֹם, netoth' ha-yom', the day's declining, Judg. xix, 8, as in the margin). The Hebrews, in conformity with the Mosaic law, reckoned the day from evening to evening, and divided it into six unequal parts:

1. The break of day.
2. The morning, or sunrise.
3. The heat of the day. It begins about nine o'clock (Gen. xviii, 1; 1 Sam. xi, 11).
4. Midday.
5. The cool of the day, literally the wind of the day, from the fact that in Eastern countries a wind commences blowing regularly for a few hours before sunset, and continues till evening.
6. The evening. See DAY.

Ag'aba (Ἀγαβά, prob. i. q. Agabus), one of the temple servants, whose "sons" returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v, 30), evidently the HAGAB (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezr. ii, 46).

Agäba (Ἀγαβα), a fortress near Jerusalem, which Galesius, its governor, restored to Aristobolus, the son of Alexander Jannæus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 24, 5). The place cannot well be identified on account of the various readings (see Hudson's ed. i, 602, note), one of which (Γαβαζα) even seems to identify it with GABATHA (q. v.). It was perhaps the eminence of GIB-EAH (q. v.).

Ag'abus (Ἀγαβος; either from the Heb. אַגָּב, a locust [which even occurs as a proper name, Ezra ii, 46], or אַגָּב, to love; Simon. Onom. N. T. 15, and Wolf, Cur. ii, 1167), the name of "a prophet," supposed to have been one of the seventy disciples of Christ (Walch, De Agabo Ute, Jen. 1757, and in his Diss. ad Act. Ap. ii, 131 sq.). He, with others, came from Judæa to Antioch, while Paul and Barnabas (A.D. 43) were there, and announced an approaching famine, which actually occurred the following year (Acts xi, 27, 28). Some writers suppose that the famine was general; but most modern commentators unite in understanding that the large terms of the original (ὅλην τὴν οἰκουμένην) apply not to the whole world, nor even to the whole Roman empire, but, as in Luke ii, 1, to Judæa only. Statements respecting four famines, which occurred in the reign of Claudius (Oros. vii, 6; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii, 8; Chron. Arm. ii, 269), are produced by the commentators who support this view (Wesseling, Obserr. i, 9, p. 28); and as all the countries put together would not make up a tenth part of even the Roman empire, they think it plain that the words must be understood to apply to that famine which, in the fourth year of Claudius (Suetonius, Claud. 18), overspread Palestine (see Kuinöl, Comment. in loc.). The poor Jews, in general, were then relieved by the queen of Adiabene, who sent to purchase corn in Egypt for them (Josephus, Ant. xx, 2, 6; 5, 2); and for the relief of the Christians in that country contributions were raised by the brethren at Antioch, and conveyed to Jerusalem by Paul and Barnabas (Acts xi, 29, 30). Many years after, this same Agabus met Paul at Cæsarea, and warned him of the sufferings which awaited him if he prosecuted his journey to Jerusalem (Acts xxi, 10–12), A.D. 55. (See Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul, i, 127; ii, 233; Baumgarten, Apostelgeschichte, i, 270 sq.; ii, 113.) The Greek Church assert that he suffered martyrdom at Antioch, and hold his festival on the 8th of March (Eichhorn, Bibl. d. bibl. Lit. i, 22, 23; vi, 20).—Kitto, s. v.

Ag'ag (Heb. Agag', אַגָּג, perh. flame, from an Arab. root, in 1 Sam. always written אַגָּג; Sept. Ἀγάγ, but Γάγ in Num.), the name of two kings of the Amalekites, and probably a common name of all their kings (Hengstenberg, Pentat. ii, 307), like Pharaoh in Egypt, and Achish or Abimelech among the Philistines. See also AGAGITE.

1. The king apparently of one of the hostile neighboring nations, at the time of the Exode (B.C. 1618), referred to by Balaam (Num. xxiv, 7) in a manner implying that the king of the Amalekites was, then at least, a greater monarch, and his people a greater people, than is commonly imagined. See AMALEKITE.

2. A king of the Amalekites, who was spared by Saul, contrary to the solemn vow of devotion to destruction [see ANATHEMA] whereby the nation, as such, had of old precluded itself from giving any quarter to that people (Exod. xvii, 14; Num. xiv, 45). Hence when Samuel arrived in the camp of Saul he ordered Agag to be brought forth. He came "pleasantly," deeming secure the life which the king had spared. But the prophet ordered him to be cut in pieces; and the expression which he employed—"As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women"—indicates that, apart from the obligations of the vow, some such example of retributive justice was intended as had been exercised in the case of Adonibezek; or, in other words, that Agag had made himself infamous by the same treatment of some prisoners of distinction (probably Israelites) as he now received from Samuel (see Diedrichs, Hinrichtung Agag's, Gött. 1776). The unusual mode in which his death was inflicted strongly supports this conclusion (1 Sam. xv, 8-33). B.C. cir. 1070.—Kitto, s. v. See SAMUEL.

Ag'agite [others A'gagite] (Heb. Agagi', אַגָּגִי, Sept. Boryāōs, Μακρίων, Vulg. Agagites), the name of the nation to which Haman (q. v.) belonged (Esther iii, 1, 10; viii, 3, 5; ix, 24). Josephus explains it as meaning Amalekite (Ant. xi, 6, 5). See AGAG.

Agāpē, plural AGAPE (ἀγάπη, ἀγάπαι), the Greek term for love, used by ecclesiastical writers (most frequently in the plural) to signify the social meal of the primitive Christians, which generally accompanied the Eucharist. The New Testament does not appear to give it the sanction of a divine command; it seems to be attributable to the spirit of a religion which is a bond of brotherly union and concord among its professors. See EUCHARIST.

1. Much learned research has been spent in tracing the origin of this custom; but, though considerable obscurity may rest on the details, the general historical connection is tolerably obvious. It is true that the ἱερανοὶ and ἑταῖρια, and other similar institutions of Greece and Rome, presented some points of resemblance which facilitated both the adoption and the abuse of the Agape by the Gentile converts of Christianity; but we cannot consider them as the direct models of the latter. If we reflect on the profound impression which the transactions of "the night on which the Lord was betrayed" (1 Cor. xi, 23) must have made on the minds of the apostles, nothing can be conceived more natural, or in closer accordance with the genius of the new dispensation, than a wish to perpetuate the commemoration of his death in connection with their social meal (Neander, Leben Jesu, p. 643; Planting of the Christian Church, i, 27). The primary celebration of the Eucharist had impressed a sacredness on the repast of which it formed a part (comp. Matt. xxvi, 26; Mark xiv, 22, with Luke xxii, 20; 1 Cor. xi, 25); and when to this consideration we add the ardent faith and love of the new converts on the one hand, and the loss of property with the disruption of old connections and attachments on the other, which must have heightened the feeling of brotherhood, we need not look farther to account for the institution of the Agape, at once a symbol of Christian love and a striking exemplification of its benevolent energy. However soon its purity was soiled, at first it was not undeserving of the eulogy pronounced by Chrysostom: "A custom most beautiful and most beneficial; for it was a supporter of love, a solace of poverty, a moderator of wealth, and a discipline of humility."

Thus the common meal and the Eucharist formed together one whole, and were conjointly denominated Lord's Supper (ἑἵπνον τοῦ κυρίου, ἑἵπνον κυριακόν) and feast of love (ἀγάπη). They were also signified (according to Mosheim, Neander, and other eminent critics) by the phrase, breaking of bread (κλάωτες ἄρτον, Acts ii, 46; κλάω τοῦ ἄρτου, Acts ii, 42; κλάωα ἄρτου, Acts xx, 7). We find the term ἀγάπαι thus applied once, at least, in the New Testament (Jude 12). "These are spots in your feasts of charity" (ἢν ταῖς ἀγάπαις ἠμῶν). The reading in 2 Pet. ii, 13, is of doubtful authority: "Spots and blemishes, living luxuriously in their Agapæ" (ἐντροφῶντες ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις αὐτῶν); but the common reading is ἐν ταῖς ἁπάταις αὐτῶν, "in their own deceivings." The phrase ἀγάπην ποιεῖν was early employed in the sense of celebrating the Eucharist; thus in the epistle of Ignatius to the church at Smyrna, § viii. In § vii ἀγαπῶν appears to refer more especially to the Agape.

By ecclesiastical writers several synonyms are used for the Agape, such as συμπόσια (Balsamon, ad Can. xxvii, Council. Laodicen.); κοινὰ τράπεζα, ἑνώχια, κοινὰ ἑστίασιν, κοινὰ συμπόσια (Chrysostom); ἑἵπνα κοινὰ (Eusebiius); συστία καὶ συμπόσια (Zonaras).

Though the Agape usually succeeded the Eucharist, yet they are not alluded to in Justin Martyr's description of the latter (Apol. i, § 65, 67); while Tertullian, on the contrary, in his account of the Agape, makes no distinct mention of the Eucharist. "The nature of our Canā," he says, "may be gathered from its name, which is the Greek term for love (dilectio). However much it may cost us, it is real gain to incur such expense in the cause of piety; for we aid the poor by this refreshment; we do not sit down to it till we have first tasted of prayer to God; we eat to satisfy our hunger; we drink no more than befits the temperate; we feast as those who recollect that they are to spend the night in devotion; we converse as those who know that the Lord is an ear-witness. After water for washing hands, and lights have been brought in, every one is required to sing something to the praise of God, either from the Scriptures or from his own thoughts; by this means, if any one has indulged in excess, he is detected. The feast is closed with prayer." Contributions or oblations of provisions and money were made on these occasions, and the surplus was placed in the hands of the presiding elder (ὁ προϊστάμενος—compare 1 Tim. v, 17, οἱ προϊστάμενοι πεισιβύτηροι), by whom it was applied to the relief of orphans and widows, and sick and destitute, prisoners and strangers (Justin, Apol. i, 67).

Allusions to the κυριακὸν ἑἵπνον are to be met with in heathen writers. Thus Pliny, in his celebrated epistle to the Emperor Trajan, after describing the meeting of the Christians for worship, represents them as assembling again at a later hour, "ad capitulum cibum, promissum tamen et innocuum." By the phrase "cibum promissum" (Augustine remarks) we are not to understand merely food partaken in common with others, but common food, such as is usually eaten; the term innocuum also intimates that it was perfectly wholesome and lawful, not consisting, for example, of human flesh (for, among other odious imputations, that of cannibalism had been cast upon the Christians, which, to prejudiced minds, might derive some apparent support from a misinterpretation of our Lord's language in John vi, 53, "Unless ye eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of man"), nor of herbs prepared with incantations and magical rites. Lucian also, in his account of the philosopher Peregrinus, tells us that, when imprisoned on the charge of being a Christian, he was visited by his brethren in the faith, who brought with them ἑἵπνα ποικίλα, which is generally understood to mean the provisions which were reserved for the absent members of the church at the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Gesner remarks on this expression, "Agapas, afferente unquoque aliquid, quod uni consumerint; hinc ποικίλα, non ἅπαντα."

2. The mode of celebrating the feast was simple. The bishop or presbyter presided. The food appears to have been either dressed at the houses of the guests, or to have been prepared at the place of meeting, according to circumstances. Before eating, the guests washed their hands, and prayer was offered. The Scriptures were read, and questions proposed by the person presiding. Then followed the recital of accounts respecting the affairs of other churches, such accounts being regularly transmitted from one church to another, so that a deep sympathy was produced; and, in many cases, assistance was furnished to churches in trouble. At the close of the feast, money was collected for orphans and widows, for the poor, and for prisoners. The kiss of charity was given, and the ceremony concluded with prayer (Rom. xvi, 16; 1 Cor. xvi, 20; 1 Thess. v, 26; 1 Pet. v, 14).

3. Their Decline.—From the passages in the Epistles of Jude and Peter, already quoted, and more particularly from the language of Paul in 1 Cor. xi, it appears that at a very early period the Agapæ were perverted from their original design; the rich frequently practised a selfish indulgence, to the neglect of their poorer brethren; ἰσχυροὶ τὸ ἴδιον εἴπιον προλαμβάνει (1 Cor. xi, 21); i. e. the rich feasted on the provisions they brought, without waiting for the poorer members, or granting them a portion of their abundance. They appear to have imitated the Grecian mode of entertainment called εἴπιον ἀπὸ παντός (see Xenophon's Memorabilia, iii, 14; Neander's Planting of the Christian Church, i, 292). On account of these and similar irregularities, and probably in part to elude the notice of their persecutors, the Christians, about the middle of the second century, frequently celebrated the Eucharist by itself and before daybreak (antelucanis cubitis) (Tertullian, De Cor. Militibus, § 3). From Pliny's Epistle it also appears that the Agapæ were suspected by the Roman authorities of belonging to the class of Hæteræ (εἰσαίτια), unions or secret societies, which were often employed for political purposes, and as such denounced by the imperial edicts; for he says (referring to the "cibus promiscuum," etc.) "quod ipsum ficere desuisse post dictum meum, quo secundum mandata tua Hæterias esse veteram" (Plin. Ep. 96 al. 97). At a still later period the Agapæ were subjected to strict regulation by various councils. Thus by the 28th canon of the Council of Laodicea it was forbidden to hold them in churches. At the Council of Carthage (A. D. 397) it was ordered (can. 29) that none should partake of the Eucharist unless they had previously abstained from food; but it is added, "excepto uno die anniversario, quo cœna domini celebratur." This exception favors the supposition that the Agapæ were originally held in close imitation of the Last Supper, i. e. before, instead of after, the Eucharist. The same prohibition was repeated in the sixth, seventh, and ninth centuries, at the Council of Orleans (can. 12), A. D. 533; in the Trullanian Council at Constantinople, A. D. 692; and in the council held at Aix-la-Chapelle, A. D. 816. Yet these regulations were not intended to set aside the Agapæ altogether. In the Council of Gangra, in Paphlagonia (about A. D. 360), a curse was denounced on whoever despised the partakers of the Agapæ or refused to join in them. When Christianity was introduced among the Anglo-Saxons by Austin (A. D. 596), Gregory the Great advised the celebration of the Agapæ, in booths formed of the branches of trees, at the consecration of churches.

Few vestiges of this ancient usage can now be traced. In some few churches, however, may still be found what seem to be remnants of the old practice; thus it is usual, in every church in Rouen, on Easter-day, after mass, to distribute to the faithful, in the nave of the church, an Agapæ, in the shape of a cake and a cup of wine. It appears that it used to be done on all great festivals; for we read in the life of Ansbertus, archbishop of Rouen, that he gave an Agapæ to the people in his church "after communion, on solemn days, and himself waited at table especially upon the poor." Dr. King suggests, that the Benediction of the Loaves, observed in the Greek Church, is a remnant of the ancient Agapæ. Suicer says that it is yet the custom in that Church on Easter-day, after the celebration of the holy mysteries, for the people to feast together in the churches; and this distribution panis benedicti et vini, he also seems to consider a vestige of the Agapæ. But the primitive love-feast, under a simpler and more expressly religious form, is retained in modern times by the Moravians and the Methodists. See LOVE-FAST. Similar meetings are held in Scotland by the followers of Mr. Robert Sandeman (q. v.), and by a branch of them in Danbury, Conn.—Suicer, Theol. col. 23; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. i, 59, 104, 296; Lardner, Works, vii, 280; Coleman, Anc. Christianity, ch. xxi, § 13; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. xv, 8; Discipuli of the M. E. Church, pt. ii.

Besides the Eucharistic Agapæ, three other kinds are mentioned by ecclesiastical writers: (1.) Agapæ natalitia, held in commemoration of the martyrs (Theodoret, Evang. Verit. viii, 923, 924, ed. Schulz); (2.) Agapæ conviviales, or marriage-feasts (Greg. Naz. Epist. i, 14); (3.) Agapæ funerales, funeral-feasts (Greg. Naz. Carm. X.), probably similar to the περι-εἴπιον or εὐκρόδειπνον of the Greeks.—Kitto, s. v.

Agapētæ (ἀγαπηταί, beloved), used in the primitive Church as a title of saints). In the early ages of the Church this title was given to virgins who dwelt with monks and others professing celibacy, in a state of so-called spiritual love. This intercourse, however pure and holy it may have been at first, soon occasioned great scandal in the Church, and at length became the cause of such evils that it was synodically condemned (Lateran Council, 1139). It seems that the name Agapeti (ἀγαπητοί) was given to men who passed the same kind of life with deaconesses and other women. The 6th Novell (cap. vi) forbids deaconesses to have with them such men, with whom they dwelt as with their brothers or relations.—Epiphanius, Heer. 43; Mosheim, Comm. ii, 138. Agapētus I, pope, son of Gordianus, a priest, by birth a Roman; succeeded John II in the papacy, April 21st (29th, Cave), 535. Theodatus, the king of the Goths in Italy, alarmed at the conquests of Belisarius, obliged Agapetus to proceed to Constantinople to sue for peace from the Emperor Justinian. This the pope was unable to obtain; but he signaled his zeal for religion by refusing to communicate with Anthimus the Eutychian, then patriarch of Constantinople. The emperor endeavored to compel Agapetus to receive him into communion, but he resolutely persisted in his refusal. Induced by this bold conduct to look more closely into the question, Justinian became convinced of the error that had been committed in elevating Anthimus to the patriarchal see, and by his order a council was held at Constantinople in 536, in which Agapetus presided, where Anthimus was deposed, and Mennas elected in his stead, and consecrated by the pope. Agapetus died at Constantinople in that same year, on the 17th day of April, after having held the see eleven months and three weeks, according to the most probable opinion. His body was carried to Rome, and buried in the church of St. Peter, in the Vatican, September 20th, on which day his festival is marked in the Roman Martyrology. Five of his epistles remain, viz., one to Justinian, two to Caesarius, bishop of Arles, and two to Reparatus, bishop of Carthage. The epistle to Anthimus, given together with these in the Collections of Councils, is spurious. He was succeeded by Silverius.—Biog. Univ. vol. i; Baronius, A.D. 535, 536; Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 535.

Agapētus II, pope, A.D. 946, was a Roman by birth, and was chosen, like his predecessor, by the faction of Alberic. The first action of the pope was to establish his political rule over the churches of the empire. For this purpose he sent Marinus, bishop of Bormazo, in Tuscany, as a legate to the Emperor Otho I, to assemble a synod. This convention, composed of French and German prelates, was held at Ingelheim, in the church of St. Remi, on the 7th of June, 948, in the presence of Kings Otho and Louis. Marinus presided over it. Notwithstanding the opposition of the synod, the legate re-established in his episcopal dignity Artaud, the former bishop of Rheims, who had been removed from his see by Ilugo, count of Paris.

In order to break down the powerful house of Marozia in Italy, Agapetus favored the claims of Otho to the imperial dignity, and was about to summon him to Rome, when the pope himself died, A.D. 955. His successor, John XII, placed the crown of Charlemagne on Otho's head.—Baronius, Annal. 951; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. x, pt. ii, ch. ii.

Agar (Ἄγαρ), a Græcized form (Gal. iv, 24, 25) of the name HAGAR (q. v.).

Agard, HORACE, an esteemed Methodist Episcopal minister, entered the itinerancy in the Genesee Conference in 1819. In 1821 he was ordained deacon, and in 1823 elder. In 1826 he was made presiding elder of the Susquehanna district, which he served for seven years, and then was transferred to Berkshire district. He filled the various posts to which he was called with great credit and success. In 1838 he was superannuated. His later years were clouded by nervous disease, which abated, so as to leave his mind clear and happy, a few days before his death in 1850.—Minutes of Conferences, iv, 498; Peck, Early Methodism, p. 457.

Agaréne (ἄγῆρη), a Græcized form (Baruch iii, 23) of the name HAGARENE (q. v.).

Agate (ἄγαθός, shebo', signif. unknown; Sept. ἀχάτης, Vulg. achates), a precious, or rather ornamental stone, which was one of those in the breastplate (see Braunii Vest. Sacerd. Heb. ii, 15) of the high-priest (Exod. xxviii, 19; xxxix, 12). The word agate, indeed, occurs also in Isa. liv, 12, and Ezek. xxvii, 6, in our translation; but in the original the word is קִדְמֹן, kidmon. See RUBY. Theophrastus describes the agate as "an elegant stone, which took its name from the river Achates (now the Drillo, in the Val di Noto), in Sicily, and was sold at a great price" (58). But it must have been known long before in the East, and, in fact, there are few countries in which agates of some quality or other are not produced. The finest are those of India; they are plentiful, and sometimes fine, in Italy, Spain, and Germany. We have no evidence that agates were found in Palestine. Those used in the desert were doubtless brought from Egypt. Pliny says that those found in the neighborhood of Thebes were usually red veined with white. He adds that these, as well as most other agates, were deemed to be effectual against scorpions, and gives some curious accounts of the pictorial delineations which the variegations of agates occasionally assumed. Agate is one of the numerous modifications of form under which silica presents itself, almost in a state of purity, forming 98 per cent. of the entire mineral. The silicious particles are not so arranged as to produce the transparency of rock crystal, but a semi-pellucid, sometimes almost opaque substance, with a resinous or waxy fracture, and the various shades of color arise from minute quantities of iron. The same stone sometimes contains parts of different degrees of translucency, and of various shades of color; and the endless combinations of these produce the beautiful and singular internal forms, from which, together with the high polish they are capable of receiving, agates acquire their value as precious stones. Agates are usually found in detached rounded nodules in that variety of the trap rocks called amygdaloid or mandelstein, and occasionally in other rocks. Some of the most marvellous specimens on record were probably merely fancied, and possibly some were the work of art, as it is known that agates may be artificially stained. From Pliny we learn that in his time agates were less valued than they had been in more ancient times (Hist. Nat. xxxvii, 10). The varieties of the agate are numerous, and are now, as in the time of Pliny, arranged according to the color of their ground. The Scripture text shows the early use of this stone for engraving; and several antique agates, engraved with exquisite beauty, are still preserved in the cabinets of the curious. (For a further account of the modern agate, see the Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.)—Kitto, s. v. See GEM.

Agátha, a female Christian martyr, born at Palermo, in the third century. Quintus, the pagan governor of Sicily (A.D. 251), captivated with her charms, and incensed by her rejection of his illicit overtures, tortured her in the most brutal manner. By his order she was first scourged with rods, then burnt with red-hot irons and cruelly torn with sharp hooks; after which she was laid upon a bed of live coals mingled with glass. She died in prison February 5, A.D. 251. The history of Agatha, however, given by the Bollandists, is suspected of corruption.—Tillemont, iii, 209; Butler, Lives of Saints, Feb. 5.

Agatho, Pope, surnamed Thaumaturgus, on account of his pretended gift of working miracles. He was a native of Palermo, in Sicily. On the 27th of June, 678, he was elected pope on the death of Donus. He is remembered mainly for his efforts against the Monothelite heresy. Chiefly by his instrumentality the 6th and last Œcumenical Council was assembled in 680 at Constantinople against these opinions, to which he sent four legates; and at that council the doctrine sanctioned by Pope Honorius was renounced by Pope Agathe—infallibility against infallibility. He died January 10th, 682. His letters against the Monothelites are preserved in the records of the 6th council (Hardouin, Concilia, tom. iii).

Agathopólis, a diocesan town of Palestine referred to in the records of the Council of Chalcedon, probably for "Azotopolis" (Reland, Palest. p. 550) or ASUDOD (q. v.).

Age (represented by several Heb. and Gr. words), sometimes signifies an indefinite period; at others, it is used for: 1. A generation (q. v.) of the human race, or thirty years; 2. As the Latin seculum, or a hundred years; 3. The maturity of life (John ix, 21); 4. The latter end of life (Job xi, 17). See ÆON.

Old Age. The strong desire of a protracted life, and the marked respect with which aged persons were treated among the Jews, are very often indicated in the Scriptures. The most striking instance which

Job can give of the respect in which he was once held, is that even old men stood up as he passed them in the streets (Job xxix, 8), the force of which is illustrated by the injunction in the law, "Before the hoary head thou shalt stand up, and shalt reverence the aged" (Lev. xix, 30). Similar injunctions are repeated in the Apocrypha, so as to show the department expected from young men toward their seniors in company. Thus, in describing a feast, the author of Ecclesiasticus (xxiii, 3, 7) says, "Speak thou that art the elder, for it becometh thee. Speak, young man, if there be need of thee, and yet scarcely when thou art twice asked." See ELDER. The attainment of old age is constantly promised or described as a blessing (Gen. xv, 15; Job v, 26), and communities are represented as highly favored in which old people abound (Isa. lxx, 20; Zech. viii, 4, 9), while premature death is denounced as the greatest of calamities to individuals, and to the families to which they belong (1 Sam. ii, 32); the aged are constantly supposed to excel in understanding and judgment (Job xii, 20; xv, 10; xxxii, 9; 1 Kings xii, 6, 8), and the mercilessness of the Chaldeans is expressed by their having "no compassion" upon the "old man, or him who stooped for age" (2 Chron. xxxvi, 17). See LONGEVITY. The strong desire to attain old age was necessarily in some degree connected with or resembled the respect paid to aged persons; for people would scarcely desire to be old, were the aged neglected or regarded with mere sufferance. See OLD. Attention to age was very general in ancient times; and is still observed in all such conditions of society as those through which the Israelites passed. Among the Egyptians, the young men rose before the aged, and always yielded to them the first place (Herod. ii, 80). The youth of Sparta did the same, and were silent—or, as the Hebrews would say, laid their hand upon their mouth—whenever their elders spoke. At Athens, and in other Greek states, old men were treated with corresponding respect. In China deference for the aged, and the honors and distinctions awarded to them, form a capital point in the government (Mém. sur les Chinois, i. 450); and among the Moslems of Western Asia, whose usages offer so many analogies to those of the Hebrews, the same regard for seniority is strongly shown. Among the Arabs, it is very seldom that a youth can be permitted to eat with men (Lane, Arabic Nights, c. xi, note 26). With the Turks, age, even between brothers, is the object of marked deference (Urquhart, Spirit of the East, ii, 471).—Kitto, s. v.

CANONICAL AGE, i. e. proper for receiving orders. In the Latin Church it is forbidden to give the tonsure to any one unless he be seven years of age, and have been confirmed (Conc. Trid. sess. xxiii, cap. 4). The proper age for conferring the four minor orders is left to the discretion of the bishop; but it is forbidden to promote any one to the rank of subdeacon under twenty-two years of age, to that of deacon under twenty-three, and to that of priest unless in his twenty-fifth year (Ibid. cap. 12). A bishop must be at least in his twenty-seventh year, or, more properly, thirty.

In the Church of England a deacon may be admitted to the priesthood at the expiration of one year from the time of receiving deacon's orders, and not before, i. e. at twenty-four years of age at the earliest; and it is to be noted that the stat. 13 Eliz. 12 declares all dispensations to the contrary to be absolutely void in law. The preface to the ordination service declares that every man, to be consecrated bishop, must be full thirty years of age.

ADULT AGE, or that at which marriage may be contracted or religious vows made. The canonists agree that men may contract marriage at fourteen years of age, and women at twelve. Until the contracting parties are each twenty-one years of age, no marriage can be legally contracted without the consent of the parents or guardians of the party which is a minor.

AGES OF THE WORLD. The time preceding the birth of our Saviour has been generally divided into six ages: 1. From the beginning of the world to the Deluge; 2. From the Deluge to the entrance of Abraham into the land of promise; 3. From the entrance of Abraham into the land of promise to the Exodus; 4. From the Exodus to the foundation of the Temple by Solomon; 5. From the foundation of the Temple by Solomon to the Babylonian captivity; 6. From the Babylonian captivity to the birth of our Lord. Ag'e'ü (Heb. Ag'ü, אג'וּ, fugitive, Sept. 'Ayá v. r. 'Αγία), a Hararite, father of Shammah, which latter was one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 11). B.C. ante 1046.

Agellius, or Agelli, ANTONIO, born at Sorrento, in Naples, a bishop of Acerno. An account of him will be found in the letters of Peter Morin (Paris, 1675). He was remarkable for his extensive knowledge of languages. He died at Acerno in 1608. His works are: 1. A Commentary on the Psalms and Canticles (Rome, 1606, fol.); 2. A Commentary on the Book of Lamentations, taken from the Greek writers and translated (Rome, 1589, 4to); 3. A Commentary on the Book of Proverbs (Verona, 1649, fol.); 4. A Commentary on Habakkuk (Antwerp, 1697, 8vo).

He was employed by Gregory XIII upon the beautiful Greek edition of the Septuagint, published at Rome, and was a member of the institution of persons called Scholastici, who were charged with the office of superintending the printing establishment of the Vatican.—Landon, Evol. Dict. s. v.

Agenda (Lat. things to be done), among ecclesiastical writers of the ancient Church, denotes (1.) divine service in general; (2.) the mass in particular. We meet with agenda matutina and vespertina—morning and evening prayers; agenda diei—the office of the day, whether feast or fast day; agenda mortuorum—the service of the dead. It is also applied to church-books, compiled by public authority, prescribing the order to be observed by the ministers and people in the ceremonies and devotions of the Church. In this sense agenda occurs for the first time in a work of Johannes de Janna, about 1287. The name was especially used to designate a book containing the formula of prayer and ceremonies to be observed by priests in their several ecclesiastical functions. It was generally adopted in the Lutheran Church of Germany, in which it is still in use, while in the Roman Church it has been, since the 16th century, supplanted by the term ritual (q. v.). For the history of the Lutheran Agendas, see LITURGY.

Aggæus (Αγγαῖος), the Græcized form (1 Esdr. vi, 1; vii, 3; 2 Esdr. i, 10) of the name of the prophet HAGGAI (q. v.).

Agier, PETER JOHN, a French jurist, was born at Paris December 28th, 1748, of a Jansenist family. When forty years old he commenced the study of Hebrew, and gave translations and comments on the prophets (principally on the four greater). In 1789 appeared his Vues sur la réformation des lois civiles, suivies d'un plan et d'une classification de ces lois (Paris, 2 vols. 8vo), followed by his Psaumes nouvellement traduits en Français sur l'Hebreu, etc. (Paris, 1809, 3 vols. 8vo); Psalmi ad Hebraicam veritatem translati, etc. (Paris, 1818, 1 vol. 16mo); Vues sur le second avènement de Jésus-Christ (Paris, 1818, 1 vol. 8vo); Propheties concernant Jésus-Christ et l'Eglise, éparses dans les Livres saints (Paris, 1819, 8vo); Les Prophetes nouvellement traduits de l'Hebreu, avec des explications et des notes critiques (Paris, 1820-1822, 9 vols. 8vo); Commentaire sur l'Apocalypse (Paris, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo). In all these works the Jansenist doctrines are strongly upheld. It is said of him that Napoleon, on seeing him once, said, "Voilà un magistrat!" He died at Paris September 22d, 1823.—Mahul, Annuaire nécrologique (Paris, 1823).

Agion, or rather Ἅγιον (ἄγιον or ἕγιον ἄγιον, the holy or the most holy place). See TEMPLE. A name anciently given to the inner portion of the church, which was appropriated to the clergy. See ΑΔΥΤΟΝ. It was so called because the most sacred services, especially the consecration of the Eucharist, were performed within it. This place had various names. See BEMA.

Agmon. See RUSH.

Agnes, saint and martyr. The acts of her martyrdom which have come down to us as written by Ambrose are spurious, and nothing further is known of her history than what Prudentius relates in the 14th Hymn, πρὸς στεφάνω, and Ambrose in lib. i, de Virginibus, which amounts to this: Agnes, at the early age of twelve or thirteen, having made profession of the Christian faith at Rome, was put to the torment to induce her to retract, in vain, and the judge ordered her to be conveyed to a house of ill fame, hoping that fear for her chastity might force her to recant. But God preserved his servant in this trial; for, according to the tradition, the first man who cast his eyes upon her was struck with blindness, and fell nearly dead at her feet! Nevertheless the saintly story adds that she was immediately delivered over to the executioner and was beheaded, according to Ruinart, in 304, or, according to Bollandus, in the preceding century. Augustine, in his 273d Sermon, declares that he made that discourse on the anniversary of the passion of St. Agnes, St. Fructuosus, and St. Eulogius, viz., Jan. 21st, on which day her festival is celebrated by the Latin, Greek, and English Churches. Many churches contend for the honor of possessing her remains.—Butler, Lives of Saints, Jan. 21.

Agnoë'tæ (from ἀγνοῖα, to be ignorant of), a sect which appeared about A.D. 370, adopting the opinions of Theophrastus of Cappadocia. They questioned the omniscience of God, alleging that He knew things past only by memory, and things future only by uncertain prescience. Ecclesiastical historians mention another sect, which in the sixth century followed Themistius, deacon of Alexandria. They maintained that Christ was ignorant of many things, and particularly of the day of judgment (see Colbe, Agnoëtismus, Giess, 1654). Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria, ascribes this opinion to certain solitaries in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, who cited, in vindication of their opinion, Mark xiii, 32: "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father."—Baronius, A.D. 535; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. vi, pt. ii, ch. v, § 9; Walch, Hist. der Ketzereien, viii, 644.

Agnus Dei (Lat. Lamb of God). (I.) A hymn generally supposed to have been introduced into the Roman Mass service by Pope Sergius I in 688. It is more probable that before his time it had been sung by the clergy alone, and he only required the laity to join. The hymn is founded on John i, 29, begins with the words Agnus Dei, and is sung at the close of the mass. For a full account of the hymn and its varieties, see Pascal, Liturg. Cathol. p. 51.

(II.) A cake of wax used in the Romish Church, stamped with the figure of a lamb supporting the banner of the cross. These cakes, being consecrated by the pope on the Tuesday after Easter in the first and seventh years of his pontificate, are supposed by Romanists to possess great virtues. They cover them with a piece of stuff cut in the form of a heart, and carry them very devoutly in their processions. From selling these Agni Dei to some, and presenting them to others, the Romish clergy and religious officers derive considerable pecuniary advantage. The practice of blessing the Agnus Dei took its rise about the 7th or 8th, according to others, about the 14th century. Though the efficacy of an Agnus Dei has not been declared by Romish Councils, the belief in its virtues has been strongly and universally established in the Church of Rome. Pope Urban V sent to John Palæologus, emperor of the Greeks, an Agnus folded in fine paper, on which were written verses explaining all its properties. These verses declare that the Agnus is formed of balm and wax mixed with chrisin, and that being consecrated by mystical words, it possesses the power of removing thunder and dispersing storms, of giving to women with child an easy delivery, of preventing shipwreck, taking away sin, repelling the devil, increasing riches, and of securing against fire. See LAMB.

(III.) It also signifies, like the Greek word Poteriocalymma (ποτήριον-κάλυμμα), a cloth embroidered with the figure of a lamb, with which, in the Greek Church, the cup at the Lord's Supper is covered.

Agobard (AGOBERTUS, AGOEBALDUS, or AGOEBAUDUS), archbishop of Lyons, was born in 779, but whether in France or Spain is uncertain. In 813 he was appointed coadjutor of Leidradus, the archbishop of Lyons, who was very far advanced in years; and in 816 the archbishop retired into the monastery of Soissons, having appointed Agobard his successor in the episcopal chair. Agobard was driven from his see by Louis-le-Débonnaire for having taken an active share in deposing him in the assembly of bishops, held at Compiègne in 833. When peace was restored between Louis and his sons, Lothaire and Pepin, Agobard recovered his see. He died at Saintonges, June 5th, 840. He was considered a man of much genius, and of no small learning in theological questions. He held liberal views with regard to inspiration. He wrote against the Adoptionists, against Ordeal by duel, and against various superstitions of the time. (See Hundeshagen, De Agobardi vita et scriptis, Giess, 1831.) His works have been preserved to us by a singular accident. Pappyrus Massonus, happening to enter the shop of a bookbinder at Lyons, as the latter was on the point of tearing up a MS. which he held in his hands, asked permission to look at it first, which he did, and, soon perceiving its value, he rescued it from its impending destruction, and shortly after published it. The MS. itself is preserved in the Bibliothèque du Roi at Paris. His works were edited Paris, 1606, and again by Baluze (2 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1666), and by Masson (Paris, 1695). They may also be found in Bib. Mar. Patr. tom. xiv.

Agonistíci, a branch of the Donatists who spread themselves through Africa to preach the opinions of Donatus, and committed many crimes under pretext of doing justice at fairs and such places. Desirous of becoming martyrs, they exposed themselves to the greatest dangers, and sometimes even killed themselves. They were forcibly suppressed under Emperor Constant, but existed till the inroad of the Vandals. See DONATISTS.

Agonizants (Confraternity of the), a society of Roman Catholic penitents at Rome (and elsewhere, as at Lima in South America), whose chief duty is that of prayer for persons condemned to death by the law. On the eve of an execution they give notice of it to several numeries, and on the day on which the criminal is to suffer they cause a great number of masses to be said for him. Another confraternity under the same name assist at death-beds generally.

Agony (ἀγῶνία), a word generally denoting contest, and especially the contests by wrestling, etc., in the public games; whence it is applied metaphorically to a severe struggle or conflict with pain and suffering (Robinson's Lex. of the N. T. s. v.). Agony is the actual struggle with present evil, and is thus distinguished from anguish, which arises from the reflection on evil that is past (Crabb's Eng. Synonymes, s. v.). In the New Testament the word is only used by Luke (xx, 44) to describe the fearful struggle which our Lord sustained in the garden of Gethsemane (q. v.). The circumstances of this mysterious transaction are recorded in Matt. xxvi, 36-46; Mark xiv, 32-42; Luke xx, 39-48; Heb. v, 7, 8. Luke alone notices the agony, the bloody sweat, and the appearance of an angel from heaven strengthening him. Matthew and Mark alone record the change which appeared in his countenance and manner, the complaint which he uttered of the overpowering sorrows of his soul, and his repetition of the same prayer. See BLOODY SWEAT. All agree that he prayed for the removal of what he called "this cup," and are careful to note that he qualified this earnest petition by a preference of his Father's will to his own; the question is, what does he mean by "this cup?" Doddridge and others think that he means the instant agony, the trouble that he then actually endured. But Dr. Mayer (of York, Pa.) argues (in the Am. Bibl. Repos. April 1841, p. 294-317), from John xviii, 11, that the cup respecting which he prayed was one that was then before him, which he had not yet taken up to drink, and which he desired, if possible, that the Father should remove. It could, therefore, be no other than the death which the Father had appointed for him—the death of the cross—with all the attending circumstances which aggravated its horror; that scene of woe which began with his arrest in the garden, and was consummated by his death on Calvary. Jesus had long been familiar with this prospect, and had looked to it as the appointed termination of his ministry (Matt. xvi, 21; xvii, 9-12; xx, 17, 19, 28; Mark x, 32-34; John x, 18; xii, 32, 33). But when he looked forward to this destination, as the hour approached, a chill of horror sometimes came over him, and found expression in external signs of distress (John xii, 27; comp. Luke xii, 49, 50). But on no occasion did he exhibit any very striking evidence of perplexity or anguish. He was usually calm and collected; and if at any time he gave utterance to feelings of distress and horror, he still preserved his self-possession, and quickly checked the desire which nature put forth to be spared so dreadful a death. It is, therefore, hardly to be supposed that the near approach of his sufferings, awful as they were, apart from every thing else, could alone have wrought so great a change in the mind of Jesus and in his whole demeanor, as soon as he had entered the garden. It is manifest that something more than the cross was now before him, and that he was now placed in a new and hitherto untried situation. Dr. Mayer says: "I have no hesitation in believing that he was here put upon the trial of his obedience. It was the purpose of God to subject the obedience of Jesus to a severe ordeal, in order that, like gold tried in the furnace, it might be an act of more perfect and illustrious virtue; and for this end he permitted him to be assailed by the fiercest temptation to disobey his will and to refuse the appointed cup. In pursuance of this purpose, the mind of Jesus was left to pass under a dark cloud, his views lost their clearness, the Father's will was shrouded in obscurity, the cross appeared in tenfold horror, and nature was left to indulge her feelings, and to put forth her reluctance." See JESUS (CHRIST).

Dr. Mayer admits that the sacred writers have not explained what that was, connected in the mind of Jesus with the death of the cross, which at this time excited in him so distressing a fear. "Pious and holy men have looked calmly upon death in its most terrific forms. But the pious and holy man has not had a world's salvation laid upon him; he has not been required to be absolutely perfect before God; he has known that, if he sinned, there was an advocate and a ransom for him. But nothing of this consolation could be presented to the mind of Jesus. He knew that he must die, as he had lived, without sin; but if the extremity of suffering should so far prevail as to provoke him into impatience or murmuring, or into a desire for revenge, this would be sin; and if he sinned, all would be lost, for there was no other Saviour. In such considerations may probably be found the remote source of the agonies and fears which deepened the gloom of that dreadful night."—Kitto, s. v.

This, however, is not entirely satisfactory. Doubtless there was much of this obscuration of our Saviour's mind [see CRUCIFIXION]; but it would appear to have had reference to another point, and one connected with his condition and circumstances at the time, rather than with any future act or consequences. The apostle's inspired remark in Heb. v, 7, has not been sufficiently attended to by interpreters, "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears, unto Him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that [i. e. as to what] he feared." We are here distinctly informed, respecting this agony of Christ, that he was delivered from the object of dread, whatever it was; but this was not true in any sense of his future passion, which he suffered, and could not consistently have expected to have avoided, in its full extent. The mission of the angels, also, shows that some relief was administered to him on the spot: "There appeared an angel unto him from heaven strengthening him" (Luke xxii, 43). The strength imparted appears to have been physical, thus, as the passage in Hebrews intimates, saving him from the death which would otherwise have instantly supervened from the force of his emotions. This death Jesus was anxious to avoid just at that time; his work was not yet done, and the "cup" of sacrificial atonement would have been premature. His heavenly Father, in answer to his prayer, removed it for the time from his lips, by miraculously sustaining his bodily powers, and his mind soon recovered its usual tone of equanimity. The emotions themselves under which he labored were evidently the same as those that oppressed him while hanging on the cross, and on other occasions in a less degree, namely, a peculiar sense of abandonment by God. This distress and perplexity cannot be attributed to a mere dread of death in however horrid a form, without degrading Christ's magnanimity below heathen fortitude, and contradicting his usually calm allusions to that event, as well as his collected endurance of the crucifixion tortures. Neither can they well be attributed (as above) to any uncertainty as to whether he had thus far fulfilled the will of God perfectly, and would be enabled in any future emergency to fulfil it as perfectly, without a gratuitous contradiction of all his former experience and statements, and assigning him a degree of faith unworthy of his character. The position thus assigned him is incompatible with every thing hitherto in his history. Some other explanation must be sought. The state of mind indicated in his expiring cry upon the cross, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" seems to betray the secret ingredient that gave the atoning cup its poignant bitterness. This appears to have been the consciousness of enduring the frown of God in the place of sinful man; without which sense of the divine displeasure, by a temporary withholding of his benign complacency, personally experienced by the Redeemer, although in others' behalf, the full penalty of transgression could not have been paid. See ATONEMENT. Jesus must suffer (in character) what the sinner would have suffered, and this with the concentrated intensity of a world's infinite guilt. The sacrifice of his human body could only have redeemed man's body; his soul's beclouded anguish alone could represent the sentence passed upon men's souls. This view essentially agrees with that taken by Olshausen (Comment. in loc.).

AGREDA, MARIA DE, abbess of the Franciscan convent of the Immaculate Conception of Agreda, in Aragon. She was born April 2d, 1602, of rich and pious parents. Her mother, influenced by some dream or supposed vision, conceived it to be her duty to found a convent of the Immaculate Conception; and, having induced her husband to consent to it, they began to build the new monastery on the site of their own house. Subsequently, the father assumed the Franciscan habit, as his two sons had done previously, and Maria, with her mother and younger sister, took the veil in the new monastery. She was elected superior, by dispensation, at twenty-five years of age. She believed herself commanded from heaven to write the life of the Virgin, but seems to have resisted the impression for ten years, for it was not till 1637 that she commenced it. When it was finished she burned it, by direction of her temporary confessor, who exercised, in so doing, a more sound discretion than her ordinary confessor, who directed her to write it again, which she did, and finished it in 1660. As soon as it appeared it was justly condemned by the censors in Spain, Portugal, Rome, and Germany, and by the Faculty of Theology at Paris (the Sorbonne), in 1696. The title of the book, which is written in Spanish, and is filled with the wildest extravagances and much that is immodest, is "The Mystical City of God" (Mística Ciudad de Dios, Perpignan, 1690, 4 vols. Antwerp, 1692, 3 vols. and oft.; French transl. by Crozet, Marseilles, 1696, 3 vols.). Eusebius Amort, theologian of Cardinal Lercari, declares that the book was inserted in the Index at Rome in 1710, but that subsequently, during the pontificate of Benedict XIII, there appeared a decree permitting it to be read. Nevertheless, he asserts that he saw in the hands of Nicolas Kidolphus, then the secretary of the congregation of the Index, another and later decree, annulling the first, and declaring that it had been surreptitiously obtained. "At first," says Amort, "I wondered why this latter decree of Benedict XIII had not been published; but my surprise ceased when I found that they had already commenced the process of the beatification of the venerable Maria de Agreda!" See Amort, De Revelationibus, etc., Augsburg, 1744, and, on the other side, a long series of articles by Don Guéranger, Benedictine of Solesmes, in Œuvres, 1859.

AGRICŌLA, FRANCIS, canon and curate of Rodiniges, and afterward of Sittarden, in the duchy of Juliers, celebrated for his erudition. He died in 1621, leaving the following works: 1. Libri quatuor Evangelicarum Demonstrationum (Cologne, 1578); 2. Locis præcipuis S. Scrip. de Sacerdotii Institutione et Officio (Lugd. 1597).

AGRICŌLA, JOHN (called Magister Islebius), said to be the founder of the sect of Antinomians (q. v.); born April 20th, 1492, at Eisleben, in Upper Saxony. His real name was Schnitter or Schneider, which he Latinized, according to the custom of the time. He studied philosophy and theology at Wittenberg, where he was distinguished for his learning and virtue, and taught in the university for several years. At Eisleben he became distinguished as a preacher. In 1526 he was present at the diet of Spire, with the elector of Saxony and the count of Mansfeld; he also subscribed the confession of Augsburg, although he subsequently differed from it in many things. In 1538 he began to preach "against the Law," and, for a time, Antinomianism appeared likely to spread; but Luther opposed the new error with so much force that the sect was suppressed in its infancy; and Agricola, at least in form, renounced his heresy (see Nitzsche, De Antinomismo Jo. Agricole, Viteb. 1804). Having retired to Berlin, he became preacher to the elector of Brandenburg, in 1540. In 1537 he signed the Articles of Smalcald, excepting, however, the additional article on the primacy of the pope. Together with Julius Pflugius (Pflug), bishop of Nuremberg, and Michael Helden, titular bishop of Sidon, he composed the celebrated Interim of Charles V. He endeavored, in vain, to appease the Adiaphoristic controversy (q. v.), and died at Berlin, September 22d, 1566. His works are: 1. Comment. in Evang. Lucae (Nurem. 1525); 2. Comment. in Ep. Pauli ad Coloss. (Wittenb. 1527); 3. A Collection and Explication of three hundred German Proverbs (Magdeburg, 1526). The best edition, Wittenberg, 1592, contains seven hundred and fifty proverbs); 4. Comment. in Ep. Pauli ad Titum (Haguenau. 1530); 5. Refutation of Thomas Mower's Explication of Psalm xix; 6. Antinomia, with its Refutation by Luther (Wittenb. 1538); 7. Antinomica Theses;

8. Historia Passionis et Mortis Christi (Strasb. 1543); 9. Formule Pueriles (Berlin, 1561); 10. Epistola de Caputibus Doctrinae Eccl. (Wittenb. 1613); 11. The Lives of the Saints, in German (Cologne, 1618).—Cordes, *Joh. Agriculture, the art or profession of cultivating the soil. See FARM; TILLAGE.

1. History.—The antiquity of agriculture is indicated in the brief history of Cain and Abel, when it tells us that the former was a "tiller of the ground," and brought some of the fruits of his labor as an offering to God (Gen. iv, 2, 3), and that part of the ultimate curse upon him was, "When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield to thee her strength" (iv, 12). Of the actual state of agriculture before the Deluge we know nothing. See ANTEDILUVIANS. Whatever knowledge was possessed by the Old World was doubtless transmitted to the New by Noah and his sons; and that this knowledge was considerable is implied in the fact that one of the operations of Noah, when he "began to be a husbandman," was to plant a vineyard, and to make wine with the fruit (Gen. ix, 2). There are few agricultural notices belonging to the patriarchal period, but they suffice to show that the land of Canaan was in a state of cultivation, and that the inhabitants possessed what were at a later date the principal products of the soil in the same country. It is reasonable, therefore, to conclude that the modes of operation were then similar to those which we afterward find among the Jews in the same country, and concerning which our information is more exact. See ARABIA.

Agriculture was little cared for by the patriarchs; more so, however, by Isaac and Jacob than by Abraham (Gen. xxvi, 12; xxxvii, 7), in whose time probably, if we except the lower Jordan valley (xiii, 10), there was little regular culture in Canaan. Thus Gerar and Shechem seem to have been cities where pastoral wealth predominated. The herdsmen strove with Isaac about his wells; about his crop there was no contention (xx, 14; xxxiv, 28). In Joshua's time, as shown by the story of the "Eshcol" (Num. xiii, 23-24), Canaan was found in a much more advanced agricultural state than when Jacob had left it (Deut. viii, 8), resulting probably from the severe experience of famines, and the example of Egypt, to which its people were thus led. The pastoral life was the means of keeping the sacred race, while yet a family, distinct from mixture and locally unattached, especially while in Egypt. When, grown into a nation, they conquered their future seats, agriculture supplied a similar check on the foreign intercourse and speedy demoralization, especially as regards idolatry, which commerce would have caused. Thus agriculture became the basis of the Mosaic commonwealth (Michaëlis, xxxvii-xli). It tended to check also the freebooting and nomad life, and made a numerous offspring profitable, as it was already honorable by natural sentiment and by law. Thus, too, it indirectly discouraged slavery, or, where it existed, made the slave somewhat like a son, though it made the son also somewhat of a slave. Taken in connection with the inalienable character of inheritances, it gave each man and each family a stake in the soil, and nurtured a hardy patriotism. "The land is Mine" (Lev. xxv, 23) was a dictum which made agriculture likewise the basis of the theocratic relation. Thus every family felt its own life with intense keenness, and had its divine tenure which it was to guard from alienation. The prohibition of culture in the sabbatical year formed, under this aspect, a kind of rent reserved by the Divine Owner. Landmarks were deemed sacred (Deut. xix, 14), and the inalienability of the heritage was insured by its reversion to the owner in the year of jubilee; so that only so many years of occupancy could be sold (Lev. xxv, 8-16, 23-35). The prophet Isaiah (v, 8) denounces the contempt of such restrictions by wealthy grandees who sought to "add field to field," enriching families and depopulating districts. See LAND.

In giving to the Israelites possession of a country already under cultivation, it was the Divine intention that they should keep up that cultivation, and become themselves an agricultural people; and in doing this they doubtless adopted the practices of agriculture which they found already established in the country. This may have been the more necessary, as agriculture is a practical art; and those of the Hebrews who were acquainted with the practices of Egyptian husbandry had died in the wilderness; and even had they lived, the processes proper to a hot climate and alluvial soil, watered by river inundation, like that of Egypt, although the same in essential forms, could not have been altogether applicable to so different a country as Palestine. See EGYPT.

11. Weather, etc.—As the nature of the seasons lies at the root of all agricultural operations, it should be noticed that the variations of sunshine and rain, which with us extend throughout the year, are in Palestine confined chiefly to the latter part of autumn and the winter. During all the rest of the year the sky is almost uninterruptedly cloudless, and rain very rarely falls. The autumnal rains usually commence at the latter end of October or beginning of November, not suddenly, but by degrees, which gives opportunity to the husbandman to sow his wheat and barley. The rains continue during November and December, but afterward they occur at longer intervals, and rain is rare after March, and almost never occurs as late as May. The cold of winter is not severe; and as the ground is never frozen, the labors of the husbandman are not entirely interrupted. Snow falls in different parts of the country, but never lies long on the ground. In the plains and valleys the heat of summer is oppressive, but not in the more elevated tracts. In these high grounds the nights are cool, often with heavy dew. The total absence of rain in summer soon destroys the verdure of the fields, and gives to the general landscape, even in the high country, an aspect of drought and barrenness. No green thing remains but the foliage of the scattered fruit-trees, and occasional vineyards and fields of millet. In autumn the whole land becomes dry and parched, the cisterns are nearly empty, and all nature, animate and inanimate, looks forward with longing for the return of the rainy season. In the hill-country the time of harvest is later than in the plains of the Jordan and of the sea-coast. The barley harvest is about a fortnight earlier than that of wheat. In the plain of the Jordan the wheat harvest is early in May; in the plains of the coast and of Esdraelon, it is toward the latter end of that month, and in the hills not until June. The general vintage is in September, but the first grapes ripen in July; and from that time the towns are well supplied with this fruit.—Robinson, Biblical Researches, ii, 96-100. See PALESTINE.

The Jewish calendar (q. v.), as fixed by the three great festivals, turned on the seasons of green, ripe, and fully-gathered produce. Hence, if the season was backward, or, owing to the imperfections of a non-astronomical reckoning, seemed to be so, a month was intercalated. This rude system was fondly retained long after mental progress and foreign intercourse placed a correct calendar within their power; so that notice of a Veadar, i. e. second or intercalated Adar, on account of the lambs being not yet of a paschal size, and the barley not forward enough for the Abib (green sheaf), was sent to the Jews of Babylon and Egypt (Ugol. de Le Rust. v, 22) early in the season. See TIME. The year, ordinarily consisting of twelve months, was divided into six agricultural periods, as follows (Mishna, Tosaphtha Taanith, ch. i):

(1.) SOWING TIME.
Tisri, latter half. {	(beginning about autumnal equinox. } Early rain due.
Marchesvan.....
Kisleu, former half.....
(2.) UNRIPE TIME.
Kisleu, latter half.
Tebeth.....
Sebat, former half.....
(3.) COLD SEASON.
Sebat, latter half.....
Adar.....
(Veadar).....
Nisan, former half.....
(4.) HARVEST TIME.
Nisan, latter half.....	{ Beginning about vernal equinox. Barley green. Passover.
Ijar.....
Sivan, former half.....
(5.) SUMMER.
Sivan, latter half.
Tammuz.....
Ab, former half.....
(6.) SULTRY SEASON.
Ab, latter half.....
Elul.....
Tisri, former half.....

Thus the six months from mid Tisri to mid Nisan were mainly occupied with the process of cultivation, and the rest with the gathering of the fruits. Rain was commonly expected soon after the autumnal equinox, or mid Tisri; and if by the first of Kisleu none had fallen, a fast was proclaimed (Mishna, Taanith, ch. i).

The common Scriptural expressions of the "early" and the "latter rain" (Deut. xi, 14; Jer. v, 24; Hos. vi, 3; Zech. x, 1; Jam. v, 7) are scarcely confirmed by modern experience, the season of rains being unbroken (Robinson, i, 41, 429; iii, 96), though perhaps the fall is more strongly marked at the beginning and the end of it. The consternation caused by the failure of the former rain is depicted in Joel i, ii; and this prophet seems to promise that and the latter rain together "in the first month," i. e. Nisan (ii, 23). See RAIN.

Its plenty of water from natural sources made Canaan a contrast to rainless Egypt (Deut. viii, 7; xi, 8-12). Nor was the peculiar Egyptian method of horticulture alluded to in Deut. xi, 10 unknown, though less prevalent in Palestine. That peculiarity seems to have consisted in making in the fields square shallow beds, like our salt-pans, surrounded by a raised border of earth to keep in the water, which was then turned from one square to another by pushing aside the mud, to open one and close the next, with the foot. Robinson, however, describes a different process, to which he thinks this passage refers (Res. i, 542; ii, 351; iii, 21), as still in use likewise in Palestine. There irrigation (including under the term all appliances for making the water available) was as essential as drainage in our region; and for this the large extent of rocky surface, easily excavated for cisterns and ducts, was most useful. Even the plain of Jericho is watered not by canals from the Jordan, since the river lies below the land, but by rills converging from the mountains. In these features of the country lay its expansive resources to meet the wants of a multiplying population. The lightness of agricultural labor in the plains set free an abundance of hands for the task of terracing and watering, and the result gave the highest stimulus to industry. See IRRIGATION.

III. Soil, etc.—The Israelites probably found in Canaan a fair proportion of woodland, which their necessities, owing to the discouragement of commerce, must have led them to reduce (Josh. xvii, 18). But even in early times timber seems to have been far less used for building material than among Western nations; the Israelites were not skilful hewers, and imported both the timber and the workmen (1 Kings v, 6, 8). No store of wood-fuel seems to have been kept; ovens were heated with such things as dung and hay (Ezek. iv, 12, 13; Mal. iv, 13); and, in any case of sacrifice on an emergency, some, as we should think, unusual source of supply is constantly mentioned for the wood (1 Sam. vi, 14; 2 Sam. xxiv, 22; 1 Kings xix, 21; comp. Gen. xxii, 3, 6, 7). All this indicates a non-abundance of timber, and implies that nearly all the arable soil was under culture, or, at least, used for pasturage. See FOREST.

The geological characters of the soil in Palestine have never been satisfactorily stated; but the different epithets of description which travellers employ, enable us to know that it differs considerably, both in its appearance and character, in different parts of the land; but wherever soil of any kind exists, even to a very slight depth, it is found to be highly fertile. As parts of Palestine are hilly, and as hills have seldom much depth of soil, the mode of cultivating them in terraces was anciently, and is now much employed. A series of low stone walls, one above another, across the face of the hill, arrest the soil brought down by the rains, and afford a series of levels for the operations of the husbandman. This mode of cultivation is usual in Lebanon, and is not unfrequent in Palestine, where the remains of terraces across the hills, in various parts of the country, attest the extent to which it was anciently carried. This terrace cultivation has necessarily increased or declined with the population. If the people were so few that the valleys afforded sufficient food for them, the more difficult culture of the hills was neglected; but when the population was too large for the valleys to satisfy with bread, then the hills were laid under cultivation. See VINEYARD.

In such a climate as that of Palestine, water is the great fertilizing agent. The rains of autumn and winter, and the dews of spring, suffice for the ordinary objects of agriculture; but the ancient inhabitants were able, in some parts, to avert even the aridity which the summer droughts occasioned, and to keep up a garden-like verdure, by means of aqueducts communicating with the brooks and rivers (Ps. i, 3; lxxv, 10; Prov. xxi, 1; Isa. xxx, 25; xxxii, 2, 20; Hos. xii, 11). Hence springs, fountains, and rivulets were as much esteemed by husbandmen as by shepherds (Josh. xv, 19; Judg. i, 15). The soil was also cleared of stones, and carefully cultivated; and its fertility was increased by the ashes to which the dry stubble and herbage were occasionally reduced by being burned over the surface of the ground (Prov. xxiv, 31; Isa. vii, 23; xxxii, 13). Dung and, in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, the blood of animals were also used to enrich the soil (2 Kings ix, 37; Ps. lxxxiii, 10; Isa. xxv, 10; Jer. ix, 22; Luke xiv, 34, 35). A rabbi limits the quantity to three heaps of ten half-cors, or about 380 gallons, to each seah (q. v.) of grain, and wishes the quantity in each heap, rather than their number, to be increased if the field be large (Mishna, Shebi'uh, iii, 2). Nor was the great usefulness of sheep to the soil unrecognised (ib. 4), though, owing to the general distinctness of the pastoral life, there was less scope for it. See MANURE.

That the soil might not be exhausted, it was ordered that every seventh year should be a sabbath of rest to the land: there was then to be no sowing or reaping, no pruning of vines or olives, no vintage or gathering of fruits; and whatever grew of itself was to be left to the poor, the stranger, and the beasts of the field (Lev. xxv, 1-7; Deut. xv, 1-10). But such an observation required more faith than the Israelites were prepared to exercise. It was for a long time utterly neglected (Lev. xxvi, 34, 35; 2 Chron. xxxvi, 21), but after the captivity it was more observed. By this remarkable institution the Hebrews were also trained to habits of economy and foresight, and invited to exercise a large degree of trust in the bountiful providence of their Divine King. See SABBATICAL YEAR. A change in the climate of Palestine, caused by increase of population and the clearance of trees, must have taken place before the period of the N. T. A further change, caused by the decrease of skilled agricultural labor, e. g. in irrigation and terrace-making, has since ensued. Not only this, but the great variety of elevation and local character in so small a compass of country necessitates a partial and guarded application of general remarks (Robinson, i, 507, 553, 554; iii, 595; Stanley, Palestine, p. 118-126). Yet wherever industry is secure, the soil still asserts its old fertility. The Haurán (Perea) is as fertile as Damascus, and its bread enjoys the highest reputation. The black and fat, but light soil about Gaza, is said to hold so much moisture as to be very fertile with little rain. Here, as in the neighborhood of Beyrút, is a vast olive-ground, and the very sand of the shore is said to be fertile if watered. See WATER.

IV. Crops and Fields.—Under the term דגן, dagan', which we translate "grain" and "corn," the Hebrews comprehended almost every object of field culture. Syria, including Palestine, was regarded by the ancients as one of the first countries for corn (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xviii, 7). Wheat was abundant and excellent; and there is still one bearded sort, the ear of which is three times as heavy, and contains twice as many grains as our common English wheat (Irby and Mangles, p. 472). Barley was also much cultivated, not only for bread, but because it was the only kind of corn which was given to beasts; for oats and rye do not grow in warm climates. Hay was not in use; and therefore the barley was mixed with chopped straw to form the food of cattle (Gen. xxiv, 25, 32; Judg. xix, 19, etc.). Other kinds of field culture were millet, spelt, various species of beans and peas, pepperwort, cummin, cucumbers, melons, flax, and perhaps cotton. Many other articles might be mentioned as being now cultivated in Palestine; but, as their names do not occur in Scripture, it is difficult to know whether they were grown there in ancient times or not. The cereal crops of constant mention are wheat and barley, and more rarely rye and millet (?). Of the two former, together with the vine, olive, and fig, the use of irrigation, the plough and the harrow, mention is found in the book of Job (xxxii, 40; xv, 33; xxiv, 6; xxix, 9; xxxix, 10). Two kinds of cummin (the black variety called "fitches," Is. xxviii, 27), and such podded plants as beans and lentiles, may be named among the staple produce. To these, later writers add a great variety of garden plants, e. g. kidney-beans, peas, lettuce, endive, leek, garlic, onion, melon, cucumber, cabbage, etc. (Mishna, Kilaim, i, 2). The produce which formed Jacob's present was of such kinds as would keep, and had kept during the famine (Gen. xliii, 11). The ancient Hebrews had little notion of green or root crops grown for fodder, nor was the long summer drought suitable for them. Barley supplied food both to man and beast, and the plant called in Ezek. iv, 9 "millet," דוחן, dochan' (the holcus dochna of Linn. according to Gesenius, Heb. Lex. s. v.), was grazed while green, and its ripe grain made into bread. In the later period of more advanced irrigation the תלתן, tillan', "fenugreek" (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 2601), occurs (Mishna, Maaseroth, i), also the שחית, shach'ath, a clover, apparently, given cut (Mishna, Peah, v, 5). Mowing (קצף, qatz, Am. vi, 1; Ps. lxxii, 6) and hay-making were familiar processes, but the latter had no express word; חשיר, chshir', standing both for grass and hay, a token of a hot climate, where the grass may become hay as it stands. The yield of the land, besides fruit from trees, was technically distinguished as תבואה, tebua'h', produce, including apparently all cereal plants, קטיוֹת, kituyoth', pod-fruits (nearly equivalent to the Latin legumen), and זרנות גינה, zaruney' gimna', garden seeds (Buxtorf, ib. col. 693), while the simple word seeds (זרנות, zarunim') was used also generically for all seed, including all else which was liable to tithe, for which purpose the distinction seems to have existed. (See Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 17 sq.). See BOTANY.

The rotation of crops, familiar to the Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii, p. 4), can hardly have been unknown to the Hebrews. Sowing a field with divers seeds was forbidden (Deut. xxii, 9), and minute directions are given by the rabbis for arranging a seeded surface with great variety, yet avoiding the juxtaposition of heterogena. Some of these arrangements are shown in the annexed drawings (from Surenhusius's Mishna, i, 120). Three furrows' interval was the prescribed margin (Kilaim, ii, 6). The blank spaces represent such margins often tapering to save ground. In a vineyard wide spaces were often left between the vines, for whose roots a radius of four cubits was allowed, and the rest of the space cropped; so herb-gardens stood in the midst of vineyards (Peah, v, 5). Similar arrangements were observed in the case of a field of grain with olives about and amidst it.

Jewish Corn-field, with Olive-trees.

Anciently, as now, in Palestine and the East the arable lands were not divided into fields by fences, as in most countries. The ripening products therefore presented an expanse of culture unbroken, although perhaps variegated, in a large view, by the difference of the products grown. The boundaries of lands were therefore marked by stones as landmarks, which, even in patriarchal times, it was deemed a heinous wrong to remove (Job xxiv, 2); and the law pronounced a curse upon those who, without authority, disturbed them (Deut. xix, 14; xxvii, 17). The walls and hedges which are occasionally mentioned in Scripture belonged to orchards, gardens, and vineyards. See GARDEN. Fields and floors were not commonly enclosed; vineyards mostly were, with a tower and other buildings (Num. xxii, 24; Psa. lxxx, 13; Isa. v, 5; Matt. xxi, 33; comp. Jud. vi, 11). Banks of mud from ditches were also used. See WALL.

With regard to occupancy, a tenant might pay a fixed moneyed rent (Cant. viii, 11)—in which case he was called סֹכֵר, soker', a mercenary, and was compellable to keep the ground in good order—or a stipulated share of the fruits (2 Sam. ix, 10; Matt. xxi, 34), often a half or a third; but local custom was the only rule; in this case he was called מְכַבֵּל, mekabbel', lessee, and was more protected, the owner sharing the loss of a short or spoiled crop; so, in case of locusts, blight, etc., the year's rent was to be abated; or he might receive such share as a salary—an inferior position—the term which described him was שֹׁכֵר, choker', manager on shares (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 1955). It was forbidden to sow flax during a short occupancy (hence leases for terms of years would seem to have been common), lest the soil should be unduly exhausted (comp. Virgil, Georg. i, 77). A passer-by might eat any quantity of corn or grapes, but not reap or carry off fruit (Deut. xxiii, 24, 25; Matt. xii, 1).

The rights of the corner (q. v.) to be left, and of gleanings (q. v.), formed the poor man's claim on the soil for support. For his benefit, too, a sheaf forgotten in carrying to the floor was to be left; so, also, with regard to the vineyard and the olive-grove (Lev. xix, 9, 10; Deut. xxiv, 19). Besides, there seems a probability that every third year a second tithe, besides the priests', was paid for the poor (Deut. xiv, 28; xxvi, 12; Amos iv, 4; Tob. i, 7; Joseph. Ant. iv, 8, 22). On this doubtful point of the poor man's tithe (מַסְרֵי אֲנִי, masar' ani') see a learned note by Surenhusius, ad Peak, viii, 2. See TITHES. These rights, in case two poor men were partners in occupancy, might be conveyed by each to the other for half the field, and thus retained between them (Maimon. ad Peak, v, 5). Sometimes a charitable owner declared his ground common, when its fruits, as those of the sabbatical year, went to the poor. For three years the fruit of newly-planted trees was deemed un-circumcised and forbidden; in the fourth it was holy, as first-fruits; in the fifth it might be ordinarily eaten (Mishna, Orlah, passim). See POOR.

V. Agricultural Operations and Implements.—Of late years much light has been thrown upon the agricultural operations and implements of ancient times, by the discovery of various representations on the sculptured monuments and painted tombs of Egypt, and (to some degree) of Assyria. As these agree surprisingly with the notices in the Bible, and, indeed, differ little from what we still find employed in Syria and Egypt, it is very safe to receive them as guides on the present subject (see also Gorse's Assyria, p. 560).

1. Ploughing has always been a light and superficial operation in the East. At first, the ground was opened with pointed sticks; then a kind of hoe was employed; and this, in many parts of the world, is still used as a substitute for the plough. But the plough was known in Egypt and Syria before the Hebrews became cultivators (Job i, 14). At first it was little more than a stout branch of a tree, from which projected another limb, shortened and pointed. This, being turned into the ground, made the furrow; while at the farther end of the larger branch was fastened a transverse yoke, to which the oxen were harnessed. Afterward a handle to guide the plough was added. The Syrian plough is, and doubtless was, light enough for a man to carry in his hand (Russell's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, i, 73). The plough, probably, was like the Egyptian, and the process of ploughing like that called scarification by the Romans ("Syria tenui sulco arat," Plin. xviii, 47), one yoke of oxen mostly sufficing to draw it. Mountains and rough places were hoed (Isa. vii, 5; Maimon. ad Mishn. vi, Ancient Egyptians Hoeing and Sowing the Land, and tilling Trees.

Modern Syrian Ploughing.

2; Robinson, iii, 595, 602-3). The breaking up of new land was performed, as with the Romans, in "early spring" (vere novo). Such new ground and fallows, the use of which latter was familiar to the Jews (Jer. iv, 3; Hos. x, 12), were cleared of stones and of thorns (Is. v, 2; Genura Hierosol. ad loc.) early in the year, sowing or gathering from "among thorns" being a proverb for slovenly husbandry (Job v, 5; Prov. xxiv, 30, 31; Robinson, ii, 127). Virgin land was ploughed a second time. The proper words are פָּתַח, pathach', to open, and סָדַד, saddal', to level (by cross ploughing, Varro, De Re Rustica, i, 32); both are distinctively used in Is. xxviii, 24. Land already tilled was ploughed before the rains, that the moisture might the better penetrate (Maimon. ap. Ugol. De Re Rust. v, 11). Rain, however, or irrigation (Is. xxxii, 20) prepared the soil for the sowing, as may be inferred from the prohibition to irrigate till the gleanings was over, lest the poor should suffer (Peak, v, 3); and such sowing often took place without previous ploughing, the seed, as in the parable of the sower, being scattered broadcast, and ploughed in afterward, the roots of the late crop being so far decayed as to serve for manure (Fellows, Asia Minor, p. 72). Where the soil was heavier, the ploughing was best done dry ("dum siccâ tellure licet," Virg. Georg. i, 214); and there, though not generally, the hoeing (sarratio, חרשׁת, idhar', dressing), and even the liratio, or ridging, of Roman husbandry, performed with tabule affixed to the sides of the share, might be useful (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Aratrum). But the more formal routine of heavy western soils must not be made the standard of such a naturally fine tilth as that of Palestine generally (comp. Columella, ii, 12). During the rains, if not too heavy, or between their two periods, would be the best time for these operations; thus 70 days before the passover was the time prescribed for sowing for the "waven-sheaf," and, probably, therefore, for that of barley generally. The plough was drawn by oxen, which were sometimes urged by a scourge (Isa. x, 26; Nahum iii, 2), but oftener by a long staff, furnished at one end with a flat piece of metal for clearing the plough, and at the other with a spike for goading the oxen. This ox-goat (q. v.) might easily be used as a spear (Judg. iii, 31; 1 Sam. xiii, 21). Sometimes men followed the plough with hoes to break the clods (Isa.

xxviii, 24); but in later times a kind of harrow was employed, which appears to have been then, as now, merely a thick block of wood, pressed down by a weight, or by a man sitting on it, and drawn over the ploughed field. See PLOUGH.

2. Sowing.—The ground, having been ploughed as soon as the autumnal rains had mollified the soil, was fit, by the end of October, to receive the seed; and the sowing of wheat continued, in different situations, through November into December. Barley was not generally sown till January and February. The seed appears to have been sown and harrowed at the same time, although sometimes it was ploughed in by a cross furrow. See SOWING.

Occasionally, however, the sowing was by patches only in well-manured spots, a process called מְנַמְנֵם, menammer', variegating like a leopard, from its spotted appearance, as represented in the accompanying drawing by Surenhusius (i, 45) to illustrate the Mishna.

Jewish Field sown in Clumps.

3. Ploughing in the Seed.—The Egyptian paintings illustrate the Scriptures by showing that in those soils which needed no previous preparation by the hoe (for breaking the clods) the sower followed the plough, holding in the left hand a basket of seed, which he scattered with the right hand, while another person filled a fresh basket. We also see that the mode of sowing was what we call "broadcast," in which the seed is thrown loosely over the field (Matt. xiii, 3-8). In Egypt, when the levels were low, and the water had continued long upon the land, they often dispensed with the plough altogether; and probably, like the present inhabitants, broke up the ground with hoes, or simply dragged the moist mud with bushes after the seed had been thrown upon the surface. To this cultivation without ploughing Moses probably alludes (Deut. xi, 10), when he tells the Hebrews that the land to which they were going was not like the land of Egypt, where they "sowed their seed, and watered it with their foot, as a garden of herbs." It seems, however, that even in Syria, in sandy soils, they sow without ploughing, and then plough down the seed (Russell's N. H. of Aleppo, i, 73, etc.). It does not appear that any instrument resembling our harrow was known; the word סַדַּד', saddal', rendered to har- row, in Job xxxix, 10, means literally to break the clods, and is so rendered in Isa. xxviii, 24; Hos. x, 11; and for this purpose the means used have been already indicated. The passage in Job, however, is important. It shows that this breaking of the clods was not always by the hand, but that some kind of instrument was drawn by an animal over the ploughed field, most probably the rough log which is still in use. See HARROW. The readiest way of brushing over the soil is by means of a bundle composed simply of thorn bushes. In highly-irrigated spots the seed was trampled in by cattle (Isa. xxxii, 20) as in Egypt by goats (Wilkinson, i, p. 39, 2d ser.).

4. Harvest.—The custom of watching ripening crops and threshing-floors against theft or damage (Robinson, i, 490; ii, 18, 83, 99) is probably ancient. Thus Boaz slept on the floor (Ruth iii, 4, 7). Barley ripened a week or two before wheat; and, as fine harvest weather was certain (Prov. xxvi, 1; 1 Sam. xii, 17; Amos iv, 7), the crop chiefly varied with the quantity of timely rain. The period of harvest must always have differed according to elevation, aspect, etc. (Robinson, i, 430, 551). The proportion of harvest gathered to seed sown was often vast, a hundred-fold is mentioned, but in such a way as to signify that it was a limit rarely attained (Gen. xxvi, 12; Matt. xiii, 8). Among the Israelites, as with all other people, the harvest was a season of joy, and this is more than once alluded to in Scripture (Psa. cxxvi, 5; Isa. ix, 13). See HARVEST.

5. Reaping.—In the most ancient times the corn was plucked up by the roots, which continued to be the practice with particular kinds of grain after the sickle was known. In Egypt, at this day, barley and "door-

Palestine, by the consideration pointed out by Russell (N. H. of Aleppo, i, 74), who states that "wheat, as well as barley in general, does not grow half as high as in Britain; and is therefore, like other grain, not reaped with the sickle, but plucked up by the roots with the hand. In other parts of the country, where the corn grows ranker, the sickle is used." When the sickle was used, the wheat was either cropped off under the ear or cut close to the ground. In the former case, the straw was afterward plucked up for use; in the latter, the stubble was left and burned on the ground for manure. As the Egyptians needed not such manure, and were economical of straw, they generally followed the former method; while the Israelites, whose lands derived benefit from the burned stubble, used the latter, although the practice of cutting off the ears was also known to them (Job xxiv, 24). Cropping the ears short, the Egyptians did not generally bind them into sheaves, but removed them in baskets. Sometimes, however, they bound them into sheaves; and such as they plucked up were bound into single long sheaves. The Israelites apreaping-hook, while the other had more resemblance in its shape to a scythe, and some of the Egyptian examples appear to have been toothed. This last is probably the same as the Hebrew maggal, which is indeed rendered by scythe in the margin of Jer. 1, 16. See SICKLE.

The reapers were the owners and their children, men-servants and women-servants, and day-laborers (Ruth ii, 4, 6, 21, 23; John iv, 36; James v, 4). Refreshments were provided for them, especially drink, of which the pear generally to have made up their corn into sheaves (Gen. xxxvii, 7; Lev. xxiii, 10-15; Ruth ii, 7, 15; Job xxiv, 10; Jer. ix, 22; Mich. iv, 12), which were collected into a heap, or removed in a cart (Amos ii, 13) to the threshing-floor. The carts were probably similar to those which are still employed for the same purpose. See WAGON. The sheaves were never made up into shocks, as with us, although the word occurs in our translation of Judg. xv, 5; Job v, 26; for the original term signifies neither a shock composed of a few sheaves standing temporarily in the field, nor a stack of many sheaves in the home yard, properly thatched, to stand for a length of time; but a heap of sheaves laid loosely together, in order to be trodden out as quickly as possible, in the same way as is done in the East at the present day (Brown, Antiq. of the Jews, ii, 591). Such heaps were sometimes fancifully arranged in the form of helmets (לְקִבְאוֹת, lekubaoth') or of turbans (לְקִמָּאוֹת, lekumasoth') [but see other explanations of these terms in Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 1960, 1051], or of a cake (לְחִרָרָא, lecharara'), as in the following illustration from Surenhusius (Mischna, ut sup.). See SHEAF.

Jewish Grain-field, with the Sheaves in Heaps of various Kinds.

With regard to sickles, there appear to have been two kinds, indicated by the different names חֶרְמֶשׁ, chermesh', and מַגְגָּל, maggal'; and as the former occurs only in the Pentateuch (Deut. xvi, 9; xxiii, 20), and the latter only in the Prophets (Jer. ii, 16; Joel i, 17), it would seem that the one was the earlier and the other the later instrument. But as we observe two very different kinds of sickles in use among the Egyptians, not only at the same time, but in the same field, it may have been so with the Jews also. The figures of these Egyptian sickles probably mark the difference between them. One was very much like our common Ancient Egyptian Reapers.

gleaners were allowed to partake (Ruth ii, 9). So in the Egyptian harvest-scenes (as above depicted), we perceive a provision of water in skins, hung against trees or in jars upon stands, with the reapers drinking, and gleaners applying to share the draught. Among the Israelites, gleanings was one of the stated provisions for the poor; and for their benefit the corners of the field were left unreaped, and the reapers might not return for a forgotten sheaf. The gleaners, however, were to obtain in the first place express permission of the proprietor or his steward (Lev. xix, 9, 10; Deut. xxiv, 19; Ruth ii, 2, 7). See REAPING; GLEANING.

6. Threshing.—Formerly the sheaves were conveyed from the field to the threshing-floor in carts; but now they are borne, generally, on the backs of camels and asses. The threshing-floor is a level plot of ground, of a circular shape, generally about fifty feet in diameter, prepared for use by beating down the earth till a hard floor is formed (Judg. vi, 37). Such floors were probably permanent, and became well-known spots (Gen. 1, 10, 11; 2 Sam. xxiv, 16, 18). Sometimes several of these floors are contiguous to each other. The sheaves are spread out upon them; and the grain is trodden out by oxen, cows, and young cattle, arranged usually five abreast, and driven in a circle, or rather in all directions, over the floor. This was the common mode in the Bible times; and Moses forbade that the oxen thus employed should be muzzled to prevent them from tasting the corn (Deut. xxv, 4; Isa. xxviii, 28). See MUZZLE.

Forks, or sticks, were only used in threshing small quantities, or for the lighter kinds of grain (Ruth ii, 17; Isa. xxviii, 27). There were, however, some kinds of threshing instruments, such as are still used in Egypt and Palestine. One of them is composed of two thick planks, fastened together side by side, and bent upward in front. Sharp fragments of stone are fixed into holes bored in the bottom. This machine is drawn over the corn by oxen—a man or boy sometimes sitting on it to increase the weight. It not only separates the grain, but cuts the straw and makes it fit for fodder (2 Kings xiii, 7). This is, most probably, the כַּרְוֵט , charuts, or "corn-drag," which is mentioned in Scripture (Isa. xxviii, 27; xli, 15; Amos i, 3; rendered "threshing instrument"), and would seem to have been sometimes furnished with iron points instead of stones. The Bible also notices a machine called a מֹרַיִף , morayif (2 Sam. xxiv, 22; 1 Chron. xxi, 23; Isa. xli, 15), which is unquestionably seen in Palestine; but is more used in some parts of Syria, and is common in Egypt. It is a sort of frame of wood, in which are inserted three wooden rollers armed with iron teeth, etc. It bears a sort of seat or chair, in which the driver sits to give the benefit of his weight. It is generally drawn over the corn by two oxen, and separates the grain, and breaks up the straw even more effectually than the drag. In all these processes, the corn is occasionally turned by a fork, and, when sufficiently threshed, is thrown up by the same fork against the wind to separate the grain, which is then gathered up and winnowed. Barley was sometimes soaked and then parched before treading out, which got rid of the pellicle of the grain. (See further the Antiquitates Trituræ, Ugolini, xxix.) See THRESHING.

the same which bears in Arabic the name of noreg (Wilkinson, ii, 130). It appears to have been similar to the Roman tribulum and the plastellum Punicum (Varr. de R. R. i, 52). This machine is not now often difference is very doubtful indicate a conspicuous part of ancient husbandry (Psa. xxxv, 5; Job xxi, 18; Isa. xvii, 13), and important, owing to the slovenly threshing. Evening was the favorite time (Ruth iii, 2), when there was mostly a breeze. The mizreh (scatterer, prob. = πρόσρον , Matt. iii, 12; Hom. Iliad, xviii, 588) was perhaps a broad shovel which threw the grain up against the wind; while the rachath (blower) may have been a fork (still used in Palestine for the same purpose) or a broad basket, in which it was tossed. The heap of produce customarily rendered in rent was sometimes so large as to cover the rachath (Mishna, Baba Mets'ah, ix, 2); this favors the latter view; again, the πρόσρον was a corn-measure in Cyprus (see Liddell and Scott, Lex. s. v. πρόσρον). The last process was the shaking in a sieve, קֶבֶרֶחַב , kebarah (cribrum), to separate dirt and refuse (Amos ix, 9).—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v. See FAN; SHOVEL; SIEVE.

Agrip'pa (Αγριππας , a frequent Roman name, signif. unknown [see Smith's Dict. of Class. Ling. s. v.]), the name of two of the members of the Herodian family (q. v.).

1. Grandson of Herod the Great, and son of Aristobulus and Berenice (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 1, 2; Wars, i, 28, 1). After various fortunes in Rome and Judæa (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6; Wars, ii, 9, 5), he received from Caligula, soon after his accession, the original territories of Philip (Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis) and the tetrarchy of Lysanias, with the title of king (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 10; Wars, ii, 9, 6; Philo, Opp. ii, 520). Returning to Palestine in the second year of Caligula (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 11), A. D. 38, he was soon afterward invested likewise with the tetrarchy of the banished Antipas (Galilee and Peræa), and finally by Claudius (to whom he had rendered important services at Rome during the changes of succession, Josephus, Ant. xix, 4; Wars, ii, 11) also with Samaria and Judæa (Josephus, Ant.

He sought to conciliate the Jews (Josephus, Ant. xix, 7, 3) not only by public munificence, but also by persecuting bigotry, as instanced by his murder of James and imprisonment of Peter (Acts xii, 1 sq.). His death at Casarea (Josephus, War, ii, 12, 6), in a terrible agony caused by worms (σκώληκες, Acts xii, 23; not vermin [see WORM]), is related by Josephus (Ant. xix, 8, 2) in almost the same terms. 2. The Agrippa before whom Paul was brought (Acts xxv, 13, 26) was the son of the foregoing, who died when he was only seventeen years old (Josephus, Ant. xix, 9, 1), and hence he did not succeed to his father's dominions (Joseph. Ant. xix, 9, 2); but he was allowed by Claudius (A.D. 48) to enjoy the principality of Chalcis, which his uncle Herod had held (Josephus, Ant. xx, 5, 2; War, ii, 12, 1), together with the superintendence of the Temple at Jerusalem, and the privilege of nominating the high-priest (Josephus, Ant. xx, i, 3), and four years afterward he was instated into the sovereignty of the former tetrarchy of Philip and Lysanias, with the title of king (Josephus, Ant. xx, 7, 1; War, ii, 12, 8)—an appellation that is applied to him likewise in the Mishna (Sotah, vii, 8). Still later Nero added Tiberias, Taricheæ, Julias, and fourteen neighboring villages to his jurisdiction (Josephus, Ant. xx, 8, 4). Agrippa contributed much to the adornment of Jerusalem and other cities (Josephus, Ant. xx, 8, 11; 9, 4); but yet he was held in no special esteem by the Jews, on account of his arbitrary appointment and deposition of the high-priests, and other mistakes in his administration (Josephus, War, iii, 17, 1). When the last war with the Romans broke out, he firmly joined their cause. He died at the age of nearly seventy years, in the fifty-first year of his reign (Phot. Bibl. 33).—Wiener, i, 485. 3. A son of Felix by Drusilla, who perished in an eruption of Vesuvius (Josephus, Ant. xx, 7, 2).

Agrippa, Marcus Vipsanius, born at Rome of an obscure family B.C. 63, and educated in company with Octavianus, afterward Augustus, by whom he was appointed to various responsible positions, which he filled with honor (Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v.). At the close of B.C. 17 he visited Jerusalem, at the invitation of Herod the Great, and conferred many privileges upon the Jews of Palestine (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 2) as well as in Ionia (Ant. xii, 3, 2, 1-4) and other provinces (Ant. xvi, 6, 4-7). He died, B.C. 12, in his 51st year, greatly lamented by his imperial patron. (Dio Cass. lib. 45-54; Liv. Epit. 117-137; Appian, Bell. Civ. lib. 5; Suet. Octav.; Trandsen, Hist. Undersuchung üb. M. Vip. Agrippa, Altona, 1836.) See AUGUSTUS.

Agrippa, Fonteius, probably the son of a Roman of the same name (Tacitus, Ann. ii, 30, 86), was proconsul of Asia Proconsularis in A.D. 67, and was recalled by Vespasian, who placed him over Mesia, A.D. 70 (Tacit. Hist. iii, 46). He was shortly afterward killed in battle with the Sarmatians (Josephus, War, vii, 4, 3).

Agrippa, Henry Cornelius, was born at Cologne Sept. 14th, 1487. He first followed the profession of arms, and served in the armies of Italy seven years with credit. Subsequently he took the degrees of doctor in law and medicine, and in 1509 had the chair of Professor of Sacred Literature at Dôle, in Franche-Comté. After passing over into England on some secret mission, he took up his abode at Cologne, where he delivered some theological lectures called Quodlibetals. His active mind was early turned to the so-called secret arts, and he belonged to a society for the promotion of them. In 1509-10 he wrote his treatise De Occulta Philosophia, which was kept in MS. until 1531. But now he appears to have returned to his first profession of arms, and served again with the Emperor Maximilian I, until he was called to the Council of Pisa, in 1511, by the cardinal of St. Croix. In 1515 he taught theology at Turin and Pavia, where he explained Mercurius Trismegistus. After his wife's death in 1519 he wandered about for the following twelve years from place to place, and eventually, in 1535, returned to France, where he was imprisoned for having written against Louisa of Savoy, the mother of Francis I. As soon as he was set at liberty he proceeded to Grenoble, where he died in the same year, 1535. It has been said that he became a Calvinist or Lutheran, but without foundation. Many authors accuse him of dealing in magic; and Paul Jovius, Delrio, and others speak harshly of him. He was styled the Trismegistus of his time, because he was learned in theology, medicine, and law.

Agrippa was a man of quick intellect and of varied knowledge: in many respects he was far in advance of his age. His Occulta Philosophia is a system of visionary philosophy, in which magic, the complement of philosophy, as he terms it, and the key of all the secrets of nature, is represented under the three forms of natural, celestial, and religious or ceremonial, agreeably to the threefold division of the corporeal, celestial, and intellectual worlds. He there enumerates, with a superficial show of scientific classification, the hidden powers which the Creator has assigned to the different objects of the creation, through the agency of the Spirit of the World. It was natural that Agrippa should become a partisan of Raymond Lull (q. v.), and he accordingly wrote a commentary on his Ars Magna. Nevertheless his caprice sometimes inclined him to opinions directly the reverse; and in such a mood he composed his cynical treatise, as he terms it, De Incertitudine et Vanitate Scientiarum. This work, which had great reputation in its day, occasionally presents us admirable remarks on the imperfections and defects of scientific pursuits. It contains also severe rebukes of the superstitions of Romish worship. He insisted on the Bible as the only rule of faith, and taught the necessity of a moral change through the Holy Spirit. Still he remained a Romanist to the end. Agrippa and his follower, John Weir, were of service to philosophy by opposing the belief in witchcraft. A full account of Agrippa is given in Meiners' Lives of Eminent Men, vol. i. His writings are collected in Opera II. C. Agrippæ (Lugd. 1560, 2 vols. 8vo); and a translation of the treatise De Incontinentiæ, etc., under the title The Vanity of Arts and Sciences, appeared in London (1684, 8vo). Ague, a disease of the fever kind, in which a cold shivering fit is succeeded by a hot one; in the Heb. קדדל, kaddal'ath, a kindling, a burning or inflammatory fever (Levit. xxvi, 16; Deut. xxviii, 22). See DISEASE.

Aguirre, JOSEPH SAENZ D', an eminent Spanish prelate, was born at Logroño, 1630, assumed the habit of the order of St. Benedict, and in 1668 took the degree of doctor at Salamanca, where he was chosen professor. He was afterward inquisitor, and in 1686 Innocent XI gave him the cardinal's hat as a return for the book which he had written against Gallicanism (q. v.). He was a man of acquirements, but strongly biased in favor of ultramontane views. He died at Rome August 19th, 1699. In 1671 he published three folios on philosophy, and in 1675 a work on Aristotle's Morals. His Treatise on the Virtues and Vices appeared in 1677; in this work he followed the principles of probability, which he abandoned in 1679. During the following two years he put forth at Salamanca his Theologia St. Anselmi, which he afterward printed at Rome, in three vols. fol. In 1683 he published his Defence of the Chair of St. Peter against the Declaration of the Gallican Clergy; but another work, entitled De Libertatibus Eccl. Gallicanæ, is incorrectly attributed to him, having been written by M. Charlas, a priest of the diocese of Pamiers, who composed it at Rome. He is, however, perhaps best known by his Collection of the Concils of Spain (Rome, 1693-4), and in which he inserted many original dissertations, some of which are attempts to defend the false decretals attributed to the early popes.

Agur (Heb. Agur', אגור, gathered), the author of the sayings contained in Prov. xxx, which the inscription describes as composed of the precepts delivered by "Agur, the son of Jakeh," to his friends "Ithiel and Ucal." Some writers have regarded the name as an appellative, but differ as to its signification (Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 22). The Vulg. has "Verba Congregantis filii Vomentis." Most of the rabbins and fathers think that Solomon himself is designated under this name, which they render collector, i. e. holder of a congregation (comp. Eccles. xii, 19); and if the word is to be understood as an appellative, it may be as well to look for its meaning in the Syriac, where, according to Bar Bahlul (in Castell. Lex.), agur means qui sapientie studiis se applicat, a sense that aptly designates Solomon. Most copies of the Sept. omit the chapter ascribed to AGUR, as well as the first nine verses of the following chapter; but insert verses 1-14 of this chap. between verses 23 and 24 of chap. xvii. That version renders the present verse thus: Τὸν ἐξ ἡμῶν λόγων, οὐκ, φοβήθητι, καὶ ἐξάμειος αὐτοῦ μετανόη. Ταῖς λέξει οὐ ἀνοή τοῖς πιστεύουσιν Οὐρ, καὶ παύσεται. Son, fear my words, and receive them with penitence. These things says the man to those that believe God, and I cease. Wimer (Reabwört. s. v.) argues that by Agur must be designated some otherwise unknown Israelite, since he is designated as the son of Jakeh (אגור בן יכח), a rarer form for אגור, and not Solomon, who, even in Eccles. (i, 1), is styled by his proper patronymic, "the son of David" (see Bertholdt, Einkl. v, 2193). See JAKEH. This argument, however, especially the latter part of it, is not of much force, since Solomon is elsewhere designated in Prov. by a symbolical name, in connection with his parentage (xxxii, 1). See LEMUEL. Prof. Stuart (Comment. in loc.) understands by Agur the son of a queen of Massa, a place which he locates near the head of the eastern fork of the Red Sea, and supposes to have been peopled by a Jewish colony. See MASSA.

Agynians or Agyniāni (from á negative, and γύνῃ, a woman), a sect belonging to the seventh century, and chiefly distinguished by their condemnation of marriage, and of the use of certain meats.

Ah- (Heb. Ach-, אַח, or אַחִי, אַחִי, brother of) occurs as the former part of many Heb. proper names, with a signification of relationship or property, similar to that contained in אב- (q. v.) or אבי-, father (Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 64), e. g. the names following; and likewise applied to females, e. g. אֲחִינֹאם, comp. אֲבִינוֹאם; indeed in some cases they are nearly interchangeable, e. g. אֲבִימֶלֶךְ, אֲחִימֶלֶךְ.

A'hab (Heb. Ahab', אַחָב, father's brother; Sept. Ἀχαάβ, Josephus Ἀχαάβος), the name of two men.

1. The son of Omri, and the eighth king of Israel, who reigned twenty-one years (current, B.C. 915-895), the preceding year apparently as viceroy in his father's old capital Tirzah, the weakest of all the Israelitish monarchs, although not without occasional good feelings and dispositions (Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.). Many of the evils of his reign may be ascribed to the close connection which he formed with the Phœnicians (Ewald, Isr. Gesch. iii, 169 sq.). There had long been a beneficial commercial intercourse between that people and the Jews, and the relations arising thence were very close in the times of David and Solomon. This connection appears to have been continued by the nearer kingdom of Israel, but to have been nearly, if not quite, abandoned by that of Judah. The wife of Ahab was Jezebel (q. v.), the daughter of Ethbaal or Ithobaal, king of Tyre, who had been priest of Astarte, but had usurped the throne of his brother Phaltes (compare Josephus, Ant. viii, 13, 2, with Apion. i, 18). She was a woman of a decided and energetic character, and soon acquired such influence over her husband that he sanctioned the introduction, and eventually established the worship of the Phœnician idols, and especially of the sun-god Baal. Hitherto the golden calves in Dan and Bethel had been the only objects of idolatrous worship in Israel, and they were intended as symbols of Jehovah. But now the king built a temple at Samaria, and erected an image and consecrated a grove to Baal. A multitude of the priests and prophets of Baal were maintained. Idolatry became the predominant religion; and Jehovah, with the golden calves as symbolical representations of him, were viewed with no more reverence than Baal and his image. But a man suited to this emergency was raised up in the person of Elijah, who boldly opposed the regal authority, and succeeded in retaining many of his countrymen in the worship of the true God.—Kitto, s. v. See ELIJAH.

The history of King Ahab is given in detail in the sacred narrative, 1 Kings xvi-xxii (see Obbarius, Gesch. d. Hauses Ahab, Nordh. 1754). One of his chief tastes was for splendid architecture, which he showed by building an ivory house and several cities, and also by ordering the restoration and fortification of Jericho, which seems to have belonged to Israel, and not to Judah, as it is said to have been rebuilt in the days of Ahab rather than in those of the contemporary king of Judah, Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xvi, 34). But the place in which he chiefly indulged this passion was the beautiful city of Jezreel (now Zerin), in the plain of Esdraelon, which he adorned with a palace and park for his own residence, though Samaria remained the capital of his kingdom. Desiring to add to his pleasure-grounds there the vineyard of his neighbor Naboth, he proposed to buy it or give land in exchange for it; and when this was refused by Naboth, in accordance with the Mosaic law, on the ground that the vineyard was "the inheritance of his fathers" (Lev. xxv, 23), a false accusation of blasphemy was brought against him, and not only was he himself stoned to death, but his sons also, as we learn from 2 Kings ix, 26. Elijah, already the great vindicator of religion, now appeared as the asserter of morality, and declared that the entire extirpation of Ahab's house was the penalty appointed for his long course of wickedness, now crowned by this atrocious crime. The execution, however, of this sentence was delayed in consequence of Ahab's deep repentance. (See Niemeyer, Charakt. v, 101). See NABOTH.

We read of three campaigns which Ahab undertook against Benhadad II, king of Damascus, two defensive and one offensive. See BENHADAD. In the first, Benhadad laid siege to Samaria, and Ahab, encouraged by the patriotic counsels of God's prophets, who, next to the true religion, valued most deeply the independence of his chosen people, made a sudden attack on him while, in the plenitude of arrogant confidence, he was banqueting in his tent with his 32 vassal kings. The Syrians were totally routed, and fled to Damascus. Next year Benhadad, believing that his failure was owing to some peculiar power which the God of Israel exercised over the hills, invaded Israel by way of Aphek, on the east of Jordan. Yet Ahab's victory was so complete that Benhadad himself fell into his hands, but was released (contrary to the will of God as announced by a prophet) on condition of restoring all the cities of Israel which he held, and making "streets" for Ahab in Damascus; that is, admitting into his capital permanent Hebrew commissioners, in an independent position, with special dwellings for themselves and their retinues, to watch over the commercial and political interests of Ahab and his subjects. This was apparently in retaliation for a similar privilege exacted by Benhadad's predecessor from Omri in respect to Samaria. After this great success Ahab enjoyed peace for three years, and it is difficult to account exactly for the third outbreak of hostilities, which in Kings is briefly attributed to an attack made by Ahab on Ramoth in Gilead on the east of Jordan, in conjunction with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, which town he claimed as belonging to Israel. But if Ramoth was one of the cities which Benhadad agreed to restore, why did Ahab wait for three years to enforce the fulfilment of the treaty? From this difficulty and the extreme bitterness shown by Benhadad against Ahab personally (1 Kings xxii, 31), it seems probable that this was not the case (or at all events that the Syrians did not so understand the treaty), but that Ahab, now strengthened by Jehoshaphat, who must have felt keenly the paramount importance of crippling the power of Syria, originated the war by assaulting Ramoth without any immediate provocation. In any case, God's blessing did not rest on the expedition, and Ahab was told by the prophet Micaiah that it would fail, and that the prophets who advised it were hurrying him to his ruin. For giving this warning Micaiah was imprisoned; but Ahab was so far roused by it as to take the precaution of disguising himself, so as not to offer a conspicuous mark to the archers of Benhadad. But he was slain by a "certain man who drew a bow at a venture;" and, though stayed up in his chariot for a time, yet he died toward evening, and his army dispersed. When he was brought to be buried in Samaria, the dogs licked up his blood as a servant was washing his chariot; a partial fulfilment of Elijah's prediction (1 Kings xxi, 19), which was more literally accomplished in the case of his son (2 Kings ix, 26). Josephus, however, substitutes Jezreel for Samaria in the former passage (Ant. viii, 15, 6).—Smith. See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

2. A false prophet who deceived the Israelites at Babylon, and was threatened by Jeremiah, who foretold that he should be put to death by the king of Babylon in the presence of those whom he had beguiled; and that in following times it should become a common malediction to say, "The Lord make thee like Ahab and Zedekiah, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire" (Jer. xxix, 21, 22), B.C. 594. The rabbins, followed by several expositors, believe that this Ahab and his associate Zedekiah were the two elders that conspired against the chastity and life of Susanna, as related in the Apocrypha; but their punishment appears to have been by stoning (Penz, De supplicio Achabi, etc. Lpz. 1736). See SUSANNA.

Ahar'ah (Heb. Achrah', אַחְרָא, perh. after the brother; Sept. 'Ααρὰ), the third son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 1), elsewhere called ENI (Gen. xlii, 21), AHIRAM (Numb. xxvi, 38), and AHER (1 Chron. vii, 12). See AHIRAM.

Ahar'el (Heb. Acharchel', אַחְרֵל, appar. born behind the breastwork; Sept. ἀχάρηλος Πηγάβ), a son of Harum, whose families are named as among the lineage of Coz, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 8). B.C. post 1612. See HARUM.

Ahas'ai (Heb. Achazay', אַחָזַי, prob. a prolonged form of Ahaz; Sept. omits, Vulg. Ahuzi), a grandson of Immer and grandfather of Amashai (Neb. xi, 13). Gesenius thinks him the same with JAHZERAM (q. v.), who is made the great-grandson of Immer in 1 Chron. ix, 12.

Ahas'bai (Heb. Achasbay', אַחָשְׁבַי, prob. blooming; Sept. 'Αχασβαί υ. τ. Ασβίτιμ), a Maachathite, father of one of David's warriors, Eliphalet (2 Sam. xxiii, 34); apparently called UR (q. v.) in the parallel passage (1 Chron. xi, 35).

Ahasuë'rus (Heb. Achashveirosh', אַחַשְׁוֵרֹשׁ, prob. the Hebrew form of Xerxes; Tobit xiv, 15, 'Ασβήρος), the name, or rather the title, of three or four Median and Persian monarchs in the Bible. See MEDIA; PERSIA. The true native orthography of the name Xerxes, long a subject of dispute (Simonis Lett. V. T. p. 580; Jahn, Einleit. ins A. T. p. 299; Pott, Etymol. Forsch. i, 65; Hyde, Rel. Vet. Pers. p. 43), has recently been brought to light from the cuneiform inscriptions of Persepolis (Grotefend, in Heeren's Ideen, i, 2, pl. 4), where it is written khschyārshā (Niebuhr, ii, p. 24), or Khsarsu (Lassen, Keilschr. p. 23), which seems to correspond to the modern Persian shyrr-shah, honking (Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 75), corresponding nearly to the interpretation, ἀσβήρος, given by Herodotus (vi, 98). It may be of service here to prefix a chronological table of the Medo-Persian kings from Cyrus to Artaxerxes Longimanus, according to their ordinary classical names. The Scriptural names conjectured to correspond to them are added in italics. See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS; HIEROGLYPHICS.

1. CYRUS, king of Media, son of Phraortes, grandson of Deïoces, and conqueror of Nineveh, began to reign B.C. 634. "Ahasuerus" 4.
2. ASTYGES, his son, last king of Media, B.C. 594. "Ahasuerus" 1.
3. CYRUS, son of his daughter Mandane and Cambyses, a Persian noble, first king of Persia, 559. "Cyrus."
4. CAMBLYSES his son, 529. "Ahasuerus" 2.
5. A Median usurper, who personates Smerdis, the younger son of Cyrus, 521. "Artaxerxes" 1.
6. DARIUS HYSTASPIS, raised to the throne on the overthrow of the Magi, 521. "Darius" 2.
7. XERXES, his son, 485. "Ahasuerus" 3.
8. ARTAXERXES LONGIMANUS (Macrocheir), his son, 465-495. "Artaxerxes" 2.

1. The first Ahasuerus (Sept. 'Ασβήρος, Theodotion $\Xi\sigma\rho\zeta\eta\varsigma$ is incidentally mentioned in Dan. ix, 1 as the father of Darius (q. v.) the Mede. It is generally agreed that the person here referred to is the ASTYAGES (q. v.) of profane history. (Jehring, in the Biblioth. Brem. viii, 565 sq.; Bertholdt, Excurs. zum Dan. ii, 848 sq.) According to others, however (Rawlinson's Herodotus, i, ess. 3, § 11), his father, Cyaxares (q. v.), is meant, as in Tobit xiv, 15.

2. The second Ahasuerus (Sept. Ἀσασίηρος) occurs in Ezra iv, 6, where it is said that in the beginning of his reign the enemies of the Jews wrote an accusation against them, the result of which is not mentioned (Hävernick, Einkl. ii, i, 296). Chronologers have been very much divided in identifying this prince with those mentioned in profane history (Prudeau's Connection; Gray's Key; Tomline's Elements; Hale's Analysis; Ussher's Annals); so much so that some author or another has sought to identify him in turn with each personage in the line of Persian kings, unless it be Cyrus and Smerdis. The form of the word favors Xerxes, but this is inconclusive, as it is rather a title than a distinctive proper name. The account of Josephus (Ant. xii, 6) favors the popular identification with Artaxerxes Longimanus, but his testimony is mere opinion in such a case, and this king is elsewhere mentioned in this very book of Scripture (Ezra vii, 1) by his usual name. The order of time in the sacred narrative itself requires us to understand CAMBYSES (q. v.), son of Cyrus, who came to the throne B.C. 529, and died after a reign of seven years and five months. His character was proverbially furious and despotic. Much confusion has been caused by mistaking this Ahasuerus for the following (Stud. u. Krit. 1847, iii, 660, 669, 678).

3. The third Ahasuerus (Sept. Ἀραξίρξης) is the Persian king of the book of Esther. The chief facts recorded of him there, and the dates of their occurrence, which are important in the subsequent inquiry, are these: In the third year of his reign he made a sumptuous banquet for all his nobility, and prolonged the feast for 180 days. Being on one occasion merry with wine, he ordered his queen, Vashti, to be brought out, to show the people her beauty. On her refusal thus to make herself a gazing-stock, he not only indignantly divorced her, but published an edict concerning her disobedience, in order to insure to every husband in his dominions the rule in his own house. In the seventh year of his reign he married Esther, a Jewess, who, however, concealed her parentage. In the twelfth year of his reign his minister Haman, who had received some slights from Mordecai the Jew, offered him 10,000 talents of silver for the privilege of ordering a massacre of the Jews in all parts of the empire on an appointed day. The king refused this immense sum, but acceded to his request; and couriers were despatched to the most distant provinces to enjoin the execution of this decree. Before it was accomplished, however, Mordecai and Esther obtained such an influence over him that he so far annulled his recent enactment as to despatch other couriers to empower the Jews to defend themselves manfully against their enemies on that day; and the result of which was that they slew 800 of his native subjects in Shushan, and 75,000 of them in the provinces. (See Jour. Sac. Lit. July, 1860, p. 385 sq.)

The same diversity among chronologers has existed with reference to the identification of this Ahasuerus as with the preceding, with whom he has usually been confounded. But the circumstances under which he is mentioned do not well comport with those under which any other of the Persian kings are introduced to us in Scripture. Now from the extent assigned to the Persian empire (Esth. i, 1), "from India even unto Ethiopia," it is proved that Darius Hystaspis is the earliest possible king to whom this history can apply, and it is hardly worth while to consider the claims of any after Artaxerxes Longimanus. But Ahasuerus cannot be identical with Darius, whose wives were the daughters of Cyrus and Otanes, and who in name and character equally differs from that foolish tyrant. Josephus (Ant. xi, 6, 1) makes him to be Artaxerxes Longimanus; but as his twelfth year (Esth. iii, 7) would fall in B.C. 454, or 144 years after the deportation by Nebuchadnezzar, in B.C. 598 (Jer. lii, 28), Mordecai, who was among those captives (Esth. ii, 6), could not possibly have survived to this time. Besides, in Ezra vii, 1-7, 11-26, Artaxerxes, in the seventh year of his reign, issues a decree very favorable to the Jews, and it is unlikely, therefore, that in the twelfth (Esth. iii, 7) Haman could speak to him of them as if he knew nothing about them, and persuade him to sentence them to an indiscriminate massacre. Nor is the disposition of Artaxerxes Longimanus, as given by Plutarch and Diodorus (xi, 71), at all like that of this weak Ahasuerus. It therefore seems necessary to identify him with XERXES (q. v.), whose regal state and affairs tally with all that is here said of Ahasuerus (the names being, as we have seen, identical); and this conclusion is fortified by the resemblance of character, and by certain chronological indications (see Rawlinson's Hist. Evidences, p. 150 sq.). As Xerxes scourged the sea, and put to death the engineers of his bridge because their work was injured by a storm, so Ahasuerus repudiated his queen, Vashti, because she would not violate the decorum of her sex, and ordered the massacre of the whole Jewish people to gratify the malice of Haman. In the third year of the reign of Xerxes was held an assembly to arrange the Grecian war (Herod. vii, 78q.); in the third year of Ahasuerus was held a great feast and assembly in Shushan the palace (Esth. i, 3). In the seventh year of his reign Xerxes returned defeated from Greece, and consoled himself by the pleasures of the harem (Herod. ix, 108); in the seventh year of his reign "fair young virgins were sought" for Ahasuerus, and he replaced Vashti by marrying Esther. The tribute he "laid upon the land and upon the isles of the sea" (Esth. x, 1) may well have been the result of the expenditure and ruin of the Grecian expedition. Throughout the book of Esther in the Sept. Artaxerxes is written for Ahasuerus, but on this no argument of any weight can be founded. See ESTHER.

Xerxes was the second son of Darius Hystaspis, whom he succeeded on the throne about B.C. 486, and was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes Longimanus about B.C. 466 (omitting the seven months' reign of the usurper Artabanus). He is famous in history from his memorable invasion of Greece at the head of an army of more than three millions, who were repulsed by the little band of Spartans at Thermopylae, and, after burning the city of Athens, were broken to pieces, and the remnant, with the king, compelled to return with disgrace to Persia (Baumgarten, De fide Esth. p. 141 sq.; De Wette, Einkl. i, 274; Petavius, Doctrina Temp. xv, 27; Kelle, Vindice Esth. Freib. 1820; Rambach, Annotat. ii, 1046; Bertholdt, Einkl. v, 2422; Scaliger, Emend. Temp. l. vi; Justi, Neue Abhandl. i, 38 sq.; Gesenius, Thec. Heb. i, 75).

4. The fourth Ahasuerus (Ἀσασίηρος) is mentioned (Tobit xiv, 15), in connection with Nabuchodonosor (i. e. Nabopolassar), as the destroyer of Nineveh (Herod. i, 106); a circumstance that points to CYAXARES (q. v.) I (Polybius ap. Syncell. p. 210), a Median king, son of Phraortes, and father of Astyages (Ilgen, Comment. in loc.).

Aha'va (Heb. Aha'va', אַחַוָּא, prob. water; Sept. Ἀχάει in Ezra viii, 21, 31, but Ἐβει v. r. 'Ezer in verse 15), the "river" (נָּהָר) which the Jewish exiles assembled their second caravan under Ezra, in returning from Babylon to Jerusalem; or, rather, as appears from verse 15 ("the river that runneth to Ahava"), the name of some spot (according to Michaelis, a city; comp. De Wette, Einkl. ii, i, 289; but more probably the river Euphrates itself, which is still called "the river" by way of eminence, Gesenius, Heb. Lex. s. v.), in the direction of which the stream where they encamped ran. Some have inferred from the mention of Casiphia (q. v.), apparently in the same neighborhood (ver. 17), that the place in question was situated near the Caspian Sea, or, at least, in Media; but this would be entirely out of the required direction, and no corresponding name has been found in that vicinity. Others have sought the Ahava in the Lycus or Little Zab, finding that this river was anciently called Adiaba or Diaba (i. e. of Adiabene, Amnian. Marcel. xxiii, 6; comp. Mannert, v, 429). But these names would, in Hebrew, have no resemblance to אַחַז; and it is exceedingly unlikely that the rendezvous for a Palestine caravan should have been in the north-eastern part of Assyria, with the Tigris and Euphrates between them and the plains they were to traverse (Le Clerc, in loc.). Rosenmüller, on the other hand, supposes (Bibl. Geogr. I, ii, 93) that it lay to the south-west of Babylonia, because that was in the direction of Palestine; but caravan routes seldom run straight between two places. In this case a straight line would have taken the caravan through the whole breadth of a desert seldom traversed but by the Arabs; and to avoid this the usual route for large caravans lay, and still lies, north-west through Mesopotamia, much above Babylonia; and then, the Euphrates being crossed, the direction is south-west to Palestine. The greater probability, therefore, is that the "river" in question (whether the Ahava itself or a branch running into it) was one of the streams or canals of Mesopotamia communicating with the Euphrates, somewhere in the north-west of Babylonia. The name, however, may be the designation of a place, and the latest researches are in favor of its being the modern Hit, on the Euphrates, due east of Damascus, the name of which is known to have been in the post-biblical times Ht, or Jehe de-levra (Talm. סְרַיָּה דְּסַרְיָה), "the spring of bitumen" (Rawlinson's Herodotus, i, 346, note). But this is rather the Ava (q. v.) or Ivah of 2 Kings xvii, 24, 30. In the parallel passage of the Apocrypha (1 Esdr. viii, 41, 60) the name is given Theras (Θεράς). Josephus (Ant. xi, 5, 2) merely says "beyond the Euphrates" (εἰς τὸ πέραν τοῦ Εὐφράτου).

A'haz (Heb. Achaz, אַחַז, possessor), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Ααζ v. r. Ααζ.) A great grandson of Jonathan, son of King Saul, being one of the four sons of Micah, and the father of Jehoiahah or Jarah (1 Chron. viii, 35; ix, 42). B.C. post 1037.

2. (Sept. and N. T. Ααζ, Josephus Ααζ, Auth. Vers. "Achaz," Matt. i, 9.) The son and successor of Jotham, being the twelfth king of the separate kingdom of Judah, who reigned fourteen years, B.C. 740-726 (besides two years as viceroy under his father). In 2 Kings xvi, 2, he is said to have ascended the throne at the age of 20 years. This has been regarded as a transcriber's error for 25, which number is found in one Hebrew MS., the Peshito, and Arabic version of 2 Chron. xxviii, 1; for otherwise his son Hezekiah was born when he was eleven years old (so Clinton, Fasti Hell. i, 318). But it more probably refers to a still earlier viceroyship at the date of his father's full coronation (2 Kings xv, 32, 33), B.C. 756. At the time of his accession, Rezin, king of Damascus, and Pekah, king of Israel, had recently formed a league against Judah, and they proceeded to lay siege to Jerusalem, intending to place on the throne Ben-Tabeal, who was not a prince of the royal family of Judah, but probably a Syrian noble. Upon this the prophet Isaiah, full of zeal for God and patriotic loyalty to the house of David, hastened to give advice and encouragement to Ahaz (see Richardson's Sermans, ii, 186), and it was probably owing to the spirit of energy and religious devotion which he poured into his counsels that the allies failed in their attack on Jerusalem. Thus much, together with anticipations of danger from the Assyrians, and a general picture of weakness and unfaithfulness both in the king and the people, we find in the famous prophecies of the 7th, 8th, and 9th chapters of Isaiah, in which he seeks to animate and support them by the promise of the Messiah. From 2 Kings xvi, and 2 Chron. xxviii, we learn that the allies took a vast number of captives, who, however, were restored in virtue of the remonstrances of the prophet Oded; and that they also inflicted a most severe injury on Judah by the capture of Elath, a flourishing port on the Red Sea, in which, after expelling the Jews, they re-established the Edomites (according to the true reading of 2 Kings xvi, 6, אֲדוֹמִיִּם בְּעַלְמֵי־אֵלָתַיִם), who attacked and wasted the east part of Judah, while the Philistines invaded the west and south. The weak-minded and helpless Ahaz sought deliverance from these numerous troubles by appealing to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who freed him from his most formidable enemies by invading Syria, taking Damascus, killing Rezin, and depriving Israel of its northern and Transjordanic districts—an extension of their dominions for which the Assyrians had been already preparing (see Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.). But Ahaz had to purchase this help at a costly price; he became tributary to Tiglath-pileser, sent him all the treasures of the Temple and his own palace, and even appeared before him in Damascus as a vassal. He also ventured to seek for safety in heathen ceremonies, despite the admonitions of Isaiah, Hosea, and Micah; making his son pass through the fire to Moloch, consulting wizards and necromancers (Isa. viii, 19), sacrificing to the Syrian gods, introducing a foreign (originally Assyrian, apparently, Rawlinson, Hist. Evidences, p. 117) altar from Damascus, and probably the worship of the heavenly bodies from Assyria and Babylon, as he would seem to have set up the horses of the sun mentioned in 2 Kings xxiii, 11 (comp. Tacit. Ann. xii, 13); and "the altars on the top (or roof) of the upper chamber of Ahaz" (2 Kings xxiii, 12) were connected with the adoration of the stars. See ASTROLOGY. The worship of Jehovah became neglected, and the Temple at length altogether closed. We see another and blameless result of this intercourse with an astronomical people in the "sundial of Ahaz" (Is. xxxviii, 8). See DIAL. He died at the age of fifty years, and his body was refused a burial in the royal sepulchre (2 Kings xvi; 2 Chron. xxviii; Isa. vii). He was succeeded by his son Hezekiah (see Simeon's Works, iv, 177).—Smith, s. v. See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

Ahazi'ah (Heb. Achazyah, אַחִיזְיָהוּ, held by Jehorah, 2 Kings i, 2; ix, 16, 23, 27, 29; xi, 2; 2 Chron. xx, 35; elsewhere in the prolonged form, Achazy'ahu, אַחִיזְיָהוּ; Sept. Ὀυαζιας, but v. r. Ὀζιας in 1 Chron. iii, 11), the name of two Jewish kings.

1. The son and successor of Ahab, and ninth king of Israel, who reigned two years (current, B.C. 895-4). Under the influence of his mother, Jezebel, Ahaziah pursued the evil courses of his father. The most signal public event of his reign was the revolt of the vassal king of the Moabites, who took the opportunity of the defeat and death of Ahab to discontinue the tribute which he had paid to the Israelites, consisting of 100,000 lambs and as many rams, with their wool (comp. Isa. xvi, 1). The difficulty of enforcing this tribute was enhanced by the fact that after the battle of Ramoth in Gilead [see AHAB] the Syrians had the command of the country along the east of Jordan, and they cut off all communication between the Israelites and Moabites. Ahaziah became a party in the attempt of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, to revive the maritime traffic by the Red Sea, in consequence of which the enterprise was blasted, and came to nothing (2 Chron. xx, 35-37). Soon after, Ahaziah, having been much injured by a fall from the roof-gallery of his palace, had the infatuation to send to consult the oracle of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, respecting his recovery. But the messengers were met and sent back by Elijah, who announced to the king that he should rise no more from the bed on which he lay (1 Kings xxii, 51, to 2 Kings i, 50).—Kitto, s. v. See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

2. The son of Jehoram by Athaliah (daughter of Ahab and Jezebel), and sixth king of the separate kingdom of Judah; otherwise called JEHOIAHIZ (2 Chron. xxi, 17; xxv, 23), and AZARIAH (2 Chron. xxii, 6). In 2 Kings viii, 26, we read that he was 22 years old at his succession, but in 2 Chron. xxii, 2, that his age at that time was 42. The former number is certainly right (comp. ver. 1), as in 2 Chron. xxi, 5, 20, we see that his father Jehoram was 40 when he died, which would make him younger than his own son, so that a transcriber must have confounded כב (22) and כב (42). (See the treatises on this difficulty in Latin by Lilienthal [Regiom. 1750], and in German by Mühlenfeld [Nordhaus. 1753].) He reigned but one year (B.C. 884-883), and that ill, being guided by his idolatrous mother (2 Kings viii, 24-29). He joined his uncle Jehoram of Israel in an expedition against Hazael, king of Damascus-Syria, for the recovery of Ramoth-Gilead, and afterward paid him a visit while he lay wounded in his summer palace of Jezreel. The two kings rode out in their several chariots to meet Jehu (q. v.); and when Jehoram was shot through the heart Ahaziah attempted to escape, but was pursued as far as the pass of Gur, and being there mortally wounded, had only strength to reach Megiddo, where he died (Grammüller, Harmonia vite Achasior, Jen. 1717). His body was conveyed by his servants in a chariot to Jerusalem for interment (2 Kings ix, 22-28). The variation in 2 Chron. xxii, 7-9, is not substantial (see Poole's Synopsis, in loc.). It appears from the latter passage that Jehu was right in considering Ahaziah as included in his commission to root out the house of Ahab, his presence in Jezreel at the time of Jehu's operations being an arrangement of Providence for accomplishing his doom. See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

Ah'ban (Heb. Achban', אַחְבָּן, brother of the wise, i. e. discreet, otherwise = אַחְבָּן, amiable; Sept. Ἀχαβάν v. r. Ὀζά, Vulg. Ahobban), the first named of the two sons of Abishur by Abihail, of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 29), B.C. long after 1612.

A'her (Heb. Acher', אַחֵר, after; Sept. Ἀόρ), a descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 12), the same person as AHARAH (1 Chron. viii, 1), or AHIRAM (q. v.).

A'hi (Heb. Achi', אַחִי, my brother [comp. AHI-], the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Ἀχί.) The first named of the four sons of Shamer, a chieftain of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 34), B.C. long post 1612.

2. (Sept. ἀδελφός, but most copies omit.) A son of Abdiel, and chieftain of the tribe of Gad, resident in Bashan (1 Chron. v, 15), B.C. apparently cir. 782.

Ahi-. See AHI.

Ahi'ah, another mode of Anglicizing (1 Sam. xiv, 3, 18; 1 Kings iv, 3; 1 Chron. viii, 7) the name AHIAH (q. v.).

Ahi'am (Heb. Achiam', אַחִיאָם, mother's brother, perh. for Achiab', אַחִיאָב, father's brother; Sept. Ἀχιάμ v. r. Ἀμνάν and Ἀχίμ), a son of Sharar the Hararite, and one of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam. xxiii, 33; 1 Chron. xi, 35), B.C. 1046. See DAVID.

Ahi'an (Heb. Achyam', אַחִיאָן, brotherly; Sept. Ἀείν v. r. Ἀίπ), the first named of the four sons of Shemidah, of the family of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii, 19), B.C. post 1856.

Ahië'zer (Heb. Achië'zer, אַחִיעֶזֶר, brother of help, i. e. helpful; Sept. Ἀχιεζερ), the name of two men.

1. A son of Ammishaddai, and phylarch or chief of the tribe of Dan at the time of the exode (Num. i, 12; ii, 25; x, 25). He made an offering for the service of the tabernacle, like his compeers (Num. vii, 66, 71), B.C. 1657.

2. The chief of the Benjamite warriors and slingers that repaired to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 3), B.C. 1054.

Ahi'huđ, the name of two men, alike in our version, but different in the original.

1. (Heb. Achichud', אַחִיחֻד, brother [or friend] of union; Sept. Ἰαχὺαδ v. r. Ἰαχὺω), the second named of the two later sons of Bela the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 7), B.C. post 1856. See SHAHARAIM. Perhaps the same as ABHUD (ver. 3). See JACOB.

2. (Heb. Achihud', אַחִיהוּד, brother [i. e. lover] of renown; Sept. Ἀχιωφ), a son of Shelomi, and phylarch of the tribe of Asher; one of those appointed by Moses to superintend the partition of Canaan (Num. xxxiv, 27), B.C. 1618.

Ahi'jah (Heb. Achijah', אַחִיהָא, brother [i. e. friend] of Jehovah, also in the prolonged form Achija'hu, אַחִיהָהוּ, 1 Kings xiv, 4, 5, 6, 18; 2 Chron. x, 5; Sept. Ἀχιά or Ἀχία, but omits in 1 Chron. ii, 25, ὁ ἀεὶστρα ἀδελφοὶ αὐτῶν in 1 Chron. xxvi, 20, Ἀτα in Neh. x, 26; Auth. Vers. "Ahiiah" in 1 Sam. xiv, 3, 18; 1 Kings iv, 3; 1 Chron. viii, 7), the name of several men.

1. The second named of the three earlier sons of Bela son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 7), [see SHAHARAIM.] elsewhere (ver. 4) called AHOAH (q. v.).

2. The last named of the five sons of Jerahmeel (great-grandson of Judah) by his first wife (1 Chron. ii, 25), B.C. cir. 1612.

3. A son of Ahitub, and high-priest in the reign of Saul (1 Sam. xiv, 3, 18); hence probably the same as AHIMELECH (q. v.) the son of Ahitub, who was high-priest at Nob in the same reign, and was slain by Saul for assisting David (1 Sam. xxii, 11). See HIGH-PRIEST. In the former passage Ahijah is described as being the Lord's priest in Shiloh, wearing an ephod. And it appears that the ark of God was under his care, and that he inquired of the Lord by means of it and the ephod (comp. 1 Chron. xiii, 3). There is, however, some difficulty in reconciling this statement concerning the ark being used for inquiring by Ahijah at Saul's bidding and the statement elsewhere (1 Chron. xiii, 3) that they inquired not at the ark in the days of Saul, if we understand the latter expression in the strictest sense. This difficulty seems to have led to the reading in the Vatican copy of the Sept. at 1 Sam. xiv, 18, of "ephod" instead of "ark" (τὸ εἶφοδὲ instead of τὴν κιβωτόν, or rather, perhaps, of εἶψος instead of εἶφοδ), in the Hebrew codex from which that version was made). Others avoid the difficulty by interpreting the ark in this case to mean a chest for carrying about the ephod in. But all difficulty will disappear if we apply the expression only to all the latter years of the reign of Saul, when we know that the priestly establishment was at Nob, and not at Kirjath-jearim, or Beale of Judah, where the ark was. The narrative in 1 Sam. xiv is entirely favorable to the mention of the ark: for it appears that Saul was at the time in Gibeah of Benjamin, so near the place where the house of Abinadab was situated (2 Sam. vi, 3) as to be almost a quarter of Kirjath-jearim, which lay on the very borders of Judah and Benjamin (see Josh. xviii, 14, 28). Whether it was the encroachments of the Philistines, or an incipient schism between the tribes of Benjamin and Judah, or any other cause, which led to the disuse of the ark during the latter years of Saul's reign, is difficult to say. But probably the last time that Ahijah inquired of the Lord before the ark was on the occasion related 1 Sam. xiv, 36, when Saul marred his victory over the Philistines by his rash oath, which nearly cost Jonathan his life; for we there read that when Saul proposed a night-pursuit of the Philistines, the priest, Ahijah, said, "Let us draw near hither unto God," for the purpose, namely, of asking counsel of God. But God returned no answer, in consequence, as it seems, of Saul's rash curse. If, as is commonly thought, and as seems most likely, Ahijah is the same person as Ahimelech the son of Ahitub, this failure to obtain an answer from the priest, followed as it was by a rising of the people to save Jonathan out of Saul's hands, may have led to an estrangement between the king and the high-priest, and predisposed him to suspect Ahimelech's loyalty, and to take that terrible revenge upon him for his favor to David. Such changes of name as Ahimelech and Ahijah are not uncommon. However, it is not impossible that, as Gesenius supposes (Theo. Heb. p. 65), Ahimelech may have been brother to Ahijah, and that they officiated simultaneously, the one at Gibeah or Kirjath-jearim, and the other at Nob.—Smith. See ARK.

4. A Pelonite, one of David's famous heroes (1 Chron. xi, 36); apparently the same called ELLAM (q. v.) the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite in the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxiii, 34). See DAVID.

5. A Levite appointed over the sacred treasury of dedicated things at the Temple in the arrangement by David (1 Chron. xxvi, 20), B.C. 1014.

6. The last named of the two sons of Shisha, secretaries of King Solomon (1 Kings iv, 3), B.C. 1014.

7. A prophet of Shiloh (1 Kings xv, 2), hence called the Shilonite (xi, 29), in the days of Rehoboam, of whom we have two remarkable prophecies extant: the one in 1 Kings xi, 31-39, addressed to Jeroboam, announcing the rending of the ten tribes from Solomon, in punishment of his idolatries, and the transfer of the kingdom to Jeroboam, B.C. 973. This prophecy, though delivered privately, became known to Solomon, and excited his wrath against Jeroboam, who fled for his life into Egypt, to Shishak, and remained there till Solomon's death. The other prophecy, in 1 Kings xiv, 6-16, was delivered in the prophet's extreme old age to Jeroboam's wife, in which he foretold the death of Ahijah (q. v.), the king's son, who was sick, and to inquire concerning whom the queen had come in disguise, and then went on to denounce the destruction of Jeroboam's house on account of the images which he had set up, and to foretell the captivity of Israel "beyond the river" Euphrates, B.C. 952. These prophecies give us a high idea of the faithfulness and boldness of Ahijah, and of the eminent rank which he attained as a prophet. Jeroboam's speech concerning him (1 Kings xiv, 2, 3) shows the estimation in which he held his truth and prophetic powers. In 2 Chron. ix, 29, reference is made to a record of the events of Solomon's reign contained in the "prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite." If there was a larger work of Ahijah's, the passage in 1 Kings xi, is doubtless an extract from it.—Smith, s. v. See JEROBOAM.

8. An Issacharite, father of Baasha, king of Israel (1 Kings xv, 27, 33; xxi, 2; 2 Kings ix, 9), B.C. ante 950.

9. One of the chief Israelites who subscribed the sacred covenant drawn up by Nehemiah (Neh. x, 26), B.C. cir. 410.

Ahi'kam (Heb. Achikam', אֲחִיקָם, brother of support, i. e. helper; Sept. Ἀχικῆμ), the second named of the four eminent persons sent by King Josiah to inquire of the prophetess Huldah concerning the proper course to be pursued in relation to the acknowledged violations of the newly-discovered book of the law (2 Kings xxii, 12-14; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 20), B.C. 623. He afterward protected the prophet Jeremiah from the persecuting fury of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxvi, 24), B.C. 607; and other members of his family were equally humane (Jer. xxxix, 14). He was the son of Shaphan, the royal secretary, and father of Gedaliah, the viceroy of Judaea after the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (2 Kings xxv, 22; Jer. xl, 5-16; xli, 1-18; xliii, 6).

Ahi'lud (Heb. Achilud', אֲחִילֻד, perh. brother of the Lydian; Sept. Ἀχιλοῦδ', but Ἀχιλοῦδ' in 1 Kings iv, 12), the father of Jehoshaphat, chronicler under David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii, 16; xx, 24; 1 Kings iv, 3; 1 Chron. xvii, 15), and also of Baana, one of Solomon's purveyors (1 Kings iv, 12), B.C. ante 1014.

Ahim'aaz (Heb. Achima'ats, אֲחִימָאָז, brother of anger, i. e. irascible; Sept. Ἀχιμαῶς), the name of three men.

1. The father of Ahinoam, wife of King Saul (1 Sam. xiv, 50), B.C. ante 1093.

2. The son and successor of Zadok (1 Chron. vi, 8, 53) in the high-priesthood (B.C. cir. 972-956), in which he was succeeded by his son Azariah (1 Chron. vi, 9). See HIGH-PRIEST. During the revolt of Absalom, David having refused to allow the ark of God to be taken from Jerusalem when he fled thence, the high-priests Zadok and Abiathar necessarily remained in attendance upon it; but their sons, Ahimaaz and Jonathan, concealed themselves outside the city, to be in readiness to bear off to David any important information respecting the movements and designs of Absalom which they might receive from within. See ABSALOM. Accordingly, Ithai having communicated to the priests the result of the council of war, in which his own advice was preferred to that of Ahithophel (q. v.), they instantly sent a girl (probably to avoid suspicion) to direct Ahimaaz and Jonathan to speed away with the intelligence. The transaction, however, was witnessed and betrayed by a lad, and the messengers were so hotly pursued that they took refuge in a dry well, over which the woman of the house placed a covering, and spread thereon parched corn. She told the pursuers that the messengers had passed on in haste; and when all was safe, she released them, on which they made their way to David (2 Sam. xv, 24-37; xvii, 15-21). B.C. cir. 1023. As may be inferred from his being chosen for this service, Ahimaaz was swift of foot. See RUNNER. Of this we have a notable example soon after, when, on the defeat and death of Absalom, he prevailed on Joab to allow him to carry the tidings to David. Another messenger, Cushai, had previously been despatched, but Ahimaaz outstripped him, and first came in with the news. He was known afar off by the manner of his running, and the king said, "He is a good man, and cometh with good tidings;" and this favorable character is justified by the delicacy with which he waived that part of his intelligence concerning the death of Absalom, which he knew would greatly distress so fond a father as David (2 Sam. xviii, 19-33).—Kitto, s. v. See DAVID.

3. Solomon's purveyor in Naphtali, who married Basmath, Solomon's daughter (1 Kings iv, 15), B.C. post 1014.

Ahi'man (Heb. Achimam', אֲחִימָן, in pause אֲחִימָן, brother of a gift, i. e. liberal; Sept. Ἀχιμάν), but in 1 Chron. ix, 17, Aimán v. r. Διμάν), the name of two men.

1. One of the three famous giants of the race of Anak, who dwelt at Hebron when the first Hebrew spies explored the land (Num. xiii, 22), B.C. 1657; and who (or their descendants, Keil, Comment. in loc.) were afterward expelled by Caleb (Josh. xv, 14), B.C. 1612, and themselves eventually slain by the Judaites (Judg. i, 10), B.C. cir. 1593.

2. One of the Levitical Temple wardens after the exile (1 Chron. ix, 17), B.C. cir. 516.

Ahim'elech (Heb. Achime'lek, אֲחִימֶלֶךְ, brother [i. e. friend] of the king; Sept. Ἀχιμέλεχ, but Ἀβιμέλεχ in Psa. lii, title; Josephus Ἀχιμέλεχος), the name of two men.

1. The twelfth high-priest of the Jews, B.C. cir. 1085-1060, son of Ahitub (q. v.), and father of Abiathar (q. v.); apparently called also אֲחִיָּאֵה (q. v.). See HIGH-PRIEST. (On the difficulties involved in these names see Küninl, Comment. ad Marc. ii, 26; Korb, in the Krit. Journ. d. Theol. iv, 295 sq.; Fritzsche, Comment. in Marc. p. 72 sq.; Hitzig, Begriff d. Krit. p. 146; Ewald, Isr. Gesch. ii, 596; Engström, De Ahimeleche et Abjuthare, Lund, 1741; Wolf, Cur. i, 439 sq.) He was a descendant of the line of Ithamar through Eli (1 Chron. xxiv, 2-6; comp. Josephus, Ant. v, 11, 5; viii, 1, 3). When David fled from Saul (B.C. 1062), he went to Nob, a city of the priests in Benjamin, where the tabernacle then was, and, by representing himself as on pressing business from the king, he obtained from Ahimelech, who had no other, some of the sacred bread which had been removed from the presence-table (see Osiander, De Davide panes propositionis accipiente, Tub. 1751). He was also furnished with the sword which he had himself taken from Goliath, and which had been laid up as a trophy in the tabernacle (1 Sam. xxi, 1-9). These circumstances were witnessed by Doeg, an Edomite in the service of Saul, and were so reported by him to the jealous king as to appear acts of connivance at, and support to, David's imagined disloyal designs. Saul immediately sent for Ahimelech and the other priests then at Nob, and laid this reasonable offence to their charge; but they declared their ignorance of any hostile designs on the part of David toward Saul or his kingdom. This, however, availed them not, for the king commanded his guard to slay them. Their refusal to fall upon persons invested with so sacred a character might have brought even Saul to reason; but he repeated the order to Doeg himself, and was too readily obeyed by that malignant person, who, with the men under his orders, not only slew the priests then present, eighty-six in number, but marched to Nob, and put to the sword every living creature it contained (1 Sam. xxii; Psa. lii, title). The only priest that escaped was Abiathar, Ahimelech's son, who fled to David, and afterward became high-priest (1 Sam. xxiii, 6; xxx, 7). See ABIATHAR. Some have supposed from Mark ii, 26, that there was another Ahimelech, a son of Abiathar, and grandson of the preceding, and that he officiated as one of the two high-priests in the time of David (2 Sam. viii, 17; 1 Chron. xxiv, 3, 6, 31); but the two may be identified by reading in these passages, "Abiathar the son of Ahimelech," instead of the reverse. In 1 Chron. xviii, 16, he is called AHIMELECH (q. v.). He is probably the same as the Ahiah who officiated for Saul (1 Sam. xiv, 3, 18).—Kitto, s. v. See AHIAH.

2. A Hittite, one of David's followers whom he invited to accompany him at night into the camp of Saul in the wilderness of Ziph, but Abishai alone appears to have had sufficient courage for the enterprise (1 Sam. xxvi, 6), B.C. 1055.

Ahim'oth (Heb. Achimoth', אֲחִימוֹתַי, brother of death, i. e. perh. destructive; Sept. Ἀχιμοῦθ), a person named with Amasai as sons of Elkanah, a Levite (1 Chron. vi, 25). From ver. 35, however, it would appear that he was rather the grandson of this Elkanah (through Amasai), and the father of the other Elkanah of ver. 26. He is there called MANATHI (q. v.).

Ahin'adab (Heb. Ahimadab', אֲחִינָדָב, brother of liberality, i. e. liberal; Sept. Ἀχινάδης), a son of Iddo, and one of the twelve officers [see PURVEYOR] who, in as many districts into which the country was divided, raised supplies of provisions in monthly rotation for Solomon's household (Kitto, Pict. Bible, in loc.); his district was Mahanaim, the southern half of the region beyond the Jordan (1 Kings iv, 14), B.C. post 1014.

Ahin'oam (Heb. Achino'am, אֲחִינוֹאֵם, brother [see AB-] of pleasantness, i. e. pleasant), the name of two

1. (Sept. Ἀχινούμ.) The daughter of Ahimaaz, and wife of King Saul (1 Sam. xiv, 50), B.C. cir. 1093.

2. (Sept. Ἀχινάμ, but Ἀχινάμ in 1 Chron. iii, 1, and v. r. Ἀχινούμ in 2 Sam. iii, 2.) A Jezreelitess, the first (according to Josephus, Ant. vi, 13, 8) wife of David, while yet a private person (1 Sam. xxv, 43; xxvii, 3), B.C. 1060. In common with his other wife, she was taken captive by the Amalekites when they plundered Ziklag, but was recovered by David (1 Sam. xxx, 5, 18), B.C. 1054. She is again mentioned as living with him when he was king of Judah in Hebron (2 Sam. ii, 2), B.C. cir. 1052, and was the mother of his eldest son Annon (2 Sam. iii, 2). See DAVID.

Ahi'ō (Heb. Achyo', אֲחִיֹּי, brotherly; Sept. in all cases translates as an appellation, his brother or brothers), the name of two men. (In 1 Chron. viii, 14 we should read אֲחִיֹּי, his brother, as an appellation of Shashak following.)

1. The fifth named of the sons of Jehiel, or Jeiel, the Gibeonite, by Maachah (1 Chron. viii, 31; ix, 37), B.C. post 1612.

2. One of the sons of the Levite Abinadab, who went before the new cart on which the ark was placed when David first attempted to remove it to Jerusalem, for the purpose of guiding the oxen, while his brother Uzzah walked by the cart (2 Sam. vi, 3, 4; 1 Chron. xiii, 7), B.C. 1043. See UZZAH.

Ahi'ra (Heb. Achira', אֲחִירָא, brother of evil, i. e. unlucky; Sept. Ἀχίρᾱ), a son of Enan and phylarch of Naphtali, whose followers were numbered, and who made a contribution to the sacred service at the Exode (Num. i, 15; ii, 29; vii, 78, 83; x, 27), B.C. 1657.

Ahi'ram (Heb. Achiram', אֲחִירָאֵם, brother of height, i. e. high; Sept. Ἀχίρᾱρ), a brother of Bela and son of Benjamin, whose posterity assumed his name (Num. xxvi, 38), B.C. post 1856; apparently the same with AHARAI (1 Chron. vii, 1), AHER (1 Chron. vii, 12), and EHI (Gen. xlii, 21). See JACOB; HUSIM.

Ahi'ramite (Heb. Achiram', אֲחִירָאֵם; Sept. Ἀχίρᾱρῖ), a designation of the descendants of the Benjamite AHIRAM (Num. xxvi, 38).

Ahis'amach (Heb. Achisa'mak, אֲחִיסָאֵם, brother of help, i. e. aiding; Sept. Ἀχισαμάχ), the father of one of the famous workmen upon the tabernacle, Aholiab the Danite (Exod. xxxi, 6; xxxv, 34; xxxviii, 23), B.C. ante 1657.

Ahish'ahar (Heb. Achisha'char, אֲחִישָׁאָחַר, brother of the dawn, i. e. early; Sept. Ἀχισαῖος), a warrior, last named of the sons of Bilhan, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 10), B.C. ante 1658.

Ahi'shar (Heb. Ahishar', אֲחִישָׁר, brother of song, i. e. singer; Sept. Ἀχισᾱρ), the officer who was "over the household" of Solomon (1 Kings iv, 6), i. e. steward (q. v.) or governor of the palace (comp. ch. xvi, 9; Isa. xxiii, 15), B.C. 1014—a post of great influence in Oriental courts, on account of the ready access to the king which it affords.

Ahith'ophel (Heb. Achitho'phel, אֲחִיתֹּפֵל, brother of insipidity, i. e. foolish; Sept. Ἀχίτοφελ, Josephus Ἀχίτοφελος), the singular name of a man renowned for political sagacity among the Jews, who regarded his counsels as oracles (2 Sam. xvi, 23). He was of the council of David (1 Chron. xxvii, 33, 34), and his son Eliam (q. v.) was one of David's body-guard (2 Sam. xxiii, 34). He was at Giloh, his native place, at the time of the revolt of Absalom, by whom he was summoned to Jerusalem; and it shows the strength of Absalom's cause in Israel that a man so capable of foreseeing results, and estimating the probabilities of success, took his side in so daring an attempt (2 Sam. xv, 12). He probably hoped to wield a greater sway under the vain prince than he had done under David, against whom it is also possible that he entertained a secret malice on account of his granddaughter Bathsheba (2 Sam. xi, 3, comp. with xxiii, 34). The news of his defection appears to have occasioned David more alarm than any other single incident in the rebellion. He earnestly prayed God to turn the sage counsel of Ahithophel "to foolishness" (probably alluding to his name); and being immediately after joined by his old friend Hushai, he induced him to go over to Absalom with the express view that he might be instrumental in defeating the counsels of this dangerous person (xv, 31-37). Psalm lv is supposed to contain (12-14) a further expression of David's feelings at this treachery of one whom he had so completely trusted, and whom he calls "My companion, my guide, and my familiar friend"—a passage which our Saviour applies to his own case in such a manner as to indicate that Ahithophel was in some sense a type of Judas (John xiii, 18); at least their conduct and their end were similar (see Steuber, Achithophel sibi loquere gulam fractus, Rint. 1741; Lindsay, Lect. ii, 199; Crit. Sac. Thes. Nov. i, 676; Jones, Works, vii, 102). The detestable advice which Ahithophel gave Absalom to appropriate his father's harem committed him absolutely to the cause of the young prince, since after that he could hope for no reconciliation with David (2 Sam. xvi, 20-23). His proposal as to the conduct of the war undoubtedly indicated the best course that could have been taken under the circumstances; and so it seemed to the council until Hushai interposed with his plausible advice, the object of which was to gain time to enable David to collect his resources. See ABSALOM. When Ahithophel saw that his counsel was rejected for that of Hushai, the far-seeing man gave up the cause of Absalom for lost (comp. Josephus, Ant. vii, 9, 8); and he forthwith saddled his ass, returned to his home at Gilead, deliberately settled his affairs, and then hanged himself, and was buried in the sepulchre of his fathers (2 Sam. xvii, B.C. cir. 1023. (Niemeyer's Charak. iv, 327 sq.; Ewald, Isr. Gesch., ii, 642.)—Kitto, s. v. See DAVID.

Ahi'tub (Heb. Achitub', אֲחִיתּוּב, brother of goodness, i. e. good; Sept. Ἀχίτωβ, Josephus Ἀχίτωβος), the name of at least two priests. See HIGH-PRIEST.

1. A descendant of Ithamar, who on the death of his father, Phinehas, in battle, and also of his grandfather, Eli, at the news of the capture of the ark, succeeded the latter in the high-priesthood, B.C. 1125, and was succeeded (B.C. cir. 1085) by his son Ahijah or Ahimelech (1 Sam. xiv, 3; xxii, 9, 11, 12, 20).

2. A descendant of the line of Ithamar, being the son (or rather descendant) of Amariah (1 Chron. vi, 7, 8, 52), and not an incumbent of the high-priesthood (comp. Josephus, Ant. viii, 1, 3, where his father's name is given as Aropheus), since his son Zadok (1 Chron. xviii, 16) was made high-priest by Saul after the extermination of the family of Ahimelech (2 Sam. viii, 17). B.C. ante 1012. It is doubtful whether this or the preceding person of this name is mentioned in 1 Chron. ix, 11; Neh. xi, 11, where he is erroneously called the father (instead of son or descendant) of Meraioth (q. v.). See AMARIAH.

3. A descendant of the last, mentioned (1 Chron. vi, 11, 12; Ezra vii, 2) as the son of another Amariah and father of another Zadok among the Jewish high-priests; but as such a coincidence of names is improbable, the person intended may perhaps have been the AZARIAH of 2 Chron. xxxi, 10. See GENEALOGY.

Ah'lab (Heb. Achlab', אַחְלָב, fattness, i. e. fertile; Sept. Ἀχλάβ v. r. Δαχλάβ), a town of Asher, apparently near Zidon and Achzib, the native inhabitants of which the Israelites were unable to expel (Judg. i, 31). Its lying thus within the unconquered Phœnician border may be the reason of its omission in the list of the Asherite cities (Josh. xix, 24-31). It is supposed (see Schwarz, Palest. p. 198) that Achlab reappears in later history as Gush-Chalab (גּוּשׁ חַלָּב) or Giscala (Reland, Palest. p. 813, 817), a place lately identified by Robinson under the abbreviated name of el-Jish, near Safed, in the hilly country to the north-west of the sea of Galilee (Researches, new ed. ii, 446; iii, 73). This place was in rabbinical times famous for its oil, and the old olive-trees still remain in the neighborhood (Reland and Robinson, ib.). From it came the famous John, son of Levi, the leader in the siege of Jerusalem (Joseph. Life, 10; War, ii, 21, 1), and it had a legendary celebrity as the birth-place of the parents of no less a person than the Apostle Paul (Jerome, Comment. ad Ep. ad Philem.). But this cannot be the Ahlab of Asher. See GISCALA.

Ah'lai (Heb. Achlay', אַחְלָי, perh. ornamental), the name of a woman and also of a man.

1. (Sept. Ἀαλαί v. r. Δααλαί.) The daughter and only child of Sheshan, a descendant of Judah, married to her father's Egyptian slave Jarha (q. v.), by whom she had Attai (1 Chron. ii, 31, 34, 35). B.C. prob. ante 1658.

2. (Sept. Ὀαί v. r. Ἀγαία.) The father of Zabab, which latter was one of David's body-guard (1 Chron. xi, 41). B.C. ante 1046.

Aho'äh (Heb. Acho'äch, אַחֹאֵחַ, brotherly; Sept. Ἀχιά v. r. Ἀχιάλ), one of the sons of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 4); called also ANIÄH (ver. 7), and perhaps IÄI (1 Chron. vii, 7). B.C. post 1856. It is probably he whose descendants are called ANOHITES (2 Sam. xxiii, 9, 28).

Aho'hite (Heb. Achochit', אַחֹחִיטִי; Sept. παράδελφος, Ἀχούιτρος [v. r. Ἀούιτρος], Ἀχούχι, Ἀχούβ [v. r. Ἀχούρι], Ἀωζί [v. r. Χώχι, Ἐχούχι]), an epithet applied to Dodo or Dodai, one of the captains under Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 4), and his son Eleazar, one of David's three chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 9; 1 Chron. xi, 12), as well as to Zalmon or Ilaai, another of his body-guard (2 Sam. xxiii, 28; 1 Chron. xi, 29); doubtless from their descent from ANOHÄI (1 Chron. viii, 4) the Benjamite (comp. 1 Chron. xi, 26).

Aho'lah (Heb. Oholah', אֹהֶלָה, i. q. אֹהֶלֶת, she has her own tent, i. e. tabernacle, for lascivious rites; Sept. Ὀολά v. r. Ὀολά, Ὀολάα; Vulg. Oollu), the name of an imaginary harlot, used by Ezekiel (xxiii, 4, 5, 36, 44) as a symbol of the idolatry of the northern kingdom, the apostate branch of Judah being designated, by a paronomasia, AHOLIEAH (q. v.). These terms indicate respectively that, while the worship at Samaria had been self-invented, and never sanctioned by Jehovah, that at Jerusalem was divinely instituted and approved, so long as pure, but now degraded and abandoned for foreign alliances (Henderson, Comment. in loc.). They are both graphically described as sisters who became lewd women, adulteresses, prostituting themselves to the Egyptians and the Assyrians, in imitating their abominations and idolatries; wherefore Jehovah abandoned them to those very people for whom they showed such inordinate and impure affection. They were carried into captivity, and reduced to the severest servitude. But the crime of Aholibah was greater than that of Aholah, for she possessed more distinguished privileges, and refused to be instructed by the awful example of her sister's ruin. The allegory is an epitome of the history of the Jewish Church.—Kitto, s. v. See IDOLATRY.

Aho'läab (Heb. Oholiab', אֹהֶלְיָב, tent of his father; Sept. Ἐνάβ), the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan, one of the two artificers in the precious metals and other materials, appointed to superintend the preparation of such materials for the tabernacle (Exod. xxxi. 6; xxxv, 34; xxxvi, 1, 2; xxxviii, 23), B.C. 1657. See BEZALEEL.

Ahol'ibah (Heb. Oholibah', אֹהֶלִיבָה, for אֹהֶלֶת, my tent is in her; Sept. Ὀολιβά v. r. Ὀολιβά; Vulg. Ooliba), a symbolical name given to Jerusalem (Ezek. xxiii, 4, 11, 22, 36, 44) under the figure of an adulterous harlot, as having once contained the true worship of Jehovah, but having prostituted herself to foreign idolatries (Hävernik, Comment. in loc.). See AHOLAH.

Aholiba'mah [many Aholib'amah] (Heb. Aholibamah, אֲחֹלִיבָמָה, tent of the height), the name, apparently, of a woman (Sept. Ὀλίβεα), and of a man or district (Sept. Ἐλιβαμὰς) named after her, in connection with the family and lineage of Esau (q. v.). She was the granddaughter of Zibeon (q. v.), the Hivite (of the family of Seir the Horite) by his son Anah (q. v.), and became one (probably the second) wife of Esau (Gen. xxxvi, 2, 25), B.C. 1964. It is doubtless through this connection of Esau with the original inhabitants of Mount Seir that we are to trace the subsequent occupation of that territory by him and his descendants, and it is remarkable that each of his three sons by this wife is himself the head of a tribe, while all the tribes of the Edomites sprung from his other two wives are founded by his grandsons (Gen. xxxvi, 15-19). In the earlier narrative (Gen. xxvi, 34) Aholibamah is called JUDITH (q. v.), daughter of Beeri (q. v.) the Hittite (q. v.). The explanation of the change in the name of the woman seems to be that her proper personal name was Judith, and that Aholibamah was the name which she received as the wife of Esau and foundress of three tribes of his descendants; she is, therefore, in the narrative called by the first name, while in the genealogical table of the Edomites she appears under the second. This explanation is confirmed by the recurrence of the name Aholibamah in the concluding list of the genealogical table (Gen. xxxvi, 40-43), which, with Hengstenberg (Die Authentie d. Pent. ii, 279; Eng. transl. ii, 228), Tuch (Comm. üb. d. Gen. p. 493), Knobel (Genes. p. 258), and others, we must therefore regard as a list of names of places, and not of mere persons, as, indeed, is expressly said at the close of it: "These are the chiefs (heads of tribes) of Esau, according to their settlements in the land of their possession." The district which received the name of Esau's wife, or, perhaps, rather from which she received her married name, was no doubt (as the name itself indicates) situated in the heights of the mountains of Edom, probably, therefore, in the neighborhood of Mount Ilor and Petra, though Knobel places it south of Petra, having been misled by Burckhardt's name Hesma, which, however, according to Robinson (Researches, ii, 552), is "a sandy tract with mountains around it . . . but not itself a mountain, as reported by Burckhardt." It seems not unlikely that the three tribes descended from Aholibamah, or, at least, two of them, possessed this district, since there are enumerated only eleven districts, whereas the number of tribes is thirteen, exclusive of that of Korah, whose name occurs twice, and which we may further conjecture emigrated (in part at least) from the district of Aholibamah, and became associated with that of Eliphaz.—Smith. See EDOM.

Ahriman. See ORMUZD.

Ahu'mai (Heb. Achumay, אַחֻמַּי, brother of water, i. e. living near a stream; otherwise, swarthy; Sept. Ἀχμυαί), the first named of the two sons of Jahath, a Zorathite, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 2), B.C. post 1612.

Ahu'zam (Heb. Achuzam', אַחֻזָּם, their possession; otherwise, tenacious; Sept. Ἀχὺζαμ' v. r. Ἀχὺαία), the first named of the four sons of Ashur ("father" of Tekoa) by one of his wives, Naarah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 6), B.C. cir. 1612.

Ahuz'zath (Heb. Achuzzath', אַחֻזָּזָת, possession, as often in the constr. of אֲחֻזָּת; otherwise, tenacious [the termination "-ath" being frequent in Philistine nouns, comp. GATH, GOLIATH, etc.]; Sept. Ὀχὸζαθή, Vulg. Ochozath), the "friend" (צַדִּיק; Sept. vvmpayaw-yic, bridesman; but rather, evidently, that unofficial but important personage of ancient Oriental courts called "the king's friend" or favorite) of Abimelech (q. v.) II, king of Gerar, who attended him on his visit to Isaac (Gen. xxvi, 26), B.C. cir. 1985.

AI (Heb. Ay, אַי, ruin, perh. so called after its destruction, Gen. xii, 8; xiii, 3; Josh. vii, 2-5; viii, 1-29; ix, 3; x, 1, 2; xii, 9; Ezra ii, 28; Neh. vii, 32; Jer. xlix, 3; always with the art., אַיִם, except in the passage last cited; Sept. Fai in Josh., Ἀγγαί in Gen., Aia in Ezra, Ai in Neh., Fai in Jer.; Vulg. Vers. "Aija;" Agath', אַגָּת, Isa. x, 28, Ἀγγαί, Ajath, "Aiath;" v. r. אַיָּא, text Josh. viii, 16; אַיָּא, Samar. Gen. xii, 8, comp. Arva, Josephus, Ant. v, 1, 12; Jerome Gai), the name of one or two places. See also AVIM.

1. A royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. x, 1), the site of which (not necessarily then a city) is mentioned as early as the time of Abraham, who pitched his tent between it and Bethel (Gen. xii, 8; xiii, 3); but it is chiefly noted for its capture and destruction by Joshua (vii, 2-5; viii, 1-29). See AMBUSH. At a later period Ai appears to have been rebuilt, for it is mentioned by Isaiah (x, 28), and it was inhabited by the Benjamites after the captivity (Ezra ii, 28; Neh. vii, 32; xi, 31). The site was known, and some scanty ruins still existed in the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Ἀγγαί), but Dr. Robinson was unable to discover any certain traces of either. He remarks (Eib. Researches, ii, 313), however, that its situation with regard to Bethel may be well determined by the facts recorded in Scripture. That Ai lay to the east of Bethel is certain (comp. Josh. xii, 9; "beside Bethaven," Josh. vii, 2; viii, 9); and the two cities were not so far distant from each other but that the men of Bethel mingled in the pursuit of the Israelites when they feigned to flee before the king of Ai, and thus both cities were left defenceless (Josh. viii, 17); yet they were not so near but that Joshua could place an ambuscade on the west (or south-west) of Ai, without its being observed by the men of Bethel, while he himself remained behind in a valley to the north of Ai (Josh. viii, 4, 11-13). A little to the south of a village called Deir Diwan, and one hour's journey from Bethel, the site of an ancient place is indicated by reservoirs hewn in the rock, excavated tombs, and foundations of hewn stone. This, Dr. Robinson inclines to think, may mark the site of Ai, as it agrees with all the intimations as to its position. Near it, on the north, is the deep Wady el-Mutyah, and toward the south-west other smaller wadis, in which the ambushed party of Israelites might easily have been concealed. According to Schwarz (Palest. p. 84), the ancient name is still preserved in some ruins called Khirket Medinat Gai, near the edge of a valley, two English miles south-east of Bethel; a position which he thinks corresponds with a rabbinical notice of Ai (Shemoth Rabbah, c. 32) as lying three Roman miles from Bethel (erroneously written Jericho). Thenius, however (in Käuffer's Exeg. Studien, ii, 127 sq.), locates Ai at Turmus Aya, a small rocky mound east of Sinjil (Robinson's Researches, iii, 85), a position which is defended by Keil (Comment. on Josh. vii, 2); but in which he has been influenced by an incorrect location of Bethel (q. v.). Stanley (Palest. p. 200 note) places it at the head of the Wady Harith. For Krafft's identification with Khirket el-Hayyeh, see Robinson (new ed. of Researches, iii, 288). Van de Velde, after a careful examination, concludes that no spot answers the conditions except Tell el-Hajar, about 40' E. by S. of Beitin, on the southern border of Wady el-Mutyah, with no remains but a broken cistern (Narrative, ii, 278-282). This position essentially corresponds to that assigned by Robinson.

It is the opinion of some that the words AVIM in Josh. xviii, 23, and GAZA in 1 Chron. vii, 28, are corruptions of AI.

2. A city of the Ammonites, apparently opposite Heshbon, and devastated next to it by the Babylonians on their way to Jerusalem (Jer. xlix, 3). Others, however, regard the name as an appellative here.

Ai'ah, another mode (2 Sam. iii, 7; xxi, 8, 10, 11; 1 Chron. i, 40) of Anglicizing the name אַיָּה (q. v.).

Ai'ath, another form (Isa. x, 28) of the name of the city אֵי (q. v.).

Aichmalōtarch (αἰχμολοτάρχης) an imaginary title (Carpzov, Apparat. Crit. p. 8 sq.), signifying chief of the captives, assigned to the heads of the Jewish families during the captivity (q. v.).

Aidan, a native of Ireland, who was sent, according to Bede, by the Scottish bishop, at the request of Oswald, king of Northumbria, as missionary bishop to the Northumbrians, about A. D. 635. Upon his arrival in Northumbria, he was appointed, at his own request, to the see of Lindisfarne, then first erected, on the island of that name. Here he set up the rule of St. Columban, and persuaded the king to establish the Church in his kingdom. "Often," says Bede, "might be seen a beautiful sight—while the bishop (who was but imperfectly acquainted with the English tongue) preached, the king and his officers, who, owing to their long exile in Scotland, had acquired the language of that country, interpreted his words to the people." Bede says that "nothing more commended his doctrine to the attention of his hearers than the fact that, as he taught, so he himself lived, seeking for nothing and attaching himself to nothing which belonged to this world. All that the king gave him he quickly distributed to the poor; and never, unless when compelled to do so, did he travel through his diocese except on foot." He died August 31, 651, apparently broken-hearted at the death of the king, who, as he had predicted, perished by treachery twelve days before. He is commemorated in the Romish martyrology on the 31st of August.—Bede, Ecl. Hist. lib. iii, cap. 3, 5, 14-17; Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 21; Collier, Ecl. Hist. i, 203.

Aigenler. ADAM, a German Jesuit, born in the Tyrol, 1633, who became professor of Hebrew at Ingolstadt. In 1673 he was sent out to China as missionary, and died on the voyage, August 16, 1673. Among other writings, he left Fundamenta Linguae sanctae (Dillingen, 1670, 4to).—Jöcher, Allg. Gelehrten-Lexicon; Hofer, Novæ Biog. Générale, i, 454.

Ai'ja, another form (Neh. xi, 31) of the name of the city אֵי (q. v.).

Aij alon, another mode (Josh. xxi, 24; Judg. i, 35; xii, 12; 1 Sam. xiv, 31; 1 Chron. vi, 69; viii, 13; 2 Chron. xi, 10) of Anglicizing the name of the city אַיָּלֹן (q. v.).

Aij'eletth Sha'har (Heb. אֵי'עֶלֶתְחַשְׁוֹרֵי, kind of the dawn, in which signification the terms often occur separately; Sept. ἡ ἀντίληψις ἢ ἰωάννη, Vulg. suscipio matutina) occurs in the title of Psa. xxii, and is apparently the name of some other poem or song, to the measure of which this ode was to be performed or chanted (Aben Ezra, in loc.; Bochart, Hieroz. i, 888; Eichhorn, Prof. ad Jonesium, De Poesi Asiatic. p. xxxii; Rosenmüller, De Wette, in loc.); like the similar terms, e. g. ΑΛ-ΤΑΣΟΠΗΘ (q. v.), which occur in the inscriptions of other Psalms (lvii, lviii, lix, lxxv), after the manner of Syriac poets (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. i, 80). The phrase, however, is not necessarily taken from the initial words of a song (as Aben Ezra maintains, comp. Prov. v, 19), much less an amatory effusion (comp. the opening of a poem of Ibn Doreil, "O gazelle!"); but the title may be borrowed, according to Oriental custom, from some prominent expression or theme in it, like David's "Song of the Bow" (2 Sam. i; comp. Gesenius, Comment. in Isa. xxii, 1). It may in this case allude either to the hunting of the deer by the early daylight, as the most favorable time for the chase; or, as more agreeable to the Arabic similes (Schultens, ad Meidan. Proor. p. 39), as well as rabbinical usage (Talmud. Hieros. Berakoth, ii, 30, l. 30, 35, ed. Cracon.), it may refer to the rays of the rising sun under the metaphor of a stag's horns (comp. Schultens and De Sacy, ap. Harirum Cons. xxxii). The interpretation of Faber (in Harmar's Observ. ii, 172) as signifying the beginning of dawn, is less agreeable to the etymology. Some (as Hare in the Bibl. Brem. Class. i, pt. 2) understand some instrument of music; and others (e. g. Kimchi and the Talmudists) the morning star.—Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 45. See PSALMS.

Ail, Ajal, Ajalah. See DEER.

Ailly, PIERRE D' (Petrus de Alliaco), a noted cardinal and learned theologian of the fourteenth century, surnamed the "Hammer of Heretics." He was born at Compiègne in 1350, of humble parentage, and completed his studies at the college of Navarre in Paris. The dispute between Nominalism and Realism had not yet died out, and D'Ailly threw himself with ardor into philosophical study. He soon became noted among the students for the skill and subtlety with which he advocated the nominalist theory, and for the wide extent of his general knowledge. At twenty-five he lectured in the university of Paris on Peter Lombard's Sententia, and soon obtained a brilliant reputation. In 1377, while yet a subdeacon, he was sent as delegate to the Provincial Council of Amboise, a rare distinction for one so young. In 1380 he was made doctor of the Sorbonne. In his inaugural address he extolled the study of Holy Writ, and afterward held lectures upon the New Testament and the nature of the Church. D'Ailly declared that the passage, "Upon this rock," etc., Matt. xvi, 18, was to be taken in a spiritual sense, asserting that the Bible alone is the everlasting rock upon which the Church is built, as Peter and his successors could not be such, on account of their human frailty. He also distinguished between the universal Church of Christ and the Church of Rome as a particular Church, and maintained that the latter had no precedence before the universal Church, and that another bishop than that of Rome might be the head of the Church. In 1384 D'Ailly was made the head of the College of Navarre, where Gerson (q. v.) and Nicholas de Clemange (q. v.) were among his pupils. When in the university of Paris, he defended the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception against the Dominicans, and especially against John de Monton; and when the latter appealed from an ecclesiastical censure to Pope Clement VII, the university sent D'Ailly to the pope to defend before him the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, as also the opinion that the right to decide in such questions ("circa ea qua sunt fidei doctrinaliter definire") does not belong to the pope alone, but also to the doctores ecclesie. The pope approved both opinions; and the university sent D'Ailly to the pope in reward for his victory, chancellor. Soon afterward he was made confessor and almoner of Charles VI, archdeacon at Cambrai, and treasurer of the Holy Chapel at Paris. In 1394 he was sent by Charles VI to Peter de Luna (Benedict XIII), to prevail upon this antipope to resign, but Benedict succeeded in bringing D'Ailly over to his side, and, through him, was recognised by France as the legitimate pope. He appointed D'Ailly, in 1398, bishop of Cambrai. D'Ailly continued to take an active and prominent part in the endeavors made for a restoration of the ecclesiastical unity. In 1409 he was a leading member of the Council of Pisa, and prevailed upon the council to depose all the popes who at that time claimed the Papal See. Alexander V was nominated in their place, but died soon after.

His successor, John XXIII, made D'Ailly a cardinal, and papal legate in Germany. As such, he took part in the Council of Constance, where he was again very conspicuous. See CONSTANCE, COUNCIL OF. Soon after his arrival, and through his influence, the Council adopted a resolution that the vote on the reformation of the Church should be taken, not according to heads, but according to nations—a decision which at once fixed the fate of John XXIII. He again urged the resignation or deposition of all the popes, and the election by the Council of a new pope, who should pledge himself to carry out the reformatory decrees of the Council. He strongly maintained the superiority of a general council over the pope, and under the influence of his views Benedict XIII was deposed. He was one of the Committee to investigate the case of John Huss, and it is a stain upon his great name that he voted for the condemnation of the reformer. In the question whether the election of a new pope was to take place before or after the completion of the reformatory decrees of the Council, D'Ailly separated from the reformatory party (the Germans, Gerson, etc.), carried the priority of the papal election, and thereby neutralized to a large extent the beneficial effects which otherwise the Council might have produced. Martin V appointed him legate at Avignon; he died there in 1425; or, according to another account, on a legative mission in the Netherlands, 1420. D'Ailly is one of the most remarkable dignitaries of the Church of the Middle Ages, and greatly distinguished both as a theologian and orator. He was, however, addicted to a belief in astrology, maintaining that important events might be predicted from the conjunctions of the planets. A very remarkable coincidence appears in the case of one of his predictions, viz., that in the year 1789, "si mundus usque ad illa tempora duraverit, quod solus Deus novit, multe tunc et magnæ et mirabiles alterationes mundi et mutationes futuræ sunt, et maxime circa leges et sectas." This prediction was written in 1414, in his Concordia astronomie cum historica narratione (published in Augsburg, 1490, 4to). D'Ailly may be considered as a predecessor of that liberal party in the Roman Catholic Church afterward represented by Bossuet and Fénelon. His principal writings were published at Douay, 1634, 8vo; but there is no full collection of his works. Among them are: 1. Commentarii Breves in libros 4 Sentent. (1500, 4to).—2. Quatuor Principia in 4 libros Sentent.—3. *Recomendatio S. All the above, from the Speculum Considerationis to the last, inclusive, were published at Douay in 1634 (8vo).—20. Tractatus de Anima (Paris, 1494, 8vo; 1505).—21. Sermones, varii Argumenti, 20.—22. *Modus sua Forma eligendi Summ. Ailredus, AELREDUS, an English historian, born in 1109, and said to have died in 1166. According to Cave, he was an Englishman, educated in Scotland, having been educated together with Henry, son of David, king of Scotland. When he was of the proper age a bishopric was offered to him, but he refused it; and, returning to England, he took the monastic vows among the Cistercians of Revesby Abbey, in Lincolnshire. He became abbot of this monastery, and afterward of Rievaulx, and made Bernard of Clairvaux his model both as to his life and style of writing. His works include Historia de Vita et Miraculis S. Edwardi R. et Confess. (among the "Decem Scriptores" of England, edited by Twissden, Lond. 1652); Genealogia Regum Anglorum; De Belo Standardi: Historia de Sanctimoniali de Wathlun (all in Twissden); Sermones de Tempore et de Sanctis (in Bibl. Clare Vallis); In Isaiam Prophetam Sermones 31; Speculum Charitatis, libri 3; Tractatus de puero Jesu duodecenni (ed. by David Camerarius, de Scot. fortitud., Paris, 1631); De Spirituali Amicitia, libri 3. The latter four treatises were edited by Gibbon, a Jesuit, and printed at Douay in 1631; also in the Biblioth. Cistercien. tom. v, 16, and Bibl. Patr. tom. xxiii, 1.—Cave, *Hist. Aimo. See HAYMO.

Aimon, also called AIMOIN, AYMOIN, a French Benedictine of the convent of Fleury, died 1008. He was a pupil of Abbo of Fleury, at whose request he wrote the work Historia Francorum, which extends from 253 to 654. A continuation by another author, which is more valuable than the original, carries the narrative to the year 727. It is contained in Bouquet's Collectio des historiens de France (Paris, 1738, 8 vols.). Aimon also wrote Vita Abbatis Floriacensis, and several works on St. Bernard.—Herzog, i, 198.

Ain (Heb. A'ym, אַיִם, a fountain) signifies literally an eye, and also, in the simple but vivid imagery of the East, a spring, or natural burst of living water, always contradistinguished from the well or tank of artificial formation, and which latter is designated by the word "Beer" (בַּיַר) or "Bor" (בּוֹר וְבַיַר). Ain still retains its ancient and double meaning in the Arabic Ain. Such living springs abound in Palestine even more than in other mountainous districts, and, apart from their natural value in a hot climate, form one of the most remarkable features of the country. Prof. Stanley (Palest. p. 147, 509) has called attention to the accurate and persistent use of the word in the original text of the Bible, and has well expressed the inconvenience arising from the confusion in the Auth. Vers. of words and things so radically distinct as Ain and Beer. The importance of distinguishing between the two is illustrated by Exod. xv, 27, in which the word Ainoh (translated "wells") is used for the springs of fresh water at Elin, although the rocky soil of that place excludes the supposition of dug wells.

Ain oftenest occurs in combination with other words, forming the names of definite localities; these will be found under EN- (q. v.), as En-gedi, En-gannim, etc. It occurs alone in two cases. See FOUNTAIN.

1. (Sept. at Josh. xxi, 16, 'Ara, at 1 Chron. iv, 32, 'Hv; elsewhere it blends as a prefix with the following names, Ep-epwz, 'Eo-epwz.) A city at first assigned to the tribe of Judah, on its southern border (Josh. xv, 32), but afterward to Simeon (Josh. xix, 7; 1 Chron. iv, 32). In all these passages it is mentioned as adjoining Remmon or Rimmon (q. v.), and it seems to be the EN-RIMMON (q. v.) of Neh. xi, 29. It was one of the Levitical cities (Josh. xxi, 16). Reland (Pal. Hist. p. 554, 625) thinks it the same with the Betane (Betany) of Judith i, 9, and the Bethan'in (Βηθανίη) located by Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. 'Αἰν, i. e. 'Ain) at four Roman miles from Hebron. But these are rather the Beth-anoth (q. v.) of Josh. xv, 59. Dr. Robinson conjectures it may have been the same with the modern village el-Ghurein, the ruins of which he saw in a valley a short distance to the right of the road a few hours south of Hebron (Researches, ii, 625). But this again is probably the Ainim (q. v.) of Josh. xv, 50. The margin of our Bibles identifies this Ain with the Ashan of Josh. xv, 42, but in 1 Chron. iv, 32 both are mentioned. In the list of priests' cities in 1 Chron. vi, 59, Ashan (q. v.) appears to take the place of Ain.

2. (With the art., אֵינִים, Ain-A'yim.) One of the landmarks on the northern or eastern boundary of Palestine as described by Moses (Num. xxxiv, 11), near the lake Gennesareth, adjoining Shephan, and apparently mentioned to define the position of Riblah, viz. "on the east side of 'the spring'" (Sept. ἐπι πηγῆς). But the ambiguous phrase אֵינִים מֵמִזְרָח (literally, from the east as to the spring), rather refers directly to the boundary as extending in general terms easterly to Ain, in the direction of Riblah (q. v.). By Jerome, in the Vulgate, it is rendered contra fontem Daphnin, meaning the spring which rose in the celebrated grove of Daphne dedicated to Apollo and Diana at Antioch. Riblah having been lately, with much probability, identified (Robinson, Research. new ed, iii, 542-6; Porter, ii, 335) with a place of the same name on the north-east slopes of the Lebanon range, "the spring" of the text is probably the modern Ain, in Cæle-Syria, between the Orontes and the Litany (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1847, p. 405, 408); so called from a large fountain of the same name a little to the north of the village, which "is strong enough to drive several mills, and about it are heavy blocks of hewn stone of a very antique appearance" (Ibid. 1848, p. 638). Dr. Robinson, however, thinks it is rather an appellative, and refers to the fountain of the Orontes still farther south-west of Riblah (new ed. of Researches, iii, 534).

Ainsworth, Henry, D. D., one of the earliest leaders of the Independents, then called Brownists; a celebrated nonconformist divine of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The time and place of his birth are unknown. In early life he gained great reputation by his knowledge of the learned languages, and particularly of Hebrew. He removed about 1593 to Amsterdam, and had a church there (with an interval spent in Ireland) until his death, which occurred suddenly in 1622. Suspicion of his having been poisoned was raised by his having found a diamond, of great value, belonging to a Jew, and his refusing to return it to him till he had confessed with some of the rabbins on the prophecies of the Old Testament relating to the Messiah, which was promised; but the Jew not having sufficient interest to obtain one, it is thought he was the instrument of his death. Ainsworth was a man of profound learning, well versed in the Scriptures, and deeply read in the works of the rabbins. His much celebrated "Annotations on several Books of the Bible" were printed at various times and in many sizes. In those on the five Books of Moses, Psalms, and the Canticles, the Hebrew words are compared with and explained by the ancient Greek and Chaldee versions, and other records and monuments of the Hebrew. The "Annotations on the Pentateuch" were republished in Edinburgh (Blackie and Son, 2 vols. 8vo) in 1813.—Neal, Hist. of the Puritans, ii, 43; Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 22.

Ainsworth, Laban, a Congregational minister, was born at Woodstock, Conn., July 19th, 1757. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1778, and became pastor of the church at Jaffrey, N. H., Dec. 10th, 1782. Here he continued in the pastoral relation until his death, March 17th, 1858. He was an evangelical preacher of more than ordinary ability, and a man of great humor in his social intercourse, but earnestly intent in his great calling. He retained the respect and affection of his people to the last.—Amer. Cong. Year Book (vol. vi, 1859, p. 117).

Aionios. See ETERNAL.

Air (ἀἶρ), the atmosphere, as opposed to the ether (αἰθήρ), or higher and purer region of the sky (Acts xxii, 24; 1 Thess. iv, 17; Rev. ii, 2; xvi, 17). The Heb. term רוּחַ, ru'ach, occurs in this sense but once (Job xli, 16); "air" is elsewhere the rendering of שָׁמַיִם, shama'yim, in speaking of birds of the heavens. The later Jews (see Eisenmenger, Entd. Jud. ii, 437 sq.), in common with the Gentiles (see Elsner, Obs. ii, 205; Douglai Annal. p. 127), especially the Pythagoreans, believed the air to be peopled with spirits, under the government of a chief, who there held his seat of empire (Philo, 31, 28; Diog. Laert. viii, 32; Plutarch, Quest. Rom. p. 274). These spirits were supposed to be powerful, but malignant, and to incite men to evil. That the Jews held this opinion is plain from the rabbinical citations of Lightfoot, Weststein, etc. Thus in Pirke Aboth, lxxxiii, 2, they are described as filling the whole air, arranged in troops, in regular subordination (see Rosenroth, Cabbala denud. i, 417). The early Christian fathers entertained the same belief (Ignat. ad Ephes. § 13), which has indeed come down to our own times. It is to this notion that Paul is supposed to allude in Eph. ii, 2, where Satan is called "prince of the power (i. e. of those who exercise the power) of the air" (see Stuart, in the Biblioth. Sacra, 1843, p. 139). Some, however, explain "air" here by darkness, a sense which it bears also in profane writers. But the apostle no doubt speaks according to the notions entertained by most of those to whom he wrote, without expressing the extent of his own belief (see Bloomfield, Rec. Syn., and Meyer, Comment. in loc.). See POWER; PRINCIPALITY. The sky as the midst of heaven, or the middle station between heaven and earth, may symbolically represent the place where the Divine judgments are denounced, as in 1 Chron. xxi, 16. See ANGEL.

The phrase εἰς αἶρα λαλεῖν, to speak into the air (1 Cor. xiv, 9), is a proverbial expression to denote speaking in vain, like ventis verba profundere in Latin (Lucret. iv, 929), and a similar one in our own language; and εἰς αἶρα ἕρπειν, to beat the air (1 Cor. ix, 26), denotes acting in vain, and is a proverbial allusion to an abortive stroke into the air in pugilistic contests (comp. Virgil, Æn. v, 377). See GAMES.

Aïrus (ἰάριος, comp. Jairus of the N. T.), one of the temple-servants whose "sons" are said to have returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 31); probably a corruption for GAHAR (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 47).

Aisle is derived from the Latin ala, French aile, a wing, and signifies the wings or side-passages of the church. The term is incorrectly applied to the middle avenue of a church, which its derivation shows to be wrong. Where there is but one aisle to a transept, it is always to the east. In churches on the continent of Europe the number of aisles is frequently two on either side of the nave and choir, and at Cologne there are even three. See CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.

Aix-la-Chapelle (Aquis-granum or Aque-granum, Germ. Aachen), a large city of Germany, dependent on the archbishopric of Cologne in spiritual matters. As the favorite abode of Charlemagne, it acquired great ecclesiastical importance; and many councils were held there. From the time of Otho I (937) to Ferdinand I, 1558, twenty-nine German emperors were crowned in this city.

The first COUNCIL OF AIX-LA-CHAPELLE was held in 789, on discipline; in the council held in 799 Felix of Urgel renounced Agnoetism, which he previously upheld. The others are that of 803, where the Benedictines received their religious regulations; of 809, on the procession of the Holy Ghost; 813, when the canons of the preceding council were published; 816, confirmatory of the rules of Chrodegang; 817, on St. Benedict's rule, etc.; 825, on the same subjects; 831, declaring the innocence of the Empress Judith; 836, on the restoration of Church property; 857, on Episcopal controversies; 842, by Kings Louis and Charles, on the division of Lothaire's possessions; two sessions in 860, against Queen Thetburga; 862, allowing King Lothaire to contract a new marriage; 992, forbidding marriages during Advent, from Septuagesima to Easter, etc.; 1165, to canonize Charlemagne.—Smith, Tables of Church Hist.

A'jah (Heb. Ayah', אַיָּה, prop. a cry, hence a hawk, as often), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Ai'; but Aid', Auth. Vers. "Aiah" in Chron.) The first named of the two sons of Zibeon the Horite or rather Hivite (Gen. xxxvi, 24; 1 Chron. i, 40), B.C. ante 1964.

2. (Sept. Aid', but in 2 Sam. iii, 7 v. r. Ἰώλ, Auth. Vers. "Aiah.") The father of Rizpah, King Saul's concubine (2 Sam. iii, 7; xxi, 8-11), B.C. ante 1093.

Aj'alón (Heb. Ayalon', אַיָּלוֹן, place of deer, or of oaks), the name of two towns.

1. (Sept. Ailón, but Ἐλών in Josh. xix, 42, ἐν ὄρει αἰ ἄψκον in Judg. i, 35, omits in 1 Sam. xiv, 31, Ἡλών v. r. Αἰλών in 1 Chron. vi, 69, Αἰάμ v. r. Αἰάμ and Ἀάμ in 1 Chron. viii, 13, Ἀιαλών v. r. Αἰλώμ in 2 Chron. xi, 10, Ἀἰλών in 2 Chron. xxviii, 18; Josephus Ἡλώμ, Ant. viii, 10, 1; Auth. Vers. "Ajalon" in all the passages except Josh. x, 12; xix, 41; 2 Chron. xxviii, 18.) A town and valley in the tribe of Dan (Josh. xiv, 42), which was given to the Levites (Josh. xxi, 24; 1 Chron. vi, 69). The native Amorites for a long time retained possession of it, although reduced to the condition of tributaries by the neighboring Ephraimites (Judg. i, 35). Being on the very frontier of the two kingdoms, we can understand how Ajalon should be spoken of sometimes (1 Chron. vi, 69, comp. with 66) as in Ephraim, and sometimes (2 Chron. xi, 10; 1 Sam. xiv, 31) as in Judah and Benjamin. It was not far from Bethshemesh (2 Chron. xxviii, 18), and was one of the places which Rehoboam fortified (2 Chron. xi, 10) during his conflicts with the new kingdom of Ephraim (1 Kings xiv, 30), and among the strongholds which the Philistines took from Abaz (2 Chron. xxviii, 18). Saul pursued hither the routed Philistines from Michmash (1 Sam. xiv, 31), and some of his chiefs appear to have subsequently defeated an incursion of the same enemies from Gath (1 Chron. viii, 13). But the town, or rather the valley to which the town gave name, derives its chief renown from the circumstance that when Joshua, in pursuit of the five kings, arrived at some point near Upper Beth-horon, looking back upon Gibeon and down upon the noble valley before him, he uttered the celebrated command, "Sun, stand thou still on Gibeon, and thou moon, in the valley of Ajalon" (Josh. x, 12). From the indications of Jerome (Onomast. and Epitaph. Paul.), who places Ajalon two Roman miles from Nicopolis, on the way to Jerusalem (comp. Ἰαλώ in Epiphani. Opp. i, 702), joined to the preservation of the ancient name, Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Researches, iii, 63) appears to have identified the valley and the site of the town. From a house-top in Beit Ur (Beth-horon) he looked down upon a broad and beautiful valley, which lay at his feet, toward Ramleh. This valley runs out west by north through a tract of hills, and then bends off south-west through the great western plain. It is called Merj Ibn 'Omeir. Upon the side of the long hill which skirts the valley on the south a small village was perceived, called Yalo, which cannot well be any other than the ancient Ajalon; and there can be little question that the broad wady to the north of it is the valley of the same name (see Thomson's Land and Book, ii, 304, 546). Keil, however (Comment. in Josh. x, 12), controverts the above view (from Lengerke, after Lapide and Le Clerc, in loc.) respecting the position of Joshua on this occasion, maintaining that if Joshua really saw both the sun and moon when he delivered this memorable address, it must have been in the early part of the day, and during the engagement before Gibeon itself; for then the sun might have been visible on the east or south-east of Gibeon, and the moon in the south-west, above the valley of Ajalon, as it would then be about to set. See JASIER. According to Schwarz (Palest. p. 141), a person on the summit of Upper Beth-horon can see at once Gibeon on the east and Ajalon on the west. The village of Yalo is situated on the northern declivity overlooking the plain, between two ravines, the western one of which contains a fountain that supplies the village. It has an old appearance, and contains several caverns in the cliffs (new ed. of Robinson's Researches, iii, 144).

2. (Sept. Ailón, Auth. Vers. "Ajalon.") A city in the tribe of Zebulun, where Elon the judge was buried (Judg. xii, 12). It is probably the modern Jalun, about four hours east of Akka, and a short distance south-west of Mejdél Kerum (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 283); for this place, although really within the bounds of Naphtali, is sufficiently near, perhaps, to the border of Zebulun to be included in that region, according to the indefinite mention of the text.

Aj'ephim (Heb. Ayephim', אֵיפִים, weary ones; Sept. ἐκλελυμένοι, Vulg. lassus, Auth. Vers. "weary") occurs in the original, 2 Sam. xvi, 14, where, although rendered as an appellative in the versions, it has been regarded by many interpreters (e. g. Michaelis, Dathé, Thénius, in loc.) as the name of a place to which the fugitive David and his company retired from Jerusalem on the approach of the rebellious Absalom, and where they made their halt for the night, but from which they were induced to remove by the news sent them by Hushai. This view is favored by the phraseology, וַיָּבֹאוּ, "and he came," שָׁמָּה, "there," evidently referring to some locality, which must be sought east of Jerusalem, beyond the Mount of Olives, toward the ford of the Jordan; perhaps between Bethany and Khan Hadrun, on the S.W. bank of Wady Sidra.

A'kan (Heb. Akan', אִקָּן, twisted; Sept. ἰσκιόψ), the last named of the three sons of Ezer, son of the Horite Seir of Idumaea (Gen. xxxv, 27); elsewhere called JAKAN (1 Chron. i, 41). See JAAKAN.

Akbara. See ACHABARA.

Akiba, a learned Jewish rabbi of the second century. He was president of the seminary at Bone Berak (Josh. xix, 45), near Jamnia. As a teacher he wielded great influence, especially in developing and diffusing the Talmudic learning and the Cabala. Among his scholars were Rabbi Meir, one of the originators of the Mishna, and Rabbi S. ben-Jochai, author of the Cabballistic work Zohar. He is said to have joined the rebel Barchochebas, and to have been taken and flayed by the Romans in his 120th year. See Jost, Geschichte d. Israeliten, p. 252; Fürst, Bib. Jud. i.

Akins, JAMES, one of the early Methodist ministers, was born in Ireland 1778, removed to America in 1792, and entered the itinerant ministry in 1801. He labored for over twenty years with success, chiefly in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, and died at Haverstraw, Aug. 9, 1823.—Minutes of Conferences, 1824, p. 439.

Ak'krub (Heb. Akkub', אַכְכּוּב, a contracted form of Jacob; Sept. 'Akoib), sometimes 'Akoib v. r. usually 'Akoip), the name of at least three men.

1. The head of one of the families of Nethim that returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 45), B.C. 536 or ante.

2. One of the Levitical gatekeepers of the Temple on the return with many of his family from the captivity (1 Chron. ix, 17; Ezra ii, 42; Neh. vii, 45; ix, 19; xii, 25); and probably one of those who expounded the law to the people (Neh. viii, 7), B.C. 536-440.

3. The fourth named of the seven sons of Elioenai or Esh, a descendant of David (1 Chron. iii, 24), B.C. cir. 410.

Akrab. See SCORPION.

Akrab'bim (Heb. Akrabbim', אַכְרַבִּים, scorpions, as in Ezek. ii, 6; Sept. 'Akrabivn', Ἀκραβειν), only in the connection MAALEH-AKRABBIM (q. v.), i. e. Scorpion-Height (Josh. xv, 3; "ascent of Akrab-bim" Num. xxxiv, 4; "going up to Akrab-bim," Judg. i, 36), an ascent, hill, or chain of hills, which, from the name, would appear to have been much infested by scorpions and serpents, as some districts in that quarter certainly were (Deut. viii, 15; comp. Volney, ii, 256). It is only mentioned in describing the frontier-line of the promised land southward in the region of the Amorites (Num. xxxiv, 4; Josh. xv, 3; Judg. i, 36). Shaw conjectures that Akrab-bim may be the same with the mountains of Akabah, by which he understands the easternmost range of the "black mountains" of Ptolemy, extending from Paran to Judaea. This range has lately become well known as the mountains of Edom, being those which bound the great valley of Arabah on the east (Travels, ii, 126). More specifically, he seems to refer Akrab-bim to the southernmost portion of this range, near the fortress of Akabah, and the extremity of the eastern gulf of the Red Sea; where, as he observes, "from the badness of the roads, and many rocky passes that are to be surmounted, the Mohammedan pilgrims lose a number of camels, and are no less fatigued than the Israelites were formerly in getting over them." Burckhardt (Syria, p. 509) reaches nearly the same conclusion, except that he rather refers "the ascent of Akrab-bim" to the acclivity of the western mountains from the plain of Akabah. This ascent is very steep, "and has probably given to the place its name of Akabah, which means a cliff or steep declivity." But the south-eastern frontier of Judah could not have been laid down so far to the south in the time of Moses and Joshua. The signification of the names in the two languages is altogether different. M. De Sauley finds this "Scorpion-steep" in the Wady es-Zurcibah, running into the S.W. end of the Dead Sea; a precipitous, zigzag ascent, up which a path marked with ancient ruins is cut in the flanks of the hard rock, and which is peculiarly infested with scorpions (Narrative, i, 361, 418, 421). Schwarz, on the other hand, locates it at the Wady el-Kwaleh, running into the south-eastern extremity of the Dead Sea (Paläst., p. 22). Both these latter positions, however, seem as much too far north as the preceding are too far south, since the place in question appears to have been situated just beyond the point where the southern boundary of Palestine turned northward; and we know from the localities of several towns in Judah and Simeon (e. g. Kadesh, Beersheba, etc.) that the territory of the promised land extended as far southward as the ridge bounding the depressed level of the desert et-Tih.

The conclusion of Dr. Robinson is, that in the absence of more positive evidence the line of cliffs separating the Ghor from the valley of the Akabah may be regarded as the Maaleh-Akrabbim of Scripture (Researches, ii, 501). This, however, would be a descent and not an ascent to those who were entering the Holy Land from the south. Perhaps the most feasible supposition is that Akrab-bim is the general name of the ridge containing the steep pass es-Syfah, by which the final step is made from the desert to the level of the actual land of Palestine. As to the name, scorpions abound in the whole of this district. The same spot may be that alluded to in the Mishna (Maaser Shenai, v. 2), as "Akrabah (אַכְרַבִּים) on the south."

The district of Acrabattine mentioned in 1 Macc. v, 3, and Josephus, Ant. xii, 8, 1, as lying on the frontier of Idumaea, toward the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, may have derived its name from this ridge. But Dr. Robinson thinks that the toponym referred to took its name from Akrabah, now a large and flourishing village a little east of Nablous, the ancient Shechem (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1853, p. 132; and see the authorities in his Researches, iii, 103). This "Acrabattine" of the Apocrypha, however, was probably a different place. See ACRA-BATTINE.

Akrothionion (Ἀκροθίων, from the top of the heap). This Greek word (usually in the plur. ἀκροθίωνα), which occurs in Heb. vii, 4, means the best of the (fruits of the earth, hence) spoils (Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Akrothionion). The Greeks, after a battle, were accustomed to collect the spoils into a heap, from which an offering was first made to the gods: this was the ἀκροθίωνον (Xenoph. Cyrop. vii, 5, 35; Herodot. viii, 121, 122; Pind. Nem. 7, 58). In the first cited case, Cyrus, after the taking of Babylon, calls the magi, and commands them to choose the ἀκροθίονα of certain portions of the ground for sacred purposes (see Stephens, Theas. Grec. p. 1560). See SPILL.

Alabama, a diocese of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States coextensive with the state of the same name. In 1859 the diocese counted 32 clergymen and 38 parishes, and the following diocesan institutions: missionary committee, ecclesiastical court, trustees of the bishops' fund, society for the relief of disabled clergymen and of the widows and orphans of the clergy. The first bishop of the diocese was Nicholas Hamner Cobbs (q. v.), consecrated in 1844, and the second, Richard H. Wilmer, consecrated March 6, 1862. Alabama was one of the dioceses which, in 1862, organized "the General Council of the Confederate States of America."

Alabarch (Ἀλαβάρχη, a term compounded apparently of some unknown foreign word, and ἀρχα, to rule; also ἀλιθάραρχος), a term not found in Scripture, but which Josephus uses repeatedly, to signify the chief of the Jews in Alexandria (Ant. xviii, 6, 3; 8, 1; xix, 5, 1; xx, 5, 2; 7, 3). Philo calls this magistrate Περσάρχης, genarch (q. v.), and Josephus, in some places, ethnarch (q. v.), which terms signify the prince or chief of a nation. Some believe that the term alabarch was given, in raillery, to the principal magistrate or head of the Jews at Alexandria, by the Gentiles, who despised the Jews. See ALEXANDRIA. The Jews who were scattered abroad after the captivity, and had taken up their residence in countries at a distance from Palestine, had rulers of their own. See DISPERSION. The person who sustained the highest office among those who dwelt in Egypt was denominated alabarch: the magistrate at the head of the Syrian Jews was denominated archon (q. v.). (See Jahn, Bibl. Archæol. § 239.) The dignity of alabarch was common in Egypt, as may be observed in Juvenal, Sat. i, 130. It was perhaps synonymous with chief tax-gatherer (comp. Sturz, De Dial. Maced. p. 65 sq.). Thus Cicero (Ep. ad Attic. 17) calls Pompey an ala- barch, from his raising taxes; but others here read arabarch (see Faccioliati, Lat. Lex. s. v. Arabarches). See JEWS.

Alabaster (Ἀλάβαστρον) occurs in the N. T. only in the notice of the "alabaster box," or rather resel, of "ointment of spikenard, very precious," which a woman broke, and with its valuable contents anointed the head of Jesus as he sat at supper, once at Bethany and once in Galilee (Matt. xxvi, 7; Mark xiv, 3; Luke vii, 37). At Alabastron, in Egypt, there was a manufactory of small pots and vessels for holding perfumes (Ptolem. iv, 5), which were made from a stone found in the neighboring mountains (Irwin's Travels, p. 382). The Greeks gave to these vessels the name of the city from which they came, calling them alabastra. This name was eventually extended to the stone of which they were formed; and at length the term alabastron was applied without distinction to all perfume vessels of whatever materials they consisted. (Herod. iii, 20; Ælian, Var. Hist. xii, 18; Theoc. xv, 114; Lucian, Asin. 51; Petron. Sat. 60; Pliny, ix, 56; comp. Wetstein, i, 515; Kypse, Obs. i, 188.) The material, although sometimes colored, was usually white, which was the most esteemed (Athen. xv, 686). Theocritus speaks of golden alabastra (Idyl. xv, 114); and perfume vessels of different kinds of stone, of glass, ivory, bone, and shells, have been found in the Egyptian tombs (Wilkinson, iii, 379). It does not, therefore, by any means follow that the alabastron which the woman used at Bethany was really of alabaster, but a probability that it was such arises from the fact that vessels made of this stone were deemed peculiarly suitable for the most costly and powerful perfumes (Plin. Hist. Nat. xiii, 2; xxxvi, 8, 24). The woman is said to have "broken" the vessel, which is explained by supposing that it was one of those shaped somewhat like a Florence oil-flask, with a long and narrow neck; and the mouth being curiously and firmly sealed up, the usual and easiest way of getting at the contents was to break off the upper part of the neck. The alabastrum mentioned in the Gospels was, according to Epiphanius, a measure containing one cotyla, or about half a pint (Smith's Diet. of Class. Antiq. s. v.). The word itself is, however, properly the name of the substance of which the box was formed, and hence in 2 Kings xxi, 13, the Sept. use ὀ ἀλάβαστρος for the Heb. ṭullach'ath, a dish, patina, לִיקוּזֹס, ampulla). Horace (Od. iv, 12) uses onyx in the same way. Alabaster is a calcareous spar, resembling marble, but softer and more easily worked, and therefore very suitable for being wrought into boxes (Pliny, iii, 20). The alabastra were not usually made of that white and soft gypsum to which the name of alabaster is now for the most part confined. Dr. John Hill, in his notes on Theophrastus, sets this matter in a clear light, distinguishing the alabastrites of naturalists as harl, and he adds: "This stone was by the Greeks called also sometimes onyx, and by the Latins marmor onychites, from its use in making boxes to preserve precious ointments, which boxes were commonly called 'onyxes' and 'alabasters.' So Dioscorides interprets." It is apprehended that, from certain appearances common to both, the same name was given not only to the common alabaster, called by mineralogists gypsum, and by chemists subphate of lime, but also to the carbonate of lime, or that harder stone from which the alabastra were usually made.

(Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.). By the English word alabaster is likewise to be understood both that kind which is also known by the name of gypsum, and the Oriental alabaster which is so much valued on account of its translucency, and for its variety of colored streakings, red, yellow, gray, etc., which it owes for the most part to the admixture of oxides of iron. The latter is a fibrous carbonate of lime, of which there are many varieties, satin spar being one of the most common. The former is a hydrous sulphate of lime, and forms, when calcined and ground, the well-known substance called plaster of Paris. Both these kinds of alabaster, but especially the latter, are and have been long used for various ornamental purposes, such as the fabrication of vases, boxes, etc., etc. The ancients considered alabaster (carbonate of lime) to be the best material in which to preserve their ointments (Pliny, H. N. xiii, 3). Herodotus (iii, 20) mentions an alabaster vessel of ointment which Cambyses sent, among other things, as a present to the Æthiopians. Hammond (Annotat. ad Matt. xxvi, 7) quotes Plutarch, Julius Pollux, and Athenæus, to show that alabaster was the material in which ointments were wont to be kept. Pliny (ix, 56) tells us that the usual form of these alabaster vessels was long and slender at the top, and round and full at the bottom. He likens them to the long pearls, called chechi, which the Roman ladies suspended from their fingers or dangled from their ears. He compares also the green pointed cone of a rose-hud to the form of an alabaster ointment-vessel (H. N. xxi, 4). The onyx (Hor. Od. iv, 12, 17, "Nardi parvus onyx"), which Pliny says is another name for alabastrites, must not be confounded with the precious stone of that name, which is a sub-species of the quartz family of minerals, being a variety of agate. Perhaps the name of onyx was given to the pink-colored variety of the calcareous alabaster, in allusion to its resembling the finger-nail (onyx) in color, or else because the calcareous alabaster bears some resemblance to the agate-onyx in the characteristic lunar-shaped mark of the last-named stone, which mark reminded the ancients of the whitish semicircular spot at the base of the finger-nail. ALABASTER, WILLIAM, a learned but erratic divine, born in Suffolk 1567, and studied both at Cambridge and Oxford. In 1596 he went to Cadiz as chaplain to the Earl of Essex, and there joined the Church of Rome. A few years of Romish life disgusted him, and in 1610 he returned to the Church of England. He obtained a prebend in St. Paul's, and afterward was made rector of Therfield, where he died in 1640. He was a great student of the so-called cabalistic learning. His works are (1) Lexicon Pentaglotton (Heb., Chald., Syr., etc.), Lond. 1637, fol.; (2) Comm. de Bestia Apocalypica, 1621. He also wrote a tragedy, "Rosarum," of which Dr. Johnson spoke highly.—Wood, Athen. Ozon., Hook, Ecol. Biog. i, 102.

Al'ameth, a less correct mode (1 Chron. vii, 8) of Anglicizing the name ALEMETH (q. v.).

Alam'melech (Heb. Alamme'lek, אֱלָמֵלֶךְ, perhaps king's oik; Sept. Ἐλμῆλϵχ, a town on the border of the tribe of Asher, mentioned between Achshaph and Anad (Josh. xix, 26). Schwarz remarks (Palest. p. 191) that the name may be indicative of a location on the branch of the Kishon still called Nahr el-Melek; perhaps at the ruins el-Haraji (Van de Velde, Memoir. p. 283).

Al'amoth (Heb. Alamoth', אֱלָמוֹת, virgins, as often; Sept. ἄλμωθ v. r. ἀλαμωθ and ἀλμωθ, Vulg. arcana), a musical term used in 1 Chron. xv, 20, apparently to denote that the chorists should sing in the female voice, i. e. our treble, or soprano. So Lafage (Hist. Gén. de la Musique) renders it "chant supérieur ou à l'octave" (comp. Mendelssohn, Introd. to Psalms). The word occurs in the same form and signification in the inscription of Psa. xlv (where the Sept. and Vulg. translate κρυφία, arcana, i. e. secrets, as if indicative of the contents of the Psalm), and twice again in nearly the same form (אֱלָמוֹת), namely, in the inscription of Psa. ix (where it has the same sense, but is differently rendered by our translators "upon Muth.—"Sept. again ὑπὲρ τῶν κρυφίων, Vulg. occultis), and in Psa. xlviii, 15 (where the context requires the meaning forever, but our version has "unto death," Sept. correctly εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, Vulg. in secula). See MUTH-LABEN. Forkel (Gesch. der Mus. i, 142) understands virgin measures (Germ. Jungfernmäße), i. e. in maidenly style, but against the propriety of the usage. See PSALMS.

Alan, CARDINAL. See ALLAN.

Alan de L'ISLE (Almus de Insulis), so called because, as most writers say, he was a native of Hyssel, in Flanders, now Lille (L'Isle, Insule) in France, or it was the name of his family. He obtained the name of "the Universal Doctor," being equally well skilled in theology, philosophy, and poetry. It is said that a great part of his life was spent in England. The opinion that he was the same as Alan of Flanders (q. v.) is now generally rejected. He was born in 1114, and died about 1200. Having been appointed to the episcopal see of Auxerre or Canterbury (the place is as uncertain as the fact), he soon resigned his functions in order to retire to the monastery of Cîteaux, where he seems to have devoted himself to alchemy. Of his alchemical labors, we only know his aphorism (dicta) on the philosopher's stone. Alan calls the amalgam resulting from the union of gold or of silver with mercury the "solution of philosophers" (solutio philosophorum), and adds that great advantages may be derived therefrom. His works are, 1. Doctrinale Minus, or the book of parables (Gons. 1491, 4to); 2. Doctrinale Minus Alterum, or Liber Sententiarum et Dictorum Memorabilium (Paris, 1492, 4to); 3. Elucidatio supra Cantica Canticoorum (Paris, 1540); 4. Lib. de Planctu Naturæ, on the vices of the age and their remedy; 5. Anticlericalismus, sive, de officio viri in omnibus virtutibus perfecti: libri ix (Basle, 1536, 8vo; Ant. 1621); this work is also called the "Encyclopædia," from its professing to contain every thing divine and human which man ought to meditate upon and admire; 6. De arte seu articulis Catholicæ fidei (published by Masson, Paris, 1612, 8vo); 7. Alam Magni de Insulis explanationum in prophetiam Merlini Ambrosii, Britannii, libri rii (Frankfort, 1607, 8vo); 8. Liber penitentialis, dedicated to Henry de Sully, archbishop of Bourges. Several other works of Alan are found in manuscript in the libraries of France and England. Another work of his on morals has been discovered during the present century at Avranches (see Ravaissou, Rapport sur les Bibliothèques de l'Ouest de la France, Paris, 1841, p. 157). The work Opus Quadrupartitum de fide Catholica contra Valdenses, Albigenes et alios hujus temporis hereticos, which was formerly enumerated among his works, is probably not from him, but from Alan de Podio (q. v.).—Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 1151; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xiii, pt. ii, ch. ii.

ALAN DE PODIO, an ecclesiastical writer, who is probably the author of the work Opus Quadrupartitum de fide Catholica. See ALAN DE L'ISLE. No particulars of the life of this author are known. His surname points to Provence. Another work of his has been discovered during the present century at Avranches (see Ravaissou, Rapport sur les Bibliothèques de l'Ouest de la France, Paris, 1841, p. 157); and he is also supposed to be the author of a work dedicated to the Abbot Ermenegaldus, of St. Gilles, and designated in the manuscript as Oculus, Oraculum Scripturæ Sacræ, Equivoca, etc.

ALAN OF FLANDERS (Alamus Flandriensis), bishop of Auxerre, born in Flanders at the beginning of the 12th century, died in 1182. Some historians, as Oudin (q. v.), identify him with Alan de l'Isle (q. v.), while others, like Cave and the authors of the Histoire Littéraire de France, regard them as different persons. He became a monk at Clairvaux, under St. Bernard, in 1128; was, about 1139, made the first abbot of Rivoir or Rivour, in the diocese of Troyes, in Champagne, and, in 1151 (or 1152), bishop of Auxerre. He is the author of a life of St. Bernard (included in Opera St. Bernardi, tom. ii, 1690, fol.).

Alarm (רָעָעָע, teruah'), a loud sound or shout, as often), a broken quivering sound of the silver trumpets of the Hebrews, warning them in their journey in the wilderness (Num. x, 5, 6; comp. Lev. xxiii, 24; xxv, 9; xxix, 1). When the people or the rulers were to be assembled together, the trumpet was blown softly; when the camps were to move forward, or the people to march to war, it was sounded with a deeper note (Jahn, Bibl. Archæol. § 95, v). Hence a war-note or call to arms, or other public exigency in general (Jer. iv, 19; xlix, 2; Zeph. i, 16). See TRUMPET.

Alasco, JOHN. See LASCO.

Alb, Alba, a long white tunic in the Church of Rome, worn by all ecclesiastics during service, and answering to the surplice in the Church of England, excepting that the alb is narrower in the sleeves, and fits the body more closely, being often gathered at the waist by a girle. The ornaments at the bottom and wrists are called apparels, and it is also sometimes embroidered with a cross upon the breast. See VESTMENT.

It was an ancient custom to clothe the newly-baptized in albis, in white garments. These garments were delivered to them, with a solemn charge to keep their robes of innocence unspotted until the day of Christ. This dress was worn from Easter-eve until the Sunday after Easter, which was called Dominica in albis; that is, the Sunday in white, whence the name Whitsunday. The garment was usually made of white linen, but occasionally of more costly materials.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. lib. xiii, cap. viii, § 2.

Alban, St., protomartyr of England, is said to have served seven years with Diocletian, after which, returning to his country, he took up his abode at Verulamium, in Hertfordshire, his birth-place. Shortly after this the persecution of Diocletian broke out, which drove Amphibalus, who had been the companion of Alban, on his journey to Rome, and his fellow-soldier, to Britain for safety, where he at once betook himself to Verulamium. When the persecution of the Christians commenced in Britain, the name of Amphibalus was brought before the prefect, Asclepiodotus, as that of a man guilty of following the new religion; but, when he could not be found, Alban voluntarily presented himself to the judge, and was put to the torment and imprisoned. Shortly after, both he and his friend, who had been discovered, were condemned to die as being Christians: Alban was put to death by the sword on a small hill in the neighborhood, called afterward by the Saxons Holmehurst, and where his body was also buried. When tranquillity had been restored to the Church, great honors were paid to the tomb of Alban, and a chapel was erected over it, which Bede says was of admirable workmanship. About 795, Offa, king of the Mercians, founded here a spacious monastery in honor of St. Alban, and soon after the town called St. Alban arose in its neighborhood. Pope Adrian IV, who was born in this neighborhood, directed that the abbot of St. Alban's should hold the first place among the abbots of England. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on June 22d.—Gough's Camden's Britannia, i, 336; Tanner, Biblioth. Brit. p. 18; Collier, Eccl. Hist. i, 48; Landon, s. v.

Albanenses, a sect of the Cathari, which appeared toward the close of the eleventh century, and derived its name from Albania, where Dualism was quite prevalent; others say, from Albano, in Italy. They held the Gnostic and Manichean doctrines of two principles, one good and the other evil. They denied the divinity of Jesus Christ, and rejected the account of his sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension. They rejected the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, affirmed that the general judgment was already passed, and that the torments of hell are the pains which men feel in this life. They denied man's free will, did not admit the doctrine of original sin, and held that man can impart the Holy Spirit to himself.—Moshem, Ch. Hist. cent. xii, pt. ii, ch. v, § 5; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. per. iii, § 87. See CATHARI.

Albati, a sect so called from the white garments they wore. They entered Italy from the Alps about 1400, having as their guide a priest clothed in white, and a crucifix in his hand. He was deemed a saint, and his followers multiplied so fast that Pope Boniface IX, growing jealous of the augmenting power of the leader, sent soldiers, who put him to death and dispersed his followers. (See Siber, De Albatis, Lips. 1736.) They are said (by their enemies and persecutors, however) to have been dissolute in their habits, while, at the same time, they professed to weep and sorrow for the sins and calamities of the times.—Moshem, Church History, ii, 467.

Alber, Erasmus, a German Protestant theologian, born at Sprendingen, near Frankfort on the Main, and educated at Wittenberg. In 1528 he was called by Landgrave Philip of Hesse as pastor to Sprendingen. Subsequently, he was court preacher to Elector Joachim II of Brandenburg, by whom he was again dismissed on account of the violence of language with which he combated the taxation of the clergy. In 1543 he received from Luther the title of doctor of divinity. In 1545 he was called by the count of Hanau-Lichtenberg to carry through the reformation in his land. From Magdeburg, to which city he was subsequently called as pastor, he was expelled on account of his opposition to the Interim. In 1553 he was appointed superintendent at Neu-Brandenburg, in Mecklenburg, where he died, May 5, 1553. While court preacher of the elector of Brandenburg, he found in a Franciscan convent a work by a Franciscan monk, Bartholomew Albizzi (q. v.), entitled Liber Conformitatum S. Francisci ad vitam Jesu Christi. This induced him to write his celebrated work, Der Barfüsser Mönche Eulenspiegel und Alcoran, which was published, with a preface from Luther, at Wittenberg, in 1542, and soon appeared in a French, Latin, and Dutch translation. He wrote several other works against the Interim, against Andreas Osiander, against the followers of Karlstadt, against Witzel, fables for the youth in rhymes, and religious songs, published by Stromberger, in Geistliche Sänge der christlichen Kirche deutscher Nation, vol. x (Halle, 1837). A complete list of his works is in Strieder, Grundlage zu einer Hessischen Gelehrten- und Schriftsteller-geschichte (Gött. 1781), i, 24 sq.—See Herzog, Supplem. i, 33; Biog. Univ. i, 394.

Alber, John Nepomuk, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Ovar, July 7, 1753, died about 1840. He wrote a large work on Hermeneutics, in 16 vols. (Interpretatio Sacre Scripture, Pesth, 1801-'4), which Horne recommends as an able refutation of the opinions of the anti-supernaturalist divines of Germany. He also wrote Institutiones Historie Eccles. (Vienna, 1793); Institutiones Hermeneuticæ, 1817; and Institutiones Lingue Hebraicæ, 1826.—Hoefler, Biog. Générale, ii, 539.

Alber, Matthew, one of the leaders of the Reformation in Southern Germany, born at Reutlingen, 1495, studied at Tübingen, and was ordained priest about 1521. He received a call as preacher to his native town, where he labored so faithfully in behalf of the Reformation, that, in 1523, the people generally were favorable to it. In 1524, Alber, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the abbot of Königsbronn, the patron of the churches of Reutlingen, was appointed by the city authorities the first pastor of the city. At the instigation of the abbot of Königsbronn, he was summoned before the bishop of Constance, but, owing to the urgent solicitations of his friends, did not go. He was therefore put under the ban by the bishop, by Pope Leo X, and by the imperial court of Rothweil. The three decrees were simultaneously posted on all the church doors, but failed to produce any effect. Alber, with the applause of the people, proceeded undauntedly on the way of reformation. He abolished the Latin mass, introduced the use of the native language at divine service, removed the images from the churches, and got married. In December, 1524, he was summoned before the Imperial Chamber of Esslingen, where he was charged with 68 heresies, all of which he acknowledged, except the charge that he had spoken disrespectfully of the Virgin Mary. The court, after examining him three days, dismissed him unpunished. The Anabaptists, who at this time endeavored to establish themselves at Reutlingen, were prevailed upon by the sermons of Alber to leave the city. He also succeeded in keeping the citizens of Reutlingen from joining in the peasants' war. Zuingle, in a letter of November 16, 1526, endeavored to gain Alber over to his view of the Lord's Supper; but Alber, like his friend Brentz, remained on the side of Luther, with whom he became personally acquainted in Wittenberg in 1536. In 1537 Alber took part in the colloquy of Urach, when he zealously combated the use of images in the churches. In 1539 he received from the university of Tübingen the title of doctor of divinity. When the Interim was forced upon Reutlingen, he left the city on June 25, 1548, and was called by Duke Ulrich as anti-tes (first pastor) of the collegiate church (Stiftskirche) of Stuttgart. Duke Christopher appointed him church counsellor, and, in 1563, he was made abbot of Blaubeuren. He died Dec. 2, 1570. He published several sermons, a catechism (Gründlicher Bericht des wahren Christenthumes), and a work on Providence (Vom rechten Branch der ewigen Vorsehung Gottes). See Hartmann, Matthäus Alber, der Reformator der Reichsstadt Reutlingen (Tübingen, 1863); Herzog, Real Encyclopädie, i, 202.

Albert, bishop of Liege (saint and martyr of the Roman Church), was the son of Godfrey, duke of Brabant. He was unanimously chosen to succeed Rudolphus, bishop of Liege, who died on the 5th of August, 1191. The Emperor Henry VI opposed this election with all his power, but Celestin II confirmed Albert in the see, and made him cardinal. Henry still persisted in his opposition; and to carry it out fully, three German gentlemen followed Albert to Rheims, whither he had retired, and in his own house, where they had been kindly and generously received, they murdered him, piercing him with thirteen mortal wounds. His body was at first interred at Rheims; but, under Louis XIII, it was translated to Brussels, where it is still preserved. The Roman Martyrology commemorates him on the 21st of November. His life, written by one of his attendants, is in the history of the bishops of Liege, by Gilles, monk of Orval.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. i, 292; Hoefler, Biog. Générale, i, 597.

Albert, "the Great" (ALBERTUS MAGNUS), so called on account of his vast erudition, was born at Lauingen, Suabia. The date of his birth is variously given, by some 1193, by others 1205. He studied at Padua, and entered the order of St. Dominic in 1221. His abilities and learning were of the highest class, and he was deemed the best theologian, philosopher, and mathematician of the age; indeed, his knowledge of mathematics was such, that the people, unable to comprehend the intricate mechanism which he used in some of his works, regarded him as a magician. An automaton which he made was so exquisitely contrived that it seemed to be endowed with powers of spontaneous motion and speech, and deceived even St. Thomas Aquinas, his pupil, who broke it in pieces with a stick, thinking it to be an emissary of the evil one. He was a strong Aristotelian, and his authority contributed greatly to uphold the reign of Aristotle in the schools at that period, in opposition to the papal bull against him. When Jordanus, general of the Dominicans, died in 1236, Albert governed the order for two years as vicar-general. Being afterward made provincial for Germany, he established himself at Cologne, where he publicly taught theology to an infinite number of pupils who flocked to him from all parts; and from this school proceeded Thomas Aquinas, Ambrose of Siena, and Thomas of Cantimpré. In 1260 he was nominated to the bishopric of Ratisbon, and reluctantly consented to accept it; he did not, however, long retain it, and in 1263 obtained permission to leave it, and retire into his convent, where he occupied himself entirely in prayer and study until his death, which happened on the 15th of November, 1260.

Albert was certainly one of the most cultivated men of his age; but yet he was rather a learned man, and a compiler of the works of others, than an original and profound thinker. He wrote commentaries on most of the works of Aristotle, in which he makes especial use of the Arabian commentators, and blends the notion of the Neoplatonists with those of his author. Logic, metaphysics, theology, and ethics were rather externally cultivated by his labors than effectually improved. With him began those minute and tedious inquiries and disputes respecting matter and form, essence and being (Essentia or Quidditas, and Existentia, whence subsequently arose the further distinction of Esse Essentia and Existentia). Of the universal, he assumes that it exists partly in external things and partly in the understanding. Rational psychology and theology are indebted to him for many excellent hints. The latter science he treated in his Summa Theologiae, as well according to the plan of Lombardus as his own. In the former he described the soul as a totum potestativum. His general relation to theology is thus stated by Neander History of Dogmas (ii, 552): "Albert defines Christianity as practical science; for although it is occupied with the investigation of truth, yet it refers every thing to the life of the soul, and shows how man, by the truths it reveals, must be formed to a divine life. It treats of God and his works, not in reference to abstract truth, but to God as the supreme good, to the salvation of men, to the production of piety in the inner and outer man. He also distinguishes various kinds of certainty: the theoretical, which merely relates to knowledge (informatio mentis), and the certainty of immediate consciousness (informatio conscientia). The knowledge obtained by faith is more certain than that derived from other sources; but we must distinguish between the fides informis and the fides formata; the first is only a means to knowledge, but the second is an immediate consciousness. Man is attracted by the object of faith just as moral truth leads him to morality. All knowledge and truth come from God, but they are imparted in different ways; our reason has the capacity to perceive truth, as the eye possesses the faculty of sight. Natural light is one thing, and the light of grace is another. The latter is a higher stage, an assimilation between him who knows and the thing known, a participation of the divine life." In his theology he labored to define our rational knowledge of the nature of God, and enlarged upon the metaphysical idea of him as a necessary Being (in whom pure Esse and his determinate or qualified nature [Sein und Wesen] are identical), endeavoring to develop in this manner his attributes. These inquiries are often mixed up with idle questions and dialectic absurdities, and involve abundant inconsistencies; as for instance, when he would account for the creation by the doctrine of emanation (causatio minima), and nevertheless denies the emanation of souls, he insists upon the universal intervention of the Deity in the course of nature, and yet asserts the existence of natural causes defining and limiting his operations. In treating of the Trinity, he traced an analogy between the divine and the human as follows: "There is no excellence among the creatures which is not to be found in a much higher style, and as an archetype, in the Creator; among created beings it exists only in foot-marks and images. This is true also of the Trinity. No artistic spirit can accomplish his work without first forming to himself an outline of it. In the spirit, therefore, first of all, the idea of its work is conceived, which is, as it were, the offspring of the spirit, in every feature resembling the spirit, representing it in its acting. (Format ex se rationem operis et speciem, quae est sicut proles ipsius intellectus, intellectui agenti similis in quantum agens est.) Thus, therefore, the spirit reveals himself in the idea of the spirit. Now, from the acting spirit this idea passes into reality, and for this purpose the spirit must find a medium in outward action. This medium must be simple, and of the same substance with him who first acted, if indeed the latter is so simple that being, nature, and activity are one in him. From this results the idea in reference to God, of the formative spirit, of the planned image, and of the spirit by which the image is realized. (Spiritus rector formae.) The creation in time is a revelation of the eternal acting of God, the eternal generation of his Son. The revelation of God in time for the sanctification of nature, is an image of the eternal procession of the spirit from the Father and the Son. Our love is only a reflection of the divine love; the archetype of all love is the Holy Spirit, who, like all love, proceeds from God. The one love spread abroad through all holy souls proceeds from the Holy Spirit. (Una caritas diffusa per omnes animas sanctas per spiritum sanctum, ad quam sicut exempla omnis dilectio refertur et comparatione illius et assimilatione caritas dici meretur.) Love in God neither diminishes nor increases, but we diminish or increase it in ourselves according as we receive this love into our souls, or withdraw from it." With reference to original sin, he taught that mankind were materially embodied in Adam: Omne genus humanum secundum corpulentiam substantiam in Adam fuit. He considered conscience to be the highest law of reason, and distinguished the moral disposition (synteresis, συντήρησις) from its habitual exercise (conscientia). All virtue which is acceptable to God is infused by him into the hearts of men. His scholars were distinguished by the name of Albertists. His life is given at length in Quidt and Echarl, Script. Ord. Predicatorum, i, 171. His works, embracing natural and moral science, metaphysics, and theology, are collected and published under the title Opera Alberti Magni quæ hactenus haberi poterant, ed. Pet. Jammy (21 vols. fol. Lyons, 1651). Those which relate to theology are the following: 1. Commentaries on different Books of Holy Scripture, contained in the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th vols. of the above edition;—2. Sermons for the whole Year and Saints' Days; Prayers formed upon the Gospels of all the Sundays in the Year; thirty-two Sermons on the Eucharist, which are usually contained among the works of St. Thomas; all contained in vols. 11 and 12;—3. Commentaries on the works attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite; also, An Abridgment of Theology, in seven books; contained in vol. 13;—4. Commentaries on the Four Books of the Master of the Sentences, in vols. 14, 15, 16;—5. A Summary of Theology, in vols. 17 and 18;—6. Summaries of Creatures, in two parts, the second concerning Man, in vol. 19;—7. A Discourse in honor of the Virgin. A special edition of his "Paradisus animæ sive libellus de virtutibus," with an appendix, containing De sacro Christi Corporis et Longiniani sacramenti tractatus xxvii, has been published by Bishop Seiler (new edit., Ratibon, 1864, 16mo).—Neander, Ch. Hist. iv, 421; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xiii, pt. ii, ch. ii, § 44; Haureau, Philosophie Scholastique, ii, 1-104; Tennemann, Hist. Phil. § 264; Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, ii, 542-593; Herzog, Real Encyclopædie, i, 203; Hoefer, Biog. Générale, i, 590 sq. (where his services to physical science are fully vindicated); Joël, Verhältniss Albert des Grossen zu Mainonides (Breslau, 1863).

Albert, fifth archbishop of Magdeburg and primate of all Germany (1513), and further, in 1514, elected archbishop of Mentz, both of which archiepiscopal sees, by dispensation from Pope Leo X, he held together—a thing altogether without example. Besides this, he was appointed administrator of the bishopric of Halberstadt. He made a contract with Pope Leo for the farming of indulgences, and made the notorious Tetzl (q. v.) one of the agents for their sale in Germany. The proceedings of Tetzl were vigorously watched and opposed by Luther, who, in turn, was hated by the archbishop. His efforts to retard the Reformation were rewarded by the cardinal's hat in 1518. He was the first to introduce the Jesuits into Germany. He died at Mentz in 1545. His writings are, 1. Statuta pro Cleri Reformatione;—2. Decreta adversus Novatores Lutherum et Asecuas;—3. Sermons;—4. Oratio de Bello movendo contra Turcos (Eisleben, 1603);—5. Responsio ad Epist. Lutheri;—6. Constitutiones et Statuta Ecclesiastica, in German (Leipsic, 1552).—Fabricius, Biblioth. Hist. i, 386, 407, 411.

Alberti, John, a Dutch theologian and philosopher, was born at Assen in 1698, and died in 1762. He was pastor at Harlem, and subsequently professor of theology at the university of Leyden. He wrote Observationes Philologicæ in sacros Nori Fæderis Libros (Leyd. 1725), in which he collected from profane writers parallel passages in justification of the Greek language of the New Testament; a Glossarium Græcum in sacros nori Fæderis libros (Leyd. 1735). He also published the first volume of the Lexicon of Hesychius, the second volume of which was published by Ruhnhenius (Leyd. 1766).—Hoefer, Biog. Générale, iii, 615.

Alberti, Leander, a Dominican monk and writer, was born at Bologna, Dec. 11, 1479, and entered the order of St. Dominic in 1498. He applied himself entirely to study, and was called to Rome by the general of his order, Francis Sylvester, of Ferrara, in 1525, to act as one of his assistants, with the title of Provincial of the Holy Land. He was also inquisitor-general at Bologna, where he died in 1552. Among his writings are De Viris Illust. Ord. Predicatorum libri vi (Bolog. 1517, fol.); De D. Dominici Obitu et Sepultura (Bolog. 1535); Historie di Bologna (up to 1279; Bolog. 1541-1590); Descrizione di tutta l'Italia, etc. (Bolog. 1550; Ven. 1551, 1581, and 1588; Latin, Cologne, 1567).—Nicron, Memoires, xxvi, 303; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, i, 617.

Albertini, JOHANN BAPTIST VON, a Moravian bishop, born in 1769 at Nerwied, in Germany. He was appointed in 1804 preacher at Niesky, and consecrated bishop in 1814. In 1821 he became bishop at Herrnhut, and died in 1831 at Bertelsdorf. He distinguished himself especially as the author of many beautiful hymns, some of which have been received into nearly all the Protestant hymn-books of Germany. His theological works are, Predigten (1805, 3d ed. 1829); Geistliche Lieder (1821, 3d ed. 1835); Reden (1832).

Albigenses, the name of one or more religious sects to whom this title seems to have been first given in the twelfth century in the south of France, distinguished by their zealous opposition to the Church of Rome, as also by the peculiar doctrines for which they contended. Some writers (e. g. Cæve) suppose them to be the same as the Waldenses, as the two sects are generally associated and condemned together by the Romanist writers. But it is certain that the Waldenses originated at a later period and held a purer faith, though it is not at all impossible that in the terrible persecutions to which the Albigenses were subjected many Waldenses were included. In the creed of the Waldenses "we find no vestiges of Dualism, nor any thing which indicates the least affinity with Oriental theories of emanation." That the Albigenses were identical with the Waldenses has been maintained by two very different schools of theologians for precisely opposite interests; by the Romanists, to make the Waldenses responsible for the errors of the Albigenses, and by a number of respectable Protestant writers (e. g. Allix), to show that the Albigenses were entirely free from the errors charged against them by their Romish persecutors. "What these bodies held in common, and what made them equally the prey of the inquisitor, was their unwavering belief in the corruption of the mediæval Church, especially as governed by the Roman pontiffs" (Hardwick, Middle Ages, p. 311).

By some writers their origin is traced to the Paulicians (q. v.) or Bogomiles (q. v.), who, having withdrawn from Bulgaria and Thrace, either to escape persecution or, more probably, from motives of zeal to extend their doctrines, settled in various parts of Europe. They acquired different names in different countries; as in Italy, whither they originally migrated, they were called Paterini and Cathari; and in France Albigenses, from the name of a diocese (Albi) in which they were dominant, or from the fact that their opinions were condemned in a council held at Albi in the year 1176. Besides these names, they were called in different times and places, and by various authors, Bulgarians, Publicans (a corruption of Paulicians), Boni Homines, Petro-Brussians, Henricians, Abelardists, and Arnaldists. In the twelfth century the Cathari were very numerous in Southern France. At the beginning of the thirteenth century a crusade was formed for the extirpation of heresy in Southern Europe, and Innocent III enjoined upon all princes to expel them from their dominions in 1209. The immediate pretence of the crusade was the murder of the papal legate and inquisitor, Peter of Castelnau, who had been commissioned to extirpate heresy in the dominions of Count Raymond VI of Toulouse; but its real object was to deprive the count of his lands, as he had become an object of hatred from his toleration of the heretics. It was in vain that he had submitted to the most humiliating penance and flagellation from the hands of the legate Milo, and had purchased the papal absolution by great sacrifices. The legates, Arnold, abbot of Cîteaux, and Milo, who directed the expedition, took by storm Beziers, the capital of Raymond's nephew, Roger, and massacred 20,000—some say 40,000—of the inhabitants, Catholics as well as heretics. "Kill them all," said Arnold; "God will know his own!" (For a full and graphic account of this crusade, see Milman, Latin Christianity, iv, 210 sq.) Simon, count of Montfort, who conducted the war under the legates, proceeded in the same relentless way with other places in the territories of Raymond and his allies. Of these, Roger of Beziers died in prison, and Peter I of Aragon fell in battle. The conquered lands were given as a reward to Simon of Montfort, who never came into quiet possession of the gift. At the siege of Toulouse, 1218, he was killed by a stone, and counts Raymond VI and VII disputed the possession of their territories with his son. But the papal indulgences drew fresh crusaders from every province of France to continue the war. Raymond VII continued to struggle bravely against the legates and Louis VIII of France, to whom Montfort had ceded his pretensions, and who fell in the war in 1226. After hundreds of thousands had perished on both sides, a peace was concluded in 1229, at which Raymond purchased relief from the ban of the Church by immense sums of money, gave up Narbonne and several lordships to Louis IX, and had to make his son-in-law, the brother of Louis, heir of his other possessions. These provinces, hitherto independent, were thus for the first time joined to the kingdom of France; and the pope sanctioned the acquisition in order to bind Louis more firmly to the papal chair, and induce him more readily to admit the inquisition. The heretics were handed over to the proselytizing zeal of the order of Dominicans, and the bloody tribunals of the inquisition; and both used their utmost power to bring the recalcitrant Albigenes to the stake, and also, by inflicting severe punishment on the penitent converts, to inspire dread of incurring the Church's displeasure. From the middle of the thirteenth century the name of the Albigenes gradually disappears.

So far as the Albigenes were a branch of the Cathari, they were Dualistic and, to a certain extent, Manichean. For their doctrines and usages, see BOGOMILES; CATHARI; PAULICIANS. But as the name "Albigenes" does not seem to have been used until some time after the Albigenian crusade (Maitland, Facts and Documents, p. 96), it is likely, as has been remarked above, that many who held the simple truths of the Gospel, in opposition to the corruptions of Rome, were included in the title by the Romish authorities, from whom our knowledge of these sects must chiefly be derived. Indeed, the gross charges brought even against the Cathari rest upon the statements of their persecutors, and therefore are to be taken with allowance. In the reaction from the mistake of Allix and others, who claimed too much for the Albigenes, there is little doubt that Schmidt and others of recent times have gone too far in admitting the trustworthiness of all the accounts of Bonacorsi, Rainerius, and the other Romanist sources of information, both as to the Albigenes and the pure Cathari (Hase, Church History, § 228). With the exception of the charge of rejecting marriage, no allegation is made against their morals by the better class of Roman writers. Their constancy in suffering excited the wonder of their opponents. "Tell me, holy father," says Evervinus to St. Bernard, relating the martyrdom of three of these heretics, "how is this? They entered to the stake and bore the torment of the fire, not only with patience, but with joy and gladness. I wish your explanation, how these members of the devil could persist in their heresy with a courage and constancy scarcely to be found in the most religious of the faith of Christ?" Elliott, in his Horæ Apocalypticæ, vindicates the orthodoxy of the Albigenes, however, too absolutely. For arguments in their favor, see Allix, History of the Albigenes (Oxford, 1821, 8vo); Faber, Theology of the Vallenses and Albigenes (Lond. 1838); Baird, History of the Albigenes, Vaudois, etc. (N. Y. 1830, 8vo). On the other hand, C. Albinus (a frequent Roman name, signifying whitish; Græcized Ἀλβίνος), a procurator of Judea in the reign of Nero, about A. D. 62 and 63, the successor of Festus and predecessor of Florus. He was guilty of almost every kind of crime in his government, pardoning the vilest criminals for money, and shamelessly plundering the provincials (Josephus, Ant. xx, 8, 1; War, ii, 14, 1). He was perhaps identical with Lucius Albinus, procurator of Mauritania under Nero and Galba, but murdered by his subjects on the accession of Otho, A. D. 69 (Tacitus, Hist. ii, 58, 59).

Albizzi, Anthony, an Italian theologian, born at Florence on November 25, 1547, died at Kempten, Bavaria, on July 17, 1626. He occupied important posts at several Italian courts, but had to leave his native country when he embraced Protestantism. He lived afterward at Augsburg, Innsbruck, and (after 1606) at Kempten. He published Sermones in Mattheum (Augsburg, 1609, 8vo); Principium Christianorum Summata (1612, 12mo); De principis religionis Christianæ (1612); Exercitationes theologice (Kempten, 1616, 4to).

Albizzi, Bartholomew, of Pisa, a Franciscan monk and writer, better known under his Latin name Bartholomæus Allicius Pisanus, born at Rivano, in Tuscany, died at Pisa, Dec. 10, 1401. He owes his celebrity to a blasphemous work (Liber Conformitatum Sancti Francisci cum Christo), in which he drew a parallel between the events in the life of Christ and the life of Francis of Assisi. This work was presented to and expressly approved by the General Chapter of the Franciscan Order in the meeting at Assisi in 1339. The first edition of the work appeared, without date, at Venice (in folio); the second (1480) and third (1484) editions, which appeared under the title Li Fioretti di San Francisco, assimilati alla vita ed alla passione di Nostro Figure, are only abridgments. A refutation of this work by P. Vergerio (Discorsi supra i Fioretti di San Francisco) was put into the Index, and the author declared a heretic. At the time of the Reformation Erasmus Alber (q. v.) wrote a celebrated work against Albizzi. The refutations of Albizzi, and especially the work of Alber, produced so profound an impression that the Franciscans considered it best to modify the work. Hence a large number of editions were published, which differ from the original both in title and in contents, such as the Liber Aureus by Buccchius (Bologna, 1590), and the Antiquitates Franciscane by Bosquier (Cologne, 1623, 8vo). These editions were again followed by several apologies, refutations, and counter-refutations. According to Wadding (Annales Minorum, vol. ix), Albizzi had, during 60 years, the reputation of being an eminent preacher, and taught theology at Bologna, Padua, Siena, and Florence. His sermons were published at Milan in 1488. A work, De vita et laudibus B. Marie Virginis, libri vii, appeared at Venice in 1596. Other works are still extant in manuscript.—Fabricius, Bibl. Lat. Med. et Infimæ ætatis, i, 318; Hofer, Biog. Générale, i, 640.

Albrights, a body of German Methodists, so called from their founder, Jacob Albright. See EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION.

Alcantara, ORDERS OF. 1. The name of a military order in Spain. The town of Alcantara having been taken from the Moors in 1212 by Alphonso IX, he intrusted the keeping of it to the knights of Calatrava, in the first instance, and two years after to the knights of St. Julian, an order instituted in 1156 (according to Angelo Manrique) by Suarez and Gomez, two brothers, and confirmed by Pope Alexander III in 1177, under the mitigated rule of St. Benedict, as in the case of the knights of Calatrava, whose other observances they also, subsequently, followed. Gomez at first was only styled prior, but afterward he assumed the title of grand master, and the order itself came to be styled the order of the knights of Alcantara. Upon the defeat of the Moors and the capture of Granada, the mastership of the order, as well as that of Calatrava, was united to the crown of Castile by Ferdinand and Isabella. In 1540 the knights of Alcantara obtained permission to marry ("to avoid offence"). Joseph Bonaparte, in 1808, deprived the order of all its revenues, part of which was restored in 1814 and the following years by Ferdinand VII. In 1835 it was abolished as an ecclesiastical order, but it still exists as a court and civil order. Their arms are a pear-tree with two grafts. This order, in its best days, possessed 50 commanderies, and exercised lordship over 53 towns or villages of Spain; it had the same dignities, and nearly the same statutes, as the order of Calatrava. The dress of ceremony consisted of a large white mantle with a green cross, fleur-de-lisée, on the left side, to distinguish them from the knights of Calatrava. They were bound by vow to maintain the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin.—Helyot, Dict. des Ordres Religieux;

Badge of the Order of Alcantara.

2. The name of a branch of the Franciscan order. See FRANCISCANS.

Al'cimius (Ἀλκιμος, strong, or perh. only a Graecized form of the Heb. El'iakim), called, also, Jacimus, i. e. Joakim (Ἰάκιμος, Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 7), a Jewish priest (1 Macc. vii, 14) who, apostatizing to the Syrians, was appointed high-priest (B.C. 162) by King Demetrius, as successor of Menelaus (1 Macc. vii, 5), by the influence of Lysias, though not of the pontifical family (Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 5; xx, 9; 1 Macc. vii, 14), to the exclusion of Onias, the nephew of Menelaus, having already been nominated by Antiochus Eupator (Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 7; comp. Selden, De success. in pontif. p. 150), and instated into office by force of arms by the Syrian general Bacchides (1 Macc. vii, 9 sq.). According to a Jewish tradition (Bere-shith R. 65), he was "sister's son of Jose ben-Joeser," chief of the Sanhedrim, whom he afterward put to death (Raphall, Hist. of Jews, i, 245, 308). At first he attached many of the patriots to his cause by fair promises (1 Macc. vii, 18 sq.), but soon alienated by his peridy not only these but his other friends, so that he was at length compelled to flee from the opposition of Judas Maccabeus to the Syrian king (1 Macc. vii, 25; 2 Macc. xiv, 3 sq.). Nicanor, who was sent with a large army to assist him, was routed and slain by the Jewish patriots (1 Macc. vii, 43; 2 Macc. xv, 37), B.C. 161. Bacchides immediately advanced a second time against Jerusalem with a large army, routed Judas, who fell in the battle (B.C. 161), and reinstated Alcimus. After his restoration, Alcimus seems to have attempted to modify the ancient worship, and, as he was engaged in pulling down "the walls of the inner court of the sanctuary" (i. e. which separated the court of the Gentiles from it; yet see Grimm, Comment. on 1 Macc. ix, 54), he was "plagued" (by paralysis), and "died at that time," B.C. 160 (Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 5; xii, 10; 1 Macc. vii, ix; comp. 2 Macc. xiv, xv; see Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes Isr. iv, 365 sq.).—Smith, s. v.

Alcuin, FLACCUS, a native of Yorkshire, England, born A.D. 735, and educated under the care of Egbert and Albert, bishops of York, from whom he learned Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. Most of the schools of France were either founded or improved by him. He was sent to Rome about 780, and on his return passed through Parna, where he met with Charlemagne, who secured his services, gave him several abbeys in France, and retained him as his tutor and friend during the rest of his life. The palace of Charlemagne was converted into an academy, in which the family and the intimate counsellors of Charlemagne joined the latter in becoming pupils of Alcuin. This academy, in which all the members assumed antique names (Charlemagne called himself David, Alcuin Flaccus, etc.), was the origin of the famous palatine schools in the houses of the princes which so long rivalled the cloister schools in the houses of the bishops. In 794 Alcuin took a prominent part in the Council of Frankfort, at which the theological opinions of the Adoptianists (q. v.) were condemned. About 796 Alcuin retired from the court to the abbey of St. Martin, at Tours, which he soon made the most famous school of the age. He died May 19, 804. His Life, by Lorentz (Halle, 1829), translated by Mrs. Snee, was published in London, 1837. The best edition of his works is entitled Alcuini opera post primam editionem à D. A. Quercitano curata, etc., stud. Frobenii Abbatibus (Ratisbon, 1777, 2 vols. fol.). This edition contains 232 letters from Alcuin, and also several letters from Charlemagne in reply to Alcuin. They are a very valuable source of information for the ecclesiastical history of the age, and extend to the year 787. Other letters, not contained in this edition, have been discovered by Pertz. Alcuin, in these letters, strongly declares himself against all compulsion in matters of faith, and in favor of religious toleration. The theological works of Alcuin comprise Questiuncule in Genesim (280 questions and answers on important passages of the Genesis); Enchiridion seu Expusitio pro et brevis in Psalmos Penitentiales, a literal commentary on the penitential Psalms; a commentary on the gospel of John; a treatise on the doctrine of the Trinity; and a number of homilies or panegyrics on the lives of the saints. He left, besides many theological writings, several elementary works in the branches of philosophy, rhetoric, and philology; also poems, and a large number of letters. He is acknowledged as the most learned and polished man of his time, although his writings are chiefly compilations from older authors. The edition of Alcuin, published at Paris by Duchesne in 1617, in one vol. fol., is divided into three parts. Contents of Part I (On Scripture): 1. Interrogationes et responsiones, seu Liber Questionum in Genesim, containing 181 questions, with their answers, addressed to Sigulphus, his disciple and companion. The last question and reply are very much longer than the others, and were in after times included among the works of St. Augustine. They are also included, with some changes, in the third book of the Commentary on Genesis, attributed to St. Eucherius, bishop of Lyons. 2. Dieta super illud Genesios, "Faciamus Hominem ad Imaginem Nostram." This has been printed among the works of St. Ambrose, with the title "Treatise on the Excellence of Man's Creation;" and also among the writings of St. Augustine. "Of the Creation of the Man." 3. Enchiridion seu Expositio p[er] a et brevis in vii Psalmos Penitentiales, in Psalm. cxxvii et in Psalmos Graduales; addressed to Arno, archbishop of Salzburg; printed at Paris, separately, in 1547, 8vo, but without the preface, which D'Achery has given in his Spicilegium (old ed. ix, 111, 116). 4. De Psalmorum Usu liber. 5. Officia per Ferias, a kind of breviary, in which he marks in detail the Psalms to be said on every day of the week, together with hymns, prayers, confessions, and litanies. 6. Epistola de illo Cantici Canticoorum loco, "Sexaginta sunt Regine," etc. 7. Commentaria in Ecclesiasten. 8. Commentarium in S. Joh. Evangelium, libri vii, printed at Strasburg in 1527. By the preface at the head of book vi, it appears that Alcuin was at the time employed, by order of Charlemagne, in revising and correcting the Vulgate. Copies of this work in MS. are extant in the library at Vauxelles and at Rome:—Part II (Doctrine, Morals, and Discipline): 1. De Fide S. Trinitatis libri iii, ad Carolum M. cum Invocatione ad S. Trinitatem et Symbolo Fidei. 2. De Trinitate ad Frigidicum Questiones 28. 3. De Differentiis eterni et semperiterni, immortalis et perpetui. Eci et Temporis, Epistola. 4. De Annua Ratione, ad Eulalianam Virgineam. 5. Contra Felicem Orgelitanum Episc. libri vii. This work was composed in A. D. 798, and in the Biblioth. Patrum is erroneously attributed to Paulinus of Aquileia. 6. Epistola ad Elipandum (Bishop of Toledo). 7. Epistola Elipandi ad Alcuinum, a defence made by Elipandus. 8. Contra Elipandi Epistolam, libri iv; a reply to the above, addressed to Leidradus, archbishop of Lyons, Nephridius of Narbonne, Benedict, abbot of Aniciana, and all the other bishops, abbots, and faithful of the province of the Goths. The Letter of Elipandus to Felix, and the Confession of Faith made by the latter after having retracted, are added at the end. The above are all the dogmatical works contained in Part II; the others are works on discipline. 1. De Divinis Officiis liber, sive Expositio Romanæ Ordinis. This work appears to have been erroneously attributed to Alcuin, and to be the work of a later hand; indeed, it is a compilation made from authors, many of whom lived after his time, such as Remigius, a monk of Auxerre, and Helerperius, a monk of Saint-Gad, who lived in the eleventh century. 2. De Ratione Septuagesime, Sexagesime, et Quinquagesime Epistola; a letter to Charlemagne on this subject, and on the difference in the number of weeks in Lent, together with the emperor's reply. 3. De Baptistis Cerevanensis, ad Odyryann Presb. Epistola. 4. De Usdem Cerev. alia Epistola. Sirmundus attributes this to Amalarius, archbishop of Treves; and, as the writer speaks of himself as "archbishop," having "suffragans" under him, it cannot be the work of Alcuin, who was only deacon. It appears from this letter that triple immersion was in use at that period, as well as the custom of giving the holy eucharist and confirmation to the newly baptized. 5. De Confessione Peccatorum, ad Pueros S. Martini Epistola. 6. Sacramen- torum Liber, containing the collects, secrets, prefaces, and post-communions for 32 different masses. 7. Homilie iii. 8. Vita Antichristi, ad Carolum M.; this is properly the work of Adso, abbot of Montier-en-Der. 9. De Virtutibus et Vitis, addressed to Count Wido or Guido. This is one of the chief of the moral treatises of Alcuin, and is divided into 36 chapters. Various discourses, placed in the appendix to the works of St. Augustine, are taken from this treatise, viz., of those numbered 254, 291, 297, 302, and 304 in the new edition. 10. De vii Artibus liber imperfectus, containing only what relates to grammar and rhetoric. The preface is the same with that which Cassiodorus puts at the head of his work on the same subject. 11. Grammatica. This was printed separately at Hanau in 1605. 12. De Rhetorica et de Virtutibus Dialogus (Paris, 1599). 13. Dialectica. Like the last, is in the form of a dialogue between Alcuin and Charlemagne (Ingolstadt, 1604). 14. Disputatio Regalis. A familiar dialogue between Pepin, afterward king of Italy, and Alcuin:—Part III (History, Letters, and Poetry): 1. Scriptum de Vita S. Martini Turonensis. 2. De Transitu S. Martini Sermo. 3. Vita S. Vedasti Episcopi Arelatensis; written about 796, at the request of the abbot Rado. 4. Vita Beatissimi Richardi, Presbyteri. 5. De Vita S. Willibrordi Trajectensis Episc. libri ii. 6. One hundred and fifteen letters, exclusive of many fragments of letters given by William of Malmesbury. 7. Pocmata et Versus de pluribus SS. Many of these, however, are erroneously attributed to Alcuin. Since Duchesne's edition, the following have been printed: 1. Treatise of the Procession of the Holy Spirit. This work is divided into three parts. In Part I he shows that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and from the Son; in Part II that He is the Spirit of the Father and of the Son; and in Part III that He is sent by the Father and by the Son. It is dedicated to Charlemagne; but as the name of Alcuin nowhere appears in the book, the only ground for believing it to be the work of Alcuin is the act of donation by which Didon, bishop of Laon (who was nearly contemporary with Alcuin), gave the MS. of the work to his cathedral church, prohibiting its ever being taken away from the library of that church under pain of incurring the anger of God and the Blessed Virgin. This may probably be the cause why the work was so long concealed. 2. Various letters—three of which are given by D'Achery, in his Spicilegium; one in the Irish letters of Archbishop Usher, published at Paris in 1665; two in the 5th volume of the Acts of the order of St. Benedict; three given by Baluze, in his Miscellany; twenty-six by Mabillon, in his Analecta, together with a poem, in elegiac verses. Baluze also gives Epistola et Prefatio in libros vii, ad Felicem Orgelitanum, iv, 413. 3. Two poems published by Lambecius. 4. Homilia de die natali S. Vedasti (Bollandus, February, p. 806). 5. Libri Quatuor Carolini de Imaginibus, attributed by Roger de Hoveden, in his Annals, to Alcuin. 6. Pocma Heroicum de Pontifibus Angliæ et SS. Ecclesie Eboracensis, containing 1658 verses. Thomas Gale, dean of York, caused this to be printed from two MSS. Oulinus attributes this poem to Frigidodus, a Benedictine, who lived about 860. 7. Commentarius Brevis in Cantica Canticoorum. Cave and others regard this as the same originally with the explication of the text, "Sexaginta sunt regine," etc., in the first part of Duchesne's volume. 8. Breviarium fidei veteris Arianos, by Sirmundus (Paris, 1630); attributed to Alcuin by Chifflet, on the authority of a MS. 9. The catalogue of the library of Centula mentions a Lectiary, indicating the epistles and gospels for every festival and day in the year, which was corrected and put in order by Alcuin. This is given by Pamelius in his collection of liturgical works (Cologne, 1561, 1571, and 1609, p. 1309). 10. A Book of Homilies, attributed to Alcuin by the author of his life, although probably he only corrected the Homiliary of Paul, the deacon, which was in two volumes, as well as that attributed to Aleuin. If the latter wrote a homiliary, it has not yet seen the light. (See Mabillon, Anallecta, p. 18.) The Book of Homilies attributed to Aleuin, but really the work of Paul, was printed at Cologne in 1539. 11. Confessio Fidei; published as the work of Aleuin, with other treatises by Chifflet, at Dijon, 1656, 4to. It has been doubted by some writers whether Aleuin was really the author. Mabillon (Anallecta, i, 178, or 490 in the folio edition) gives proofs to show that he was so, one of which is, that the MS. itself from which Chifflet printed it assigns it to him by name. Besides all these works, some of the writings of Aleuin have been lost, others still remain in MS. only, and others again have been erroneously ascribed to him. Some of them have been recently discovered by Pertz.—See Monnier, Aleuin and Charlemagne (with fragments of an unpublished commentary of Aleuin on St. Matthew, and other pieces, published for the first time (Paris, 2d ed. 1864, 32mo); *Biog. Alden, Noah, a Baptist minister, was born at Middleborough, Mass., May 30, 1725. At 19 he married and removed to Stafford, Conn., connecting himself at that time with the Congregational Church. In 1753 he became a Baptist, and was ordained in 1755 pastor of the Baptist church in Stafford. In 1766 Mr. Alden was installed pastor of the church in Bellingham, Mass.; from which place he was sent as a delegate to the convention which formed the constitution of the state. He was also a member of the convention to which was submitted the Constitution of the U. S. Mr. Alden remained pastor at Bellingham until his death in 1797.—Sprague, Annals, vi, 67.

Alden, Timothy, was born at Yarmouth, Mass., Aug. 28, 1771, and graduated in 1794 at Harvard, where he was distinguished for his knowledge of Oriental languages. In 1799 he was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Portsmouth, N. H., but in 1805 devoted himself to teaching. He conducted female schools successively in Boston, Newark, New York, and in 1817 was appointed president of Meadville College, Penn., which office he held till 1831. He died at Pittsburg, 1839. He published a number of occasional sermons and pamphlets.—Sprague, Annals, ii, 452.

Aldhelm or Adelme, an early English bishop, born in Wessex about 656, educated by Adrian in Kent, embraced the monastic life, and founded the abbey of Malmesbury, of which he was the first abbot. He became bishop of Sherborne 705, and died 709. He is said to have lived a very austere life, "giving himself entirely to reading and prayer, denying himself in food, and rarely quitting the walls of the monastery. If we may believe the account of William of Malmesbury, he was also in the habit of immersing himself as far as the shoulders in a fountain hard by the abbey, and did not come forth until he had completely repeated the Psalter; this he did not omit, summer or winter." The first organ used in England is said to have been built under the directions of Aldhelm. According to Camden (Britannia in Wilt. p. 116), he was the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, and taught his people to compose Latin verses. His works have recently been collected and published under the title Aldhelmi opera que extant, omnia e codicibus MSS. emendavit, nonnulla nunc primum editit J. A. Giles, LL.D. (Oxon. 1844, 8vo).—Collier, Eccl. Hist. i, 283; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 680; Landon, Eccl. Dict. i, 91.

Aldrich, Henry, was born at Westminster, 1647, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He was celebrated for the zeal and ability which he displayed as a controversialist against the Romish writers of his time. After the Revolution he was presented dean of Christ Church, Oxford (1689), and was made dean of the living of Wem, in Shropshire. He was a great lover of church music, and has left twenty anthems; he was also the author of the well-known glee, "Hark, the bonny Christ Church Bells." Himself a sound and accomplished scholar, he endeavored by every means in his power to foster the love of classical learning among the students of his college, and presented them annually with an edition of some Greek classic, which he printed for this special purpose. He also published a system of logic for their use, and at his death bequeathed to his college his valuable classical library. Dr. Aldrich was a proficient in more than one of the arts; three sides of what is called Peckwater Quadrangle, in Christ Church College, and the church and campanile of All Saints in High Street, Oxford, were designed by him; and he is also said to have furnished the plan, or at least to have had a share in the design of the chapel of Trinity College, Oxford. He died Dec. 14, 1710. Among his writings are, 1. A Reply to two Discourses [by Abr. Woodhead] concerning the Adoration of our Blessed Saviour in the Holy Eucharist (1687);—2. A Defence of the Oxford Reply (1688);—3. Artis Logicæ Compendium (1691, and often reprinted); it is still in use at Oxford as a manual for beginners.—English Cyclopædia, s. v.; New Gen. Dict. i, 142.

Aleander, Jerome, Cardinal, born February 13, 1480, at Motta, on the confines of Friuli and Istria. He studied at Venice, where he became acquainted with Erasmus, and applied himself with great success to the Chaldee and Arabic languages. In 1508 Louis XII called him to France, where he became rector of the university of Paris. In 1519 Pope Leo X sent him as nuncio into Germany to oppose Luther, and, during his absence, in 1520, made him librarian of the Vatican. Aleander, who was papal legate at the diet of Worms, spoke for three hours against Luther, and drew up the edict which condemned him (Münter, Beitr. zur Kirch.-Gesch. p. 48). In 1523 he caused the burning of two monks at Brussels. He afterward became archbishop of Brindisi and nuncio in France, and was made prisoner by the Spaniards at the battle of Pavia, 1525. After his liberation he was created cardinal of St. Chrysogono, 1538, and died at Rome, February 1, 1542.—Landon, Eccl. Dict. i, 227.

Alegambe, Philip, born at Brussels in January, 1592, became a Jesuit at Palermo in 1613, theological professor at Gratz, 1629, and finally prefect of the German Jesuits. He died 1651. He made large additions to Ribadaneira's Catalogus Scriptt. Soc. Jesu, of which he published a revised edition at Antwerp, 1643. P. Sotnel (Southwell) in 1675 published at Rome a new edition of the book, with the last additions and corrections of Alegambe. He also wrote Herōis et Victima charitatis Soc. Jesu (Rome, 1658, 4to) and Mortes Illustres et Gestæ eorum de Soc. Jesu, qui in odium fidei occisi sunt (Rome, 1657, fol.).—Landon, Eccl. Dict. i, 228; New General Biog. Dict. i, 148.

Al'ema (only in the dat. plur. iv' Al'eporec), one of the fortified cities in Gilead beyond the Jordan, occupied in the time of Judas Maccabæus, to the oppression of the Jews, by the Gentiles, in connection with certain neighboring towns (1 Macc. v, 26). Grimm (Hanwb. zu d. Macc. in loc.) thinks it is probably the BEER-ELIM (q. v.) of Isa. xv, 8 (comp. BEER simply in Num. xxi, 16), an identification favored by the associated names (Bozrah and Carnaim) known to be in the same locality.

Alembert, Jean Le Rond D', a French mathematician and philosopher of the empirical school, was born in Paris, Nov. 16, 1717, and died in the same city Oct. 29, 1783. He was the illegitimate child of the Chevalier Destouches-Canon, and of the celebrated Madame de Tencin, sister of the archbishop of Lyons.

His unnatural parents exposed him, soon after his birth, near the church of St. Jean le Rond, and hence his Christian name. After he became eminent, his father recognised him and gave him a pension. In childhood he displayed great precocity of talent, and in 1730 he entered the College Mazarin, where he had a Jansenist tutor, studied mathematics and philosophy, and wrote a commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. After leaving college he attempted to study medicine, and afterward law; but finding his turn for mathematics all-powerful, he determined to live on his small pension of 1200 francs a year and devote himself to free studies. At twenty-three he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1741 he published his "Treatise on Dynamics," which was followed by successive publications in mathematical science, all of the first rank, but which do not fall within our province to notice. About 1750 he joined with Diderot in the Encyclopedie, to which he communicated many articles, and also the preliminary "Discourse." In 1754 he became a member of the French Academy; and in 1759 he published his Elements of Philosophy. After the peace of 1763 D'Alembert was invited by Frederick the Great to fill the office of president of the Academy of Berlin, and the empress of Russia had also solicited him to superintend the education of her children. Having refused, however, both these appointments, he was, in 1772, nominated perpetual secretary to the French Academy, a position in which he wrote seventy eloges of deceased members. In the latter part of his life he was attacked with calculus, and died of that disease in his sixty-sixth year. His miscellaneous writings are collected in (Œuvres littéraires, edited by Bastien (Paris, 1805, 18 vols. 8vo; new ed. Paris, 1821, 5 vols. 8vo, the best). As a philosopher, D'Alembert was a disciple of Locke, and carried out his principles to their ultimate conclusion in scepticism and materialism. He never wrote as vulgarly or violently against Christianity as Voltaire, but he was quite as far gone in unbelief. As to the existence of God, he thought the "probabilities" were in favor of Theism; as to Christianity, he thought the "probabilities" were against Revelation. — Hoefler, Biog. Générale, i, 783; Tennemann, Manual Hist. of Philosophy, § 373.

Ale'meth, the name of two persons, and also of a place; of two forms in the original.

1. (Heb. Ale'meth, אֶלְמֶת, in pause Ale'meth, אֶלְמֶת, covering, otherwise adulthood; Sept. Ἀλεμέτ v. r. Ἐλμῆτ, Vulg. Almath, Auth. Vers. "Alameth.") The last named of the nine sons of Becher the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 8), B.C. post 1856.

2. (Heb. same as preced.; Sept. Γαλεμίετ and Γαλεμίετ, v. r. Σαλαμιάτ, Vulg. Almath.) The first named of the two sons of Jehoahab or Jarah, son of Abaz, of the posterity of King Saul (1 Chron. viii, 36; ix, 42), B.C. post 1037.

3. (Heb. Alle'meth, אֶלְמֶת, but other copies same as the foregoing, with which the signification agrees; Sept. Γαλημιετ v. r. Γαλεμίετ, Vulg. Almath.) A sacerdotal city of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. vi, 60); doubtless the same elsewhere (Josh. xxi, 18) called ALMON (q. v.).

Ales, or Alesius, ALEXANDER, a Lutheran divine, born at Edinburgh 1500, and educated at St. Andrew's, where he afterward became canon. Employed to influence Patrick Hamilton (q. v.) to recant, he was so impressed by Hamilton's arguments, and by his constancy at the stake, that he embraced the reformed doctrines himself. In 1532 he went to Germany, and visited Luther and Melancthon, with whom he became intimate. In 1534 he came to England on the invitation of Cranmer, and was appointed professor of theology at Cambridge. Cranmer employed him in translating the English liturgy into Latin. In 1540 he returned to Germany, and was professor first at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder and afterward at Leipsic, where he died 1565. In the Synergistic controversy (q. v.) he maintained the necessity of good works. His principal works are, 1. De necessitate et merito bonorum operum (1560);—2. Commentarii in Evangelium Joannis, et in utramque Epistolam ad Timotheum;—3. Expositio in Psalmos Davidis;—4. De Justificatione, contra Osiandrum;—5. De Sancta Trinitate, cum confutatione erroris Valentini;—6. Responsio ad triginta et duos articulos theologorum Loveniensium. Also a Latin work on the right of the laity to read the Scriptures in the vernacular tongue, and a defence of that work against Cochlaeus.—Hook, Ecl. Biog. i, 130; Burnet, Hist. of Reformation, i, 345; ii, 247; Proctor on Common Prayer, 63, 66.

Alexander (Ἀλεξανδρος, man-defender, a title often bestowed by Homer upon Paris, son of Priam, and hence a frequent Grecian name), the name of several men mentioned or involved in Biblical history, or in the Apocrypha and Josephus.

1. The third of the name, surnamed THE GREAT, son (by Olympias) and successor of Philip, king of Macedon. He is not expressly named in the Bible, but he is denoted in the prophecies of Daniel by a leopard with four wings, signifying his great strength, and the unusual rapidity of his conquests (ch. vii. 6); also by a one-horned he-goat, running over the earth so swiftly as not to touch it, attacking a ram with two horns, overthrowing him, and trampling him under foot, without any being able to rescue him (viii. 4-7). The he-goat prefigured Alexander; the ram Darius Codomannus, the last of the Persian kings. In the statue beheld by Nebuchadnezzar in a dream (ii, 39), the belly of brass was the emblem of Alexander, and the legs of iron designated his successors (Lengerke, Dan. p. 95 sq.). He is often mentioned in the books of the Maccabees (Wernsdorf, De fide libror. Macc. p. 40 sq.); and his career is detailed by the historians Arrian, Plutarch, and Quintus Curtius (Droysen, Gesch. Alex. d. Gr. Berl. 1833, Hamb. 1837).

Alexander was born at Pella B.C. 356 (comp. 1 Macc. i, 7; Euseb. Chron. Ann. ii, 33). At an early age he was placed under the care of Aristotle; and while still a youth he turned the fortune of the day at Chæroneæ (B.C. 338). Philip was killed at a marriage feast when Alexander was about twenty. After he had performed the last duties to his father, and put down with resolute energy the disaffection and hostility by which his throne was menaced, he was chosen by the Greeks general of their troops against the Persians, and entered Asia with an army of 34,000 men, B.C. 334. In one campaign he subdued almost all Asia Minor. In the battle of Granicus he defeated Orobates, one of Darius's generals; and Darius himself, whose army consisted of 400,000 foot and 10,000 horse, in the narrow pass of Issus, which leads from Syria to Cilicia. Darius fled, abandoning his camp and baggage, his children, wife, and mother, B.C. 333. After he had subdued Syria, Alexander came to Tyre, and the Tyrians opposing his entrance into their city, he besieged it. At the same time he is said to have written to Jaddus, high-priest of the Jews, that he expected to be acknowledged by him, and to receive those submissions which had hitherto been paid to the king of Persia. Jaddus refusing to comply, as having sworn fidelity to Darius, Alexander resolved to march against Jerusalem when he had reduced Tyre (q. v.). After a protracted siege, the latter city was taken and sacked, B.C. 332. This done, Alexander entered Palestine and reduced it. Egypt next submitted to him; and in B.C. 331 he founded Alexandria (q. v.), which remains to the present day the most characteristic monument of his life and work. In the same year he finally defeated Darius at Gaugamela; and in B.C. 330 his unhappy rival was murdered by Bessus, satrap of Bactria. The next two years were occupied by Alexander in the consolidation of his Persian conquests, and the reduction of Bactria. In B. C. 327 he crossed the Indus, penetrated to the Hydaspes, and was there forced by the discontent of his army to turn westward. He reached Susa, B. C. 325, and proceeded to Babylon, B. C. 324, which he chose as the capital of his empire. In the next year he died there (B. C. 323) in the midst of his gigantic plans; and those who inherited his conquests left his designs unachieved and unattempted (comp. Dan. vii. 6; viii. 5, xi. 3). His death is attributed to intemperance; and upon his death-bed he sent for his court, and declared that "he gave the empire to the most deserving." Some affirm, however, that he regulated the succession by a will. The author of the first book of Maccabees (i, 6) says he divided his kingdom among his generals while he was living; and it is certain that a partition was eventually made of his dominions among the four principal officers of his army. He died at the age of thirty-three, after reigning twelve years—six as king of Macedon and six as monarch of Asia. He was buried at Alexandria. See MACEDONIA.

Coin of Alexander the Great.

The famous tradition of the visit of Alexander to Jerusalem during his Phœnician campaign (Josephus, Ant. xi, 8, 1 sq.) has been a fruitful source of controversy. The Jews, it is said, had provoked his anger by refusing to transfer their allegiance to him when summoned to do so during the siege of Tyre, and after the reduction of Tyre and Gaza (Josephus, l. c.) he turned toward Jerusalem. Jaddua (Jaddus) the high-priest (Neh. xii, 11, 22), who had been warned in a dream how to avert the king's anger, calmly awaited his approach; and when he drew near went out to Sapha (ספח, he watched), within sight of the city and temple, clad in his robes of hyacinth and gold, and accompanied by a train of priests and citizens arrayed in white. Alexander was so moved by the solemn spectacle that he did reverence to the holy name inscribed upon the tiara of the high-priest; and when Parmenio expressed surprise, he replied that "he had seen the god whom Jaddua represented in a dream at Dium, encouraging him to cross over into Asia, and promising him success." After this it is said that he visited Jerusalem, offered sacrifice there, heard the prophecies of Daniel which foretold his victory, and conferred important privileges upon the Jews, not only in Judea, but in Babylonia and Media, which they enjoyed during the supremacy of his successors. The narrative is repeated in the Talmud (Yoma, 69, ap. Otho, Lex. Rab. s. v. Alexander; the high-priest is there said to have been Simon the Just), in later Jewish writers (Vajikra R. 13; Joseph ben Gorion, ap. Ste. Croix, p. 553), and in the chronicles of Abulfeda (Ste. Croix, p. 555). The event was adapted by the Samaritans to suit their own history, with a corresponding change of places and persons, and various embellishments (Aboul'fatah, quoted by Ste. Croix, p. 209-212); and in due time Alexander was enrolled among the proselytes of Judaism. On the other hand, no mention of the event occurs in Arrian, Plutarch, Diodorus, or Curtius; and the connection in which it is placed by Josephus is alike inconsistent with Jewish history (Ewald, Gesch. d. Volkes Isr. iv, 124 sq.) and with the narrative of Arrian (iii, 1). See JADDUA.

But admitting the incorrectness of the details of the tradition as given by Josephus, there are several points which confirm the truth of the main fact. Justin says that "many kings of the East came to meet Alexander wearing fillets" (xi, 10); and after the capture of Tyre "Alexander himself visited some of the cities which still refused to submit to him" (Curt. iv, 5, 13). Even at a later time, according to Curtius, he executed vengeance personally on the Samaritans for the murder of his governor Andromachus (Curt. iv, 8, 10). Besides this, Jewish soldiers were enlisted in his army (Hecat. ap. Josephus, Apion, i, 22); and Jews formed an important element in the population of the city which he founded shortly after the supposed visit. Above all, the privileges which he is said to have conferred upon the Jews, including the remission of tribute every sabbatical year, existed in later times, and imply some such relation between the Jews and the great conqueror as Josephus describes. Internal evidence is decidedly in favor of the story even in its picturesque fulness. From policy or conviction, Alexander delighted to represent himself as chosen by destiny for the great act which he achieved. The siege of Tyre arose professedly from a religious motive; the battle of Issus was preceded by the visit to Gordium; the invasion of Persia by the pilgrimage to the temple of Ammon. And if it be impossible to determine the exact circumstances of the meeting of Alexander and the Jewish envoys, the silence of the classical historians, who notoriously disregarded (e. g. the Maccabees) and misrepresented (Tac. Hist. v, 8) the fortunes of the Jews, cannot be held to be conclusive against the occurrence of an event which must have appeared to them trivial or unintelligible (Jahn, Archæol. iii, 300 sq.; Ste. Croix, Essai critique, etc., Paris, 1810 [in Eng. Bath, 1793]; Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, ii, 133 sq.; and, on the other side, Ant. van Dale, Dissert. super Aristæ, Amstel. 1705, p. 69 sq.; Favini, De Alex. M. ingress. Hierosolyma, Flor. 1781). See PERSIA.

The tradition, whether true or false, presents an aspect of Alexander's character which has been frequently lost sight of by his recent biographers. He was not simply a Greek, nor must he be judged by a Greek standard. The Orientalism, which was a scandal to his followers, was a necessary deduction from his principles, and not the result of caprice or vanity (comp. Arr. vii, 29). He approached the idea of a universal monarchy from the side of Greece, but his final object was to establish something higher than the paramount supremacy of one people. His purpose was to combine and equalize, not to annihilate; to wed the East and West in a just union—not to enslave Asia to Greece (Plut. de Alex. Fort. i, 6). The time, indeed, was not yet come when this was possible, but if he could not accomplish the great issue, he prepared for its accomplishment.

The first and most direct consequence of the policy of Alexander was the weakening of nationalities, the first condition necessary for the dissolution of the old religions. The swift course of his victories, the constant incorporation of foreign elements in his armies, the fierce wars and changing fortunes of his successors, broke down the barriers by which kingdom had been separated from kingdom, and opened the road for larger conceptions of life and faith than had hitherto been possible (comp. Polyb. iii, 59). The contact of the East and West brought out into practical forms thoughts and feelings which had been confined to the schools. Paganism was deprived of life as soon as it was transplanted beyond the narrow limits in which it took its shape. The spread of commerce followed the progress of arms; and the Greek language and literature vindicated their claim to be considered the most perfect expression of human thought by becoming practically universal. The Jews were at once most exposed to the powerful influences thus brought to bear upon the East, and most able to support them.

In the arrangement of the Greek conquests which followed the battle of Ipsus, B.C. 301, Judæa was made the frontier land of the rival empires of Syria and Egypt, and though it was necessarily subjected to the constant vicissitudes of war, it was able to make advantageous terms with the state to which it owed allegiance from the important advantages which it offered for attack or defence. See ANTOCHUS. Internally also the people were prepared to withstand the effects of the revolution which the Greek dominion effected. The constitution of Ezra had obtained its full development. A powerful hierarchy had succeeded in substituting the idea of a church for that of a state, and the Jew was now able to wander over the world and yet remain faithful to the God of his fathers. See DISPERSION. The same constitutional change had strengthened the intellectual and religious position of the people. A rigid "fence" of ritualism protected the course of common life from the license of Greek manners; and the great doctrine of the unity of God, which was now seen to be the divine centre of their system, counteracted the attractions of a philosophic pantheism. See SIMON THE JUST. Through a long course of discipline, in which they had been left unguided by prophetic teaching, the Jews had realized the nature of their mission to the world, and were waiting for the means of fulfilling it. The conquest of Alexander furnished them with the occasion and the power. But, at the same time, the example of Greece fostered personal as well as popular independence. Judaism was speedily divided into sects, analogous to the typical forms of Greek philosophy. But even the rude analysis of the old faith was productive of good. The freedom of Greece was no less instrumental in forming the Jews for their final work than the contemplative spirit of Persia, or the civil organization of Rome; for if the career of Alexander was rapid, its effects were lasting. The city which he chose to bear his name perpetuated in after ages the office which he providentially discharged for Judaism and mankind; and the historian of Christianity must confirm the judgment of Arrian, that Alexander, "who was like no other man, could not have been given to the world without the special design of Providence" (Arr. vii. 30). See ALEXANDRIA. And Alexander himself appreciated this design better even than his great teacher; for it is said (Plut. De Alex. i. 6) that when Aristotle urged him to treat the Greeks as freemen and the Orientals as slaves, he found the true answer to this counsel in the recognition of his "divine mission to unite and reconcile the world."—Smith. See SECTS, JEWISH.

Tetradrachm (Attic Talent) of one of the Successors of Alexander.—Obverse: Head of Alexander the Great as a young Jupiter Ammon. Reverse: Pallas seated, holding a Victory, with Monogram and Letter (Σ); Inscription (in Greek), "Of King Ly-simachus."

In the prophetic visions of Daniel the influence of Alexander is necessarily combined with that of his successors. They represented with partial exaggeration the several phases of his character; and to the Jews nationally the policy of the Syrian kings was of greater importance than the original conquest of Asia. But some traits of "the first mighty king" (Dan. viii. 21; xi. 3) are given with vigorous distinctness. The emblem by which he is typified ("עֵזָא, a he-goat, from עָזָא, he leaped, Gesenius, Thes. s. v.) suggests the notions of strength and speed; and the universal extent

(Dan. viii. 5, . . . from the west on the face of the whole earth) and marvellous rapidity of his conquests (Dan. i. c. he touched not the ground) are brought forward as the characteristics of his power, which was directed by the strongest personal impetuosity (Dan. viii. 6, in the fury of his power). He ruled with great dominion, and did according to his will (xi. 3); "and there was none that could deliver . . . out of his hand" (viii. 7). See GOAT.

The name of Alexander is equally celebrated in the writings of the Orientals, as in those of the Greeks and Romans; but they vary extremely from the accounts which Western historians give of him (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v. Escander; Moses Choren. p. 82). They call him Iscander Dulkarnaim (see Gollii, Lez. Arab. 1896), "double-horned Alexander," alluding to the two horns of his empire (or his power) in the East and West. For further details, see Anthony's Class. Dict.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Elog. s. v. See GREECE.

2. Surnamed BALAS (Josephus, Ant. xiii. 4, 8, 'Αλιξανδρος ὁ Βάλας λεγόμενος; Strab. xiv. p. 751, τὸν Βάλαν 'Αλιξανδρον; Justin. xxxv. 1, Subornant pro eo Balam quendam . . . nomen ei Alexandri inditur; comp. the Aramaean ܠܝܟܠܐ, the lord), a personage whose history is detailed in the Maccabees and Josephus (comp. Justin. xxxv.; Polyb. xxxiii. 14, 16; Liv. Epit. l. liii; Appian. Syriaco, lxxvii; Euseb. Chron.). He likewise assumed the titles "Epiphaneus" (ἐπιφανής, illustrious), "Euergetes" (εὐεργετής, benefactor), etc. His extraction is doubtful; but he professed to be the natural son of Antiochus Epiphaneus, and in that capacity, out of opposition to Demetrius Soter, he was recognised as king of Syria by the king of Egypt, by the Romans, and eventually by Jonathan Maccabæus (Strab. xiii; Josephus, Ant. xiii. 2, 1), but he was more generally regarded as an impostor, who falsely assumed the connection (App. Syr. 67; Justin. l. c. comp. Polyb. xxxiii. 16). He claimed the throne of Syria in B.C. 152 in opposition to Demetrius Soter, who had provoked the hostility of the neighboring kings and alienated the affections of his subjects (Josephus, l. c.). His pretensions were put forward by Heralclides, formerly treasurer of Antiochus Epiphaneus, who obtained the recognition of his title at Rome by scandalous intrigues (Polyb. xxxiii. 14, 16). After landing at Ptolemais (1 Macc. x. 1) Alexander gained the warm support of Jonathan, who was now the leader of the Jews (1 Macc. ix. 73); and though his first efforts were unsuccessful (Justin. xxxv. 1, 10), in B.C. 150 he completely routed the forces of Demetrius, who himself fell in the retreat (1 Macc. x. 48-50; Josephus, Ant. xiii. 2, 4; Strab. xvi. p. 751). After this Alexander married Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemaeus VI Philometor; and in the arrangement of his kingdom appointed Jonathan governor (μετ' ἄρχης, 1 Macc. x. 65) of a province (Judæa; comp. 1 Macc. xi. 57). But his triumph was of short duration. After obtaining power, he gave himself up to a life of indulgence (Liv. Epit. 59; comp. Athen. v. 211), leaving the government in the hands of ministers whose misrule rendered his reign odious (Diod. Sic. Fragments, xxxiii). Accordingly, when Demetrius Nicator, the son of Demetrius Soter, landed in Syria in B.C. 147, the new pretender found powerful support (1 Macc. x. 67 sq.). At first Jonathan defeated and slew Apollonius, the governor of Coele-Syria, who had joined the party of Demetrius, for which exploit he received fresh favors from Alexander (1 Macc. x. 69-89); but shortly afterward (B.C. 146) Ptolemy entered Syria with a large force, and after he had placed garrisons in the chief cities on the coast, which received him according to the commands of Alexander, suddenly pronounced himself in favor of Demetrius (1 Macc. xi. 1-11; Josephus, Ant. xiii. 4, 5 sq.), alleging, probably with truth, the existence of a conspiracy against his life (Josephus, l. c.; comp. Diod. ap. Müller, Fragm. ii. 16). Alexander, who had been forced to leave Antioch (Josephus, l. c.), was in Cilicia when he heard of Ptolemy's defection (1 Macc. xi, 14). He hastened to meet him, but was defeated (1 Macc. xi, 15; Justin. xxxv, 2), and fled to Abse, in Arabia (Diod. l. c.), where he was murdered, B.C. 146 (Diod. l. c.; 1 Macc. xi, 17, differ as to the manner; and Enseb. Chron. Arm. i, 349, represents him to have been slain in the battle). The narrative in 1 Macc. and Josephus show clearly the partiality which the Jews entertained for Alexander "as the first that entreated of true peace with them" (1 Macc. x, 47); and the same feeling was exhibited afterward in the zeal with which they supported the claims of his son Antiochus. Balas left a young son, who was eventually made king of Syria by Tryphon, under the name of Antiochus Theos (1 Macc. xi, 13-18; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 3). See ANTOCHUS.

third son of John Hyrcanus, who left three sons, or five, according to Josephus (War, i, 2, 7). The father was particularly fond of Antigonos and Aristobulus, but could not endure his third son, Alexander, because he had dreamed that he would reign after him, which implied the death of his two brothers. Antigonos never reigned, and Aristobulus reigned but for a short time. After his death, Salome, or Alexandra, his widow, liberated Alexander, whom Aristobulus had confined in prison since their father's death, and made him king, B.C. 104. Alexander put to death one of his brothers, who had formed a design on his life, and heaped favors on another, called Absalom, who, being contented with a private condition, lived peaceably, and retired from public employments. Alexander was of a warlike, enterprising disposition; and when he had regulated his dominions he marched against Ptolemis, but was soon compelled to relinquish the object of his expedition in order to defend his own territories against Ptolemy Lathyrus, who had marched a powerful army into Galilee. Alexander gave him battle near Asophus, not far from the Jordan; but Ptolemy killed 30,000, or, as others say, 50,000 of his men. After this victory the latter met with no resistance. His mother, Cleopatra, however, apprehensive for the safety of Egypt, determined to stop his further progress, and for this purpose levied a numerous army, and equipping a large fleet, soon landed in Phœnicia, B.C. 102. Ptolemis opened its gates to receive her; and here Alexander Jannæus presented himself in her camp with considerable presents, and was received as an unhappy prince, an enemy of Ptolemy, who had no refuge but the queen's protection, B.C. 101. Cleopatra made an alliance with him in the city of Scythopolis, and Alexander marched with his troops into Cœle-Syria, where he took the town of Gadara after a siege of ten months, and after that Amathus, one of the best fortresses in the country, where Theodoros, son of Zeno, had lodged his most valuable property as in absolute security. This Theodoros, falling suddenly on Alexander's army, killed 10,000, and plundered his baggage. Alexander, however, was not deterred by this disaster from prosecuting his purposes: having recruited his army, he besieged Raphia, Anthedon, and Gaza—towns on the Mediterranean—and took them; the latter, after a desperate resistance, was reduced to a heap of ruins, B.C. 96.

After this Alexander returned to Jerusalem, but the Jews had revolted; and on the feast of tabernacles, while he, as high-priest, was preparing to sacrifice, the people assembled in the temple had the insolence to throw lemons at him, taken from the branches which they carried in their hands. Alexander put the seditious to the sword, and killed about 6000. Afterward he erected a partition of wood before the altar and the inner temple to prevent the approach of the people; and to defend himself in future against such attempts, he took into his pay guards from Pisidia and Cilicia. Finding Jerusalem likely to continue the seat of clamor and discontent, Alexander quitted the metropolis, at the head of his army, B.C. 93; and, having crossed the Jordan, he made war upon the Moabites and Ammonites, and obliged them to pay tribute; attacked Amathus, the fortress beyond Jordan before mentioned, and razed it; and also made war with Obela, king of the Arabians, whom he subdued. On his return to Jerusalem he found the Jews more incensed against

3. Surnamed ZEBINA (or Zabinas, Ζαβίνας, said to signify "purchased," from a report that Ptolemy had bought him as a slave), the son of a merchant named Protarchus; he was set up by Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt, as a pretender to the crown of the Greek kingdom of Syria shortly after the death of Antiochus Sidetes and the return of Demetrius Niceator from his captivity among the Parthians (B.C. 128). Antioch, Apamea, and several other cities, disgusted with the tyranny of Demetrius, acknowledged the authority of Alexander, who pretended to have been adopted by Sidetes; but he never succeeded in obtaining power over the whole of Syria. In the earlier part of the year 125 he defeated Demetrius, who fled to Tyre, and was there killed; but in the middle of the same year Alexander's patron, the king of Egypt, set up Antiochus Gryphus, a son of Demetrius, by whom he was defeated in battle. Alexander fled to Antioch, where he attempted to plunder the temple of Jupiter in order to pay his troops; but the people rose against him and drove him out of the city. He soon fell into the hands of robbers, who delivered him up to Antiochus, by whom he was put to death, B.C. 122. He was weak and effeminate, but sometimes generous. (Justin. xxxix, 1, 2; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 9, 10; Clinton, Fasti, iii, 331.)

4. Surnamed JANNÆUS (Ἰανναῖος), the first prince of the Maccabean dynasty who for any considerable period enjoyed the title of king. See MACCABEES. Coins of his reign are extant, from which it appears that his original name was Jonathan, which he exchanged for the Greek name Alexander, according to the Hellenizing custom of the age. His history is detailed by Josephus (Ant. xiii, 12-16). He was the

him than ever, and a civil war shortly ensued, in which he killed above 50,000 persons. All his endeavors to bring about a reconciliation proving fruitless, Alexander one day asked them what they would have him do to acquire their good-will. They answered unanimously "that he had nothing to do but to kill himself." After this they sent deputies to desire succors from Demetrius Eucarus against their king, who marched into Judæa with 3000 horse and 40,000 infantry, and encamped at Sichem. A battle ensued, in which Alexander was defeated and compelled to fly to the mountains for shelter, B.C. 88. This occurrence, however, contributed to his re-establishment, for a large number of the Jews, touched with the unhappy condition of their king, joined him; and Demetrius, retiring into Syria, left the Jews to oppose their king with their own forces. Alexander, collecting his army, marched against his rebellious subjects, whom he overcame in every engagement, and having shut up the fiercest of them in Bethom, he forced the town, made them prisoners, and carried them to Jerusalem, where he ordered eight hundred of them to be crucified before him during a great entertainment which he made for his friends; and before these unhappy wretches had expired he commanded their wives and children to be murdered in their presence—an unheard-of and excessive cruelty, which occasioned the people of his own party to call him "Thracides," meaning "as cruel as a Thracian," B.C. 86. Some time afterward Antiochus, surnamed Dionysius, having conquered Damascus, resolved to invade Judæa; but Alexander defeated his intention, and compelled him to return into Arabia, where he was killed. Aretas, the succeeding king of Damascus, however, came into Judæa, and defeated Alexander in the plain of Sephala, B.C. 82. A peace being concluded, Aretas returned to Damascus, and Alexander ingratiated himself with the Jews, B.C. 81. Having given himself up to excessive drinking, he brought on a violent quartan fever, which terminated his life. His queen, Alexandra, observing him to be near his end, and foreseeing all she had to fear from a mutinous people not easily governed, and her children not of age to conduct her affairs, was greatly distressed. Alexander told her that, to reign in peace, she should conceal his death from the army till Bagaba, which he was then besieging, was taken; that, when returned to Jerusalem, she should give the Pharisees some share in the government; that she should send for the principal of them, show them his dead body, give them permission to treat it with what indignities they pleased in revenge for the ill-treatment they had received from him, and promise that she would in future do nothing in the government without their advice and participation. He died at the age of forty-eight, after a reign of twenty-seven years, B.C. 78. This admission of the Pharisees into the government demands the especial notice of the reader, as it accounts not only for their influence over the minds of the people, but also for their connection with the rulers, and their power as public governors, which appear so remarkably in the history of the Gospels—much beyond what might be expected from a sect merely religious. Alexander left two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, who disputed the kingdom and high-priesthood till the time of Herod the Great, and whose dissensions caused the ruin of their family, and were the means of Herod's elevation. — Calmet, s. v. See ALEXANDRA.

5. The son of Aristobulus and Alexandra, and grandson of Alexander Jannæus. He was to have been carried captive to Rome, with his brother Antigonus, when Pompey took Jerusalem from Aristobulus (B.C. 63); on the way, however, he found means to escape, and, returning to Judæa (B.C. 57), raised an army of 10,000 foot and 15,000 horse, with which he performed many gallant actions, and seized the fortresses of Alexandrium and Machærus. Hyrcanus applied for aid to Gabinius, the general of the Roman troops, who drove him from the mountains, beat him near Jerusalem, killed 3000 of his men, and made many prisoners. By the mediation of his mother, Alexandra, matters were accommodated with Gabinius, and the Romans marched into Egypt, but were soon compelled to return by the violent proceedings of Alexander. Wherever he met with Romans he sacrificed them to his resentment, and a number were compelled to fortify themselves on Mount Gerizim, where Gabinius found him at his return from Egypt. Being apprehensive of engaging the great number of troops who were with Alexander, Gabinius sent Antipater with offers of general pardon if they laid down their arms. This had the desired success; many forsook Alexander, and retired to their own houses; but with 30,000 still remaining he resolved to give the Romans battle. The armies met at the foot of Mount Tabor, where, after a very obstinate action, Alexander was overcome, with the loss of 10,000 men.

Under the government of Crassus (B.C. 53) Alexander again began to embroil affairs; but after the unhappy expedition against the Parthians Cassius obliged him, under conditions, to continue quiet (B.C. 52) while he marched to the Euphrates to oppose the passage of the Parthians. During the wars between Cæsar and Pompey, Alexander and Aristobulus, his father, espoused Cæsar's interest, B.C. 49. Aristobulus was poisoned, and Alexander beheaded at Antioch, B.C. 48. (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 5-7; War, i, 8 and 9.)

6. The son of Jason, sent to Rome to renew friendship and alliance between the Jews and Romans; he is named in the decree of the senate directed to the Jews in the ninth year of Hyrcanus's pontificate, B.C. 60 (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 8, 5).

7. The son of Dositheus, another Jewish ambassador on the same occasion (Josephus, ib.). Perhaps identical with the following.

8. The son of Theodoros, sent to Rome by Hyrcanus to renew his alliance with the senate. He is named in the decree of the senate addressed to the magistrates of Ephesus, made in the consulship of Dolabella (B.C. 43), which specified that the Jews should not be forced into military service, because they could not bear arms on the Sabbath-day, nor have, at all times, such provisions in the armies as were authorized by their law (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 10, 10 and 11).

9. A son of Herod the Great by Mariamne. The history of this prince, which is given by Josephus (Ant. xv, xvi; War, i, 22-27), can hardly be separated from that of Aristobulus, his brother and companion in misfortune. After the tragical death of their mother, Mariamne (Josephus, Ant. xv, 7), Herod sent them to Rome to be educated in a manner suitable to their rank (ib. 10, 1). Augustus allowed them an apartment in his palace, intending this mark of his consideration as a compliment to their father Herod. On their return to Judæa (ib. xvi, 1, 2) the people received the princes with great joy; but Salome, Herod's sister, who had been the principal cause of Mariamne's death, apprehending that if ever the sons of the latter possessed authority she would feel the effects of their resentment, resolved by her calumnies to alienate the affections of their father from them. This she managed with great address, and for some time discovered no symptoms of ill-will. Herod married Alexander to Glaphyra, daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and Aristobulus to Berenice, daughter of Salome. Pheroras, the king's brother, and Salome, his sister, conspiring to destroy these young princes, watched closely their conduct, and often induced them to speak their thoughts freely and forcibly concerning the manner in which Herod had put to death their mother Mariamne. Whatever they said was immediately reported to the king in the most odious and aggravated terms, and Herod, having no distrust of his brother and sister, confided in their representations as to his sons' intentions of revenging their mother's death. To check in some degree their lofty spirits, he sent for his eldest son, Antipater, to court—he having been brought up at a distance from Jerusalem, because the quality of his mother was much inferior to that of Mariamne—thinking that, by thus making Aristobulus and Alexander sensible that it was in his power to prefer another of his sons before them, they would be rendered more circumspect in their conduct. The contrary, however, was the case. The presence of Antipater only exasperated the two princes, and he at length succeeded in so entirely alienating his father's affection from them, that Herod carried them to Rome to accuse them before Augustus of designs against his life, B.C. 11 (ib. 10, 7). But the young princes defended themselves so well, and affected the spectators so deeply with their tears, that Augustus reconciled them to their father, and sent them back to Judea, apparently in perfect union with Antipater, who expressed great satisfaction to see them restored to Herod's favor. When returned to Jerusalem Herod convened the people in the temple, and publicly declared his intention that his sons should reign after him—first Antipater, then Alexander, and afterward Aristobulus. This declaration exasperated the two brothers still further, and gave new occasion to Pheroras, Salome, and Antipater to represent their disaffection to Herod. The king had three confidential eunuchs, whom he employed even in affairs of great importance. These were accused of being corrupted by the money of Alexander, and, being subjected to the rack, the extremity of the torture induced them to confess that they had often been solicited by Alexander and Aristobulus to abandon Herod and join them and their party, who were ready for any undertaking in asserting their indisputable right to the crown. One of them added that the two brothers had conspired to lay snares for their father while hunting, and were resolved, should he die, to go instantly to Rome and beg the kingdom of Augustus. Letters were produced likewise from Alexander to Aristobulus, wherein he complained that Herod had given fields to Antipater which produced an annual rent of 200 talents. This intelligence confirmed the fears of Herod, and rendered him suspicious of all persons about his court. Alexander was put under arrest, and his principal friends to the torture. The prince, however, was not dejected at this storm. He not only denied nothing which had been extorted from his friends, but admitted even more than they had alleged against him, whether desiring to confound the credulity and suspicions of his father, or to involve the whole court in perplexities, from which they should be unable to extricate themselves. He conveyed letters to the king, in which he represented that to torment so many persons on his account was useless; that, in fact, he had laid ambuscades for him; that the principal courtiers were his accomplices, naming, in particular, Pheroras and his most intimate friends, adding that Salome came secretly to him by night, and that the whole court wished for nothing more than the moment when they might be delivered from that pain in which they were continually kept by his cruelties.

In the mean time, Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and father-in-law of Alexander, informed of what was passing in Judea, came to Jerusalem for the purpose of effecting, if possible, a reconciliation between Herod and his son. Knowing the violence of Herod's temper, he feigned to pity his present situation, and to condemn the unnatural conduct of Alexander. The sympathy of Archelaus produced some relentings in the bosom of Herod, and finally led to his reconciliation with Alexander and the detection of the guilty parties. But this calm did not long continue. One Eurycles, a Lacedæmonian, having insinuated himself into Herod's favor, gained also the confidence of Alexander; and the young prince opened his heart freely concerning the grounds of his discontent against his father. Eurycles repeated all to the king, whose suspicions against his sons were revived, and he at length ordered them to be tortured. Of all the charges brought against the young princes, nothing could be proved except that they had formed a design to retire into Cappadocia, where they might be freed from their father's tyranny, and live in peace. Herod, however, having substantiated this fact, took the rest for granted, and dispatched two envoys to Rome, demanding from Augustus justice against Alexander and Aristobulus. Augustus ordered them to be tried at Berytus, before the governors of Syria and the tributary sovereignties of the neighboring provinces, particularly mentioning Archelaus as one, and giving Herod permission, should they be found guilty, to punish them as he might deem proper. Herod convened the judges, but basely omitted Archelaus, Alexander's father-in-law; and then, leaving his sons under a strong guard at Platane, he pleaded his own cause against them before the assembly, consisting of 150 persons. After adducing against them every thing he had been able to collect, he concluded by saying that, as a king, he might have tried and condemned them by his own authority, but that he preferred bringing them before such an assembly to avoid the imputation of injustice and cruelty. Saturnius, who had been formerly consul, voted that they should be punished, but not with death, and his three sons voted with him; but they were overruled by Volumnus, who gratified the father by condemning his sons to death, and induced the rest of the judges to join with him in this cruel and unjust sentence. The time and manner of carrying it into execution were left entirely to Herod. Damascenus, Tyro, and other friends interfered in order to save the lives of the unfortunate princes, but in vain. They remained some time in confinement, and, after the report of another plot, were conveyed to Selaste, or Samaria, and there strangled, B.C. 5 (ib. 11, 7).—Calmet.

The leading incidents of this narrative, which is chiefly interesting as confirmatory of the barbarous character attributed to Herod in the Gospels, are confirmed by Strabo (xvi, 765). It is probably this event to which Macrobius alludes (Saturn. ii, 4) when speaking of the jocose remark that Augustus is said to have made on hearing that in the massacre of the Bethlehemite children (Matt. ii, 16) one of the king's own sons had perished, "It were better to be Herod's swine than his son!" Perhaps, however, the son referred to may be Antipater (q. v.), whom he also ordered to execution just before his death. See HEROD.

10. A son of Alexander Herod (above) by Glaphyra (Josephus, War. i, 18, 1). See HEROD.

11. A son of Phasaëus (son of Phasaëus, Herod's brother) by Salampio, Herod's daughter (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4). See HEROD.

12. A relative of the high-priest, and a leading Jew, present at the examination of Peter and John before the Sanhedrim for the cure of the lame man (Acts iv, 6), A.D. 29. Many (Kinol, in loc.) suppose he was the Alexandrian alabarch Alexander Lysimachus (below), who was a brother of the well-known Philo, and an old friend of the Emperor Claudius (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 8, 1; xix, 5, 1), and whose son, Alexander Tiberius (below), was procurator of Judea and afterward of Egypt (Josephus, War. ii, 11, 6; 15, 1, etc.).

13. A man whose father, Simon, a Cyrenian Jew, was compelled to bear the cross of Christ behind him from the gate to Calvary (Mark xv, 21). A.D. post 29. From the manner in which he and his brother Rufus are mentioned, it is not unlikely that they were afterward known as Christians.

14. An alabarch (q. v.) of Alexandria, surnamed LYSIMACHUS, steward of Antonia the mother of Claudius, who freed him from the incarceration to which he had been subjected by the preceding emperor (Josephus, Ant. xix, 5, 1). It was through him that Agrippa received the loan of 200,000 drachmæ (ib. xviii, 6, 3). Some have thought him the same with No. 12, above.

15. A son of the foregoing, surnamed TIBERIUS (Josephus, Ant. xx, 5, 2). His uncle was Philo, the celebrated Jewish author. Alexander, however, did not continue in the faith of his ancestors, and was rewarded for his apostasy by various public appointments. In the reign of Claudius he succeeded Fadus as procurator of Judæa, about A.D. 46, and was promoted to the equestrian order. He was subsequently appointed by Nero procurator of Egypt; and by his order 50,000 Jews were slain on one occasion at Alexandria in a tumult in the city. It was apparently during his government in Egypt that he accompanied Corbulo in his expedition into Armenia, A.D. 64; and he was, in this campaign, given as one of the hostages to secure the safety of Tiridates when the latter visited the Roman camp. Alexander was the first Roman governor who declared in favor of Vespasian; and the day on which he administered the oath to the legions in the name of Vespasian, the kalends of July, A.D. 69, is regarded as the beginning of that emperor's reign. Alexander afterward accompanied Titus in the war against Judæa, and was present at the taking of Jerusalem. (Josephus, J'ar. ii, 11, 6; 15, 1; 18; 7, 8; iv, 10, 6; vi, 4, 3; Tacitus, Ann. xv, 28; Hist. i, 11; ii, 74, 79; Suetonius, Vesp. 6.)

16. A Jew of Ephesus, known only from the part he took in the uproar about Diana which was raised there by the preaching of Paul (Acts xix, 33), A.D. 54. As the inhabitants confounded the Jews and Jewish Christians, the former, apprehensive lest they might be involved in the popular commotion as opponents of the prevalent idolatry, put forward Alexander, apparently one of their own number, and perhaps a practised speaker, to defend them from any connection with the Christians (Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul, ii, 87 note); but his interference only inflamed the mob the more, so that he was unable in the tumult to obtain a hearing (Neander, Planting of the Church, i, 318, Edinb. ed.). Some suppose that this person is the same with "Alexander the coppersmith" of 2 Tim. iv, 14; but this is by no means probable: the name of Alexander was in those times very common among the Jews.

17. A coppersmith or brazier (mentioned in 1 Tim. i, 20; 2 Tim. iv, 11), who, with Hymenæus and others, broached certain heresies touching the resurrection, for which they were excommunicated by the Apostle Paul, A.D. 54-64. These persons, and especially Alexander, appear to have maligned the faith they had forsaken and the character of the apostle. As every Jew learned some trade, it has been imagined that Alexander was really a man of learning, and not an artisan, although acquainted with the brazier's craft. But we are not aware that it was usual to designate a literate person by the name of the trade with which he was acquainted, although this may possibly have been the case when a man bore a name so common and so undistinguishing as that of Alexander. The supposition of some (Neander, Planting, i, 407 note), that different persons are alluded to in the two passages cited, is not the more probable one (Matthies, Pastoraltheorie, p. 259 sq.).

Alexander I., bishop of Rome, succeeded Evaristus in that see 110. He ruled for eight years and five months, and is said to have suffered martyrdom under Hadrian in 119, though this is doubted (Euseb. H. E. iv, 4; Iren. iv, 3). Alexander is said by some writers to have been the first who directed that water should be mixed with the wine in the Eucharist, and also to have introduced holy water; but it is the usual custom of Roman Catholic writers to attribute the events of later periods to earlier ones. The epistles attributed to him are spurious.

II. Pope (originally called Anselm Badagus), a native of Milan. As priest of his native town, he began, about the middle of the 11th century, to preach against the marriage of the clergy. Archbishop Guido, of Milan, who sympathized with the married clergy, obtained for him from the Emperor Henry and the Pope Stephen II, the diocese of Lucca, in order to remove him. Anselm, however, in his new position, vigorously pursued his attacks upon the married clergy, and became intimate with the leaders of the hierarchic party, Hildebrand and Petrus Damiani. On the death of Pope Nicholas II (1061), Hildebrand, who was already all-powerful at Rome, succeeded in elevating Anselm to the papal throne under the name of Alexander II. The party of the count of Tusculum, in union with the married clergy, opposed to him Bishop Cadolus of Parma as antipope under the name of Honorius II, but Alexander was generally recognised in Germany by the Synod of 1062. As pope, Alexander endeavored to enforce all the exorbitant pretensions of the papacy, and in this effort was supported by Hildebrand and Damiani, who acted as his legates and counsellors. He forbade King Henry II of Germany to divorce his wife Bertha, excommunicated the councillors of the king, and summoned the latter to Rome. He died before Henry had resolved to go, April 20, 1073, and was succeeded by Hildebrand under the name of Gregory VII. Forty-five of his epistles are extant (Concilii, tom. ix, p. 1115).—Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 395-398; iv, 106; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1061; Wetzer and Welte, i, 154.

III. Pope (originally called Roland Bandinelli), a Tuscan. In 1159 he was made pope, but was driven out of Rome by the antipope Victor III. The Emperor Frederick Barbarossa convoked the Council of Pavia in 1160, in which Victor was confirmed, and Alexander deposed and excommunicated. Alexander and his party, in their turn, excommunicated Victor and his abettors. Alexander was recognised by the kings of France, England, Spain, Sicily, Jerusalem, and Hungary; while Victor, who claimed to have been elected by the clergy, the Senate, and the barons of Rome, was only recognised by Germany and Lombardy. Alexander had to flee to France, where, at a council held at Tours (1162), he declared all the ordinations made by the antipope sacrilegious, and condemned the Albigenses as heretics. After the death of Victor, April 20, 1164, Frederick had a new antipope elected, who assumed the name of Pascal III. In 1165 Alexander returned to Rome, where he met with an enthusiastic reception. Against the advancing armies of the emperor he was supported by the king of Sicily. In 1166 the Greek emperor, Manuel, opened negotiations with Alexander for the purpose of bringing about a union of the Greek and Latin Churches, as well as of the two empires; but the negotiations led to no permanent result. In 1166 he was again ejected from Rome by the emperor, who was crowned there by Pascal, while Alexander excommunicated him, and absolved his subjects from the oath of allegiance. Alexander also allied himself with the League of the Lombardian cities which rose against Frederick, and established a new federal city, which they called, in honor of the pope, Alexandria. The antipope Pascal died Sept. 26, 1168, but his partisans elected in his place John, abbot of Sturm, in Hungary, who assumed the name of Calixt III. In 1171 Alexander was informed of the murder of Thomas à Becket. He put all England under the ban, and sent two cardinals to England to examine the whole matter, which terminated in the absolution of the king and the canonization of Thomas à Becket. In 1177 the emperor got reconciled with Alexander at Venice. The emperor threw himself upon his knees and kissed the foot of the pope, while the latter gave to the emperor the kiss of peace, and gave him his arm to conduct him into the church. The antipope Calixt abdicated in 1178, and was appointed by Alexander governor of Benevent. The opponents of Alexander elected, however, another antipope (Sept. 29, 1178), who assumed the name of Innocent III, but was soon after captured by order of Alexander, and imprisoned in a monastery, where he died. In 1179 Alexander held at Rome the third general council of Lateran (q. v.), which issued a number of decrees on church discipline and excommunicated the Albigenses. In 1180 Alexander prevailed upon the kings of France and England to undertake a new crusade for the purpose of aiding the king of Jerusalem against Saladin. Alexander even endeavored to convert the sultan of Iconium by addressing to him a kind of catechism under the name of Instructio Fidei. Alexander reserved the canonization of saints, which had formerly been practised also by the metropolitans, to the popes, and introduced the Littere Monitoriales. Several Epistles of Alexander are found in the Concilia of Labbe, and his bulls have been printed in the Bullarium of Cherubini, and in the Italia Sacra of Ughelli. Alexander died at Rome in 1181.—The best work on the history of Alexander is by Reuter, Geschichte Alexander III und der Kirche seiner Zeit (3 vols. Berl. 1845-'64). See also Turner, Hist. Engl. vol. iv; Neander, Ch. Hist. iv, 168.

IV, Pope (originally Reinwald, count of Segni), a man of worldly spirit, ascended the throne in 1254, at a period of great disturbance. Alexander, like his predecessor, endeavored to confiscate the entire kingdom of Sicily on the ground that the Emperor Frederick II, who was also king of Italy, had died excommunicated. When Manfred, an illegitimate son of Frederick, maintained himself against the papal troops as ruler of Sicily, Alexander excommunicated him, proclaimed against him a crusade, and put the entire kingdom under the ban. At the same time he asked considerable sums from Henry III, king of England, in order to defray the expenses of the crusade, and, as an indemnification, offered the kingdom of Sicily to Edmund, the second son of Henry. A legate gave to this young prince in advance the investiture. Manfred, however, maintained himself, and, aided by the Saracens, conquered the pope, and compelled him to take refuge at Viterbo, where he died, May 25, 1261, leaving the papal authority greatly enfeebled. At the beginning of his pontificate, Alexander, at the request of Louis XI, sent inquisitors to France. He was very partial to the Dominicans, and condemned a work by William of St. Amour against the mendicant orders ("On the Dangers of the last Times") and a work entitled "The Everlasting Gospel," and ascribed to John of Parma, the general of the Franciscans. Like his predecessors, he endeavored to bring about a union between the Greek and the Roman Churches. Several letters and bulls of his pope have been printed in Labbe's Concilia, Ughelli's Italia Sacra, d'Achery's Spicilegium, and other collections.—Hoefler, Biog. Générale, i, 878; Neander, Ch. Hist. iv, 188, 283, 421.

V, Pope (originally Peter Philargus), a Franciscan monk from Candia, was raised to the papal throne in 1409 by the Council of Pisa, which deposed the popes Gregory XII and Benedict XIII. His prodigality of gifts and offices during his pontificate was so unbounded that he used to say, "When I became a bishop I was rich; when a cardinal, poor; and when a pope, a beggar." He died 1410, it was supposed from poison administered by his successor, John XXII. He was regarded as one of the most learned men of his age. He translated several works from Greek into Latin, which, however, have never been printed. Mazzuchelli (in his work Scrittori d'Italia) gives a list of the writings of this pope, but he only published his letters, his bulls, and a little treatise on the conception of the Virgin Mary.—Hoefler, Biog. Générale, i, 879.

VI, Pope (originally Roderic Lenzuoli, but afterward Borgia, from his mother's family), was born at Valentia, Spain, in 1431. His mother, Jane Borgia, was the sister of Pope Calixtus III. Roderic first studied law, but entered on a military career at the age of 18. His youth was a very dissolute one; and he early formed a criminal connection with a Roman lady living in Spain with her two daughters. He soon seduced the daughters also; and one of them, Rosa Vanozza, became his life-long mistress. By her he had five children, two of whom, Caesar Borgia and Lucretia, surpassed their father, if possible, in abominable crimes. In 1455, while Roderic was living in adultery in Spain, his uncle became pope. This opened to him a new career of ambition. He went to Rome on a promise from the pope of an office worth 12,000 crowns a year; and at the same time his mistress and her children went to Venice, under the charge of an intendant, Manuel, who afterward passed as her husband, to shield the amours of Roderic. The pope was charmed with the pleasing manners and apparent piety of his nephew, and made him cardinal and vice-chancellor in 1456. Roderic affected great piety, visited the prisons and the poor, was diligent in keeping church services, and soon beguiled the Romans into confidence in his purity. During the pontificates of Pius II, Paul II, and Sixtus IV, successors of Calixtus, he remained quiet. In the pontificate of Innocent VIII, which began in 1484, he brought his mistress to Rome, and put her in a house near St. Peter's, when he passed his nights with her, the days being devoted ostentatiously to his public duties and acts of piety! In the mean time he was busy buying up votes for the papal chair, and when Innocent died (1492), he had purchased a sufficient number of cardinals to secure his election. This statement rests on the authority of Burchard, master of ceremonies to Alexander VI, who left a journal, which was afterward published in 1696 (Hanover, ed. by Leibnitz) in part, and has recently been published in full (Florence, 1854, 8vo). Burchard states the price paid by Roderic for the votes of the cardinals as follows: to Cardinal Orsino, the castles of Monticelli and Sariani; to Ascanius Sforza, the vice-chancellorship of the Church; to the cardinal of Colonna, the rich abbey of St. Benedict, as well as the domains and right of patronage for himself and family forever; to the cardinal of St. Angelo, the bishopric of Porto, and the tower which was a dependency on it, with a cellar full of wine. The cardinal of Parma received the city of Nepi; Savelli received the government of Citta Castellana, and of the church of St. Mary the Greater; a monk of Venice, who had obtained the cardinalate, sold his vote for five thousand ducats of gold. Roderic became pope August 2, 1492, and took the name of Alexander VI. His pontificate of eleven years was a stormy one, as he made every thing subordinate to the purpose of raising his bastard children above the heads of the oldest princely houses of Italy. Of the crimes alleged against Alexander and his children, Cæsar and Lucretia, this is not the place to speak in detail; it is enough to say that this pontificate rivalled the worst periods of the Roman Empire in debauchery, venality, and murder. It was in 1492 that Columbus discovered America, and the Portuguese were soon after disputing with the Spaniards as to their claims through Vasco de Gama. The dispute was referred to Alexander. He traced a line which passed from pole to pole through the Azores, or Western Islands, and decreed that all the countries which were beyond this line, that is, the West Indies, or America, should belong to Spain; and all east of it, i. e. the East Indies and the African coast, to Portugal. The censorship of books forms one of the many claims of Alexander to the gratitude of posterity, as he is said to have originated it in 1502. The monk Savonarola (q. v.) fearlessly exposed the wickedness of Alexander, who caused him to be burnt in 1498.

Alexander VI.

The wits of the time did not fail of their duty in pasquinades, one of which runs thus:

De vitio in vitium, de flamma transit in ignem.
Vendit Alexander claves, altaria, Christum;
Vendere jure potest, emerat file prius;
Etc.

The death-scene of this wretch is stated by Tommasi, in substance, as follows: After the marriage of his daughter Lucretia, the pope requested Cardinal Corneto to lend him his palace for a great feast, to which all the cardinals and nobility were to be invited, and at which some of them were to be poisoned. By mistake the poisoned wine was handed to the pope and his son Cæsar. Both were soon taken ill; Cæsar recovered, but the pope died the same night, August 18, 1503.

Of course there have not been wanting apologists even for such a monster as Alexander VI. Among those who doubt, or affect to doubt, the stories of his great crimes, are Voltaire, Roscoe, the Biographie Universelle of Michaud, and Appleton's Cyclopaedia. But the evidence of contemporary writers is not to be shaken by the kind of criticism employed by those who would whitewash the Borgias. See, as the chief authorities, Burchard, Diarium, nunc primum pub. juris factum ab A. Gennarelli (Florence, 1854, 8vo); Tommasi, Vita di Cesare Borgia. The chief points of Burchard's diary are given in Gordon, Life of Alexander VI and Cesar Borgia (Lond. 1729, fol.; 1730, French, 2 vols. 8vo). See also Ranke, History of the Papacy, i, 44 sq.; Masse, Hist. du Pape Alexandre VI (Paris, 1830, 8vo); Gieselser, Ch. Hist. per. iii, § 133, and authorities there cited.

VII. Pope (originally Fabio Chigi), born at Siena 1599, succeeded to the papacy in 1655. He surrounded himself with splendor, and while he indulged in luxury and licentiousness, he also spent vast sums in improving and adorning the city of Rome. He confirmed the bull of Innocent X against the five propositions of Jansenius; and was the author of the "Formulary"—an act the intention of which was to prove that these five propositions were contained in the writings of Jansenius. In consequence of a difficulty with the government of France, French troops seized the town and the district of Avignon, which at that time still belonged to the Papal States; and the Sorbonne published theses in order to prove that the popes, so far from being infallible in temporal affairs, were not even infallible in spiritual matters. After having in vain invoked the aid of several Catholic princes, Alexander complied with all the demands of the French king, and had Avignon restored to him. He died in 1667. His bulls are found in Cherubini's Bullarium. A volume of his verses, Philomathi Muse Juveniles (so called because written when he was at the collège of the Philomathi, at Siena), was printed in 1656.—Biog. Univ. i, 526; Ranke, Hist. of Papacy, ii, 191; Pallavicino, Della Vita di Alessandro VII libri v (Prato, 1840, 2 vols.); Hoefer, Biographie Générale, i, 903.

VIII. Pope (originally Ottoboni), born at Venice 1610, made pope 1689, died 1691, having held the chair long enough to advance his own family, and secure for himself an enduring reputation for avarice and duplicity. He declared the decrees of 1682 which guaranteed the independence of the Gallican Church, to be null and void. This pope, though opposed to the Jansenists, nevertheless condemned the doctrine of "philosophical sin," as taught by the Jesuit professor, Bongot, of Dijon. The Vatican Library is indebted to him for the acquisition of the magnificent collection of books and manuscripts of the Queen Christina.—Hoefer, Biog. Générale, i, 905; Ranke, Hist. of Papacy, ii, 279.

Alexander, Saint, bishop of Cappadocia, and afterward of Jerusalem: first, as colleague of the aged Narcissus, and afterward alone. Eusebius (lib. vi, ch. xi) gives an account of his call to the episcopacy of Jerusalem, and of his service there. He protected Origen, whose fellow-disciple he had been, and ordained him priest. Under Alexander Severus he was imprisoned for seven years. He suffered a second persecution under Decius, and died in prison at Cæsarea in 251. He is the first bishop who has been a coadjutor. He was a friend of literature, and established a library at Jerusalem. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on March 18; by the Greek, on December 22.—Dupin, Ecl. Writers, 3d cent.

Alexander patriarch of Alexandria from A. D. 312 to 326; he succeeded Achillas, and his appointment excited the envy and hatred of Arius, who had himself aspired to the episcopal throne. His doctrines were attacked by Arius, whom, after mildly exhorting to return to the truth, he cited before an assembly of the clergy at Alexandria, and, on his refusing to recant his errors, excommunicated him and his followers. This sentence was afterward confirmed by above a hundred bishops in the Council of Alexandria, A. D. 320. One of his epistles against Arius may be found in Socrates, Hist. Ecl. i, 6, and another in Theodoret, Hist. Ecl. i, 4.

Alexander, first bishop of Constantinople after its name was changed from Byzantium. Alexander resolutely opposed the Arian heresy; and when Eusebius of Nicomedia insisted upon Arius being received into the Church of Constantinople, Alexander, in the deepest affliction, ordered public fasting and prayer to be made to God to avert it; and himself passed whole nights before the altar, with his face upon the ground. Arius died on the day before that fixed for his restoration. Alexander died in 340.—Socrates, Hist. Ecl. i, 37, 38; ii, 6; Acta Sanctorum.

Alexander, bishop of Hierapolis, an adherent of Nestorius. At the Council of Ephesus (431), where he had been sent as a delegate, he signed, with eight other bishops, a letter addressed by Nestorius to the Emperor Theodosius, for the purpose of obtaining the convocation of another synod, to which Cyril of Alexandria and the Egyptian bishops should not be invited. Pope Sixtus III., to whom Alexander at a later date appealed, refused him a hearing, and at length the emperor banished him to Famothis in Egypt. Twenty-three letters, existing in a Latin translation (Epist. Lupi Ephesiarum), are ascribed to him as author; and Suidas reports a discourse of his, Quid nori Christus in mundum intulerit.—Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, s. v.

Alexander, founder of the Acæmetæ (q. v.), was born of an ancient family, in Asia Minor, in the time of the Emperor Constantius. He first filled an office at court, but afterward gave all that he had to the poor, and retired into Syria. He afterward founded a monastery on the banks of the Euphrates, and introduced a new rule of chanting the praises of God without ceasing, day and night, throughout the year. To secure this, he divided his monks into six classes, one of which followed another perpetually. When he had thus exercised his monks for twenty years in this first monastery of his order, he left them, and passed through Palmyra, Antioch, and Constantinople, in all which places he suffered for the faith. At last he died, about 440, at another monastery of his institution, called Gomon, at the mouth of the Pontus Euxinus. Bollandus give a life of him, which purports to be written by one of his disciples.—Bailet, Jan. 15; Landon, Eccles. Dict. 1, 240.

Alexander ALESIUS, or DE HALES (so called because he was born at Hailes, in Gloucestershire, or was a monk in the monastery there), one of the most eminent of the scholastic divines. After studying in England he proceeded to Paris, and studied theology and the canon law, and gained such a high reputation that he was styled “the Irrefragable Doctor.” He became a Franciscan in 1222, and died at Paris 1245. His works are: 1. A Commentary on the Psalms [erroneously attributed to Bonaventura, and by others, with greater probability, to Hugo de Sancto-Caro] (Venice, 1496, fol.);—2. Commentaries on the Apocalypse (Paris, 1647, fol.);—3. A Summary of all Theology—Summa Theologica (Norimh, 1482; Basle, 1502; Venice, 1576, 4 vols.; Cologne, 1622, and many other places);—4. Comment. on the Four Books of the Sentences (Lyons, 1581); there are doubts whether he was the author of this last work.

The Summa was written at the command of Pope Innocent IV, and enjoined by his successor, Alexander IV, to be used by all professors and students of theology in Christendom. Alexander gave the doctrines of the Church a more rigorously syllogistic form than they had previously had, and may thus be considered as the author of the scholastic theology. He answered the question whether theology is a science in the following manner: he made a distinction in the application of the idea of science; science relates either to the completion of the knowledge of truth (in which case it has to do with knowledge as such—that is, theoretical); or the knowledge relates to religious experience, and of the latter kind is theological knowledge. This knowledge can only proceed from the disposition. Theology demands the human soul, since it rouses the affections, the tendencies of the disposition, by the principles of goodness, the fear of God, and love. The relation of knowledge to faith is therefore the reverse of what it is in the other sciences, since theology first of all produces faith, and, after the soul has been purified through faith working by love, the result is the understanding of theology. In logical science, on the contrary, rational knowledge produces faith. If the former have produced faith, then the internal grounds for such conviction will appear. Faith is then the light of the soul; and the more any one is enlightened by this light, so much more will he apprehend the reasons by which his faith is proved. There is, indeed, a faith which does not rise so high as knowledge, which satisfies itself with probabilities; but Christian faith is different. It proceeds from experience, appeals to the revelation of the highest truths, and hence stands above all knowledge (Neander, History of Dogmas, ii, 550). As to our knowledge of God, Alexander taught that “the idea of God is a habitus naturaliter impressus prime veritatis, and is founded on the connection subsisting between eternal truth and the moral nature of man. But we must distinguish between a cognatio in habitu and in actu. The habitual lies at the basis of human consciousness; the actual is the developed idea. In reference to the former, the idea of God is undeniable; in reference to the second, a twofold tendency of the soul is possible—in proportion as it either turns to the revelation of the highest truth, or allows worldliness and the lower powers of the soul to govern it. In the latter case, the consciousness of God may be wanting, and the fool will say, There is no God.” He distinguishes also between the idea of God in general (ratio communis) and the particular application of it (ratio propria). “The former is true even in idolatry, for that testifies of an idea of God as its foundation, though the application of it is erroneous.” As to grace, he “defines the gratia gratis data as the gift which is communicated to rational creatures, in order to make them capable, as far as depends on this gift, to labor for the eternal salvation and improvement of others. It is the more remote preparation for salvation, mere dead faith, knowledge without life. Through the gratia gratum faciens salvation itself is added.” He “supposed man to be created first in his paris naturalibus, and then the higher development of nature follows by the informatio per gratiam. According to this view man needed grace from the beginning, but it was to be attained by the determination of his will. The original relation of the latter to nature is distinguished from the present in this respect, that it required grace only for its higher culture, not for its transformation. Man, in relation to grace, was informis negativè, without the higher form of life, but not informis positivè, as he was after the Fall. Hence gratia is informans, not reformans” (Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, ii, 574, 587). In ecclesiastical matters he advocates the strongest papal doctrines, being especially in favor of the prerogatives of the papacy. He refuses any toleration to heretics, and would have them deprived of all property; he absolves subjects from all obligations to obey a prince that is not obedient to the Church. The spiritual power, which blesses and consecrates kings, is, by that very fact, above all temporal powers, to say nothing of the essential dignity of its nature. It has the right to appoint and to judge these powers, while the pope has no judge but God. In ecclesiastical affairs also he maintains the pope’s authority to be full, absolute, and superior to all laws and customs. The points on which Alexander exercises his dialectics are sometimes simply ludicrous; as when he discusses the question whether a mouse that should nibble a consecrated wafer would thereby eat the body of Christ. He arrives at the conclusion that it would. He thinks Adam died at three o’clock, because that was the hour of Christ’s death.—Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. iv, 420 et al.; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. vol. iii, 324, 358; Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 1230; Haureau, Philosophie Scholastique, ch. xv.

Alexander NATALIS. See NATALIS.

Alexander NEVSKI, one of the saints of the Russian calendar, second son of the Grand-duke Jaroslava II, was born in Vladimir A.D. 1218. In 1238 he was made governor of Novogorod, which he defended against the Tartar hordes, who at that time grievously oppressed Russia. In 1239 an army of Swedes, Danes, and Teutonic knights appeared before the city and summoned Alexander to submit, who, however, bravely refused, and vanquished them in a bloody battle near the river Neva, whence he received the honorable surname which was then given to him. On the death of Yaroslav II, in 1247, his brother Andrew endeavored to deprive him of the throne of Vladimir, and Alexander fled to the khan of Sarai, with the aid of whom he ascended the throne in 1252, and reigned for 12 years with great wisdom. The rest of his life was spent in the defence of his country against the Tartars, the Swedes, and the Livonians, who continued their attacks. He died at Gorodetz, near Novogorod, A.D. 1263, and was enrolled by the gratitude of his country among her saints. Peter the Great subsequently built the celebrated monastery of St. Alexander Nevski on the spot where Alexander’s most renowned victory was gained. He also instituted under the same name an order of knighthood, which still exists in unabated lustre, and is only conferred as the reward of extraordinary services.—Biog. Univ. i, 582; Rose, Biog. Diet.; Biog. Générale, i, 857.

Alexander, Archibald, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian clergyman, was born in Rockbridge Co., Va., April 17, 1772, was licensed to preach in 1791, and labored with great acceptance in his native state till 1796, when he accepted the presidency of Hampden Sidney College. By his wisdom and industry he soon imparted to the institution a more healthful and vigorous tone, as well as greatly increased the number of its students. In 1807 he removed to Philadelphia, taking charge of the Pine Street church. Made D.D. in 1810, Dr. Alexander was chosen in 1812 to the professorship of Didactic and Polemic Theology at the Princeton Seminary, then just organized. He continued in this office till his death in 1851. As a preacher, he was very effective. As a teacher, "Dr. Alexander was possessed of a combination of qualities admirably fitted to secure both the respect and the affection of his students, and the strongest and most unanimous testimony has been borne by multitudes to the beneficial influence of his instructions and example in forming their religious character, in cultivating their intellectual powers, and in storing their minds with useful knowledge. Above eighteen hundred candidates for the ministry had studied under his superintendence, of whom about sixteen hundred were alive at the time of his death, most of them occupied as pastors in the two leading branches of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, but not a few also as missionaries among the heathen. While his great talents and acquirements, his sound judgment, and his profound piety secured their esteem and confidence, his unaffected simplicity, his cordial kindness, and his hearty vivacity called forth a very large measure of personal affection. He filled for forty years, with powers that scarcely exhibited any symptom of decay, a situation of great influence; he was able and willing to improve fully his opportunities of usefulness, and thus he became a great benefactor to his Church and country, by exerting a most powerful and wholesome influence on the formation of the character of a large number of men who are now making full proof of their ministry, and are workmen that need not to be ashamed" (Brit. Qu. Rev. 1854). His principal works are: Brief Compendium of Bible Truth (N. Y. 12mo); — Address to a young Christian (Phila.); — Annals of the Jewish Nation (N. Y.); — Bible Diet. (18mo, Phila.); — Christian Experience (Phila. 1840, 12mo); — Evidences of Christianity (12mo, Phila. 1825; often reprinted); — Hist. of the Patriarchs (1833, Phila.); — Canon of O. and N. T. (Phila. 1851, 12mo); — History of Colonization (8vo, 1816); — History of the Israelitish Nation (Phila. 1853, 8vo). His "Moral Science" (12mo) was a posthumous publication. He left also many MSS., which will, it is to be hoped, be published hereafter. — Sprague, Annals, iii, 612; Memoir, by Rev. J. W. Alexander (N. Y. 1854, 8vo); Brit. and For. Evang. Review, 1854, p. 584; Meth. Quar. Rev. 1862, p. 250.

Alexander, Caleb, a Presbyterian minister of the last century, born at Northfield, Mass., in 1755, and graduated at Yale in 1777, was licensed to preach in 1778. He was instrumental in founding Hamilton College, a seminary at Auburn, and other institutions. Died in 1828.—Sprague, Annals, iii, 406.

Alexander, James W., D.D., eldest son of Dr. Archibald Alexander (q. v.), was born March 13, 1801, in Louisa Co., Va. He received his academical training under James Ross in Philadelphia, and graduated A.B. at Princeton in 1820. He was appointed tutor in the college at the age of twenty, having in the mean time pursued his theological studies at the seminary under the instruction of his father, who was appointed in 1812 first professor in the Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church at Princeton. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1824, and soon after became pastor of the same church in Charlotte Co., Va., in which his father had commenced his ministry. In 1828 he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian church in Trenton, N. J. In 1832 he resigned his charge in Trenton, on account of impaired health, and became editor of the Presbyterian newspaper in Philadelphia. In the following year he was appointed Professor of Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres in the college at Princeton, which post he continued to occupy until, in 1844, he was called to the Duane Street church in New York. While fulfilling the professorship he preached regularly to a small congregation of colored people at Princeton, without compensation, for the space of seven years. In 1843 he was made D.D. by Lafayette College, Pa. In 1849 he was appointed by the General Assembly Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Church Government in Princeton Theological Seminary, and in 1851 he was called to take charge of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church, New York. Here his most important work in the Gospel ministry was performed. He gathered around him one of the largest and most influential congregations in the land, who were attracted, not by his popular talents, but by his personal worth, and weight, and piety, and by the fervid simplicity with which he preached Christ Jesus. Dr. Alexander was a man of eminent and varied learning, reaching into all the departments of science and literature, the stores of which, in many modern as well as ancient languages, were as familiar to him and as much at his command as those in his mother tongue. Yet his practical religious zeal was so great that the greater part of his writings consists of books for children, and writings to increase practical religion. His rare qualities as a writer and a preacher enabled him to say every thing in a style of originality and peculiar grace. He was equally distinguished for moral excellence, especially for child-like simplicity of character, unaffected humility, and simple but ever-glowing piety. In the spring of 1859 his health began to fail. With a view to its restoration, he went to Virginia in the early summer, and appeared to grow better. About a week before his death he was seized with dysentery, and died at the Red Sweet Springs, Alleghany Co., Va., July 31, 1859.

Dr. Alexander's writings are chiefly practical, but all distinguished by breadth of thought and by admirable excellence of style. Among them are, A Gift to the Afflicted (12mo); — Geography of the Bible (by J. W. and J. A. Alexander, 12mo); — Consolation, or Discourses to the suffering Children of God (N. Y. 1853, 8vo); — American Mechanics (2 vols. 18mo); — Thoughts on Family Worship (12mo); — Life of Rev. A. Alexander, D.D. (8vo); — Young Communicant (12mo); — The American Sunday-school and its Adjuncts (Phil. 1856). He wrote more than thirty juvenile books for the American Sunday-school Union, of which the best known are Infant Library, Only Son, Scripture Guide, Frank Harper, Carl, the Young Emigrant. He also was a frequent contributor to the Princeton Review. Since his death has appeared his Thoughts on Preaching (N. Y. 1861, 12mo); — Discourses on Faith (N. Y. 1862, 12mo). — New York Observer; Forty Years' Correspondence of Dr. J. W. Alexander with a Friend (N. Y. 1860, 2 vols. 12mo); New Englander, Nov. 1860, art. v; Mercersburg Rev. Oct. 1860.

Alexander, Joseph Addison, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister and scholar, third son of Dr. Archibald Alexander (q. v.), was born April 24, 1809. He graduated at Princeton in 1826, receiving the first honor of his class. He was soon after appointed tutor in that college, but declined the post, and united with Professor Robert B. Patton in the establishment of the Edgehill Seminary for boys at Princeton. In 1830 he was appointed Adjunct-professor of Ancient Languages at Princeton, but resigned in 1833 to visit the German universities. He spent a season at Halle and Berlin, and returned to accept the professorship of Oriental Literature in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, to which he had been appointed during his absence. In 1852 he was transferred to the chair of Ecclesiastical History. He died at Princeton, Jan. 28, 1860.

Dr. Alexander spoke almost all the modern languages of Europe, and as a scholar in Oriental literature had few, if any, superiors. His critical works are distinguished by keen analysis and sound discrimination. As a preacher, he was distinguished and popular. Preaching mostly from written notes, he was seldom known to take his eyes from the paper, though he kept up the interest of his auditors by the great learning, the clear method, and, at times, the high flight of eloquence he displayed. He had the rare capacity, both mental and physical, of almost incessant reading and intellectual labor, and he tasked his great energies to the utmost. The result is before us in a life of seldom paralleled intellectual achievement. He studied Arabic when a boy, and had read the whole Koran in that tongue when he was fourteen. Persian, Syriac, Hebrew, Coptic were successively mastered. He did not study these languages for the sake of their grammar, but of their literature; not for the purpose of knowing, but of using them. He studied, however, profoundly the philosophy of their structure and their analogies to each other, and learned the Sanscrit to possess the basis of comparative philology. Greek and Latin, and all the modern languages of Europe, were familiar to him. From this foundation of linguistic learning he proceeded to a wide and comprehensive system of historical, antiquarian, and philosophical studies. But all his other acquisitions were subordinated to the study and elucidation of the Word of God. His professional lectures and his commentaries were the fruit of his wide researches thus applied and consecrated. But his personal love for the Scriptures and delight in them were not less remarkable than his ability in illustrating them. He had learned whole books of them by heart, both in the original and in our English version. The exegetical works of Dr. Alexander have gained him a great reputation in Europe, as well as in America, and will doubtless remain a permanent part of Biblical literature. They include The earlier Prophecies of Isaiah (N. Y. 1846, 8vo);—The later Prophecies of Isaiah (N. Y. 1847, 8vo);—Isaiah illustrated and explained (an abridgment of the critical commentary, N. Y. 1851, 2 vols. 12mo);—The Psalms translated and explained (N. Y. 1850, 3 vols. 8vo);—Commentary on the Acts (N. Y. 1857, 2 vols. 12mo);—Comm. on Mark (1858, 12mo). He also published (from the Princeton Review) Essays on the primitive Church Offices (N. Y. 1851). Since his death his Sermons have been published (2 vols. 8vo, N. Y. 1860); also a Commentary on Matthew (N. Y. 1860); and Notes on N. T. Literature (N. Y. 1861, 12mo).

Alexandra (Ἀλεξάνδρα, fem. of Alexander), the name of several women in Josephus.

1. Surnamed (or rather, perhaps, originally named) SALOME, first married to Aristobolus, and afterward the wife of Alexander Jannæus, his brother. In the account of the latter prince we have noticed the advice which he gave upon his death-bed to Alexandra, with a view to conciliate the Pharisees and establish herself in the kingdom. Alexandra followed his counsel, and secured the object of her wishes. The Pharisees, won by the marks of respect which she paid to them, exerted their influence over the people, and Alexander Jannæus was buried with great pomp and splendor, and Alexandra ruled during the space of nine years. Under her government the country enjoyed external peace, but was distracted by internal strife. The Pharisees, having obtained an ascendancy over the mind of the queen, proceeded to exact from her many important advantages for themselves and friends, and then to obtain the punishment and persecution of all those who had been opposed to them during the king's reign. Many of the Sadducees, therefore, were put to death; and their vindictiveness proceeded to such acts of cruelty and injustice that none of Alexander's friends could be secure of their lives. Many of the principal persons who had served in the late king's armies, with Aristobolus at their head, entreated permission to quit their country, or to be placed in some of the distant fortresses, where they might be sheltered from the persecution of their enemies. After some deliberation, she adopted the expedient of distributing them among the different garrisons of the kingdom, excepting those, however, in which she had deposited her most valuable property. In the mean time her son Aristobolus was devising the means of seizing upon the throne, and an opportunity at length presented itself for carrying his project into effect. The queen being seized with a dangerous illness, Aristobolus at once made himself master of those fortresses in which his friends had been placed, and, before the necessary measures could be taken to stay his progress, he was placed at the head of a large number of troops. Alexandra left the crown to Hyrcannus, her eldest son; but he, being opposed by Aristobolus, retired to private life. Alexandra died B.C. 69, aged seventy-three years (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 16, 1-5; Muller, De Alexandra, Ald. 1711; Zeltner, id. ib. cod.).

2. The daughter of Hyrcannus, wife of Alexander (son of Aristobolus and brother of Hyrcannus), and mother of another Aristobolus and of Mariamne (q. v.), whose death, in consequence of her husband's learning he (Herod the Great's) suspicions, she perfidiously connived at; but she was afterward herself put to death by Herod's order (Josephus, Ant. xv, 2, 5-7, 8).

3. A daughter of Phasaëlus by Salampio: she married Timinus of Cyprus, but had no children (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4).

Alexan'dria (properly Alexandri'a, Ἀλεξάνδρεια, 3 Macc. iii, 20; iv, 11; occurs in the N. T. only in the derivatives Ἀλεξάνδριός, an Alexandrian, Acts vi, 9; xviii, 24; and Ἀλεξάνδριον, Alexandrine, Acts xxvii, 6; xxviii, 11), the chief maritime city and long the metropolis of Lower Egypt, so called from its founder, Alexander the Great, was in many ways most importantly connected with the later history of the Jews—as well from the relations which subsisted between them and the Ptolemies, who reigned in that city, as from the vast number of Jews who were settled there, with whom a constant intercourse was maintained by the Jews of Palestine. It is situated on the Mediterranean, twelve miles west of the Canopic mouth of the Nile, in 31° 13' N. lat. and 25° 53' E. long. It owes its origin to the comprehensive policy of Alexander, who traced himself the ground-plan of the city (Plut. Alex. 26), perceiving that the usual channels of commerce might be advantageously altered; and that a city occupying this site could not fail to become the common emporium for the traffic of the Eastern and Western world, by means of the river Nile and the two adjacent seas, the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. See ALEXANDER THE GREAT. For a long period Alexandria was the greatest of known cities, for Nineveh and Babylon had fallen, and Rome had not yet risen to pre-eminence; and even when Rome became the mistress of the world, and Alexandria only the metropolis of a province, the latter was second only to the former in wealth, extent, and importance, and was honored with the magnificent titles of the second metropolis of the world, the city of cities, the Queen of the East, a second Rome (Diod. Sic. xvii; Strab. xvii; Ammian. Marcell. xxii; He-gesipp. iv, 27; Josephus, War, iv, 11, 5). It is not mentioned at all in the Old Testament [see NO], and only incidentally in the New (Acts vi, 9; xviii, 24; xxvii, 6).

Alexandria was founded B.C. 332, upon the site of the small village of Rhacotis (Strabo, xvii, c. i, 6), and opposite to the little island of Pharos, which, even before the time of Homer, had given shelter to the Greek traders on the coast. Alexander selected this spot for the Greek colony which he proposed to found, from the capability of forming the deep water between Rhacotis and the isle of Pharos into a harbor that might become the port of all Egypt. He accordingly ordered Diocrates, the architect who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, to improve the harbor, and to lay down the plan of the new city; and he further appointed Cleomenes of Naucratis, in Egypt, to act as superintendent. The light-house upon the isle of Pharos was to be named after his friend Hephæstion, and all contracts between merchants in the port were to commence "In the name of Hephæstion." The great market which had hitherto existed at Canopus was speedily removed to the new city, which thus at once rose to commercial importance. After the death of Alexander, the building of the city was carried on briskly by his successor, Ptolemy Lagus, or Soter, but many of the public works were not completed till the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The city was built upon a strip of land between the sea and the Lake Mareotis, and its ground plan resembled the form of a Greek chlamys, or soldier's cloak. The two main streets, 240 feet wide, left a free passage for the north wind, which alone conveys coolness in Egypt. They crossed each other at right angles in the middle of the city, which was three miles long and seven broad, and the whole of the streets were wide enough for carriages. The long narrow island of Pharos was formed into a sort of breakwater to the port, by joining the middle of the island to the main-land by means of a mole seven stadia in length, and hence called the Heptastadium. To let the water pass, there were two breaks in the mole, over which bridges were thrown. The public grounds and palaces occupied nearly a third of the whole extent of the city. The Royal Docks, the Exchange, the Posideion, or temple of Neptune, and many other public buildings, fronted the harbor. There also stood the burial-place for the Greek kings of Egypt, called "the Soma," because it held "the body," as that of Alexander was called. On the western side of the Heptastadium, and on the outside of the city were other docks, and a ship-canal into Lake Mareotis, as likewise the Necropolis, or public burial-place of the city. There were also a theatre, an amphitheatre, a gymnasium, with a large portico, more than 600 feet long, and supported by several rows of marble columns; a stadium, in which games were celebrated every fifth year; a hall of justice, public groves or gardens, a hippodrome for chariot races, and, towering above all, was the temple of Serapis, the Serapeum. The most famous of all the public buildings planned by Ptolemy Soter were the library and museum, or College of Philosophy. They were built near the royal palace, in that part of the city called Bruchion, and contained a great hall, used as a lecture-room and common dining-room, and had a covered walk all round the outside, and a seat on which the philosophers sometimes sat in the open air. Within the verge of the Serapeum was a supplementary library, called the daughter of the former. The professors of the college were supported out of the public income. The light-house at Alexandria was not finished till the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, B.C. 284-246. It was built by the architect Sostratus. The royal burial-place was also finished in this reign, and Philadelphus removed the body of Alexander from Memphis to this city, and hither pilgrims came and bowed before the golden sarcophagus in which the hero's body was placed. Seleucus Cybriactes, B.C. 54, is said to have stolen the golden coffin of Alexander. The Emperor Claudius, A.D. 41-55, founded the Claudian Museum; and Antoninus, A.D. 162-181, built the Gates of the Sun and of the Moon, and likewise made a hippodrome. At the great rebellion of Egypt, A.D. 297, Alexandria was besieged by Diocletian, when, in commemoration of his humanity in staying the pillage of the city, the inhabitants erected an equestrian statue, now lost, but which, there is little doubt, surmounted the lofty column known by the name of Pompey's Pillar, the base of which still bears the inscription, "To the most honored emperor, the saviour of Alexandria, the unconquerable Diocletian." The port of Alexandria is described by Josephus (War, iv, 10, 5), and his description is in perfect conformity with the best modern accounts. It was secure, but difficult of access, in consequence of which a magnificent pharos, or light-house, accounted one of the "seven" wonders of the world, was erected upon an islet at the entrance. From the first arrival of Ptolemy Soter in Egypt, he made Alexandria his residence; and no sooner had he some respite from war than he bent all the resources of his mind to draw to his kingdom the whole trade of the East, which the Tyrians had, up to this time, carried on by sea to Elath, and from thence, by the way of Rhinocolura, to Tyre. He built a city on the west side of the Red Sea, whence he sent out fleets to all those countries to which the Phœnicians traded from Elath; but, observing that the Red Sea, by reason of rocks and shoals, was very dangerous toward its northern extremity, he transferred the trade to another city, which he founded at the greatest practicable distance southward. This port, which was almost on the borders of Ethiopia, he called, from his mother, Berenice, but the harbor being found inconvenient, the neighboring city of Myos Hormos was preferred. Thither the products of the East and South were conveyed by sea, and were from thence taken on camels to Coptus on the Nile, where they were again shipped for Alexandria, and from that city were dispersed into all the nations of the West, in exchange for merchandise which was afterward exported to the East (Strabo, xxii, p. 805; Pliny, Hist. Nat. vi, 23). The commerce of Alexandria being so great, especially in corn—for Egypt was considered the granary of Rome—the centurion might readily "find a ship, corn-laden, sailing into Italy" (Acts xxvii, 6; xxviii, 11; see Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, ii, 308, 309). The beauty (Athen. i, p. 3) of Alexandria was proverbial. Every natural advantage contributed to its prosperity. The climate and site were sim-ularly healthful (Strab. p. 793). The harbors, formed by the island of Pharos and the headland Lochias, were safe and commodious, alike for commerce and for war; and the lake Marcotis was an inland haven for the merchandise of Egypt and India (Strab. p. 798). Under the despotism of the later Ptolemies the trade of Alexandria declined, but its population (300,000 freemen, Diod. xvii, 52, which, as Mamert suggests, should be doubled, if we include the slaves; the free population of Attica was about 130,000) and wealth (Strab. p. 798) were enormous. After the victory of Augustus it suffered for its attachment to the cause of Antony (Strab. p. 792); but its importance as one of the chief corn-ports of Rome secured for it the general favor of the first emperors. In later times the seditious tumults for which the Alexandrians had always been notorious desolated the city (A. D. 260, Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. x), and religious feuds aggravated the popular distress (Dionys. Alex. Ep. iii, xii; Euseb. H. E. vi, 41 sq.; vii, 22). Yet even thus, though Alexandria suffered greatly from constant discussions and the weakness of the Byzantine court, the splendor of "the great city of the West" amazed Amrou, its Arab conqueror (A. D. 640, Gibbon, c. li); and after centuries of Mohammedan misrule it promises once again to justify the wisdom of its founder (Strab. xvii, 791-9; Frag. ap. Josephus, Ant. xiv, 7, 2; Plut. Alex. 26; Arr. iii, 1; Josephus, War, iv, 5). Bonaparte took Alexandria in 1798, and it remained in the possession of the French till they surrendered it to the British, Sept. 2, 1801, when they were finally expelled from the country. Mohammed Ali dug a canal, called El-Mahmoudieh (a compliment to Mahmood, the father of the present sultan, Abul-el-Mejid), which opened a water communication with the Nile, entering that river at a place called Fouah, a few miles distant from the city. All about the city, but particularly to the south and east, are extensive mounds, and fragments of ancient luxury and magnificence, granite columns, marble statues, and broken pottery. The modern city of Alexandria is surrounded by a high wall, built by the Saracens between A. D. 1200-1300. Some parts of the walls of the old city still exist, and the ancient vaulted reservoirs, extending under the whole town, are almost entire. The ancient Necropolis is excavated out of the solid rock. The site of that part known to have been Rhacotis is now covered by the sea; but beneath the surface of the water are visible the remains of ancient Egyptian statues and columns.

Alexandria became not only the seat of commerce, but of learning and the liberal sciences. This distinction also it owed to Ptolemy Soter, himself a man of education, who founded an academy, or society of learned men, who devoted themselves to the study of philosophy, literature, and science. For their use he made a collection of choice books, which by degrees increased under his successors until it became the finest library in the world, and numbered 700,000 volumes (Strab. xvii, p. 791; Euseb. Chron.). It sustained repeated losses by fire and otherwise, but these losses were as repeatedly repaired; and it continued to be of great fame and use in those parts, until it was destroyed by a mob of Christians, A. D. 391, or, according to others, burnt by the Saracens, A. D. 642. See ALEXANDRIAN LIBRARY. Undoubtedly the Jews at Alexandria shared in the benefit of these institutions, as the Christians did afterward, for the city was not only a seat of heathen, but of Jewish, and subsequently of Christian learning (Am. Bib. Repos. 1834, p. 1-21, 190, 617). The Jews never had a more profoundly learned man than Philo, nor the Christians men more erudite than Origen and Clement; and if we may judge from these celebrated natives of Alexandria, who were remarkably intimate with the heathen philosophy and literature, the learning acquired in the Jewish and Christian schools of that city must have been of that broad and comprehensive character which its large and liberal institutions were fitted to produce. It will be remembered that the celebrated translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek [see SEPTUAGINT] was made, under every encouragement from Ptolemy Philadelphus, principally for the use of the Jews in Alexandria, who knew only the Greek language (see Sturz, De dialecto Mæcedonica et Alexandrina, Lips. 1808); but partly, no doubt, that the great library might possess a version of a book so remarkable, and, in some points, so closely connected with the ancient history of Egypt. The work of Josephus against Apion affords ample evidence of the attention which the Jewish Scriptures excited. According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. ii, 17), Mark first introduced the Gospel into Alexandria; and, according to less authentic accounts, he suffered martyrdom here about A. D. 68. A church dedicated to this evangelist, belonging to the Coptic (Jacobite) Christians, still exists in Alexandria (Rosenmüller, Bib. Geog. iii, 291 sq.). The Jewish and Christian schools in Alexandria were long held in the highest esteem, and there is reason to believe that the latter, besides producing many eloquent preachers, paid much attention to the multiplying of copies of the sacred writings. The famous Alexandrian manuscript (q. v.), now deposited in the British Museum, is well known. For many years Christianity continued to flourish at this seat of learning, but at length it became the source, and for some time continued the stronghold, of the Arian heresy. The divisions, discords, and animosities which were thus introduced rendered the churches of Alexandria an easy prey to the Arabian impostor, and they were swept away by his followers.

The population of Alexandria was mixed from the first (comp. Curt. iv, 8, 5), and this fact formed the groundwork of the Alexandrine character. The three regions into which the city was divided (Regio Judæorum, Bruchium, Ithacotis) corresponded to the three chief classes of its inhabitants, Jews, Greeks, Egyptians; but in addition to these principal races, representatives of almost every nation were found there (Dion Chrys. Orat. xxxii). According to Josephus, Alexander himself assigned to the Jews a place in his new city: "and they obtained," he adds, "equal privileges with the Macedonians" (Ap. ii, 4) in consideration "of their services against the Egyptians" (War. ii, 18, 7). Ptolemy I imitated the policy of Alexander, and, after the capture of Jerusalem, he removed a considerable number of its citizens to Alexandria. Many others followed of their own accord; and all received the full Macedonian franchise (Josephus, Ant. xii, 1; comp. Ap. i, 22), as men of known and tried fidelity (Josephus, Ap. ii, 4). Already on a former occasion the Jews had sought a home in the land of their bondage. More than two centuries and a half before the foundation of Alexandria a large body of them had taken refuge in Egypt after the murder of Gedaliah; but these, after a general apostasy, were carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxv, 26; Jer. xlv; Josephus, Ant. x, 9, 7). The Jews, however much their religion was disliked, were valued as citizens, and every encouragement was held out by Alexander himself and by his successors in Egypt to induce them to settle in the new city. The same privileges as those of the first class of inhabitants (the Greeks) were accorded to them, as well as the free exercise of their religion and peculiar usages; and this, with the protection and security which a powerful state afforded against the perpetual conflicts and troubles of Palestine, and with the inclination to traffic which had been acquired during the captivity, gradually drew such immense numbers of Jews to Alexandria that they eventually formed a very large portion of its vast population, and at the same time constituted a most thriving and important section of the Jewish nation (Cleopatras, in Josephus, Apion, 2; War. ii, 36; Q. Curtius, iv, 8). The Jewish inhabitants of Alexandria are therefore often mentioned in the later history of the nation, and their importance as a section of that nation would doubtless have been more frequently indicated had not the Jews of Egypt thrown off their ecclesiastical dependence upon Jerusalem and its temple, and formed a separate establishment of their own at On or Heliopolis. See ON; ONIAS.

We find (Acts ii, 10) that, among those who came up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Pentecost, there were Jews, devout men from Egypt, and the parts of Libya about Cyrene. Of this city, Apollon, the eloquent convert, was a native (Acts xviii, 24); and of the Jews that disputed with Stephen and put him to death, many were Alexandrians, who, it seems, had a synagogue at that time in Jerusalem (Acts vi, 9). Philo estimates them in his time at little less than 1,000,000 (In Flacc. § 6, p. 971); and adds that two of the five districts of Alexandria were called "Jewish districts," and that many Jews lived scattered in the remaining three (ib. § 8, p. 973). Julius Cæsar (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 10, 1) and Augustus confirmed to them the privileges which they had enjoyed before, and they retained them, with various interruptions, of which the most important, A. D. 39, is described by Philo (l. c.), during the tumults and persecutions of later reigns (Josephus, Ap. ii, 4; War. xii, 3, 2). They were represented (at least from the time of Cleopatra to the reign of Claudius, Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. p. 353) by their own officer [see ALABARCH] (Ὠβαρχης, Strab. in Josephus, Ant. xiv, 7, 2; ἀναβάρχη, ib. xviii, 7, 3; 9, 1; xix, 5, 1; comp. Rup. ad Juv. Sat. i, 130; γενάρχης, Philo, In Flacc. § 10, p. 975), and Augustus appointed a council (γερονσία, i. e. Sanhedrim; Philo, l. c.) "to superintend the affairs of the Jews," according to their own laws. The establishment of Christianity altered the civil position of the Jews, but they maintained their relative prosperity; and when Alexandria was taken by Amrou, 40,000 tributary Jews were reckoned among the marvels of the city (Gibbon, cli). They enjoyed their privileges undisturbed until the time of Ptolemy Philopator, who, being exasperated at the resistance he had met with in attempting to enter the temple at Jerusalem, wreaked his wrath upon the Jews of Alexandria on his return to Egypt. He reduced to the third or lowest class all but such as would consent to offer sacrifices to the gods he worshipped; but of the whole body only 300 were found willing to abandon their principles in order to preserve their civil advantages. The act of the general body in excluding the 300 apostates from their congregations was so represented to the king as to move his anger to the utmost, and he madly determined to exterminate all the Jews in Egypt. Accordingly, as many as could be found were brought together and shut up in the spacious hippodrome of the city, with the intention of letting loose 500 elephants upon them; but the animals refused their horrid task, and, turning wildly upon the spectators and soldiers, destroyed large numbers of them. This, even to the king, who was present, seemed so manifest an interposition of Providence in favor of the Jews, that he not only restored their privileges, but loaded them with new favors. This story, as it is omitted by Josephus and other writers, and only found in the third book of Maccabees (ii-v), is considered doubtful.

The dreadful persecution which the Jews of Alexandria underwent in A. D. 39 shows that, notwithstanding their long establishment there, no friendly relations had arisen between them and the other inhabitants, by whom, in fact, they were intensely hated. This feeling was so well known that, at the date indicated, the Roman governor, Avillius Flaccus, who was anxious to ingratiate himself with the citizens, was persuaded that the surest way of winning their affections was to withdraw his protection from the Jews, against whom the emperor was already exasperated by their refusal to acknowledge his right to divine honors, which he insanely claimed, or to admit his images into their synagogues. The Alexandrians soon found out that they would not be called to account for any proceedings they might have recourse to against the Jews. The insult and bitter mockery with which they treated Herod Agrippa, when he came to Alexandria before proceeding to take possession of the kingdom he had received from Caligula, gave the first intimation of their dispositions. Finding that the governor connived at their conduct, they proceeded to insist that the emperor's images should be introduced into the Jewish synagogues; and on resistance being offered, they destroyed most of them, and polluted the others by introducing the imperial images by force. The example thus set by the Alexandrians was followed in other cities of Egypt, which contained at this time about a million of Jews; and a vast number of oratories—of which the largest and most beautiful were called synagogues—were all either levelled with the ground, consumed by fire, or profaned by the emperor's statues (Philo, In Flacc. p. 968-1009, ed. 1640; De Leg. ix; Euseb. Chron. 27, 28). Flaccus soon after published an edict depriving the Jews of the rights of citizenship, which they had so long enjoyed, and declaring them aliens. The Jews then occupied two out of the five quarters (which took their names from the first five letters of the alphabet) into which the city was divided; and as they were in those times by no means remarkable for their submission to wrong treatment, it is likely that they made some efforts toward the maintenance of their rights, which Philo neglects to record, but which gave some pretence for the excesses which followed. At all events, the Alexandrians, regarding them as abandoned by the authorities to their mercy, openly proceeded to the most violent extremities. The Jews were forcibly driven out of all the other parts of the city, and confined to one quarter; and the houses from which they had been driven, as well as their shops and warehouses, were plundered of all their effects. Impoverished, and pent up in a narrow corner of the city, where the greater part were obliged to lie in the open air, and where the supplies of food were cut off, many of them died of hardship and hunger; and whoever was found beyond the boundary, whether he had escaped from the assigned limits or had come in from the country, was seized and put to death with horrid tortures. So likewise, when a vessel belonging to Jews arrived in port, it was boarded by the mob, pillaged, and then burnt, together with the owners. At length King Herod Agrippa, who staid long enough in Alexandria to see the beginning of these atrocities, transmitted to the emperor such a report of the real state of affairs as induced him to send a centurion to arrest Flaccus, and bring him a prisoner to Rome. This put the rioters in a false position, and brought some relief to the Jews; but the tumult still continued, and as the magistrates refused to acknowledge the citizenship of the Jews, it was at length agreed that both parties should send delegates, five on each side, to Rome, and refer the decision of the controversy to the emperor. At the head of the Jewish delegation was the celebrated Philo, to whom we owe the account of these transactions; and at the head of the Alexandrians was the noted Apion. The latter chiefly rested their case upon the fact that the Jews were the only people who refused to consecrate images to the emperor, or to swear by his name. But on this point the Jewish delegates defended themselves so well that Caligula himself said, "These men are not so wicked as ignorant and unhappy in not believing me to be a god." The ultimate result of this appeal is not known, but the Jews of Alexandria continued to be harassed during the remainder of Caligula's reign; and their alabarch, Alexander Lysimachus (brother of Philo), was thrown into prison, where he remained till he was discharged by Claudius, upon whose accession to the empire the Alexandrian Jews betook themselves to arms. This occasioned such disturbances that they attracted the attention of the emperor, who, at the joint entreaty of Herod and Agrippa, issued an edict conferring on the Jews of Egypt all their ancient privileges (Philo, In Flacc. p. 1019-1043; Josephus, Ant. xviii, 10; xix, 4). The state of feeling in Alexandria which these facts indicate was very far from being allayed when the revolt of the Jews in Palestine caused even those of the nation who dwelt in foreign parts to be regarded as enemies both by the populace and the government. In Alexandria, on a public occasion, they were attacked, and those who could not save themselves by flight were put to the sword. Only three were taken alive, and they were dragged through the city to be consigned to the flames. At this spectacle the indignation of the Jews rose beyond all bounds. They first assailed the Greek citizens with stones, and then rushed with lighted torches to the amphitheatre to set it on fire and burn all the people who were there assembled. The Roman prefect, Tiberius Alexander, finding that milder measures were of no avail, sent against them a body of 17,000 soldiers, who slew about 50,000 of them, and plundered and burned their dwellings (Josephus, War. ii, 18, 7; comp. Matt. xxiv, 6).

After the close of the war in Palestine, new disturbances were excited in Egypt by the Sicarii, many of whom had fled thither. They endeavored to persuade the Jews to acknowledge no king but God, and to throw off the Roman yoke. Such persons as opposed their designs, and tendered wiser counsels to their brethren, they secretly assassinated, according to their custom. But the principal Jews in Alexandria having in a general assembly earnestly warned the people against these fanatics, who had been the authors of all the troubles in Palestine, about 600 of them were delivered up to the Romans. Several fled into the Thebaid, but were apprehended and brought back. The most cruel tortures which could be devised had no effect in compelling them to acknowledge the emperor for their sovereign; and even their children seemed endowed with souls fearless of death and bodies incapable of pain. Vespasian, when informed of these transactions, sent orders that the Jewish temple in Egypt should be destroyed. Lupus, the prefect, however, only shut it up, after having taken out the consecrated gifts; but his successor, Paulinus, stripped it completely, and excluded the Jews entirely from it. This was in A.D. 75, being the 343d year from its erection by Onias. The Jews continued to form a principal portion of the inhabitants, and remained in the enjoyment of their civil rights till A.D. 415, when they incurred the hatred of Cyril, the patriarch, at whose instance they were expelled, to the number of 40,000, and their synagogues destroyed. However, when Amrour, in A.D. 640, took the place for the Caliph Omar, he wrote to his master in these terms: "I have taken the great city of the West, which contains 4000 palaces, 4000 baths, 400 theatres, 12,000 shops for the sale of vegetable food, and 40,000 tributary Jews." From that time the prosperity of Alexandria very rapidly declined; and when, in 969, the Fatemite caliphs seized on Egypt and built New Cairo, it sunk to the rank of a secondary Egyptian city. The discovery of the passage to the East by the Cape in 1497 almost annihilated its remaining commercial importance; and although the commercial and maritime enterprises of Mehemet Ali have again raised it to some distinction, Alexandria must still be accounted as one of those great ancient cities whose glory has departed. When Benjamin of Tudela visited the place (Itin. i, 158, ed. Asher), the number of Jews was not more than 3000, and does not now exceed 500 families of African Jews, besides about 150 families of the Italian community (Benjamin's Eight Years in Asia and Africa, Hannover, 1859, p. 250). The entire population, at present, is rapidly increasing, but the statistical statements greatly vary. Fierer's Universal Lexicon (Altenburg, 1857) gives 60,000; Chambers's Encyclopaedia (Edinburgh and New York, 1860, vol. i), 80,000; the Annuaire de Gotha for 1860, 400,000. It is now called Scandevon or El-Iskendariyeh (Mannert, x, 615 sq.; Forbiger, Handb. d. alt. Geogr. ii, 777; Ruppel, Abyssinien, i, 82; Niebuhr, Trav. i, 32 sq.; Fkett, *Erdgesch. v. ALEXANDRIA, CHURCH OF. Christianity was early introduced into Alexandria, probably by some of the Jews converted by the preaching of Peter on the day of Pentecost; but its progress was slow; for it had to struggle against all the varieties of worship and opinion known to exist, and the spirit of the Neo-Platonic philosophy, which, by forcing every creed to bear an allegorical signification, represented each as a variety of itself. See ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOLS. In consequence of the disputations to which the attempt to blend the simple truths of Christianity with the abstruse speculations of the Platonic philosophy gave rise, the Church of Alexandria was early divided into sects and parties, whose violent controversies soon engaged the attention of the whole Christian world. In Alexandria itself the rivalry between the followers of Athanasius and Arius led to deeds of atrocious violence on both sides, and inflicted a schism on the Christian community which lasted for several centuries. The final triumph of the orthodox party was followed by a manifest decay of piety, and when the Saracens introduced the religion of Islam by the sword, they found little obstinacy in the Alexandrian Christians, the greatest portion of whom became apostates. Since that time a Christian Church has only had a nominal existence in the city, where the slightest variation in a single article of faith was once deemed of sufficient importance to require the interference of a general council. Ecclesiastical historians generally attribute most of the early heresies which divided the Christian Churches, not only of Asia, but of Europe, to the influence of the Alexandrian Platonists.

Alexandria was the scene of some of the fiercest persecutions which wasted the early Church; and among the sufferers in the time of the Emperor Severus was Leonides, father of the celebrated Origen, and Potamiana, a woman not less distinguished for her chastity than her beauty, who, with her mother, Marcella, was burned to death, boiling pitch being poured over their naked bodies. These calamities induced Tertullian to compose his "Apology."

Alexandria was the source, and for some time the principal stronghold, of Arianism, as Arius was a presbyter of the Church of this city about the year 315. His doctrines were condemned by a council held here in the year 320, and afterward by a general council of three hundred and eighty fathers held at Nice, by order of Constantine, in 325. These doctrines, however, which suited the reigning taste for disputative theology and the pride and self-sufficiency of nominal Christians better than the unsophisticated simplicity of the Gospel, spread widely and rapidly notwithstanding that Arius was steadfastly opposed by the celebrated Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, the intrepid champion of the Catholic faith, who was raised to the archiepiscopal throne of Alexandria in 326.

This city was, in 415, distinguished by a fierce persecution of the Jews by the Patriarch Cyril. They who had enjoyed the rights of citizens and the freedom of religious worship for seven hundred years, ever since the foundation of the city, incurred the hatred of this ecclesiastic, who, in his zeal for the extermination of heresies of every kind, pulled down their synagogues, plundered their property, and expelled them, to the number of forty thousand, from the city.

ALEXANDRIA, PATRIARCHATE OF. 1. Alexandria was the metropolis of Egypt, which was divided after the time of Marcellinus into nine provinces: 1, Egyptus Prima; 2, Augustamnica Prima; 3, Augustamnica Secunda; 4, Egyptus Secunda; 5, Arcadia; 6, Thebais Inferior; 7, Libya Superior; 8, Thebais Superior; and 9, Libya Inferior. Libya was also called Cyrenaica. The number of bishops in these provinces was, early, very numerous. At a synod held in 321, about 100 were present. At that time the bishop of Alexandria held the second rank in the Christian Church, next to the bishop of Rome. Later, they had to yield this place to the bishop of Constantinople. See PATRIARCH. During the Arian and Monophysite controversies the patriarchate was sometimes temporarily in the hands of these sects; and the latter obtained the permanent possession of it about the middle of the 7th century. The orthodox Greek (Melchite) Church established a second patriarchate of their own; and a third, though only nominal, was created by the Roman Church (Neale, Hist. of Alex. Patriarchate, Lond. 1847).

II. In modern days the number of dioceses within this patriarchate is miserably reduced. The Jacobites (Copts), who prevail in number, had in 1680 but eleven virtual sees, viz.: 1, Neggadei; 2, Girge; 3, Abuteq; 4, Sint (to which Girge and Abuteq are united); 5, Mofallut; 6, Koskam; 7, Melave; 8, Belnese; 9, Atfish; 10, Tabla, with Aschmin; 11, Finn; 12, Bilbeis; 13, Mansoura; 14, Damietta, to which the last mentioned two are united; 15, Menuf. See CORRS.

The Melchites, or Catholics, had but four sees besides Alexandria: 1, that of Libya, or Æthiopia; 2, Memphis, or Old Cairo; 3, Pelusium, or Damietta; and, 4, Rosetta. These four sees, Mr. Neale informs us, have now virtually ceased to exist (Hist. East. Ch. ii, 474). See GREEK CHURCH.

Both the patriarchs, viz., the Melchite, or orthodox, and the Jacobite, reside at present at Cairo. The title of the Jacobite patriarch, as given by Le Quien, is "Pater N. . . ., sanctissimus archiepiscopus magnæ urbis Alexandriae Babylonis et Nomorum, Ægypti, Thebaidis," etc. Wiltsch, Geogr. and Stat. of the Church (Lond. 1860).

ALEXANDRIA, COUNCILS OF. The following councils were held at Alexandria: 1, A.D. 231, in which Origen was deposed from the priesthood; 2, A.D. 235, against Ammonius; 3, A.D. 258, against Novatus; 4, A.D. 263, against Neptianus and Cerinthus (Fabric. ii, 292); 5, A.D. 305, 306, or 308, against Meletius, bishop of Lycopolis, in Egypt; 6, A.D. 315, against Arius, St. Alexander presiding; 7, A.D. 319 or 320, against Arius and the Meletians and Sabellians—Hosius of Cordova was present; 8, A.D. 321, against Arius; 9, A.D. 326, in which St. Athanasius was elected patriarch; 10, A.D. 340, in favor of St. Athanasius; 11, A.D. 362, in which the divinity of the Holy Spirit, the Incarnation, the term Hypostasis, and other matters, were treated of; 12, A.D. 363, in which St. Athanasius drew up a confession of faith, which was presented to the Emperor Jovianus; 13, A.D. 389, in which the Origenists were condemned; 14, A.D. 430, in which St. Cyril condemned Nestorius; 15, A.D. 451, against the Eutychians; 16, A.D. 578, by Damianus, the Eutychian patriarch, against Peter of Antioch; 17, A.D. 633, under Cyrus the Monothelite, in which the Monothelite errors were adroitly defended. For a good summary of the doings of these councils, see Landon, Manual of Councils, p. 17 sq.

Alexan'drian (Ἀλεξανδρείη), an inhabitant of Alexandria in Egypt, spec. a Jew living there (Acts vi, 9; xviii, 24). Alexandria was much frequented by Jews, so that 10,000 of them are said to have been numbered among its inhabitants (Philo, In Flacc. p. 971; Josephus, Ant. xix, 5, 2). See ALEXANDRIA. It appears from Acts vi, 9, that they were accustomed to attend the festivals at Jerusalem, and that they even had a synagogue there for their special use (Kuinöl, Hackett, in loc.). See SYNAGOGUE.

ALEXANDRIAN CHRONICLE, the name given to a MS. found in Sicily by Jerome Surita, and carried to Rome, and preserved by Antonio Augustine, auditor of the Rota. Charles Sigonius and Onuphrius Panvinus made considerable use of it in the composition of their Consular Fasti, and published it in Greek and Latin. The name "Sicilian Fasti" was given to these annals because of their having been found in that island. It is not so easy to assign a reason for the name of "the Chronicle of Alexandria," except that the name of Peter of Alexandria is at the head of the Augsburg MS. found in the library of Augsburg by Casaubon. Matthæus Raderus, a Jesuit, published the first complete edition of this chronicle at Munich, in 1615, in Greek and Latin. Dufresne, who published an improved edition (Gr. and Lat. with notes, Paris, 1688), gives it the name of the Paschal Chronicle, because it treats of the time of celebrating Easter. Cave and Ussher attribute it to George Pisides, A.D. 640; Casimir Oudin to George of Alexandria, A.D. 620. This chronicle begins at the creation, and is carried up to the tenth year of the consulate of the Emperor Heraclius, or A.D. 628. It seems to have been written by two authors, of whom one carried the work on to the year of Christ 354, and the other completed it. It is compiled without any great judgment or research, but the writer evidently had access to many ancient monuments, which are now lost.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 640.

ALEXANDRIAN LIBRARY. This remarkable collection of books, the largest of the ancient world, was founded by Ptolemy Soter, in the city of Alexandria, in Egypt. Even in the time of its first manager, Demetrius Phalereus, a banished Athenian, the number of volumes or rolls already amounted to 50,000; and during its most flourishing period, under the direction of Zenodotus, Aristarchus of Byzantium, Apollonius Rhodius, and others, is said to have contained 400,000, or, according to another authority, 700,000. The greater part of this library, which embraced the collected literature of Rome, Greece, India, and Egypt, was contained in the Museum, in the quarter of Alexandria called Bruchetium. During the siege of Alexandria by Julius Cæsar this part of the library was destroyed by fire; but it was afterward replaced by the collection of Pergamos, which was presented to Queen Cleopatra by Mark Antony, to the great annoyance of the educated Romans. The other part of the library was kept in the Serapeion, the temple of Jupiter Serapis, where it remained till the time of Theodosius the Great. When the emperor permitted all the heathen temples in the Roman empire to be destroyed, the magnificent temple of Jupiter Serapis was not spared. A mob of fanatic Christians, led on by the Archbishop Theophilus, stormed and destroyed the temple, together, it is most likely, with the greater part of its literary treasures, in A. D. 391. It was at this time that the destruction of the library was begun, and not at the taking of Alexandria by the Arabians, under the Caliph Omir in A. D. 612. The story, at least, is ridiculously exaggerated which relates that the Arabs found a sufficient number of books remaining to heat the baths of the city for six months. The historian Orosius, who visited the place after the destruction of the temple by the Christians, relates that he then saw only the empty shelves of the library (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. 51). See Petit-Radel, Recherches sur les Bibliothèques Anciennes et Modernes (Paris, 1819); and Ritschl, Die Alexandrinische Bibliothek (Berlin, 1838). COMP. ALEXANDRIA.

ALEXANDRIAN MANUSCRIPT (CODEX ALEXANDRINUS, so called from its supposed origin at Alexandria), one of the three or four most famous copies of the Holy Scriptures, and designated as A of the N. T. It contains the whole Bible in Greek, including the Septuagint version of the O. T., with the first (or genuine) Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, and part of his second (or apocryphal). It is defective, however, in several passages of the N. T. (Matt. i, 1-xxv, 6; John vi, 50-viii, 52; 2 Cor. iv, 13-xii, 6), and in part of the Psalms, where the leaves are totally missing. Letters here and there have also been cut away in binding; and in a considerable part of the N. T. one of the upper corners of the leaves is gone. The N. T. books are found in the order in which they are arranged in the other ancient MSS.: the Catholic Epistles follow the Acts; then come the Pauline Epistles, but with that to the Hebrews before the Pastoral Epistles; the Apocalypse, so rare in extant ancient codices, stands as usual at the close of the N. T.; and in this copy it has been preserved from the injury which has befallen both ends of the volume by reason of the Epistles of Clement having been added. The MS., which is on thin vellum and in semi-folio form, is now bound in four volumes, the first three of which contain the O. T. The pages are about thirteen inches long and ten broad; the writing on each is divided into two columns of fifty lines each, having about twenty letters or upward in a line. These letters are continuously written in uncial characters, without any space between the words, the uncial being of an elegant yet simple form, in a firm and uniform hand, though in some places larger than in others. The punctuation merely consists of a point placed at the end of the sentence, usually on a level with the top of the preceding letter, but not always, and a vacant space follows the point at the end of the paragraph, the space being proportioned to the break in the sense. Capital letters of various sizes abound at the beginning of books and sections, not painted as in later copies, but written by the original scribe in common ink. Vermilion is freely used in the initial lines of books. Accents and breathings are found in the beginning of Genesis only. At the end of each book are neat and unique ornaments in the ink of the first hand. Contractions occur as in other very ancient MSS. It has the Ammonian divisions of the Gospels, with references to the canons of Eusebius; the headings of the large sections are placed at the top of the page, the places where they begin being indicated in the text, and in Luke and John the numbers being set in the margin of the column. The subdivisions of the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse, by Euthalius and others, are not indicated; a cross occasionally appears as a separation of the chapters of the Acts—a large initial denoting a paragraph throughout (Davidson, Bib. Crit. ii, 271 sq.).

This MS. is now in the manuscript-room of the British Museum, where it was placed on the formation of that library in 1753. It previously belonged to the king's private collection, having been presented to Charles I through Sir Thomas Roe, English ambassador to Turkey, by Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople. An Arabic inscription, several centuries old, at the back of the table of contents, on the first leaf of the MS., states that it was written by the hand of Thecla the martyr, and given to the Patriarchal Chamber in the year of the Specimens of the Codex Alexandrinus. The first is in bright red, with breathings and accents, and contains Gen. i, 1, 2, Sept. (Εν αρχή ἐποίησεν ὁ θεὸς τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ τὴν γῆν ἢ δὲ γῆ ἦν ἀορατὸς καὶ ἀκατάκεκαστος· καὶ σκότος ἐπλήρωτο τῆς ἀβύσσου.). The second specimen is in common ink, and contains Act. xx, 25 (Προσεχετε εαυτοῖς καὶ παντὶ τῷ ποιμῶν· εἰ μὴ οὗ το πῶτα το ἁγιον εθετο εἰσακοπισθῶ· ποιμαίνει τὴν ἐκκλησίαν | του κυ ην περιποιησῆτο οια | του αιματος του λαου).

Martyrs 814 (A.D. 1008). Another, and apparently an earlier inscription, in Moorish Arabic, declares that the book was dedicated to the Patriarchal Chamber at Alexandria. But upon neither of these notices can much reliance be placed. That the codex was brought from Alexandria by Cyril (who had previously been patriarch of that see), need not, however, be doubted, though Wetstein, on the dubious authority of Matthew Mutis of Cyprus, Cyril's deacon, concluded that it came from Mt. Athos. It is now very generally assigned to the beginning or middle of the fifth century. The reasons for this are in part the general style of the characters, especially the shape of certain distinctive letters (e. g. α , $\bar{\epsilon}$, $\bar{\epsilon}$, π , σ , ϕ , and ω), the presence of the Eusebian canons (A. D. 268-340?), and of the Epistle of Marcellinus by Athanasius before the Psalms (303?-373), which place a limit in one direction; while the absence of the Euthalian divisions of the Acts and Epistles, and the shortness of the subscriptions appear tolerably decisive against a later date than A. D. 450. The insertion of Clement's Epistles points likewise to a period when the canon was yet unsettled. These were added as parts of the specified number of the N. T. books; while the apocryphal Psalms bearing the name of Solomon, which the MS. appears to have once contained, were separated in the list, as something wholly different in point of authority. The latter were prohibited by the Council of Laodicea, soon after the middle of the fourth century, from being read in the churches; and to this prohibition the MS. is conformed, although it treats the epistles of Clement so differently. Wetstein's and Woide's objections to this date (such as the use of $\theta\epsilon\omicron\sigma\iota\kappa\omicron\varsigma$ as a title of the Virgin in her song added to the Psalms) are anachronous. Woide believes that a different hand was employed upon it from 1 Cor. v. onward, but this is not clear. The original copyist was not very careful, and the later corrector was by no means accurate. Yet of all the uncials, this holds a rank as one of the first value. It contains indeed the itacisms (interchange of ϵ and η , and ι , ϵ , and α) common to that period, and certain orthographical peculiarities (e. g. $\chi\eta\rho\alpha\mu\omicron\iota\alpha$, $\epsilon\lambda\upsilon\theta\alpha\mu\epsilon\iota$, etc.) frequent in the Egyptian MSS. The reference to St. Thecla as its writer is plausibly explained by Tregelles, who remarks that, inasmuch as the text (Matt. xxv. 6) where this MS. now begins was the lesson in the Greek Church for her festival, the Egyptian scribe may have hastily concluded that she wrote it (Scrivener, Introduct. to N. T. p. 82).

The N. T. portion of this Codex was published by Woide, from fac-simile letters cast expressly for the purpose, under the title "Nov. Test. Græc. e Cod. Alexandr." (Lond. 1786, fol.); revised by Cowper (Lond. 1800). The O. T. part was printed from the same characters by Baber (4 vols. fol. Lond. 1816-28). On its critical value, see Semler, De ant. Cod. Alexandr. (Hal. 1759); Woide, Notitia Cod. Alexandr. curavit Spohn (Lips. 1788). Comp. Michaelis, *Orient. ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOLS, a term usually applied to the various systems of philosophy and religious belief that had characterized or originated among the citizens of Alexandria at different periods in its history. See ALEXANDRIA.

I. Pagan.—When Alexander the Great built the city of Alexandria, with a determination to make it the seat of his empire, he also opened a new mart of philosophy, which emulated the fame of Athens itself. A general indulgence was granted to Egyptians, Gre-cians, Jews, or others, to profess their respective systems of philosophy without molestation. The consequence was that Egypt was soon filled with religious and philosophical sectaries of every kind, and particularly that almost every Grecian sect found an advocate and professor in Alexandria. The family of the Ptolemies, who, after Alexander, obtained the government of Egypt, from motives of policy encouraged this new establishment. Ptolemy Lagus, who had obtained the crown of Egypt by usurpation, was particularly careful to secure the interest of the Greeks in his favor, and with this view invited people from every part of Greece to settle in Egypt, and removed the schools of Athens to Alexandria. Under the patronage, first of the Egyptian princes and afterward of the Roman emperors, Alexandria long continued to enjoy great celebrity as the seat of learning, and to send forth eminent philosophers of every sect to distant countries. Philosophy during this period suffered a grievous corruption from the attempt which was made by philosophers of different sects and countries, Grecian, Egyptian, and Oriental, to frame from their different tenets one general system of opinions. The respect which had long been universally paid to the schools of Greece, and the honors with which they were now adorned by the Egyptian princes, induced other wise men, and even the Egyptian priests and philosophers themselves, to submit to this innovation. See PHILOSOPHY.

Naturally enough, therefore, the philosophy which seems to have obtained most at Alexandria was an eclectic teaching, aiming at bringing together the best features of every school, and combining them into one harmonious aggregate. Antiochus is the best representative of that movement: the fundamental idea of his metaphysics consists in asserting that the writings of Plato, connected with those of Orpheus and of Pythagoras, form a code of doctrine, a species of revelation, given by heaven, and superior to all the attempts of human speculation. The eclecticism taught by Antiochus was exclusively confined to the doctrines of the Greek school. The celebrated Philo (q. v.), who flourished from A. D. 40 to 60, borrowing from the works of Plato a great number of ideas and views, endeavored to amalgamate them with the truth contained in the Old Testament, the traditions of the Cabala, and the Essenian philosophy. Philo may be said to have spiritualized Judaism by the means of Platonism; and in turning the mind of his countrymen away from mere verbal criticism, and from the minutiae of legal observances, he prepared them, to some degree, for the reception of the Gospel. But the philosopher whose name is chiefly connected with the history of Alexandria is Ammonius Saccas (q. v.), surnamed $\theta\epsilon\omicron\iota\tau\iota\kappa\omicron\varsigma$, on account of the beauty of his teaching, who was a mystic theosophist, but a theosophist who blended his views with polytheism, and engrafted them there, not on Christianity. Seeing how fast the old convictions were vanishing away before ideas, feelings, and hopes of a totally different origin, he endeavored to renovate philosophy by showing that on the most important points Plato and Aristotle agree. This was the ruling axiom of his theories, which he completed in systematizing the Greek demonology by the help of elements derived from Egyptian and Eastern sources. As soon as the Christian religion became the creed of the state, the pagan school of Alexandria fell to the ground. It had to maintain, single-handed, a desperate struggle against the united forces of Gnostic philosophers and of the new religion, which, after having originated in an obscure corner of the Roman empire, was advancing with rapid strides to the conquest of society. The best accounts of the literary history of Alexandria, its pagan schools, libraries, philosophy, etc., may be found in M. Matter's Histoire de l'école d'Alexandrie (Paris, 2d ed. 3 vols. 8vo) and in Simon's Histoire de l'école d'Alexandrie (Paris, 1845, 2 vols. 8vo). A rapid and vigorous, but not very trustworthy sketch is given in Kingsley's Alexandria and her Schools (Cambridge, 1854, 12mo).

II. Jewish.—For some time the Jewish Church in Alexandria was in close dependence on that of Jerusalem. Both were subject to the civil power of the first Ptolemies, and both acknowledged the high-priest as their religious head. The persecution of Ptolemy Philopator (B.C. 217) occasioned the first political separation between the two bodies. From that time the Jews of Palestine attached themselves to the fortunes of Syria [see ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT]; and the same policy which alienated the Palestinian party gave unity and decision to the Jews of Alexandria. The Septuagint translation, which strengthened the barrier of language between Palestine and Egypt, and the temple of Leontopolis (B.C. 161), which subjected the Egyptian Jews to the charge of schism, widened the breach which was thus opened. But the division, though marked, was not complete. At the beginning of the Christian era the Egyptian Jews still paid the contributions to the temple-service (Raphall, Hist. of Jews, ii, 72). Jerusalem, though its name was fashioned to a Greek shape, was still the Holy City, the metropolis, not of a country but of a people (Ἱερόπολις, Philo, In Flacc. § 7; Leg. ad Civ. § 36), and the Alexandrians had a synagogue there (Acts vi, 9). The internal administration of the Alexandrine Church was independent of the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem; but respect survived submission.

There were, however, other causes which tended to produce at Alexandria a distinct form of the Jewish character and faith. The religion and philosophy of that restless city produced an effect upon the people more powerful than the influence of politics or commerce. Alexander himself symbolized the spirit with which he wished to animate his new capital by founding a temple of Isis side by side with the temples of the Grecian gods (Arr. iii, 1). The creeds of the East and West were to coexist in friendly union; and in after-times the mixed worship of Serapis (comp. Gibbon, c. xxviii; Smith, Dict. of Class. Geogr. i, 98) was characteristic of the Greek kingdom of Egypt (August. D. Civ. Dei, xviii, 5; S. marinus .Egyptiorum Dus). This catholicity of worship was further combined with the spread of universal learning. The same monarchs who favored the worship of Serapis (Clem. Al. Protr. iv, § 48) founded and embellished the museum and library; and part of the library was deposited in the Serapeum. The new faith and the new literature led to a common issue, and the Egyptian Jews necessarily imbibed the spirit which prevailed around them.

The Jews were, indeed, peculiarly susceptible of the influences to which they were exposed. They presented from the first a capacity for Eastern or Western development. To the faith and conservatism of the Oriental they united the activity and energy of the Greek. The mere presence of Hellenic culture could not fail to call into play their powers of speculation, which were hardly repressed by the traditional legalism of Palestine (comp. Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. p. 293 sq.); and the unchanging element of divine revelation, which they always retained, enabled them to harmonize new thought with old belief. But while the intercourse of the Jew and Greek would have produced the same general consequences in any case, Alexandria was peculiarly adapted to ensure their full effect. The result of the contact of Judaism with the many creeds which were current there must have been speedy and powerful. The earliest Greek fragment of Jewish writing which has been preserved (about 160 B.C.) [see ARISTOBOLUS] contains large Orphic quotations, which had been already moulded into a Jewish form (comp. Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. p. 370); and the attempt thus made to connect the most ancient Hellenic traditions with the law was often repeated afterward. Nor was this done in the spirit of bold forgery. Or-phus, Musæus, and the Sibyls appeared to stand in some remote period anterior to the corruptions of polytheism, as the witnesses of a primeval revelation and of the teaching of nature, and thus it seemed excusable to attribute to them a knowledge of the Musæic doctrines. The third book of the Sibyllines (cir. B.C. 150) is the most valuable relic of this pseudo-Hellenic literature, and shows how far the conception of Judaism was enlarged to meet the wider views of the religious condition of heathendom which was opened by a more intimate knowledge of Greek thought; though the later Apocalypse of Ezra [see ESDRAS, 4] exhibits a marked reaction toward the extreme exclusiveness of former times.

But the indirect influence of Greek literature and philosophy produced still greater effects upon the Alexandrine Jews than the open conflict and combination of religious dogmas. The literary school of Alexandria was essentially critical and not creative. For the first time men labored to collect, revise, and classify all the records of the past. Poets trusted to their learning rather than to their imagination. Language became a study; and the legends of early mythology were transformed into philosophic mysteries. The Jews took a vigorous share in these new studies. The caution against writing, which became a settled law in Palestine, found no favor in Egypt. Numerous authors adapted the history of the Patriarchs, of Moses, and of the Kings to classical models (Euseb. Præp. Ev. ix, 17-39. Eupolemus, Artapanus [?], Demetrius, Aristaus, Cleodemus or Malchas, "a prophet"). A poem which bears the name of Phocylides gives in verse various precepts of Leviticus (Daniel, sec. LXX, Apolog. p. 512 sq. Rome, 1772); and several large fragments of a "tragedy" in which Ezekiel (cir. B.C. 110) dramatized the Exodus have been preserved by Eusebius (l. c.), who also quotes numerous passages in heroic verse from the elder Philo and Theodotus. This classicism of style was a symptom and a cause of classicism of thought. The same Aristobolus who gave currency to the Judeo-Orphic verses endeavored to show that the Pentateuch was the real source of Greek philosophy (Euseb. Præp. Ev. xiii, 12; Clem. Al. Strom. vi, 98).

The proposition thus enunciated was thoroughly congenial to the Alexandrine character; and henceforth it was the chief object of Jewish speculation to trace out the subtle analogies which were supposed to exist between the writings of Moses and the teaching of the schools. The circumstances under which the philosophical studies first gained a footing at Alexandria favored the attempt. For some time the practical sciences reigned supreme, and the issue of these was scepticism (Matter, Hist. de l'École d'Alex. iii, 162 sq.). Then at length the clear analysis and practical morality of the Peripatetics found ready followers, and, in the strength of the reaction, men eagerly trusted to those splendid ventures with which Plato taught them to be content till they could gain a surer knowledge (Phæd. p. 86). To the Jew this surer knowledge seemed to be already given, and the belief in the existence of a spiritual meaning underlying the letter of Scripture was the great principle on which all his investigations rested. The facts were supposed to be essentially symbolic; the language the veil (or sometimes the mask) which partly disguised from common sight the truths which it wrapped. In this way a twofold object was gained. It became possible to withdraw the Supreme Being (τὸ ὄν, ὁ ὄν) from immediate contact with the material world, and to apply the narratives of the Bible to the phenomena of the soul. It is impossible to determine the process by which these results were embodied; but, as in parallel cases, they seem to have been shaped gradually in the minds of the mass, and not fashioned at once by one great teacher. Even in the Sept. there are traces of an endeavor to interpret the anthropomorphic imagery of the Hebrew text [see SEPTUAGINT], and there can be no doubt that the Commentaries of Aristobulus gave some form and consistency to the allegoric system. In the time of Philo (B.C. 20—A.D. 50) the theological and interpretative systems were evidently fixed even in many of their details, and he appears in both cases only to have collected and expressed the popular opinions of his countrymen. See PHILO.

In each of these great forms of speculation—the theological and the exegetical—Alexandrianism has an important bearing upon the apostolic writings. But the doctrines which are characteristic of the Alexandrian school were by no means peculiar to it. The same causes which led to the formation of wider views of Judaism in Egypt, acting under greater restraint, produced corresponding results in Palestine. A doctrine of the Word (Logos), and a system of mystical interpretation grew up within the rabbinic schools, which bear a closer analogy to the language of the Apostle John and to the "allegories" of Paul than the speculations of Philo. See LOGOS.

The speculative doctrines which thus worked for the general reception of Christian doctrine were also embodied in a form of society which was afterward transferred to the Christian Church. Numerous bodies of ascetics (Therapeutæ), especially on the borders of Lake Mareotis, devoted themselves to a life of ceaseless discipline and study. See THERAPEUTÆ. Unlike the Essenes, who present the corresponding phase in Palestinian life, they abjured society and labor, and often forgot, as it is said, the simplest wants of nature in the contemplation of the hidden wisdom of the Scriptures (Philo, De Vit. Contempl. throughout). The description which Philo gives of their occupation and character seemed to Eusebius to present so clear an image of Christian virtues that he claimed them as Christians; and there can be no doubt that some of the forms of monasticism were shaped upon the model of the Therapeutæ (Euseb. H. E. ii, 16).

At the beginning of the second century the number of Christians at Alexandria must have been very large, and the great leaders of Gnosticism (q. v.) who arose there (Basilides, Valentinus) exhibit an exaggeration of the tendency of the Church. But the later forms of Alexandrine speculation, the strange varieties of Gnosticism, the progress of the catechetical school, the development of Neoplatonism, the various phases of the Arian controversy, belong to the history of the Church and to the history of philosophy. To the last Alexandria fulfilled its mission; and we still owe much to the spirit of its great teachers, which in later ages struggled, not without success, against the sterner systems of the West.—Smith, Diet. of Bible, i, 46.

III. Christian.—The Christian school of Alexandria at first aimed only at the instruction of converts from heathenism, and the instruction was catechetical. It was afterward developed into a theological seminary. Jerome dates its origin from the time of St. Mark, but there is no authority for his statement. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. v, 10) states that it had existed from "ancient times;" but the first definite account dates from about 181, when Pantenus, a philosopher who had abandoned first Stoicism and then Platonism, and had been a Christian missionary in India, commenced lecturing in Alexandria (Euseb. loc. cit.). Whether Athenagoras, a philosopher who embraced Christianity about the middle of the 2d century, and who is called by Philip of Sida (see Dolwell, Dissert. in Irén. Oran. 1680, p. 488, 497) a predecessor of Pantenus, was ever at Alexandria, is extremely doubtful. The testimony of Philip of Sida is not very trustworthy, and the silence of Eusebius, and Athenagoras's way of teaching, which is by no means Alexandrine, speak against it. About A.D. 190 Clement became assistant to Pantenus, and, about 203, head of the school. Origen became connected with the school as teacher when only a youth of 18 years, and he labored then, with some brief interruptions, until 232, when he was expelled from Alexandria. In the later years of his stay at Alexandria he was assisted by his disciple and successor Heraclas, who subsequently became bishop of Alexandria. Heraclas was succeeded by Dionysius, also a disciple of Origen, and later, likewise a bishop of Alexandria. The celebrity of the Alexandrian school continued for some time after the death of Dionysius, notwithstanding the rival institution which arose at Cæsarea Palestinae, and which was for some time conducted by Origen. It did not cease until the close of the fourth century.

Of the history of the school after the death of Dionysius we are, however, but imperfectly informed. Eusebius (H. E. vii, 32) names among the successors of Dionysius only Achilles, whose name is wholly omitted by Philip of Sida, and who, at all events, was less prominent than Pierius, who is mentioned by Philip and by Photius (Cod. 118). The names of Theognostus and Serapion are given as principals of the school only by Philip. It is possible, as Philip states, that about the close of the third century the Alexandrian bishop and martyr, Peter (Euseb. H. E. vii, 32), gave catechetical instruction, and later, about the middle of the fourth century, an Alexandrian monk, Macarius. Arius, the originator of Arianism, seems to have likewise been for some time principal of the school. The name of the learned and pious Didymus is mentioned as an Alexandrian catechist not only by Philip, but by Sozomen (H. E. iii, 15) and Rufin (H. E. ii, 7), and there is reason to believe that he presided over the school during the long period from 340 to 395. His assistant in later years, and his successor as catechist, was Rhodon, the teacher of Philip of Sida, and his withdrawal from Alexandria to Sida about 395 led, according to the testimony of Philip, to the close of the Alexandrian school. It is more probable that other causes had a greater share in bringing about this event. The controversies concerning Origen, and later, concerning Nestorianism and Monophysitism, in which the Alexandrian spirit degenerated and became extinct; the complete victory of Christianity, which diminished the number of adult converts and lessened the need of catechetical instruction for adults, and the prosperous development of Christian science, gradually undermined the prominent position of the Alexandrian school in the Church. It again became what it had been at the beginning, a school in which children received catechetical instruction.

In the best days of the school the number of students was very great, but it seems never to have had buildings or endowments. The head master chose his own assistants; the teachers were paid only by presents from the scholars; and the students lodged where they could. The manner of teaching was as in the schools of the ancient philosophers, accommodated in many cases to the needs of individuals, and frequently it was catechetical. Whoever wished it received instruction in philosophy also. In general the instruction was related to the Christian Gnosis, as milk to more substantial food. It did not depart from the plainness of faith; and the speculative doctrines of the essence of God, the origin of the world, the relation of reason to revelation, were excluded (Strom. v, 685). Probably what is contained in the Chortatio of Clement constituted the contents of his introductory catechetical lectures; and it was followed by instructions in a pious, moral life, as we find them in the Pædagogus, and by a discussion of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. To impart a more profound "gnostic" insight into Christianity, he reserved for private conversations. The following chronological list of the catechists is given in Guericke, De Schola Alexandrina (Halle, 1824-25, 2 pts.):

Schaff gives the following brief but clear account of the influence of the Alexandrian school on theology: "From this school proceeded a peculiar theology, the most learned and genial representatives of which were Clement and Origen. This theology is, on the one hand, a regenerated Christian form of the Alexandrian Jewish religious philosophy of Philo; on the other, a Catholic counterpart and a positive refutation of the heretical Gnosis, which reached its height also in Alexandria but half a century earlier. The Alexandrian theology aims at a reconciliation of Christianity with philosophy, or, subjectively speaking, of pistis with the gnosis; but it seeks this union upon the basis of the Bible and the doctrine of the Church. Its center, therefore, is the Logos, viewed as the sum of all reason and all truth, before and after the incarnation. Clement came from the Hellenic philosophy to the Christian faith; Origen, conversely, was led by faith to speculation. The former was an aphoristic thinker, the latter a systematic. The one borrowed ideas from various systems; the other followed more the track of Platonism. But both are Christian philosophers and churchly gnostics. As Philo, long before them, in the same city, had combined Judaism with Grecian culture, so now they carried Grecian culture into Christianity. This, indeed, the apologists and controversialists of the second century had already done as far back as Justin the 'philosopher.' But the Alexandrians were more learned and liberal-minded, and made much freer use of the Greek philosophy. They saw in it, not sheer error, but in one view a gift of God, and a theoretical schoolmaster for Christ, like the law in the practical sphere. Clement compares it to a wild olive-tree, which can be ennobled by faith; Origen (in the fragments of an epistle to Gregory Thaumaturgus) to the jewels which the Israelites took with them out of Egypt, and turned into ornaments for their sanctuary, though they also wrought them into the golden calf. It is not necessarily an enemy to the truth, but may, and should be its handmaid, and at least neutralize the attacks against it. The elements of truth in the heathen philosophy they attributed partly to the secret operation of the Logos in the world of reason, partly to acquaintance with the Jewish philosophy, the writings of Moses and the prophets. So with the Gnostic heresy. The Alexandrians did not successively condemn it, but recognized the desire for deeper religious knowledge which lay at its root, and sought to meet this desire with a wholesome supply from the Bible itself. To the γνώσις ψευδώνυμος they opposed a γνώσις ἀληθινή. Their maxim was, in the words of Clement, 'No faith without knowledge, no knowledge without faith;' or, 'Unless you believe, you will not understand' (Isa. vii. 9, in the Sept. ὅταν μὴ πιστεύσητε, οὐκ ἔτι συνήτε). Faith and knowledge have the same substance, the saving truth of God, revealed in the Holy Scriptures, and faithfully handed down by the Church; they differ only in form. Knowledge is our consciousness of the deeper ground and consistency of faith. The Christian knowledge, however, is also a gift of grace, and has its condition in a holy life. The ideal of a Christian gnostic includes the perfect love as well as the perfect knowledge of God. Clement describes him as one 'who, growing gray in the study of the Scriptures, and preserving gray in the orthodoxy of the apostles and the Church, lives strictly according to the Gospel.' The Alexandrian theology is intellectual, profound, stirring, and full of fruitful germs of thought, but rather unduly idealistic and spiritualistic, and, in exegesis, loses itself in arbitrary allegorical fancies. In its efforts to reconcile revelation and philosophy, it took up, like Philo, many foreign elements, especially of the Platonic and Gnostic stamp, and wandered into views which a later and more orthodox, but more narrow-minded and less productive age, condemned as heresies, not appreciating the immortal service of this school to its own and after times" (History of the Christian Church, § 126).

ALEXANDRIAN VERSION, another name for the SEPTUAGINT (q. v.).

Alexandrium (Ἀλεξάνδρειον), a place frequently referred to by Josephus as having been originally built by Alexander (hence, doubtless, the name), apparently Jannaens (Ant. xiii, 16, 3), on a hill near Coereæ (q. v.), toward Jericho (Ant. xiv, 3, 4); fortified by Alexander the son of Aristobulus (Ant. xiv, 5, 2; War. i, 8, 2), and demolished by Galinius (Ant. xiv, 5, 4; War. i, 8, 5), but again restored by Herod (Ant. xiv, 15, 4). It was the burial-place of the founder's family, and here accordingly the bodies of Herod's sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, were removed by night for interment (Ant. xvi, 11, 7; War. i, 17, 6). It has been identified by Schultz (Ritter, Erdk. xv, 452-454) as the modern villa ze Kejr Istum, about four miles S.E. of Shiloh, containing the ruins of an ancient castle built with very large stones (Van de Velde, Mém., p. 284).

Alexandroschênè (for Ἀλεξάνδρον σκήνη, Alexander's tent), a place mentioned in the Jerusalem Itinerary as 12 R. miles from Tyre, and the same distance from Edippa; evidently the ruin now called Iskanderma, at the southern foot of Ras el-Abiad on the Mediterranean.

Alexas (Ἀλεξᾶς, contracted from Alexander, q.

v.), a favorite of Herod the Great, and by his influence the husband of Salome (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 1, 1; War, i, 28, 6), by whom he had a son, also named Alexas, and married to Cypros, a daughter of Antipater (Ant. xviii, 5, 3). See HERODIAN FAMILY.

Alexians, or "Brethren and Sisters of St. Alexius," so called from their patron saint. Alexius, said to have been a Roman senator of the fifth century, who gave up the world for a life of poverty and celibacy. They were also called CELLITES, and a fuller account of them will be found under that title.

Alexius. See ALEXIANS.

Alfred THE GREAT, king of England, was born in 849, his parents being Ethelwulf, king of the West Saxons, and Asburga, his first wife. He mounted the throne in 871, and during the thirty years in which he held the reins of government he experienced the greatest vicissitudes of fortune. As king, he was a great benefactor of the Church; he built many monasteries and churches, and founded the University of Oxford, which has been, under God, through all ages, the main support of the true faith in that kingdom. He died in November, A. D. 900, being then fifty-one years old. Besides drawing learned men to his court, Alfred himself was devoted to letters. He translated Boethius, De Consolatione (published by Cordale, London, 1829, 8vo). Several other works are attributed to Alfred; among them, 1. A Saxon Paraphrase of the History of Bede, given in the Cambridge edition of Bede's History (1722, fol.);—2. Various Laws relating to the Church, contained in the same work (Appendix);—3. A Saxon Translation of the Liber Pastoralis of St. Gregory (in MS. at Cambridge);—4. The Psalter of David, partly translated into Saxon (printed at London, with the Latin text, in 1640, 4to);—5. Anglo-Saxon Translation of Orosius (given at the end of Pauli's "Life of Alfred," in Bohn's Library). He is also said to have translated the Four Dialogues of St. Gregory, which are lost.—Powell, Life of Alfred the Great (Lond. 1634, 12mo); Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 871; Weisz, Geschichte Alfred's (Schaffhausen, 1852, 8vo); Pauli, Life of Alfred (Berl. 1851), trans. by Thorp (Lond. 1853, 12mo).

Algeria, a country of Northern Africa, which forms now (since 1830) a French possession. Its area is about 150,000 square miles; population, in 1858, 3,250,000, most of whom are Mohammedans. The European population has rapidly increased since 1830. In 1832 it was only 5919 souls; in 1856, 155,607, among whom were 86,969 French, and 42,569 Spaniards. Among the Europeans were, in 1857, about 10,000 Protestants, with eleven clergymen. The rest are mostly Roman Catholics, who have one bishopric at Algiers. There are several convents, among which a large agricultural and educational institution of the Trappists is celebrated. There were, in 1855, 178 boys' and 119 girls' schools, with 10,672 boys and 8986 girls. Four towns had Arabic-French schools, with 400 scholars. An Association of St. Louis was formed in 1859 for the civilization of the Mohammedans, and had commenced the publication of an Arabic paper, Biogys Barys (the Eagle of Paris).—Schem's Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859; Behaghel, L'Algérie (Par. 1865). Al'gum, a transposed form (2 Chron. ii, 8; ix, 10, 11) of the Heb. term ALMUG (q. v.).

Ali'ah, a less correct form (1 Chron. i, 51) of the name ALVAH (q. v.).

Ali'an, a less correct form (1 Chron. i, 40) of the name ALVAN (q. v.).

Alien (אֲרָם, ger, also אֲרָם, nekar', or אֲרָם, nokri', both meaning stranger, as often rendered; ἀλλότριος), a foreigner, or person born in another country, and not having the usual rights and privileges of the citizens of the country in which he lives. Among the Hebrews there were two classes of persons denominated thus: 1. The proper aliens (אֲרָם), those who were strangers generally, and who possessed no landed property, though they might have purchased houses; 2. Those less properly so called (אֲרָם תְּשׁוּבִים, toshabim', sojourners), i. e. strangers dwelling in another country without being naturalized (Lev. xxii, 10; Psa. xxxix, 12). Both of these classes were to be treated with kindness, and were to enjoy the same rights with other citizens (Lev. xix, 33, 34; Deut. x, 19; xxiii, 7; xxiv, 17). Strangers might be naturalized, or permitted to enter into the congregation of the Lord, by submitting to circumcision and renouncing idolatry (Deut. xxiii, 1-8).

The Edomites and Egyptians were capable of becoming citizens of Israel after the third generation. It appears also that other nations were not entirely excluded from being incorporated with the people of Israel. But the Ammonites and Moabites, in consequence of the hostile disposition which they had manifested to the Israelites in the wilderness, were absolutely excluded from the right of citizenship (Michaelis, Mos. Recht, § 63).

In the earlier periods of the Hebrew state, persons who were natives of another country, but who had come, either from choice or necessity, to take up their residence among the Hebrews, appear to have been placed in favorable circumstances. At a later period, viz., the reigns of David and Solomon, they were compelled to labor on the religious edifices which were erected by those princes (2 Chron. ii, 1, 17, 18, comp. with 1 Chron. xxii, 2). This, however, were probably prisoners of war (Jahn, Bibl. Archæol. § 181). See CITIZENSHIP; GENTILE.

The term alien is used figuratively in Eph. ii, 12, to denote those persons who were without Christ, and who had no interest in the blood of the covenant. See ADOPTION.

Alisgema (ἀλισγέμα), a Hellenistic word (Stephens, Thes. Gr. s. v.) which occurs in Acts xv, 20, Auth. Vers. "pollution" (comp. ver. 29 and 1 Cor. viii), with reference to meat sacrificed to idols, and there means défilément, pollution. The apostle in these passages alludes to the customs of the Gentiles, among whom, after a sacrifice had been concluded and a portion of the victim had been assigned to the priests, it was usual to hold a sacrificial feast in honor of the god, on which occasion they ate the residue of the flesh (comp. Homer, Odys. iii, 470). This feast might take place either in the temple or in a private house (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Sacrificium). But there were many who, from need or avarice, salted and laid up the remnants for future use (Theoph. Char. c. X), or even gave them to the butchers to sell in the shambles (Schöttg. Hor. Heb. ad Act. xv, 20; 1 Cor. viii). This flesh, having been offered to idols, was held in abomination by the Jews; and they considered not only those who had been present at these feasts, but also those who ate the flesh which had been offered up, when afterward exposed for sale in the shambles, as infected by the contagion of idolatry (q. v.). The council at Jerusalem, therefore, at the suggestion of James, directed that converts should refuse all invitations to such feasts, and abstain from the use of all such meat, that no offence might be given to those Christians who had been Jews. See KINOL, ad Act. xv, 20.—Kitto, s. v. Comp. DECREE.

Alkali, the oxide or carbonate of one of the metallic bases, having a strong caustic power; usually applied to soda, potash, and ammonia. Of these substances the Hebrews appear to have been acquainted with two forms (see Thomson's Land and Eoek. ii, 302), concerning which we translate from Winer, ii, 9 sq.

1. Mineral alkali seems to have been designated by the term ne'ther (נֶחֶר; "nitre," Prov. xxv, 20; Jer. ii, 22; νήπιον, Attic Νίπρον). It was found at all times in large quantities in two lakes of the valley of the Nile west of the river (Strabo, xvii, 803; Plin. xxxi, 46), and is still obtained there from the water under the name of natrum (Paulus, Samm. v, 182 sq.; Forsk. Flor. Æg. p. 45; Andréossy, in the Memoires sur l'Égypte, ii, 27 sq.; comp. Descript. de l'Égypte, xii, 1 sq.; Hasselquist, Reisen. p. 548). The Egyptians used nitre for embalming dead bodies (Herod. ii, 87); it was also employed instead of soap for washing (Jer. ii, 22; comp. Jerome, ad Prov. xxv, 20), as still appears to be customary in Egypt (Hasselquist, ut sup.; Forsk. Flor. p. 46). The property of this mineral, when dissolved in vinegar, of effervescing and losing its cleansing power, is alluded to in Prov. xxv, 20. (See generally Michaelis, Comment. in Soc. Gott. prælect. Brem. 177, p. 134 sq.; Beckmann, Gesch. d. Erfind. v, 517 sq.) See NITRE.

2. Vegetable alkali is denoted by the Hebrew term borith (בֹּרִית; "soap," Jer. ii, 22; Mal. iii, 2), and by the Greeks and Romans likewise nitre (comp. Plin. xxxi, 46). It was obtained by water (lye) from the ashes of the soap-wash (Arabic kali), of which Forsk. (Flor. p. lxiiv sq., 54 sq., 98) found various kinds in Egypt, e. g. the Salsola kali, or the Mesembryanthemum nodiflorum of Linnæus (comp. Hasselquist, Reisen. p. 225; Rafinesq. Delile, Flora Æg. illustr. in the Descript. de l'Égypte, xix, 81; see Oken, Botan. ii, i, 584; ii, 856; Schkuhr, Botan. Handb. i, 174 sq.). The saline plants indigenous in Palestine from which borith was obtained were also, according to the Talmudists (see Celsii Hierobot. i, 350) and Jerome (in loc. Jer.), called by the same name, and are the same as those called by the Arabs asham. Of these plants Rauwolf (Reisen. p. 37) found in Syria two species; one was a thick bushy shrub, with numerous slender branches, surmounted by thick tufts, and furnished with narrow pointed leaves; the other in stem and top resembles "sheep-dew," with thick ash-colored roots (see his figures of each under Nos. 37, 38). The distinction of the various kinds of Oriental saline plants requires a new botanical treatment (Kitto, Phys. Geogr. of Holy Land, p. cclxvii; Pliny, xix, 18, mentions among the plants growing in Syria one "which yields a juice useful for washing wool," under the name radicula, Gr. σποδύριον, comp. Dioscorides, ii, 193; Beckmann, Gesch. d. Erfind. iv, 18 sq.; Sprengel, ad Dioscor. ii, 478, regards this as no other than the Sapcuria officinalis). Formerly, as at the present day (Rauwolf, ut sup.; Arvieux, Reisen. ii, 163; Belon, in Paulus's Samm. iv, 151), the ashes of these plants formed an important article of commerce in Oriental markets (thus their name al-kali is Arabic); and it is not only employed (in the form of lye or soap) as a means of cleansing clothes and the skin (Jer. ii, 22; Mal. iii, 2; Job ix, 30), but also in the reduction of metals, e. g. silver and lead (Isa. i, 25), and in the manufacture of glass (comp. generally Celsius, i, 449 sq.; Michaelis, Commentat. ut sup.). Allan, WILLIAM (Cardinal), born in Lancashire in 1532, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford, where he afterward became, in Queen Mary's time, principal of St. Mary's Hall, and was also made canon of York. At Queen Elizabeth's accession he retreated to Louvain, and then became professor at Douay, canon of Cambrai and Rheims, and lastly, in 1587, he was made cardinal-priest of St. Martin's in Rome, and in 1588 archbishop of Mechlin. He was very active in collecting the English Romanists abroad into one body, and in establishing a college, first at Douay and then at Rheims. His zeal against Queen Elizabeth showed itself in two bitter works, which he published before the invasion of England by the Spaniards, encouraging King Philip to that enterprise, and urging the subjects of Queen Elizabeth to consider themselves absolved from their allegiance, and to execute the papal ban deposing Elizabeth and putting Philip II in her stead. This treason greatly embittered the English people against Allan, and the Earl of Arundel was afterward condemned to death for corresponding with him. He died at Rome in 1594, and the Jesuits were charged with poisoning him. They, in turn, charged the crime against Dr. Lewis, bishop of Cassona, who, they said, hoped to succeed Allan as English cardinal.—Hook, Ecol. Biog. i, 103; Collier, Ecol. Hist. vii, 180.

Allatius, LEO (Leo Allacci in Italian), was born in 1586 of Greek parents in the island of Chio, went to Rome in 1600, and studied at the Greek College in that city. When his course of studies was completed, Bernard Justiniani, bishop of Anglona, selected him for his grand-vicar. In 1621 Pope Gregory XV sent him into Germany to bring to Rome the Palatine Library of Heidelberg, and Alexander VII made him librarian of the Vatican in 1661. He died in January, 1669, aged eighty-three, having founded several colleges in his native island. According to Nicéron, he was indefatigable in his labors, and possessed a prodigious memory, stored with every kind of knowledge, but he wanted judgment and critical acumen. A list of his writings may be found in Nicéron, Mémoires, viii, 10. The most important of them are, 1. De Ecclesiâ Occident. et Orient. Perpetuâ Consensione (Cologne, 1648, 4to);—2. De utriusque Eccl. etc. in dogmate de Purgatorio Consensione (Rome, 1655, 8vo);—3. De Libris Eccl. Græcorum (Paris, 1645, 8vo);—4. De Templis Græcorum recentioribus (Cologne, 1645, 8vo);—5. Græciæ Orthodoxæ Scriptores (Rome, 1652, 2 vols. 4to);—6. De Octavo Synodo Photiana (Franef. 1666, 4to).

Allegory (ἀλληγορία) occurs in the Bible only in the participial form, ἀλληγορούμενος, allegorized (Gal. iv, 24), where the apostle cites the history of the free-born Isaac and the slave-born Ishmael, and only speaks of it as allegorically applied. Allegories themselves are, however, of frequent occurrence in Scripture.

An allegory has been sometimes considered as only a lengthened metaphor; at other times as a continuation of metaphors. But, according to its original and proper meaning, as shown by its derivation, the term denotes a representation of one thing which is intended to excite the representation of another thing. In most allegories the immediate representation is made in the form of a narrative; and, since it is the object of the allegory itself to convey a moral, not a historic truth, the narrative is commonly fictitious. The immediate representation is understood from the words of the allegory; the ultimate representation depends upon the immediate representation applied to the proper end. The interpretation of the former is commonly called the grammatical or the literal interpretation, although we should speak more correctly in calling it the verbal interpretation, since, in the plainest narratives, even in narratives not designed for moral application, the use of words is never restricted to their mere literal senses. Every parable is a kind of allegory; e. g. in the parable of the sower (Luke viii, 5-15) we have a plain narrative—a statement of a few simple and intelligible facts, such, probably, as had fallen within the observation of the persons to whom our Saviour addressed himself, followed by the explanation or allegorical interpretation. The impressive and pathetic allegory addressed by Nathan to David affords a similar instance of an allegorical narrative accompanied with its explanation (2 Sam. xii, 1-14). Allegories thus accompanied constitute a kind of simile, in both parts of which the words themselves are construed either literally or figuratively, according to the respective use of them; and then we institute the comparison between the things signified in the former part and the things signified in the latter part. The most frequent error in the interpretation of allegorical representations is the attempt to discover too minute coincidences, or to apply them in all their details. See PARABLE.

But allegorical narratives are frequently left to explain themselves, especially when the resemblance between the immediate and ultimate representation is sufficiently apparent to make an explanation unnecessary. Of this kind we cannot have a more striking example than that beautiful one contained in the 80th Psalm, "Thou broughtest a vine out of Egypt," etc. The allegorical delineation of old age by Solomon (Eccl. xii, 2-6) is perhaps one of the finest of the Old Testament. The use of allegorical interpretation is not, however, confined to mere allegory, or fictitious narratives, but is extended also to history, or real narratives. And in this case the grammatical meaning of a passage is called its historical, in contradistinction to its allegorical meaning. There are two modes in which Scripture history has been thus allegorized. According to one, facts and circumstances, especially those recorded in the Old Testament, have been applied to other facts and circumstances, of which they have been described as representative. According to the other, these facts and circumstances have been described as mere emblems. The former is warranted by the practice of the sacred writers themselves; for when facts and circumstances are so applied, they are applied as types of those things to which the application is made. But the latter has no such authority in its favor, though attempts have been made to procure such authority. For the same things are there described, not as types or as real facts, but as mere ideal representations, like the immediate representations in allegory. By this mode, therefore, history is not treated as allegory, but converted into allegory—a mode of interpretation that cannot claim the sanction of Paul from the above treatment of the history of Isaac and Ishmael.—Marsh, Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible, lect. v. See INTERPRETATION.

Alleine, JOSEPH, an eminently pious non-conformist divine, was born at Devizes in 1623. His piety and love of learning displayed themselves very early, and at sixteen he was sent to Lincoln College, Oxford, but in 1651 he removed to Corpus Christi College, a Wiltshire scholarship being then vacant. In 1653 he was admitted bachelor of arts, and in 1655 he became co-pastor with the Rev. George Newton, at Taunton, where he labored with great diligence and success until 1662, when he was deprived of his office for non-conformity, and on the 26th of May, 1663, was committed to Ilchester jail, where, after being treated with great indignity, together with seven ministers and fifty Quakers, he was indicted at the assizes for preaching on the 17th of May, of which he was found guilty, and fined one hundred marks. He declared in court "that, whatsoever he was charged with, he was guilty of nothing but doing his duty." He continued in prison a year, and, after his release, he was even more zealous in propagating the Gospel, till his exertions brought on illness. In 1665 he was again apprehended, and, with some of his friends, was committed to prison for sixty days. The confinement increased his disorder, and he rapidly became worse, and died November, 1668. His Alarm to the Unconverted is one of the most useful and most widely circulated books of practical religion ever published.—Life of Alleine, with Letters (N. Y. 1840, 12mo); Staunford, Life of Alleine (Lond. 1864).

Allelu'ia (ἀλληλουϊα), a Græcized form (Rev. xix, 1, 3, 4, 6) of the Heb. exclamation HALLELUJAH (q. v.).

Allemanni, a confederacy of German tribes, among which, probably, the Tencteri, Usipeti, Chatti, and Vangiones were the most important. The name denotes either (according to Zeus) a confederacy of men of different nations, or (according to Grimm) the true descendants of Manus, real German men. They appear for the first time on the stage of history under the reign of Caracalla (211), who assumed the title of Allemanicus because he pretended to have conquered the Allemanni on the Maine. Toward the close of the 3d century they took possession of the country between the Rhine, Maine, and Danube. There they existed under this distinctive name until the beginning of the 10th century, when Duke Erchanger was executed, and his successor Burcard proclaimed Duke of Suabia.

The Roman provinces on the Rhine and Danube, at the time of their occupation by the Allemanni, were partly inhabited by Christians. The Allemanni suppressed in some districts Christianity altogether, while in others it was strong enough to withstand all persecutions. Thus Paganism and Christianity existed side by side until the battle of Zulpich (496), in consequence of which the Allemanni became subject to the Franks, who now entered the Christian Church. The connection of the Allemannic dukes and grandees with the Frankish kings, the Frankish legislation, especially the lex Allemannica of Dagobert the Great (630), and the efforts of the bishops of the neighboring sees of Auzsburg and Vindinissa, greatly promoted the spreading of Christianity. When the latter see was transferred to Constance, an Allemannic city, the growth of Christianity became still more rapid. Among the missionaries who labored for the conversion of the Allemanni, Fridolin (550), Columban and Gallus (610), Trudpert (640), and Pirminius (724), are best known. (See these articles.) At the time of Boniface (740) the Christianization of the country seems to have been completed. See Hefele, Einführung des Christenthums im südwestlichen Deutschland (Tübing, 1837); Stälin, Würtemb. Gesch. i. Compare GERMANY; BADEN; WURTEMBERG.

Allen, Benjamin, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Hudson, N. Y., September 29, 1789, was bred a Presbyterian, and obtained his education under many difficulties by strenuous exertion. In 1814 he entered the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was licensed as a lay reader in Charlestown, Va., where he gave special attention to the instruction of the colored people. He was ordained deacon in 1816 and priest in 1818. In 1815 he published (for one year) a weekly paper called the "Loyola's Magazine," and in 1820 an Abridgment of Burnet's History of the Reformation (1 vol.), which had a very large sale. In 1821 he was chosen rector of St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia, as successor to the Rev. Dr. Pilmore. Here his labors as pastor and preacher were incessant, and he added to them a great deal of literary work. In 1822 he published Christ and Him Crucified (12mo), and Living Manners, a tale (12mo); in 1823-4, a History of the Church of Christ (2 vols. 8vo); in 1825, The Parents' Counselor; a Narrative of the Newton Family; and a Sketch of the Life of Dr. Pilmore. In 1827 he established a publishing-house, called "The Prayer-book and Missionary House," to cheapen prayer-books, tracts, etc., and wrote for publication several small practical and biographical works. Under these accumulated labors his health broke down, and he sailed for Europe in March, 1828. In England he imprudently allowed himself to be called into frequent service at anniversaries and public meetings, and his strength failed entirely by midsummer. He died on the return voyage to America, Jan. 13, 1829. Besides the publications above named, he published also a number of separate sermons, and several small volumes of poems, written in early life.—Sprague, Annals, v, 591.

Allen, David Oliver, D.D., a Congregational minister and missionary, was born in 1800 at Barre, Mass. He graduated at Amherst College in 1823, studied theology in Andover Theological Seminary, 1824-27, went, with his wife, as missionary to India in 1827. In 1844 he took charge of the printing establishment in Bombay, employing at that time one hundred persons. He published several tracts in the Marhatta language, and superintended a revised and corrected edition of the whole Scriptures in that language. He returned, on account of enfeebled health, to America in June, 1853, and published in 1856 a "History of India, Ancient and Modern." He was a member of the "Royal Asiatic Society" and the "American Oriental Society." He died in Lowell, July 17, 1863.

Allen, Henry. See ALLENITES.

Allen, James, a Puritan minister, was born in England in 1632. He was a fellow of New College, Oxford, but was ejected for non-conformity in 1662, came to America, and was ordained teacher of the First Church, Boston, December 9, 1668, as colleague with Mr. Davenport, who was at the same time ordained pastor. He served this church for forty years with dignity and industry, but without remarkable success. Several of his occasional sermons were printed. He died September 22, 1710.—Sprague, Annals, i, 163.

Allen, John, one of the early ministers of Massachusetts, was born in England in 1596, and was driven from his native land during the persecution of the Puritans. Removing to New England, he was settled pastor of the church at Dedham, April 24, 1639, where he continued till his death, August 26, 1671. He was a man of considerable distinction in his day. He published a defence of the nine positions, in which, with Mr. Shepard of Cambridge, he discusses the points of Church discipline, and a defence of the synod of 1662, against Mr. Chauncy, under the title of Animadversions upon the Antisynodalia (4to, 1664).—Allen, Biographical Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 53.

Allen, John, chancellor of Ireland, was born in 1476, was educated at Oxford, and took his bachelor's degree at Cambridge. He soon obtained several benefices, and was sent by Archbishop Warham to Rome on ecclesiastical affairs; he spent nine years there, and, on his return, Wolsey made him his chaplain. He was made archbishop of Dublin in 1528, and soon after chancellor. He was an active assistant of Cardinal Wolsey in the spoliation of the religious houses, and was a learned canonist. Allen was murdered by Thomas Fitzgerald, son of the earl of Kildare, July 28, 1534, and his death was regarded by the people as a divine judgment upon him for having been instrumental in the destruction of forty monasteries. He wrote Epist. de Pallii Significatione, and other pieces relating to ecclesiastical subjects.—Biog. Univ. tom. i, p. 590; Rose, Biog. Dictionary; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Wood, Atheus Oxoniensis.

Allen, John, a learned layman, was born at Truro, in Cornwall, England, in 1771, and conducted for upward of thirty years a private school in London, where he died in 1839. He published a work on Modern Judaism (8vo, London, 1816 and 1830). Bickersteth calls it the best work on the subject in the English language. In 1813 he published a translation of Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion, which has continued to be the standard English version of that great work, though it may now, perhaps (1862), be superseded by Beveridge's new translation. Allen's edition of the Institutes was reprinted at New York (1819, 4to), and often since in 2 vols. 8vo, in which form it is issued by the Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia.—Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 49; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 53.

Allen, John, was pastor of a Baptist congregation at Spitalfields, 1764 to 1767. Engaging in business, he became involved in difficulties, was tried for forgery, and was acquitted. He subsequently went to New York, and had some reputation as a preacher there until his death. He published The Spiritual Magazine, or the Christian's Grand Treasure, wherein the Doctrines of the Bible are unfolded (Lond. 1752; reprinted, with preface by Romaine, Lond. 1810, 3 vols. 8vo); Chain of Truth, a dissertation on the Harmony of the Gospels (1764).—Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 426; Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 49.

Allen, Moses, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Northampton, Massachusetts, September 14, 1748. He was educated at Princeton, where he graduated in 1772. He was ordained at Christ's Church parish, about twenty miles from Charleston, S. C., March 26, 1775. In 1777 he removed to Midway, Georgia. The British army from Florida, under General Prevost, dispersed his society in 1778, and burned the church, almost every dwelling-house, and the crops of rice then in stacks. In December he was taken prisoner by the British, and treated with great severity. Seeing no prospect of release from the prison-ship where he was confined, he determined to attempt the recovery of his liberty by jumping overboard and swimming to an adjacent point; but he was drowned in the attempt, February 8, 1779.—Allen, Biog. Dictionary, s. v.

Allen, Richard, first bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1760. After 17 years' service in the Methodist ministry, to which he had been ordained by Bishop Asbury, he was elected bishop of the newly-formed "African Methodist Episcopal Church" (q. v.) in 1816. He died in Philadelphia, March 26, 1831.—Gorrie, Churches and Sects, p. 54.

Allen, Solomon, a useful minister of the Gospel, brother of Moses Allen (q. v.), was born at Northampton, February 23, 1751. He, with four of his brothers, entered the army in the Revolutionary war, and rose to the rank of major. At 40 he was converted, and was made deacon of the church at Northampton. Soon after he felt it his duty to preach the Gospel, but the neighboring clergy discouraged him, on account of his great age and his want of theological learning. But he was not to be hindered; he devoted himself to the study of the Bible, and went for his theology to the works of Hoar and Baxter. At fifty years of age he entered upon a career of voluntary labor as a preacher, which lasted, chiefly in the new settlements in Western New York, for 20 years. "He rejoiced in fatigues and privations in the service of his beloved Master. Sometimes, in his journeys, he reposed himself with nothing but a blanket to protect him from the inclemency of the weather. But though poor, he was the means of enriching many with the inestimable riches of religion. Four churches were established by him, and he numbered about two hundred souls as by his preaching reclaimed from perdition. Though poor himself, there were those connected with him who were rich, and by whose liberality he was enabled to accomplish his benevolent purposes. From such sources he expended about a thousand dollars in books and clothing for the people in the wilderness." In 1820 he returned to Massachusetts. "At Pittsfield, where some of his relations lived, and where his brother had been the minister, Mr. Allen went through the streets, and entering each house, read a chapter in the Bible, exhorting all the members of the family to serve God, and praying fervently for their salvation. In like manner he visited other towns. He felt that the time was short, and he was constrained to do all the good in his power. With his white locks, and the strong, impressive tones of his voice, and having a known character for sanctity, all were awed at the presence of the man of God. He went about with the holy zeal and authority of an apostle. In prayer Mr. Allen displayed a sublimity and pathos which good judges have considered as unequalled by any ministers whom they have known. It was the energy of true faith and strong feeling. In November he arrived at New York, and there, after a few weeks, he expired in the arms of his children, Jan. 28, 1821."—Allen, Biog. Dictionary, s. v.

Allen, Thomas, a non-conformist minister, was born at Norwich, England, 1608, and educated at Cambridge. He was afterward minister of St. Edmund's, in Norwich, but was silenced by Bishop Wren, about 1636, for refusing to read the Book of Sports. In 1638 he fled to New England, and was installed in Charlestown, where he preached the Gospel till about 1651, when he returned to Norwich, and continued the exercise of his ministry till 1662, when he was ejected for non-conformity. He died September 21, 1673. He published a Chain of Scripture Chronology, from the Creation till the Death of Christ (London, 1659, 4to), and a number of practical writings.—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 51; Allen, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Allen, Thomas, a Church of England divine, was born at Oxford in 1682, and was educated at Wadham College. He became rector of Kettering in 1714, and continued to serve that parish until his death, May 31, 1755. He published An Apology for the Church of England (London, 1725, 8vo); The Christian's sure Guide to eternal Glory, Expositions of Rev. ii, iii (London, 1733, 8vo); The Practice of a Holy Life (London, 1716, 8vo).—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 51; Nichols, Illustrations, iii, 789.

Allen, Thomas, brother of Moses, and first minister of Pittsfield, Mass., was born January 7, 1743, at Northampton. He was educated at Harvard College, and passed A. B. in 1762. After studying theology under the direction of Mr. Hooker of Northampton, Mr. Allen was ordained April 18, 1764. During a ministry of forty-six years he was unwearied in his sacred calling. Besides his stated labors on the Sabbath, he frequently delivered lectures, and in the course of his life preached six or seven hundred funeral sermons. During the war of the Revolution he went out twice as a volunteer chaplain. He died February 11, 1810.—Sprague, Annals, i, 608; Allen, Biog. Dictionary, s. v.

Allen, William (Cardinal). See ALLAN.

Allen, William, a tradesman of London, whose works were highly esteemed by Bishop Kidder and others, was originally an Independent, but from conviction joined the Church of England in 1658. He died in 1686, at an advanced age. His Works were published at London, folio, in 1707, with a preface concerning the author and his writings, by the bishop of Chichester. Bishop Kidder preached his funeral sermon.—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 51.

Allen, William, a member of the Society of Friends, and a distinguished Christian philanthropist, was born, in 1770, at Spitalfields. He founded, in 1797, with Mr. Phillips, the "Spitalfields Soup Society," exerted himself for the abolition of the slave-trade, and of capital punishment in the case of minor offences, for the improvement of primary schools and prisons, for the establishment of saving funds and other similar purposes. From 1816 to 1833 he visited four times the principal countries of Europe in behalf of his philanthropic enterprises. Many years before his death, Mr. Allen purchased an estate near Lindfield, Sussex, and withdrew from business. Here, while still zealously engaging in public schemes of usefulness and benevolence, he carried out various philanthropic plans for the improvement of his immediate dependents and poorer neighbors. He erected commodious cottages on his property, with an ample allotment of land attached to each cottage; and he established schools at Lindfield for boys, girls, and infants, with workshops, out-houses, and play-grounds. About three acres of land were cultivated on the most approved system by the boarders, who also took a part in household work. The subjects taught were land-surveying, mapping, the elements of botany, the use of the barometer, rain-gauge, etc., and there was a good library with various scientific and useful apparatus. He died at his house near Lindfield, December 30, 1843.—Sherman, Life of William Allen (1857, 8vo); English Cyclopaedia, s. v.; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 54.

Allenites, the followers of Henry Allen, born at Newport, R. I., June 14, 1748, a man of natural capacity but undisciplined mind, who, about the year 1774, journeyed through most parts of the province of Nova Scotia, and, by his popular talents, made many converts. He also published several treatises and sermons, in which he maintains that the souls of all the human race are emanations, or rather parts, of the one Great Spirit, but that originally they had individually the powers of moral agents—that they were all present with our first parents in the garden of Eden, and were actually in the first transgression. He supposes that our first parents in innocency were pure spirits; that the material world was not then made; but, in consequence of the fall, mankind being cut off from God, that they might not sink into immediate destruction, the world was produced, and they were clothed with hard bodies; and that all the human race will in their turns, by natural generation, be invested with such bodies, and in them enjoy a state of probation. He maintains that the body of our Saviour was never raised from the grave, and that none of the bodies of men ever will be; but when the original number of souls have had their course on earth they will all receive their reward or punishment in their original unembodied state. He held baptism, the Lord's Supper, and ordination, to be matters of indifference. Allen died in 1784, after which his party greatly declined.—Adams's Dict. of Religions; Grégoire, Hist. des Sectes, v, 110 sq.

Allestree, RICHARD, D.D., an eminent English divine, born at Uppington, Shropshire, 1619, and educated at Oxford. In 1641 he took up arms for the king, and, after the royal downfall, he took orders. In 1660 he was made regius professor of divinity at Oxford and canon of Christ Church. In 1665 he was elected provost at Eton, where he died 1680. He was a laborious scholar, and did a great deal for Eton College. He published Forty Sermons (Oxf. 1684, 2 vols. fol.).—Hook, Ecl. Biog. i, 142.

Alley, WILLIAM, bishop of Exeter, was born about 1512 at Great Wycomb, Bucks; he was educated at Eton, from whence, in 1528, he went to King's College, Cambridge; after having taken his degree of A.B. in that university, he removed to Oxford. At this time the contest between the Romish and the reforming party in the Church of England was carried on with much violence on both sides. Alley attached himself zealously to the reformers, and, on the accession of Queen Mary, thought it expedient to conceal himself, and earned an honorable maintenance in the north of England by practising physic and educating youth. When Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, he returned to London, and read the divinity lecture in St. Paul's. He is said to have discharged this office with great ability; and he is also distinguished as the translator of the Pentateuch for Archbishop Parker's Bible. On the 14th of July, 1569, he was consecrated bishop of Exeter, and discharged his duties faithfully until his death in 1571. He published an exposition of 1 Peter in The Poor Man's Library (Lond. 1565, fol.).

Alliance, a confederacy formed by treaty between two nations for their amicable intercourse and mutual advantage. Compacts of this character are designated in Scripture by various terms, e. g. LEAGUE; COVENANT; TREATY, etc.

1. History of Jewish Treaties.—Anterior to the Mosaic institutions, such alliances with foreigners were not forbidden. Abraham was in alliance with some of the Canaanitish princes (Gen. xiv, 13); he also entered into a regular treaty of alliance with the Philistine king Abimelech (ch. xxi, 22 sq.), which was renewed by their sons (ch. xxvi, 26-30). This primitive treaty is a model of its kind; it leaves all details to the honest interpretation of the contracting parties. Abimelech says: "Swear unto me here by God that thou wilt not deal falsely with me, nor with my son, nor with my son's son; but according to the kindness that I have done unto thee thou shalt do unto me, and unto the land wherein thou hast sojourned." Even after the law it appears that such alliances with distant nations as could not be supposed to have any dangerous effect upon the religion or morals of the people were not deemed to be prohibited. Thus, in the case of the treaty with the Gibeonites, Joshua and the elders are condemned for it only on the ground that the Gibeonites were in fact their near neighbors (Josh. ix, 3-27).

On the first establishment of the Israelites in Palestine, lest the example of foreign nations should draw them into the worship of idols, intercourse and alliance with such nations were strongly interdicted (Lev. xviii, 3, 4; xx, 22, 23). For the same object of political isolation a country was assigned to them shut in by the sea on the west, by deserts on the south and east, and by mountains and forests on the north. But with the extension of their power under the kings, the Jews were brought more into contact with foreigners, and alliances became essential to the security of their commerce (q. v.). These diplomatic arrangements may primarily be referred to a partial change of feeling which originated in the time of David, and which continued to operate among his descendants. During his wanderings he was brought into association with several of the neighboring princes, from some of whom he received sympathy and support, which, after he ascended the throne, he gratefully remembered (2 Sam. x, 2). He married the daughter of a heathen king, and had by her his favorite son (2 Sam. iii, 3); the king of Moab protected his family (1 Sam. xxii, 3, 4); the king of Ammon showed kindness to him (2 Sam. x, 2); the king of Gath showered favors upon him (1 Sam. xxvii; xxviii, 1, 2); the king of Hamath sent his own son to congratulate him on his victories (2 Sam. viii, 15); in short, the rare power which David possessed of attaching to himself the good opinion and favor of other men, extended even to the neighboring nations, and it would have been difficult for a person of his disposition to repel the advances of kindness and consideration which they made. Among those who made such advances was Hiram, king of Tyre; for it eventually transpires that "Hiram was ever a lover of David" (1 Kings v, 2), and it is probable that other intercourse had preceded that relating to the palace which Hiram's artificers built for David (2 Sam. v, 11). The king of Tyre was not disposed to neglect the cultivation of the friendly intercourse with the Hebrew nation which had thus been opened. He sent an embassy to condole with Solomon on the death of his father, and to congratulate him on his own accession (1 Kings v, 1). The plans of the young king rendered the friendship of Hiram a matter of importance, and accordingly "a league" was formed (1 Kings v, 12) between them; and that this league had a reference not merely to the special matter then in view, but was a general league of amity, is evinced by the fact that more than 250 years after a prophet denounces the Lord's vengeance upon Tyre, because she "remembered not the brotherly covenant" (Amos i, 9). Under this league large bodies of Jews and Phenicians were associated, first in preparing the materials for the Temple (1 Kings v, 6-18), and afterward in navigating the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean (1 Kings ix, 26-28). Solomon also contracted an alliance with a Pharaoh, king of Egypt, which was cemented by his marriage with a princess of the royal family; by this he secured a monopoly of the trade in horses and other products of that country (1 Kings x, 28, 29). After the division of the kingdom the alliances were of an offensive and defensive nature; they had their origin partly in the internal disputes of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, and partly in the position which these countries held relatively to Egypt on the one side, and the great Eastern monarchies of Assyria and Babylonia on the other. The scantiness of the historical records at our command makes it probable that the key to many of the events that occurred is to be found in the alliances and counter-alliances formed between these people, of which no mention is made. Thus the invasion of Shishak in Rehoboam's reign was not improbably the result of an alliance made with Jeroboam, who had previously found an asylum in Egypt (1 Kings xii, 2; xiv, 25). Each of these monarchs sought a connection with the neighboring kingdom of Syria, on which side Israel was particularly assailable (1 Kings xv, 19); but Asa ultimately succeeded in securing the active co-operation of Benhadad against Baasha (1 Kings xv, 16-20). Another policy, induced probably by the encroaching spirit of Syria, led to the formation of an alliance between the two kingdoms under Ahab and Jehoshaphat, which was maintained until the end of Ahab's dynasty; it occasionally extended to commercial operations (2 Chron. xx, 36). The alliance ceased in Jehu's reign; war broke out shortly after between Amariah and Jeroboam II; each nation looked for foreign aid, and a coalition was formed between Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah on the one side, and Ahaz and Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, on the other (2 Kings xvi, 5-9). By this means an opening was afforded to the advances of the Assyrian power; and the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, as they were successively attacked, sought the alliance of the Egyptians, who were strongly interested in maintaining the independence of the Jews as a barrier against the encroachments of the Assyrian power. Thus Hoshea made a treaty with So (Sabaco, or Sevechus), and rebelled against Shalmaneser (2 Kings xvii, 4); Hezekiah adopted the same policy in opposition to Sennacherib (Isa. xxx, 2); in neither case was the alliance productive of much good—the Israelites were abandoned by So; it appears probable that his successor Sethos, who had offended the military caste, was unable to render Hezekiah any assistance; and it was only when the independence of Egypt itself was threatened that the Assyrians were defeated by the joint forces of Sethos and Tirhakah, and a temporary relief afforded thereby to Judah (2 Kings xix, 9, 36; Herod. ii, 141). The weak condition of Egypt at the beginning of the 26th dynasty left Judah entirely at the mercy of the Assyrians, who, under Esarhaddon, subdued the country, and by a conciliatory policy secured the adhesion of Manasseh and his successors to his side against Egypt (2 Chron. xxxiii, 11-13). It was apparently as an ally of the Assyrians that Josiah resisted the advance of Necho (2 Chron. xxxv, 20). His defeat, however, and the downfall of the Assyrian empire, again changed the policy of the Jews, and made them the subjects of Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar's first expedition against Jerusalem was contemporaneous with and probably in consequence of the expedition of Necho against the Babylonians (2 Kings xxiv, 1; Jer. xlvi, 2); and lastly, Zedekiah's rebellion was accompanied with a renewal of the alliance with Egypt (Ezek. xvii, 15). A temporary relief appears to have been afforded by the advance of Hophrah (Jer. xxxvii, 11), but it was of no avail to prevent the extinction of Jewish independence.

On the restoration of independence, Judas Maccabæus sought an alliance with the Romans, who were then gaining an ascendancy in the East, as a counterpoise to the neighboring state of Syria (1 Macc. viii; Joseph. Ant. xii, 10, 6); this alliance was renewed by Jonathan (1 Macc. xii, 1; Ant. xiii, 5, 8), and by Simon (1 Macc. xv, 17; Ant. xiii, 7, 3); on the last occasion the independence of the Jews was recognised and formally notified to the neighboring nations, B.C. 140 (1 Macc. xv, 22, 23). Treaties of a friendly nature were at the same period concluded with the Lacedæmonians under an impression that they came of a common stock (1 Macc. xii, 2; xiv, 20; Ant. xii, 4, 10; xiii, 5, 8). The Roman alliance was again renewed by Hyrcanus, B.C. 128 (Ant. xiii, 9, 2), after his defeat by Antiochus Sidetes, and the losses he had sustained were repaired. This alliance, however, ultimately proved fatal to the independence of the Jews; the rival claims of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus having been referred to Pompey, B.C. 63, he availed himself of the opportunity of placing the country under tribute (Ant. xiv, 1, 4). Finally, Herod was raised to the sovereignty by the Roman senate, acting under the advice of M. Antony (Ant. xiv, 14, 5).

2. Their Religious and Political Effects.—This intercourse with the heathen appears to have considerably weakened the sentiment of separation, which, in the case of the Hebrews, it was of the utmost importance to maintain. The disastrous consequences of even the seemingly least objectionable alliances may be seen in the long train of evils, both to the kingdom of Israel and of Judah, which ensued from the marriage of Ahab with Jezebel, the king of Tyre's daughter. See AHAB; JEZEBEL. These consequences had been manifested even in the time of Solomon; for he formed matrimonial alliances with most of the neighboring kingdoms, and to the influence of his idolatrous wives are ascribed the abominations which darkened the latter days of the wise king (1 Kings xi, 1-8). The prophets, who were alive to these consequences, often raised their voices against such dangerous connections (1 Kings xx, 38; 2 Chron. xvi, 7; xix, 2; xxv, 7, etc.; Isa. vii, 17); but it was found a difficult matter to induce even the best kings to place such absolute faith in Jehovah, the Head of their state, as to neglect altogether those human resources and alliances by which other nations strengthened themselves against their enemies. Remarkable instances of this are those of Asa, one of the most pious monarchs of Judah (1 Kings xv, 16-20), and, in a less degree, of Ahaz (2 Kings xvi, 5, etc.; 2 Chron. xxviii, 16, etc.). In later times the Maccabees appear to have considered themselves unrestrained by any but the ordinary prudential considerations in contracting alliances; but they confined their treaties to distant states, which were by no means likely ever to exercise that influence upon the religion of the people which was the chief object of dread. The most remarkable alliances of this kind in the whole Hebrew history are those which were contracted with the Romans, who were then beginning to take a part in the affairs of Western Asia. Judas claimed their friendly intervention in the negotiation then pending between the Jews and Antiochus Eupator (2 Macc. xi, 24 sq.); and two years after he sent ambassadors to the banks of the Tiber to propose a treaty of alliance and amity. By the terms of this treaty the Romans ostensibly threw over the Jews the broad shield of their dangerous protection, promising to assist them in their wars, and forbidding any who were at peace with themselves to be at war with the Jews, or to assist directly or indirectly those who were so. The Jews, on their part, engaged to assist the Romans to the utmost of their power in any wars they might wage in those parts. The obligations of this treaty might be enlarged or diminished by the mutual consent of the contracting parties. This memorable treaty, having been concluded at Rome, was given upon brass and deposited in the Capitol (1 Macc. viii, 22-28; Joseph. Ant. xii, 10; other treaties with the Romans are given in lib. xiii).

3. Rites by which they were ratified.—From the time of the patriarchs a covenant of alliance was sealed by the blood of some victim. A heifer, a goat, a ram, a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon were immolated in confirmation of the covenant between the Lord and Abraham (Gen. xv, 9). The animal or animals sacrificed were cut in two (except birds, ver. 10), to typify the doom of perjurers. Between the two parts the contracting parties passed, involving imprecations of a similar destruction upon him who should break the terms of the alliance (Gen. xv, 10; cf. Liv. i, 24); hence the expression כָּרַתְּ אֶת־הַבְּרִית (= ἕφακτα τήμνω, fedus icere), to make (lit. to cut) a treaty; hence, also, the use of the term בְּרִית (lit. imprecation) for a covenant. This usage often recurs in the prophets, and there are allusions to it in the New Testament (Jer. xxxiv, 18; Dan. xiii, 55; Matt. xxiv, 51; Luke xii, 46). The perpetuity of covenants of alliance thus contracted is expressed by calling them "covenants of salt" (Num. xviii, 19; 2 Chron. xiii, 5), salt being the symbol of incorruption, or fidelity, inasmuch as it was applied to the sacrifices (Lev. ii, 13), and probably used, as among the Arabs, at hospitable entertainments. See SALT. Occasionally a pillar or a heap of stones was set up as a memorial of the alliance

(Gen. xxxi, 52). Presents were also sent by the party soliciting the alliance (1 Kings xv, 18; Isa. xxx, 6; 1 Macc. xv, 18). The event was celebrated by a feast (Exod. xxiv, 11; 2 Sam. iii, 12, 20).

The fidelity of the Jews to their engagements was conspicuous at all periods of their history. The case of the Gibeonites affords an instance scarcely equalled in the annals of any nation. The Israelites had been absolutely cheated into the alliance; but, having been confirmed by oaths, it was deemed to be inviolable (Josh. ix, 19). Long afterward, the treaty having been violated by Saul, the whole nation was punished for the crime by a horrible famine in the time of David (2 Sam. xxi, 1 sq.). The prophet Ezekiel (xvii, 13-16) pours terrible denunciations upon King Zedekiah for acting contrary to his sworn covenant with the king of Babylon. From numerous intimations in Josephus, it appears that the Jewish character for the observance of treaties was so generally recognised after the captivity, as often to procure for them consideration from the rulers of Western Asia and of Egypt.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

ALLIANCE, EVANGELICAL. See EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

ALLIANCE, HOLY, a league entered into by the Emperor Alexander of Russia, the Emperor Francis of Austria, and Frederic William, king of Prussia, after the defeat of Napoleon in 1815, consisting of a declaration signed by them personally, that, in accordance with the precepts of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the principles of justice, charity, and peace should be the basis of the internal administration of their empires and of their international relations; and that the happiness and religious welfare of their subjects should be the great objects they should ever keep in view. It originated with Alexander, who, it is said, imagined that it would introduce a new era of Christian government; but whatever may have been the original intention, it soon became, in the hands of the wily Metternich, an instrument for the support of tyranny and oppression, and laid the foundation of the Congressional system of politics, which, while it professes to have for its object the support of legitimacy, is a horrid conspiracy against the rights and privileges of the people. See HOLY ALLIANCE.

Allison, Burgess, D.D., a Baptist minister and successful teacher, was born at Bordentown, N. J., Aug. 17, 1753, and died at Washington Feb. 20, 1827. At the age of sixteen he was baptized, and immediately began to preach. Desirous of classical and theological education, he placed himself, in 1774, under the instruction of Dr. Samuel Jones, of Lower Dublin, near Philadelphia. In 1777 he studied a short time at Rhode Island College, and on his return became pastor of the feeble congregation at Bordentown. Receiving but little compensation, he opened a classical boarding-school, which attained great reputation. Mr. Allison retired from this post in 1796 for a few years, which time he devoted to various inventions, and especially to the improvement of the steam-engine and its application to navigation. Resuming his school in 1801, he afterward reaccepted the pastorate, but was soon compelled by ill health to relinquish his labors. In 1816 he was elected chaplain to the House of Representatives, and was afterward appointed chaplain at the Navy Yard in Washington, in which office he died. Dr. Allison was offered, at different times, the presidency of three colleges, all of which he declined. He was a man of great mechanical and artistic genius, and was for a long time one of the secretaries of the American Philosophical Society. He kept up a large foreign correspondence, and wrote much for the periodicals of the day.—Sprague, Annals, vi, 121.

Allison, Francis, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, was born in Donegal County, Ireland, in 1705, educated at the University of Glasgow, and came to America in 1735. He became pastor at New London, Chester Co., Pa., in 1737, where he opened an academy in 1743. He removed to Philadelphia in 1752, and took charge of an academy there. In 1755 he was appointed vice-provost and Professor of Moral Philosophy in the newly-established University of Pennsylvania. He died in 1779. Dr. Allison was very active in the events which led to the "Great Schism" in 1741. His reputation as a classical scholar was very great.—Sprague, Annals, iii, 73.

Allison, Patrick, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, born in Lancaster Co., Pa., in 1740, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1760. He was licensed to preach in 1763, and became pastor of a church in Baltimore in 1765, and continued in its service till within two years of his death in 1802. He was a man of great influence, and especially distinguished as a deliberative speaker.—Sprague, Annals, iii, 257.

Allix, Peter, a learned French Protestant divine, born in 1641 at Alençon, educated at Saumur and at Sedan. So highly was he esteemed by those of his own opinions that, in 1670, he was invited to Charenton to succeed the learned Daillé. Here he engaged with Claude in the French translation of the Bible. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes drove him into England, where he founded a church, in which the services were carried on in French, but according to the English ritual, and in 1690 Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, gave him a canonry and the treasurer-ship of his cathedral. He died in 1717. He was a man of great learning, well acquainted with Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, and Chaldee, and a voluminous writer. His most valuable productions are, 1. Reflexions critiques et théologiques sur la controverse de l'Eglise;—2. Reflexions sur tous les livres de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament (Amst. 1689, 2 vols. 8vo);—3. The Judgment of the ancient Jewish Church against the Unitarians (Oxford, new ed. 1821, 8vo);—4. Remarks upon the Ecclesiastical History of the Churches of Piedmont (1690, new ed. Oxford, 1821, 8vo). In this treatise he seeks to show, in opposition to Bossuet, that these churches were not infected with Manichæism, and had from the apostles' time maintained the pure faith. 5. History of the Albigenses (new ed. Oxf. 1821, 8vo). He also published a translation of the book of Ratrammus, "On the Body and the Blood of Jesus Christ," with an essay, in which he attempts to show that the views of this author are contrary to the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. To the same end, Allix published (Lond. 1686), from a manuscript of the library of St. Victor, a work by the Dominican John of Paris, entitled De Modo existendi corporis Christi in sacramento altaris; and a little book of Roman Catholic origin (the authorship of which was attributed to the Abbé de Longuerue), intended to prove that transubstantiation was not a Catholic doctrine. He wrote several works in favor of the revolution in England to allay the scruples of those who hesitated to take the oath of allegiance. A full list of his works is given by Haag, La France Protestante, i, 61.—Jones, Christian Biog. p. 8.

Allocution (Lat. allocutio, i. e. an "address") is applied, in the language of the Vatican, to denote specially the address delivered by the pope at the College of Cardinals in a public consistory. The publication of the resolutions taken in the secret consistories is generally accompanied by an allocution, and frequently the condition of the Roman Church in the various countries furnishes the subject for it. It may be considered as corresponding in some measure to the official explanations which constitutional ministers give when questions are asked in Parliament, or to the political messages of the French emperor. The court of Rome makes abundant use of this method of address when it desires to guard a principle which it is compelled to give up in a particular case, or to reserve a claim for the future which has no chance of recognition in the present.—Wetzer and Welte, ii, 345.

Al'lon (Ἀλλών v. r. Ἀλών), one of the "servants of Solomon," whose descendants are said to have returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 34); but as the genuine text (Ezra ii, 57) has no such (nor the preceding) name, it is probably an error of copyists or editors for the appellative ἄλλων, "of others" (Fritzsche, Handb. in loc.), unless for Ἄμων.

Al'lon (Heb. Allon', אֵלֹן, oak, as often), the name of a place and of a man. See also ALLOX-BACHUTH; OAK.

1. A town on the border of Naphtali, according to the Auth. Vers., between Heleph and Zaunanim (Josh. xix, 33); but perhaps rather designating only some remarkable tree as a landmark near the latter place (אֵלֹן זְאֵנַיִם [v. r. אֵלֹן זְאֵנַיִם] אֵלֹן זְאֵנַיִם, and their border ran from Cheleph, thence from the oak that is by Zaunanim; Vulg. et caput terminus de Heleph, et Elon in Saunim; Sept. καὶ ἐγενήθη τὰ ὅρια αὐτῶν Μελέφ καὶ Μαχλὼν καὶ Σευνανίμ), q. d. Allon-Zaunanim, i. e. "the oak of Zaunanim" (since the enumeration in ver. 38 requires the union of these names as of one place), or "the oak of the loading of tents," as if deriving its name from some nomad tribe frequenting the spot (Stanley, Palest. p. 340 note). See ZAAUNAIM. Such a tribe were the Kenites, and in connection with them the place is again named in Judg. iv, 11, with the additional definition of "by Kedesh (Naphtali)." Here, however, the Auth. Vers. following the Vulgate, renders the words "the plain of Zaunanim."

In Josh. xix, 33, אֵלֹן, Allon, is the reading of V. d. Hooght, and of Walton's Polyglott; but most MSS. have אֵלֹן, Elon (Davidson's Hebr. Text. p. 46). In Judg. iv, 11, the Targum Jonathan renders "the plain of the swamp" (see Schwarz, Palest. p. 181). This is Ewald's explanation also (Gesch. Isr. ii, 492 note). For other interpretations, see Fürst (Heb. Handb. p. 91). In Gen. xxxv, 8, the Sam. Version, according to its customary rendering of Allon, has אֵלֹן בְּרֵיתֵי בָקִיִּת, "the plain of Bakith." See more fully under ELON.

2. (Sept. Ἀλών v. r. Ἀλών.) The son of Jedaiah and father of Shiphai, chief Simeonites, of the family of those who expelled the Hamites from the valley of Gedor (1 Chron. iv, 37). B. C. apparently considerably ante 711.

Al'lon-bach'uth (Heb. Allon'-Bakuth', אֵלֹן בַּחֻת, oak of weeping; Sept. βάλανος πένθους), a spot near Bethel, so designated from a tree under which Jacob encamped, and where Rebeckah's nurse Deborah was buried (Gen. xxxv, 8). See OAK. From the comparative rarity of large trees in the plains of Palestine, they were naturally designated as landmarks, and became favorite places for residence and sepulture (Judg. vi, 11-19; 1 Sam. xxxi, 13). See ALLOX. The particular tree in question is thought by some to have been a terebinth (q. v.), but scarcely the same under which Abraham sojourned (Gen. xviii, 1) [see MAMRE], but perhaps the "palm-tree of Deborah," under which Deborah (q. v.) dwelt (Judg. iv, 5). So Ewald (Gen. Gesch. i, 344; iii, 29) believes the "oak of Tabor" (1 Sam. x, 3, Auth. Vers. "plain of T."), to be the same as, or the successor of, this tree, "Tabor" being possibly a merely dialectical change from "Deborah" (see also Stanley, Palest. p. 143, 220). See BAAL-TAMAR.

Allophÿli (ἀλλόφρονας), a Greek term which signifies properly strangers; but is generally taken (not only in the Sept., but by classical writers) to signify the Philistines (Reland, Palest. p. 41, 75, 76). See ALIEN.

All-saints' Day, a festival celebrated by the Greek Church the week after Whitsuntide, and by the Roman Catholics on the 1st of November, in honor of all saints and martyrs. Chrysostom (Hom. 74 de Martyribus) seems to indicate that it was known in the fourth century, and that it was celebrated on Trinity Sunday, called by the Greeks Κυριακή τῶν ἁγίων (the Sunday of the Martyrs). It was introduced into the Western Church in the beginning of the seventh century by Boniface. The number of saints being excessively multiplied, it was found too burdensome to dedicate a feast-day to each, there being, indeed, scarcely hours enough in the year to distribute among them all. It was therefore resolved to commemorate on one day all who had no particular days. By an order of Gregory IV, it was celebrated on the 1st of November, 834; formerly the 1st of May was the day appointed. It was introduced into England (where it is usually called All-hallowmas) about 870, and is still observed in the English and Lutheran Churches, as well as in the Church of Rome, on 1st November.—Ittig, De Feste Omnium Sanctorum, in the Miscell. Lips. i, 300 sq.; Farrar, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v.; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. b. lxx, ch. vii, § 14.

All-souls' Day, a festival held by Roman Catholics on the day after All-saints' Day, for special prayer in behalf of the souls of all the faithful dead. It was first introduced in 998, by Odilon, abbot of Clugni, who enjoined it on his own order. It was soon after adopted by neighboring churches. It is the day on which, in the Romish Church, extraordinary masses are repeated for the relief of souls said to be in purgatory. Formerly, on this day, persons dressed in black perambulated the towns and cities, each provided with a bell of dismal tone, which was rung in public places, by way of exhortation to the people to remember the souls in purgatory (Farrar, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v.). In some parts of the west of England it is still "the custom for the village children to go round to all their neighbors souling, as they call it—collecting small contributions, and singing the following verses, taken down from two of the children themselves:

Soul! soul! for a soul-cake;
I pray, good mistress, for a soul-cake,
One for Peter, two for Paul,
Three for Them who made us all.
Soul! soul! for an apple or two;
If you've got no apples, pears will do,
Up with your kettle, and down with your pan;
Give me a good big one, and I'll be gone.

The soul-cake referred to in the verses is a sort of bun which, until lately, it was an almost general custom for people to make, and to give to one another on the 2d of November."—Notes and Queries, 1st ser. vol. iv.

Allud, Allus. See CHELLUS.

Allut, JEAN, surnamed l'Eclaircur (the Enlightener), a pseudonym adopted by a French fanatic, who, at the beginning of the 18th century, attempted at London the establishment of a new sect. His real name was Elie Marion, and he was a native of Barre, a village in the vicinity of Montpellier. His apostles or associates were Nicolas Fatio, Jean Dandé, and Charles Portails. His works, which are now very rare, are as follows: 1. D'écarterment des ténèbres d'avec la lumière, afin d'éclairer les hommes à chercher la lumière (Lond. 1710, 8vo).—2. Eclair de lumière descendant des cieux, et du relèvement de la chute de l'homme par son péché (without name of place, 1711, 8vo).—3. Plan de la justice de Dieu sur la terre dans ces derniers jours (1714, 8vo).—4. Quand vous aurez saccagé, vous serez saccagé (1714, 8vo); the latter work consists of letters signed Allut, Marion, Fatio, and Portails.—5. Avertissement Prophétique d'Elie Marion (Lond. 1707, 8vo).—6. Cri d'alarme, ou avertissement aux nations qu'ils sortent de Babelone (1712, 8vo).—Hoefcr, Biographie Générale, ii, 169.

Allwoerden, HEINRICH VON, a German theologian, a native of Stade, lived in the first half of the 18th century. He studied at Helmstedt, under the celebrated Mosheim, and, upon the advice of the latter, published a life of Servetus under the following title, Historia Michaelis Serveti (Helmstedt, 1728, 4to), with a portrait of Servetus. An abstract of this work is given in the Acta Eruditorum (Leipsic, 1728), and in the Bibliothèque raisonnée des ouvrages des savants (i, 328).—Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, ii, 169.

Allyn, JOHN, D.D., a Unitarian minister, born in Barnstable, Mass., March 21, 1767. He graduated at Harvard 1785, and in 1788 became pastor in Duxbury, Mass., which position he retained until his death, July 19, 1833. In 1820 he was the delegate from Duxbury in the Constitutional Convention of Massachusetts. He published several of his sermons and charges.—Sprague, Unitarian Pulpit, p. 207.

Almain, JACQUES, a French theologian, was born at Sens, became professor in the college at Navarre, where he had studied under John Major, in 1512. He was one of the greatest theologians of his time, and a follower of Scotus and Occam. In 1511 he took his doctor's degree, and very shortly after was chosen by the faculty of theology to reply to the work of Cajetan, on the superiority of the pope to a general council. In 1515 he died, in the very prime of life. Among his works are De Auctoritate Ecclesie seu S. Conciliorum eam representantium, etc., contra Th. de Vio (Par. 1512, and in Gerson's works, Dupin's edition); De Potestate Ecclesiastica et laicali (an exposition of the decisions of Occam; in Gerson, and also in the edition of his works published at Paris in 1517); M. rabii (Paris, 1525, 8vo).—Cave, Hist. Lit.; Landon, Eccles. Dict., i, 270; Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, ii, 179; Dupin, Ecl. Writers, cent. xvi.

Almeida, EMMANUEL, was born at Viseu, in Portugal, in 1580. He entered the order of Jesuits at the age of eighteen, and in 1622 was sent by Vitelleschi, the general of the order, as ambassador to Ethiopia, where he remained ten years, catechizing the people, and gaining an insight into their manners and customs. He died at Goa in 1646, leaving collections for a Histoire de la haute Ethiopie, which Balthazar Teller arranged, augmented, and published at Coimbra, in 1660, in folio. He also wrote Lettres Historiques (Rome, 1629, 8vo), correcting the false statements of the Dominican Urreta concerning Ethiopia.—Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, ii, 181.

Almericians or Amauricians, a short-lived sect of the thirteenth century, which derived its name from Amalric (Almeric or Amauric, of Bena), a theologian whose doctrines (approaching to Pantheism) were prohibited and condemned at Paris by a public decree in the year 1204. The followers of Almeric, after his death, led by David of Dinanto (q. v.), carried his doctrines out to their full consequences. Respecting the Trinity, they held and taught that the power of the Father had continued only during the Mosaic dispensation, that of the Son twelve hundred years after his incarnation; and that in the thirteenth century the age of the Holy Ghost commenced, in which all sacraments and external worship were to be abolished, and the salvation of Christians was to be accomplished entirely by the internal operation of the Holy Spirit, without any external acts of religion. "Although an abstract speculative system was not calculated in that age to spread among the laity, yet, through the element of mysticism, these doctrines were diffused quite widely among the people. Books unfolding the system and its practical aims were written in French, and widely circulated. Pantheism, with all its practical consequences, was more plainly expressed than Amalric had probably ever intended or expected. The members of the sect were claimed to be subjects in which the incarnation of the Holy Ghost was begun. Casarius of Heisterbach charges the sect with teaching that God had spoken in Ovid as well as in Augustin; that the only heaven and the only hell are in the present life; that those who profess the true knowledge no longer need faith or hope; they have attained already to the true resurrection, the true Paradise, the real heaven; that he who lives in mortal sin has hell in his mouth, but that it is much the same thing as having a rotten tooth in the mouth. The sect opposed the worship of saints as idolatry, called the ruling church Babylon, and the pope Anti-Christ" (Neander, Ch. History, iv, 448). See Hahn, Gesch. der Pasagier, etc. (Stuttgart, 1850, 8vo). A goldsmith by the name of William of Aria was the prophet of the sect. He claimed to be one of seven personages in which the Holy Ghost was to incarnate himself, and, besides many other prophecies, predicted to the king of France that the French empire would embrace the entire globe. As many of the followers of Amalric concealed their doctrines, commissioners were sent out into several French dioceses to discover them by professing adhesion to the views of Amalric. In 1209 fourteen of the foremost followers of Amalric were summoned before a Council of Paris, sentenced, and delivered over to the secular arm. They were kept imprisoned until the return of King Philip Augustus, when, on Dec. 20, 1210, ten of them were burned and two exiled. The council again condemned the works of Amalric, together with those of David of Dinanto, with all books of theology written in the vulgar language, and the metaphysical works of Aristotle. The physical works of Aristotle were prohibited for three years. In 1215 the fourth general council of the Latrans again condemned Amalric and his followers. In many instances it is difficult to determine which doctrines belong to Amalric himself and which to his followers. Some of the latter, it is certain, had very loose notions of morality. The sect of the Free Spirit owes its origin chiefly to the impulse given by Amalric.—Neander, Ch. Hist., iv, 446 sq.; Mosheim, Ch. Hist., cent. xiii, pt. ii, ch. v, § 12; Hahn, in Stud. u. Krit., 1846, p. 184; Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, ii, 127. See AMALRIC.

Almeyda, FRANCISCO DE, a Portuguese theologian, was born at Lisbon, July 31, 1701. He gained a great reputation as a writer on ecclesiastical law, and, on May 13, 1728, became a member of the Royal Academy. He wrote several learned works on the origin and ecclesiastical law of the churches of the Iberian Peninsula, the most important of which is entitled Aparato para a disciplina e ritos ecclesiasticos de Portugal (Lisbon, 4 vols. 1735-37, 4to).—Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, ii, 193.

Almici, PIETRO CAMILLO, an Italian oratorian, was born at Bre-cia, Nov. 2, 1714, died Dec. 30, 1779. He wrote, among other books, Reflexions Critiques on the celebrated work of Feltronus (q. v.), De Statu Ecclesie. Some of his works have not yet been published, among them one, entitled Meditations sur la vie et sur les écrits de Fr. Paolo Sapp.—Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, ii, 193.

Almo'dad (Heb. Almodad, אֱלְמוֹדָד, signif. unknown; Sept. Ἐλμοδάδ, Vulg. Elmodad, Josephus Ἐλμοδάδος, Ant. i, 6, 4), the first named of the thirteen "sons" of Joktan (Gen. x, 26; 1 Chron. i, 20), doubtless founder of an Arabian tribe. B.C. post 2384. See ARABIA. The ancient interpreters afford no light as to the location of the tribe, either simply retaining the name (Sept., Vulg., Syr., Samar.), or giving fanciful etymological paraphrases (Saad., Pseudo-jon.). Syncellus (p. 46) understands the inhabitants of Enlila (Tricar). Bochart (Phaleg, ii, 16) supposes the Allamodote (Ἀλλομοδοῖται) of Ptolemy (vi, 7, 24) to be meant; and a people in the middle of Arabia Felix, near the sources of the river Lar, which empties into the Persian Gulf. The early Arabian genealogies contain the name Modad (Al being the Arabic article) as that of at least two kings of the Jorhamida reigning in Hejaz (Caussin de Perceval, Essai sur l'Hist. des Arabes avant l'Islamisme, i, 33 sq., 168, 194 sq.), one of whom is said to have married the daughter of Ishmael (Pococke, Specim. p. 80); while another named Modar was the grandson of Adnan (Pococke, p. 46; Ibn Coteiba, in Eichhorn's Monum. Arabum, p. 63). Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 93) rejects both these names, as less likely than a corruption from Morad, the name of a tribe in the mountains of Arabia Felix near Zabid (see Abulfeda, Hist. Anteislamica, p. 190, ed. Fleischer), so called from their progenitor, a son of Kahlan, son of Saba, son of Jashhab, son of Jaarab, son of Kachtan, i. e. Joktan (Pococke, Specim. p. 42, ed. White; Abulfeda, p. 478, ed. De Sacy; Eichhorn, ut sup. p. 141; comp. generally Michaelis, Spicileg. ii, 153 sq.).

Al'mon (Heb. Almon', אֶלְמוֹן, hidden; Sept. Ἐλμών v. r. Ἰάμαλα), the last named of the four sacerdotal cities of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xxi, 18), called ΑΛΕΜΕΤΙ (q. v.) in the parallel passage (1 Chron. vi, 60), where it is named second of the three there mentioned; it is omitted in the general list of the Benjamite cities (Josh. xviii, 21-28). Jarchi and Kimchi, after the Targum of Jonathan, confound it with the ΒΑΗΡΙΜ (q. v.) of 2 Sam. iii, 16. Schwarz (Pal-est. p. 128) says he discovered the ruins of ancient buildings bearing the name Al-Muth, which he regards as Almon, on a hill one mile north-east of the site of Anathoth; doubtless the Almit similarly identified by Dr. Robinson (new ed. of Researches, iii, 287; comp. Tobler, Denkblätter, p. 631). See also ALMON-DIBLATHAIM.

Almond (אֶמְנוֹן, shaked', wakeful, from its early blossoming, comp. Plin. xvi, 25, 42) occurs as the name of a tree in Eccles. xii, 5: "The almond-tree (Sept. ἀμυγδαλον, Vulg. amygdalum) shall flourish, and the fruit of the caper (q. v.) droop, because man goeth to his long home." This evidently refers to the profuse flowering and white appearance of the almond-tree when in full bloom, and before its leaves appear. It is hence added as illustrative of the hoary hairs of age (Thomson's Lawn and Book, i, 496). Gesenius, however, objects (Thes. Heb. p. 1473) that the blossoms of the almond are not white, but roseate, like the peach-blow; but see Knobel, Ewald, Hitzig, in loc. In Jer. i, 11, a "rod of an almond-tree" (Sept. κάρπινος, Vulg. vigilans) is made an emblem of prompt vigilance and zeal, according to the inherent force of the original term (Henderson, Comment. in loc.). The produce of the tree is also denoted by the same term, evidently some species of nut, in Gen. xliiii, 11 (Sept. κάριον, Aquila and Symmachus ἀμύγαλον), where Jacob desires his sons to take into Egypt of the best fruits of the land, almonds, etc. As the almond-tree is a native of Syria and Palestine, and extends from thence to Afghanistan, and does not appear to have been indigenous in Egypt, almonds were very likely to form part of a present from Jacob, even to the great men of Egypt; the more especially as the practice of the East is for people to present what they can afford in their respective stations. In Num. xvii, 8, the rod of Aaron is described as having "brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds" (Sept. κάρα, Vulg. amygdalus). In Exod. xxv, 33, 34; xxxvii, 19 (where the derivative verb אָמַן is used), bowls are directed to be made like almonds (Sept. κarioσκον). The form of the almond would lead to its selection for ornamental carved work, independently of its forming an esteemed esculent, as well as probably yielding a useful oil. See NUT.

The word luz, translated "hazel," also occurs in Gen. xxx, 37, as the name of some tree, rods of which Jacob peeled and set before his ewes at the time of their conception; and was probably another term for the almond, of which the Arabic name is still luz (Forsk., Flora Eg. p. 67). Some think this was the wild almond, while shaked designates the cultivated variety (Rosenmüller, Aberth. IV, i, 263 sq.). See HAZEL.

The almond-tree very closely resembles the peach-tree both in form, blossoms, and fruit; the last, however, being destitute of the pulpy flesh covering the peach-nut. It is, in fact, only another species of the same genus (Amygdalus communis, Linn.). It is a native of Asia and Africa, but it may be cultivated in the south of Europe, and the hardier varieties even in the middle portions of the United States. The flowers appear as early as February (Thomson, Lawn and Book, i, 495), or even January (Pliny, xvi, 42; comp. Bahle, Calcul. Palest. p. 5 sq.; Schubert, Reis. iii, 114), the fruit in March (Kitto, Phys. Hist. of Palest.). For a general discussion of the subject, see Celsius, Hierob. i, 297 sq.; Hayne, Beschreib. d. in d. Arzneikunde gebräuchlichen Gewächse, iv, No. 39; Strumpf, Handbuch der Arzneimittellehre (Berlin, 1848), i, 93 sq.; Martius, Pharmakogn. p. 254 sq.; Loudon, *Arboret. Al'mon-diblathaim (Heb. Almon'-Diblathaim', found only with luz-local and in pause, אֶלְמוֹן דִּבְלַתַּיִם, [to the] covering of the two fig-cakes; Sept. Ἐλμών Διβλαθαιμ, Vulg. Helmondelbathaim), the fifty-first station of the Israelites [see EXODE] between Dibongad and the well (Beer) in the wilderness east of the Dead Sea (Num. xxxiii, 46, 47); probably the same elsewhere called BETH-DIBLATHAIM (Jer. xlvi, 22) and DIBLATH (Ezek. vi, 14). See DIBLATHAIM. It appears to have lain in a fertile spot not far north of Dibon-gad, perhaps on the edge of the eminence overlooking the Wady Wäleh. See DIBON-GAD.

Almoner is the name given originally to that member of a religious order who had the distribution of the money and other things set apart for alms, which, by canonical law, was to amount to at least a tenth of the revenues of the establishment. Afterward, those ecclesiastics also received this name who were appointed by princes to the same office in their households. The Grand Almoner of France was one of the principal officers of the court and of the kingdom, usually a cardinal, and, in right of his office, commander of all the orders, and also chief director of the great hospital for the blind. Queens, princes, and princesses had also their almoners, and bishops were usually appointed to this office. In England the office of hereditary grand almoner is now a sinecure, his only duty being to distribute the coronation medals among the assembled spectators. The lord high almoner, who is usually a bishop, distributes twice a year the queen's bounty, which consists in giving a silver penny each to as many poor persons as the queen is years of age. See ALMS.

Alms (ἀλεμοσύνη, mercifulness, i. e. an act of charity, Matt. vi, 1-4; Luke xi, 41; xii, 23; Acts iii, 2, 3, 10; x, 2, 4, 31; xxiv, 17; "almsdeeds," Acts ix, 36), beneficence toward the poor, from Anglo-Sax. almesse, probably, as well as Germ. almosen, from the corresponding Greek word ἀλεμοσύνη; Vulg. elemosyna (but see Bosworth, Anglo-Saxon Diet.). The word "alms" is not found in our version of the canonical books of the O. T., but it occurs repeatedly in the N. T., and in the Apocryphal books of Tobit and Ecclesiasticus. The Heb. צדקה, tsedakah, righteousness, the usual equivalent for alms in the O. T., is rendered by the Sept. in Deut. xxiv, 13, and elsewhere, ἀλεμοσύνη, while the best MSS., with the Vulg. and Rheim. Test., read in Matt. vi, 1, καταστροφή, righteousness. See POOR.

1. Jewish Alms-giving.—The regulations of the Mosaic law respecting property, and the enjoining of a general spirit of tender-heartedness, sought to prevent destitution and its evil consequences. The law in this matter is found in Lev. xxv, 35: "And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen into decay with thee, then shalt thou relieve him;" and it is liberally added, "yea, though he be a stranger or a sojourner, that he may live with thee." The consideration by which this merciful enactment is recommended has peculiar force: "I am the Lord your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt to give you the land of Canaan, and to be your God." The spirit of the Hebrew legislator on this point is forcibly exhibited in Deut. xv, 7 sq.: "If there be among you a poor man . . . thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him . . . Beware that thine eye be not evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him naught; and he cry unto the Lord against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works." The great antiquity of the practice of benevolence toward the poor is shown in Job xxix, 13 sq. How high the esteem was in which this virtue continued to be held in the time of the Hebrew monarchy may be learnt from Psa. xli, 1: "Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord will remember him in time of trouble" (comp. Psa. cxii, 9; Prov. xiv, 31). The progress of social corruption, however, led to the oppression of the poor, which the prophets, after their manner, faithfully reprobated (Isa. lviii, 3); where, among other neglected duties, the Israelites are required to deal their bread to the hungry, and to bring the outcast poor to their house (comp. Isa. x, 2; Amos ii, 7; Jer. v, 28; Ezek. xxii, 29). However favorable to the poor the Mosaic institutions were, they do not appear to have wholly prevented beggary; for the imprecation found in Psa. cix, 10, "Let his children be vagabonds and beg," implies the existence of beggary as a known social condition (comp. generally Carpzov, Elemosynæ Inditor. ex antiquitate Jud. delineate, Lips. 1728). Begging naturally led to almsgiving, though the language of the Bible does not present us with a term for "alms" till the period of the Babylonian captivity, during the calamities attendant on which the need probably introduced the practice (Gesenius, Carm. Samar. p. 63). In Dan. iv, 24, we find the Chald. word ܐܝܬܝܗܘܢ (ʾaithawun, lit. righteousness), rendered ἀλεμοσύνα in the Sept., and the ensuing member of the sentence puts the meaning beyond a question: "O king, break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by showing mercy to the poor, if it may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity." A new idea is here presented, namely, that of merit and purchase. Alms-giving had come to be regarded as a means of conciliating God's favor and of warding off evil. At a still later period this idea took a firm seat in the national mind, and almsdeeds were regarded as a mark of distinguished virtue (Tobit ii, 14; iv, 11). That begging was customary in the time of the Saviour is clear from Mark x, 46, "Blind Bartimæus sat by the wayside begging;" and Acts iii, 2, "A lame man was laid daily at the gate of the temple called Beautiful to ask alms" (comp. ver. 10). And that it was usual for the worshippers, as they entered the temple, to give relief, appears from the context, and particularly from the fine answer to the lame man's entreaty made by the Apostle Peter. See BEGGAR.

Charity toward the poor and indigent—that is, alms-giving—was probably among the later Jews a highly-honored act of piety (see Buxtorf, Florileg. Heb. p. 88 sq.; Otho, Lec. Rabb. p. 196 sq.), and hence is named even in connection with prayer and fasting (Tobit, xii, 9). It was regarded as especially agreeable to God (comp. Acts x, 4, 31; Heb. xiii, 16; Thilo, Apoc. p. 324), as meritorious in the divine sight (Prov. x, 2; xi, 4; Tob. ii, 14), even availing to blot out sins (Tob. iv, 10; Sir. xxix, 10-13; comp. Dan. iv, 24), in short, as a fulfilment of the whole law (Talm. Jerus. Peah, i). Children were early trained up to it (Tob. xiv, 11), and among the ecclesiastics of pious persons their charitableness was almost always enumerated (Sir. xxxi, 11; Acts ix, 36; x, 2). Exhortations to this virtue are especially frequent in the Proverbs of Solomon (iii, 27 sq.; xxii, 9; xxviii, 27), and in the book of Sirach (iii, 23 sq.; vii, 36), and the latter gives practical hints for the performance of this duty (xii, 1 sq.; xviii, 14; xx, 13 sq.). Accordingly, there were arrangements in the synagogues for the collection of alms on the Sabbath (Matt. vi, 2; comp. Vitringa, Synag. p. 811), and in the temple was a chamber (מִזְבֵּי הַצְדָקָה) where alms not specially designated for the poor Jews (מִזְבֵּי הַצְדָקָה) were deposited (Mishna, Shek. v, 6); on the other hand, the trumpet-shaped vessels (מִזְבֵּי הַצְדָקָה) to which some have erroneously referred the term σαλπιζω in Matt. vi, 2) served for the reception of those that individuals contributed for the support of divine worship. See TEMPLE. In the community, according to Maimonides, eleemosynary contributions were so arranged that almoners (מְצַדְקִים, collectors, fully מְצַדְקֵי הַצְדָקָה, Talm. Jerus. Demay, fol. xxiii, 2) sometimes took up collections of money in a box (מִזְבֵּי) on the Sabbath, and sometimes received daily from house to house voluntary offerings, consisting of victuals, in a vessel (מִזְבֵּי) carried for that purpose (see, [Eck or] Werner, De fisco et parvaside pauperum duab. specieb. elemosynar. vet. Ebror. Jen. 1725). By far the foremost in alms-giving were the Pharisees, but they did it mostly in an ostentatious manner. The charge laid against them in Matt. vi, 2, has not yet been fully explained, on account of the obscurity of the expression "do not sound a trumpet before thee" (μη σαλπιγγεις ἔμπροσθεν σου), which can hardly refer to the modern Oriental practice (Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 181) of beggars (as in some parts of Switzerland) demanding charity by making music, since in that case the "trumpeting" would not proceed from the donor, nor would he be at all in fault. The language conveys the idea that the Pharisees assembled the poor in the synagogues and streets by the sound of a trumpet, which naturally attracted also spectators thither; but this custom would be too ceremonious to be probable, because it would require these individuals to have an attendant with a trumpet, as they could not well have blown it themselves. By the term "synagogues" here could not be meant the audience-room, at least during divine service, but only the porch or immediate vicinity of the edifice. On the whole, the expression "sound a trumpet" may more easily be interpreted metaphorically (with the Church fathers, also Grotius, Fritzsche, Tholuck, and others), q. d., don't make a flourish of music in front of you, i. e. do not proclaim your liberality in a noisy manner. See generally Aster, D' Eleemosynis Judæorum (Lips. 1728); Maimonides, De Jure Pauperis, vii, 10; ix, 1, 6; Jahn, Arch. Bibl. iv, 371; Lightfoot; Howe Hebr. on Matt. vi, 2, and Descr. Templi, 19; and comp. Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Tuba. See OFFERINGS; TYTHES; TEMPLE.

II. Apostolical.—The general spirit of Christianity, in regard to succoring the needy, is nowhere better seen than in 1 John iii, 17: "Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" With the faithful and conscientious observance of the "royal law" of love, particular manifestations of mercy to the poor seem to be left by Christianity to be determined by time, place, and circumstances; and it cannot be supposed that a religion, one of whose principles is "that, if any would not work, neither should he eat" (2 Thess. iii, 10), can give any sanction to indiscriminate alms-giving, or intend to encourage the crowd of wandering, idle beggars with which some parts of the world are still infested. The emphatic language employed by the Lord Jesus Christ and others (Luke iii, 11; vi, 30; xi, 41 [see the treatise on this text by Sommel, Lond. and Goth. 1787]; xii, 33; Matt. vi, 1; Acts ix, 37; x, 2, 4) is designed to enforce the general duty of a merciful and practical regard to the distresses of the indigent—a duty which all history shows men have been lamentably prone to neglect; while the absence of ostentation and even secrecy, which the Saviour enjoined in connection with alms-giving, was intended to correct actual abuses, and bring the practice into harmony with the spirit of the Gospel. In the inimitable reflections of Jesus on the widow's mite (Mark xii, 42) is found a principle of great value, to the effect that the magnitude of men's offerings to God is to be measured by the disposition of mind whence they proceed; a principle which cuts up by the very roots the idea that merit attaches itself to alms-giving as such, and increases in proportion to the number and costliness of our almsdeeds.

Accordingly, we find that the duty of relieving the poor was not neglected by the early Christians (Luke xiv, 13; Acts xx, 35; Gal. ii, 10). Every individual was exhorted to lay by on the Sunday in each week some portion of his profits, to be applied to the wants of the needy (Acts xi, 30; Rom. xv, 25-27; 1 Cor. xvi, 1-4). It was also considered a duty specially incumbent on widows to devote themselves to such ministrations (1 Tim. v, 10). One of the earliest effects of the working of Christianity in the hearts of its professors was the care which it led them to take of the poor and indigent in the "household of faith." Neglected and despised by the world, cut off from its sympathies, and denied any succor it might have given, the members of the early churches were careful not only to make provision in each case for its own poor, but to contribute to the necessities of other though distant communities (Acts xi, 29; xxiv, 17; 2 Cor. ix, 12). This commendable practice seems to have had its Christian origin in the deeply interesting fact (which appears from John xiii, 29) that the Saviour and his attendants were wont, notwithstanding their own comparative poverty, to contribute out of their small resources something for the relief of the needy. See generally Gude, Eleemosynæ Eccles. Apostolica ex Antiquitate Sacra (Lauban, 1728).—Winer, i, 46; Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

III. Ecclesiastical Alms-giving.—In the early ages of Christianity alms were divided in some provinces into four portions; one of which was allotted to the bishops, another to the priests, a third to the deacons and sub-deacons, which made their whole subsistence, and a fourth part was employed in relieving the poor and in repairing churches. These alms were given to the poor at their entrance into the church. The reasons assigned for this practice by Chrysostom indicate on his part a very defective view of Gospel truth. He says, "For this reason our forefathers appointed the poor to stand before the door of our churches, that the sight of them might provoke the most backward and inhuman soul to compassion. And as, by law and custom, we have fountains before our oratories, that they who go in to worship God may first wash their hands, and so lift them up in prayer, so our ancestors, instead of fountains and cisterns, placed the poor before the door of the church, that, as we wash our hands in water, we should cleanse our souls by beneficence and charity first, and then go and offer up our prayers. For water is not more adapted to wash away the spots of the body than the power of almsdeeds is to cleanse the soul. As, therefore, you dare not go in to pray with unwashed hands, though this be but a small offence, so neither should you without alms ever enter the church for prayer" (Hom. xxv, de verb. Apost.). The period of Lent was particularly fruitful in alms. During the last week Chrysostom enjoins a more liberal distribution than usual of alms to the poor, and the exercise of all kinds of charity. The reason he assigns is, the nearer men approach to the passion and resurrection of Christ, by which all the blessings of the world were poured forth on men, the more they should feel themselves obliged to show all manner of acts of mercy and kindness toward their brethren (Bingham, bk. xxi, ch. i, § 25). At the time of marriage, as a substitute for the old Roman practice of throwing about nuts, the early Christians were accustomed to distribute alms to the poor and to children. The distribution of alms at funerals was associated with the unscriptural practice of praying for the dead. In one of Chrysostom's "Homilies," he says, "If many barbarous nations burn their goods together with their dead, how much more reasonable is it for you to give your child his goods when he is dead! Not to reduce them to ashes, but to make him the more glorious; if he be a sinner, to procure him pardon; if righteous, to add to his reward and retribution." In several of the fathers alms-giving is recommended as meritorious; and the germ of Romish teaching on the subject of salvation by the merit of good works may be clearly found in them.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. xiii, viii, § 14; Coleman, Inc. Christianity, ch. iv, § 3; Höfling, Lehre d. ält. Kirche v. Opfer. See ALMSDEER.

The order in the Church of England is, that alms should be collected at that part of the communion-service which is called the offertory, while the sentences are reading which follow the place appointed for the sermon.

In the Methodist Episcopal Church alms are collected at the sacrament of the Lord's Supper and at the love-feasts.

On the Christian duty of alms-giving see Taylor, Holy Living and Dying, ch. iv, § 8; Saurin, Sermons (Serm. ix); Barrow's Sermon on Bounty to the Poor (Works, ii, 69); Wayland's Moral Science, p. 376 sq. See CHARITY, and POOR.

IV. Civil.—The poor-laws of modern times have brought up anew the whole question of alms-giving in its relation to Christian ethics, and it requires a thorough investigation.—Chalmers on the Scottish Poor-laws (Ed. Rev. xli, 228). See HOSPITALS; PAUPER.

Almug (Heb. only in the plural almuginim, אֲלֻמִּינִים, according to Bohlen, from the Sanscrit mīcata, a similar wood, al- being the Arab. article, 1 Kings x, 11, 12; Sept. τὰ ἔλαια τὰ πελεκητά, Vulg. ligna thyma, Auth. Vers. "almug-trees"), or ALGUM (Heb. likewise only in plur. algaminim, אֲלֻגִּינִים, by transposition from the preceding, 2 Chron. ii, 8, Vulg. ligna pinea; 2 Chron. ix, 10, 11, ligna thyma; Sept. ἔλαια τὰ πικκίνα, Auth. Vers. "algum-trees"), a kind of precious wood brought along with gold and precious stones from Ophir by the navy of Hiram in the time of Solomon, and employed by him for the ornaments of the temple and palace, as well as for making musical instruments (1 Kings x, 11, 12), and previously unknown to the Israelites (2 Chron. ix, 10, 11), although it is stated to have been also procured from Lebanon (2 Chron. ii, 8). The Sept. translators of Kings understand "heaven wood" to be meant, but in Chron. it is rendered "pine wood," as by the Vulg. in one passage, although elsewhere "thyme-wood" (comp. Rev. xviii, 12), or citron-wood. See THYME. Its occurrence in 2 Chron. ii, 8 (whence the inference that it was a species of pine, see Biel, De lignis ex Libano petitis, in the Museum Hagan. iv, 1 sq., or cedar, as Abulwalid, in loc.) among the trees procurable from Lebanon (comp. its omission in the parallel passage, 1 Kings v, 8) is probably an interpolation (Rosenmüller, Bib. Bot. p. 245), since it would not in that case have afterward become unknown (1 Kings x, 12). Dr. Shaw supposes it to have been the cypress, because the wood of that tree is still used in Italy and elsewhere for violins, harpsichords, and other stringed instruments. Hiller (Hierophyt. xiii, § 7) supposes a gummy or resinous wood to be meant, but this would be unfit for the uses to which the almug-tree is said to have been applied. Josephus (Ant. viii, 7, 1) describes the wood as that of a kind of pine, which he distinguishes from the pine of his own days. Many of the rabbins (e. g. R. Tanchum) understand pearls, for which the word in the sing. (almug, אֲלֻמִּינִים) occurs in the Talmud (Mishna, Kelim, xiii, 6; comp. Maimonides and Bartinora, in loc.); but these are not a wood (אֲלֻמִּינִים), and are obtained from the Red and Mediterranean seas, whence they are even exported to India (Pliny, xxxii, 2); so that we must probably understand the Talmudists as only referring to the red or coraline hue of the wood. The interpretation of Kimchi (Targum, in loc. 2 Chron.), that it was a red dye-wood, called albacum in Arabic, and commonly Brazil-wood (Abulfadli and Edrisi, ap. Celsius (Hierobot. i, 171 sq.), who refer it to the sandal-wood of commerce (in Sanscrit, rakta), a view which is corroborated by the position of Ophir (q. v.), probably southward and eastward of the Red Sea, in some part of India (Pict. Bible, ii, 349–366), whence alone the associated products, such as gold, precious stones, ivory, peacocks, apes, and tin, could have been procured. Among those, however, who have been in favor of sandal-wood, many have confounded with the true and far-famed kind what is called "red sandal-wood," the product of Pterocarpus santalinus, as well as of Adenanthera pavonina (Beckmann, Waarckennde, II, i, 112 sq.; Wahl, Ostindien, ii, 802; Faber, Archæologie, p. 374). But the most common sandal-wood is that which is best known and most highly esteemed in India. It is produced by the Santalum album, a native of the mountainous parts of the coast of Malabar, where large quantities are cut for export to China, to different parts of India, and to the Persian and Arabian gulfs. The outer parts of this tree are white and without odor; the parts near the root are most fragrant, especially of such trees as grow in hilly situations and stony ground. The trees vary in diameter from 9 inches to a foot, and are about 25 or 30 feet in height, but the stems soon begin to branch. This wood is white, fine-grained, and agreeably fragrant, and is much employed for making rosaries, fans, elegant boxes, and cabinets. The Chinese use it also as incense both in their temples and private houses, and burn long slender candles formed by covering the ends of sticks with its sawdust mixed with rice-paste. As sandal-wood has been famed in the East from very early times, it is more likely than any other to have attracted the notice of, and been desired by, more northern nations. We do not, however, trace it by its present or any similar name at a very early period in the writings of Greek authors; it may, however, have been confounded with agila-wood, or agalochum, which, like it, is a fragrant wood and used as incense. See ALOE. Sandal-wood is mentioned in early Sanscrit works, and also in those of the Arabs. Actuarius is the earliest Greek author that expressly notices it, but he does so as if it had been familiarly known. In the Periplus of Arrian it is mentioned as one of the articles of commerce obtainable at Omama, in Gedrosia, by the name ἔλαια σαγάλανα, which Dr. Vincent remarks may easily have been corrupted from σαγᾶλανα. As it was produced on the Malabar coast, it could readily be obtained by the merchants who conveyed the cinnamon of Ceylon and other Indian products to the Mediterranean (comp. Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 93; Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Santalaceae, Santalum). See BOTANY, and comp. SANDAL-WOOD.

Aloe, Aloes, or Lign-Aloe, an Oriental tree, having a fragrant wood, but entirely different from the plant from which the bitter resin aloes is obtained, used in medicine. The Hebrew words ahalim and ahaloth (אֲחַלִּים, אֲחַלוֹת) occur in Psa. xlv, 8, "All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes (Sept. σπικρή), and cassia;" Prov. vii, 17, "I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, with cinnamon and aloes" (Sept. omits); Cant. iv, 14, "Spikenard and saffron, eglam and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense, myrrh and aloes (Sept. ἀλάς), with all the chief spices." From the articles which are associated with them (both names indicating the same thing), it is evident that it was some odoriferous substance probably well known in ancient times. See AROMATICS.

This tree or wood was called by the Greeks ἄγαλαχρον, and later ἑλαλόη (Dioscor. i, 21), and has been known to moderns by the names of aloe-wood, paradise-wood, eagle-wood, etc. Modern botanists distinguish two kinds; the one genuine and most precious, the other more common and inferior (Ains-lie, Materia Indica, i, 479 sq.). The former (Cynometra agallocha, or the Aquilaria ovata of Linn.) grows in Cochinchina, Siam, and China, is never exported, and is of so great rarity in India itself as to be worth its weight in gold (Martius, Lehrbuch der Pharmakognosie, p. 83 sq.). Pieces of this wood that are resinous, of a dark color, heavy, and perforated as if by worms, are called calumbac; the tree itself is called by the Chinese sik-hiang. It is represented as large, with an erect trunk and lofty branches. The other or more common species is called garo in the East Indies, and is the wood of a tree growing in the Moluccas, the Eccocaria agallocha of Linnaeus (Oken, Lehrb. d. Naturgesch. II, ii, 609 sq.; Lindley, Flora Med. p. 190 sq.). The leaves are like those of a pear-tree; and it has a milky juice, which, as the tree grows old, hardens into a fragrant resin. The trunk is knotty, crooked, and usually hollow (see Gildemeister, De Rebus Indicis, fasc. i, 65). The domestic name in India is aghal (Sanscrit, agaru); whence the Europeans who first visited India gave it the name of lignum aquile, or eagle-wood. From this the Hebrew name seems also to be derived (Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 33), which the Vulgate, in Numb. xxiv, 6, has translated, "As teats which the Lord hath spread;" instead of "As aloes-trees which the Lord hath planted"—in our version, "lign-aloës." Aloe-wood is said by Herodotus to have been used by the Egyptians for embalming dead bodies; and Nicodemus brought it, mingled with myrrh, to embalm the body of our Lord (John xix, 39). By others, however, the aloes (άλων) with which Christ's body was embalmed is thought to have been an extract from a different plant, the prickly shrub known among us by that name (Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Agave). Some, again, consider the lign-aloë of the Old Testament to be a different East-Indian tree from the above, namely, the Aquilaria agallochum, but whether it be the same with the more precious Alôgi or Alogians (â privative, and λόγος, denoting the Logos; or from άλογοι, unreasonable), a sect of heretics in the second century, who were ardent opponents of the Montanists. According to Epiphanius (Har. 51) they denied that Jesus Christ was the Logos, and did not receive either the Gospel according to John or the Apocalypse, both of which they ascribed to the Gnostic Cerinthus. Lardner doubts their existence. It does appear, however, that certain opponents of the Montanists not only denied the prophetic gifts claimed by these heretics, but began also to reject from the creed all those things out of which the error of the Montanists had sprung; hence they denied the continuance of the gifts of the Holy Ghost in the Church; and from thus rejecting the doctrine of the Logos, so clearly taught in the earlier part of the Gospel, they acquired their name. They are said to owe their origin to Theodotus of Byzantium, a currier. See Euseb. Ch. Hist. v, 28; Lardner, Works, iv, 190; viii, 627; Heinichen, De Alogis, etc. (Lips. 1829); Neander, Ch. Hist. i, 526, 583.

Alombrados, a mystic sect in Spain since 1575, who considered neither the sacraments nor good works necessary, and rejected the ministerial office. They were exterminated in Spain by the Inquisition in 1623. One part of them emigrated to France, where they were likewise suppressed by royal order in 1635.

A'loth (1 Kings iv, 16). See BEALOTH.

Aloysius of Gonzaga, a saint of the Roman calendar, born in Castiglione, 1568, noted in his youth for devotion and severity, entered the order of Jesuits 1587. In 1591, during an epidemic at Rome, he distinguished himself by labors and sacrifices, and finally fell a victim to the pestilence. He was canonized 1526 by Benedict XIII, and is commemorated in the Roman Church Jan. 21.—Butler, Lives of Saints, Jan. 21.

Al'pha or Α, the first letter in almost all alphabets. In Hebrew it is called aleph (א), which signifies ox, from the shape of it in the old Phœnician alphabet, where it somewhat resembles the head and horns of that animal (Plutarch, Quest. Sympos. ix, 2; Gesenii Theaur. Heb. p. 1). The following figures illustrate the steps by which this letter reached its form in various languages. See ALPHABET. Its predominant sound in nearly all languages is very simple, being little more than a mere opening of the mouth as in ah! In Hebrew, however, it is treated in gran-variety above spoken of is uncertain (Celsius, Microbot. i, 135). An inferior kind of aloës is also said to be obtained from the Aquilaria Malaccensis (Rumphius, Herbar. Amboin. ii, 29 sq.). The aloës of the ancients were procured from Arabia and India (Salmassius, Esere. ad P'na. ii, 1054 sq.). It is still highly prized as an article of luxury in the East (Harmar, Observ. ii, 149; Kämpfer, Amon. p. 901; Burchardt, Arabia, i, 216; Hartmann, Hebr. i, 315 sq.; Lamarck, Enc. Meth. i, 422-429; Roxburgh, Flora Ind. ii, 423).

The plant which has the reputation of producing the best aloës of modern shops is the Aloe Socotrina, a native of the Cape of Good Hope and the island of Socotra, but now commonly cultivated in the West Indies. The resin is obtained by inspissation from the juice of the leaves (Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Aloe). See BOTANY, and comp. LIGN-ALOE.

mar as a consonant of the guttural class, although a very soft one, corresponding to the "smooth breathing" in Greek (Ⲁ), and cannot therefore be readily represented in English. Like all the other letters of the Hebrew alphabet, it is frequently employed in the Psalms and Lamentations to indicate a division of the stanzas in the manner of an acrostic (q. v.). A remarkable instance occurs in Psa. cxix, which is divided into as many sections of several verses each as there are letters in the alphabet, the first word of each verse beginning with the letter appropriate to the section. The Hebrew name has passed over along with the letter itself into the Greek alpha. Both the Hebrews and Greeks employed the letters of their alphabets as numerals; and Α, therefore (aleph or alpha), denoted one, the first. Hence our Lord says of himself that he is (τὸ Α) Alpha and (τὸ Ω) Omega, i. e. the first and the last, the beginning and the ending, as he himself explains it (Rev. i, 8, 11; xxi, 6; xxii, 13).

This expression, which in the O. T. had already been employed to express the eternity of God (Isa. xlv, 6), was in the patristic period more definitely employed with the same significance (Tertul. De monog. c. 5; Prudentius, Cathemer. Hymn, ix, 11); and its applications were traced out with puerile minuteness (see Primasius, in the Bibl. Patr. Mar. x, 338), especially by the Gnostic Marcus (Iren. Haeres. i, 14; Tertul. Præser. c. 50). Traces of this significance as a symbol of the divinity of Christ (Rhaban, De laud. s. Crucis, i, fig. 1; Didron, Iconogr. Chrét. p. 601) have been found in the following interesting monograms, which occur on the catacombs of Melos (Ross, Reisen auf d. Inseln d. ägeischen Meeres, iii, 149) and Naples (Aginc. Pitt. xi, 9), and in the cemeteries of Rome (Manachi Orig. et antiq. Christ. iii, 75), as well as on coins and inscriptions elsewhere.

Early Christian Symbols, containing the Greek letters Α and Ω, with the cross or the sign ΧΡ (for Χριστός).

They are sometimes enclosed in a circle. See Bey-schlag, De sigillo nominis Dei hominis (Viteb. 1692); Ewald, De a et ω nomine Chr. mystico, in his Embl. ii, 169 sq.; Pfeiffer, De a et ω (Regiom. 1677); Rüdiger, De Christo per primum (ⲀⲓⲨⲀⲚⲀⲒⲔ) et ultimum (Αϰϰⲓ) S. S. vocem indicato (Gies. 1724). See OMEGA.

Alphabet (from the first two Greek letters, alpha and beta), the series of characters employed in writing any language. The origin of such written signs is unknown, having been ascribed by some to Adam and other antediluvians (Bangii Exercitationes de ortu et progressu literarum, Hafnia, 1657, p. 99 sq.), and lately to an astronomical observation of the relative position of the planets in the zodiac by Noah at the deluge (Seyffarth, Unser Alphabet ein Abbild des Thierkreises, Leipz. 1834). See LANGUAGE.

The earliest and surest data, however, on which any sound speculation on this subject can be based, are found in the genuine paleographical monuments of the Phœnicians; in the manifest derivation of all other Syro-Arabian and almost all European characters from that type, and in the testimony which history bears to the use and transmission of alphabetical writing (Carpzov, Crit. Sacr. p. 227; Kopp, Bilder und Schriften der Vorzeit, Mannh. 1819; and especially Gesenius, Scripturæ linguæque Phœnicæ monumenta, Lips. 1837). See WRITING.

The earliest Phœnician.

Historical derivation of Alphabets.

There are only three nations which can compete for the honor of the discovery, or rather the use and transmission of letters—the Babylonians, the Phœnicians, and the Egyptians. The chief arguments in favor of the first (Kopp, Bilder und Schriften, ii, 147; Hoffmann, Gram. Syr. p. 61) are based on the very early civilization of Babylon; on numerous passages which attribute the discovery to the Σίροι, Syri, and Χαλδαῖοι (quoted in Hoffmann, l. c.); and especially on the existence of a Babylonian brick containing an inscription in characters resembling the Phœnician. To these arguments Gesenius has replied most at length in the article Palæographie, in Ersch and Gruber's Allgemeine Encyclopædie.

Nearly an equal number of ancient authorities might be cited as testimonies that the discovery of letters was ascribed to the Phœnicians and to the Egyptians (Waltou's Prolegomena, ii, 2). And, indeed, there is a view, suggested by Gesenius (Palæographie, l. c.), by which their rival claims might, to a certain extent, be reconciled—that is, by the supposition that the hieroglyphical was, indeed, the earliest kind of all writing; but that the Phœnicians, whose commerce led them to Egypt, may have borrowed the first germ of alphabetical writing from the phonetic hieroglyphs. There is at least a remarkable coincidence between the Syro-Arabian alphabet and the phonetic hieroglyphs, in that in both the figure of a material object was made the sign of that sound with which the name of the object began. See ALPHA. But, if this theory were true, it would still leave the Phœnicians the possibility of having actually developed the first alphabetical writing; and that, together with the fact that the earliest monuments of the Syro-Arabians have preserved their characters, and the unanimous consent with which ancient writers ascribe to them the transmission of the alphabet to the Greeks (Herod. v, 58; Diod. Sic. v, 74), may make the probabilities preponderate in their favor.—Kitto, Cyclop. On this assumption, the following table exhibits the probable derivation of the alphabets of the three leading types, the Shemitic, the Indo-Germanic, and the modern European, as represented by the three forms of character employed in this work, namely, the Hebrew, Greek, and English, to which all the others bear a well-known and mostly obvious relation. The sounds attributed to them respectively, however, were in many cases different. Another and more fundamental variation arises from the fact that in the Hebrew all the letters are regarded as consonants, the vowels being designated by certain additional marks called "points," of late invention. See HEBREW LANGUAGE. For a view of the printed characters of all languages with their powers, see Ballhorn, Alphabete orientalischer und occidentalischer Sprachen (Leipzig and Lond. 1859). This (and still more the above) classification must be understood as applying only to the written symbols, and not to the etymological affinities of languages, which depend upon national derivation. Alphæus (Ἀλφαῖος), the name of two men.

1. The putative father of James the Less (Matt. x, 3; Mark iii, 18; Luke vi, 15; Acts i, 13), and husband of Mary, the sister-in-law of our Lord's mother (John xix, 25) [see MARY]; for which reason James is called "the Lord's brother" (Gal. i, 19). See JAMES. A. D. ante 26. It seems that he was a (perhaps elder) brother of Joseph, to whom, on his decease without issue, his widow was married according to the Levirate Law (q. v.). By comparing John xix, 25, with Luke xxiv, 10, and Matt. x, 3, it appears that Alphæus is the Greek, and Cleophas or Clopas (q. v.) the Hebrew or Syriac name of the same person, according to the custom of the provinces or of the time, when men had often two names, by one of which they were known to their friends and countrymen, and by the other to the Romans or strangers. More probably, however, the double name in Greek arises, in this instance, from a diversity in pronouncing the π in his Aramaean name, $\pi\alpha\lambda\phi\alpha\gamma$ (chalphay), changing, as in the Talmudists. Lightfoot, ad Acts, i, 13; a diversity which is common also in the Septuagint (Kuiniol, Comment. on John xix, 25). See NAME. Or rather, perhaps, Ch'p'is was a Greek name adopted out of resemblance to the Jewish form of Alphesus (like "Paul" for "Saul"), if, indeed, the former be not the original from which the latter was derived by corruption.

2. The father of the evangelist Levi or Matthew (Mark ii, 14). A. D. ante 26.

Alphage or Elphegus, archbishop of Canterbury, distinguished for humility and piety. Being infected with the views of the age, he took the habit in the monastery of the Benedictines, and afterward shut himself up in a cell at Bath. Here he remained until, the see of Winchester being vacated by the death of Ethelwold, Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, called him to the vacant bishopric. In 1005 he was elevated to the see of Canterbury. After he had governed this metropolitan see some years, the Danes made an irruption into the city, burned the cathedral, and having put to death upward of seven thousand of the inhabitants, seized the archbishop, whom they kept in bonds seven months, and then murdered; this was on the 19th April, 1012. Godwin remarks that the murderers did not escape the penalty of their sacrilegious act, scarcely one in the whole Danish army having escaped.—Collier, Eccles. Hist. i, 487-493.

Alphen, JEROME SIMON VAN, a German theologian, was born at Hanau, May 23, 1665; studied at Franeker and Leyden; became pastor at Warmond, and afterward at Amsterdam; and finally, in 1715, professor of theology at Utrecht, which office he filled until his death at Utrecht, Nov. 7, 1742. His principal work is Specimina Analytica, in Epist. Pauli (Utrecht, 1742, 2 vols. 4to).—Drakenborch, Oratio Funerbris in Van Alphen (Utrecht, 1743); Hoefler, Biog. Générale, i, 210.

Alphery, NICEPHORUS (or MIKIPHER), a Russian, allied by birth to the imperial family. In consequence of political troubles, he went to England, studied theology, and, in 1618, became curate of Warlen, Huntingdonshire. It is said that he was repeatedly called from his retirement to return to Russia, even with offers of the imperial throne; but he preferred his quiet duties in England. In 1643 he was deprived of his living, but it was restored to him after the Restoration, and he lived, greatly respected, to a great age.—Biographia Britannica, s. v.; Walker, Survivings of the Clergy in the Great Rebellion, pt. ii.

Alphitomancy, a kind of divination (q. v.) performed with barley, first among the pagans, and from them introduced among Christians. A person suspected of crime was brought before a priest, who made him swallow a piece of barley-cake; if this was done without difficulty, he was declared to be innocent; otherwise, not.—Delrio, Disq. Magicæ, lib. iv, cap. 11; Landon, Eccles. Diet. s. v.

Alphonso de Alcalá (in Latin ALPHONSUS COMPLUTENSIS), a Spanish rabbi, was a native of Alcalá de Henares, and lived toward the close of the 15th century. He embraced Christianity, and was employed by Cardinal Ximenes in the revision of the celebrated Polyglot.—Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. i, 193.

Alphonso de Zamora, a Spanish Jew and distinguished rabbi, converted to the Catholic faith, and baptized in 1506. Cardinal Ximenes employed him for fifteen years upon his celebrated Polyglot, after which he composed a Dictionary of the Chaldee and Hebrew words of the Old Testament, and other works relating to the text of the Holy Scriptures. In these labors he had some assistance from others; but he composed many other works by himself, mostly on the Hebrew tongue. He wrote also, from Spain, a letter to the Roman Jews, in Hebrew and Latin interlined, reproaching them for their obstinacy.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1506; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. i, 193.

Alphonsus of Liguori. See LIGUORI.

Alsted, JOHANNIS HEINRICH, a German Protestant divine, born in 1588 at Herborn, in Nassau, professor of philosophy and theology in his native town, and subsequently at Weissenbourg, in Transylvania, where he died in 1638. He represented the Reformed Church of Nassau at the Synod of Dort. Among his numerous works may be mentioned, Tractatus de Mille Annis (1618; a treatise on the Millennium, translated and published in London in 1643, 4to); Encyclopædia Bihlica (Francof. 1620, 1642), in which he attempts to prove that the principles and materials of all the arts and sciences should be sought for in the Scriptures. He wrote also a general Encyclopædia (Lyons, 1649, 4 vols. fol.), and other works, of which a list may be found in Nicéron, Mémoires, t. xli.

Altanæus (Αλτανάιος, prob. for Μαλτανάιος, and this, by resolution of the dagesh, for Μαλτανάιος), one of the "sons" of Asom (or Hashum), who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 35); evidently the MATTENAI (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 33).

Altar (עֹזֶזֶת, ni'zhe' a'ch, from עֹזֶזֶת, to slay in sacrifice; βοθράς), a structure on which sacrifices of any kind are offered. In ancient times this was always done by slaughter or by fire. The term is borrowed in modern times to signify a table or other erection in a church on which the sacraments are administered, or near which prayer is offered and other religious exercises performed (comp. Heb. xiii, 10). They were originally of earth (Exod. xx, 24; comp. Lucan. ix, 988; Horace, Od. s, iii, 8, 4; Ovid, Metam. iv, 752; Trist. v, 5, 9; Pliny, v, 4) or unwrought stone (Exod. xx, 25), erected on such spots as had been early held sacred (Gen. xii, 7 sq.; xiii, 18; xxvi, 25; xxxv, 1; Exod. xvii, 15; xxiv, 4 sq.), especially hill-tops and eminences (Gen. xxii, 9; Ezek. xviii, 6; comp. Herod. i, 131; Homer, Iliad. xxii, 171; Apollon. Rhod. 524; Livy, xxi, 38; Philostr. Apol. i, 2), also house-tops (2 Kings xxiii, 12), as being nearer the sky (Tacit. Ann. xiii, 57; Philostr. Apol. ii, 5); occasionally under remarkable trees (2 Kings xvi, 4). See Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Ara; Selden, Synedr. iii, 269 sq.; Jahn, Archæol. pt. iii, c. 2, 5; Bähr, Synbo'ik, i, 157, 233; Lakemacher, Antiq. Græc. sacr. p. 221 sq. The stone altars erected to the true God (Josh. viii, 31; 1 Kings xviii, 31; 1 Sam. vi, 14) were imitated by the Gentiles, as appears from Pausanias (vi, 382), where he mentions "an altar of white stone," and Apollonius Rhodius, in speaking of the temple of Mars (Argon. ii). Altars were generally erected at the gates of the city (2 Kings xxiii, 8). We may refer to this Acts xv, 13, where the priest of Jupiter is said to have brought filleted oxen to the gates to perform sacrifice. An altar, both among the Jews and the heathen, was an asylum, a sanctuary, for such persons as fled to it for refuge (Exod. xxi, 14; 1 Kings i, 50; ii, 28, etc.). As to the practice of the heathen in this respect, all the Greek writers are more or less copious. See HOMER.

Heb. xiii, 10, "We have an altar," etc., Macknight explains thus: "Here, by a usual metonymy, the altar is put for the sacrifice, as is plain from the apostle's adding 'of which they have no right to eat.' This is the sacrifice which Christ offered for the sins of the world; and the eating of it does not mean corporeal eating, but the partaking of the pardon which Christ, by that sacrifice, had procured for sinners" (comp. Olshausen, Comment. in loc.). See LORD'S SUPPER.

One wooden table was wont to be placed in the midst of every meeting-place of the primitive Christians, upon which each of them laid what he bestowed for the use of the poor, as we are informed by Theodoret (v. 18; see Heb. xii, 16); and because alms are noted with the name of sacrificy, that table upon which they were laid was called by the ancient Christians an altar. Compare SACRIFICE.

level for the fire and the sacrifice. Such are the cairns of altar-like form, many of which still remain; but as they are sometimes found in places where stones of large size might have been obtained, it seems that in later times such altars had a special appropriation; and Toland shows (Hist. of Brit. Druids, p. 101) that the sacred fires were burned on them, and sacrifices

I. Pagan.—There is a strong probability that some of those ancient monuments of unhewn stone, usually called Druidical remains, which are found in all parts of the world, were derived from the altars of primitive times. See STONE. These are various in their forms, and their peculiar uses have been very much disputed. (See Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Avebury, Carnac, Stonehenge.) Dr. Kitto has elaborately examined the subject (Vict. Hist. of Palest., append. to bk. iii, ch. iii and iv), and comes to the conclusion that the cromlechs are representatives of ancient altars, while the kistvaens, or stones disposed in a chest-like form, are analogous to the arks of Jewish and Egyptian worship [see ARK], and are remnants of the so-called arkite traditions. See FLOOD. Cromlechs are somewhat in the form of a table, one large stone being sup-offered to Bel, Baal, or the Sun. In many instances, as at Stonehenge, a circle of stones is ranged around a central one in an amphitheatrical manner, an arrangement which has been found to take place likewise even in Persia, as at Darab (Ouseley's Travels, ii, 124). Caesar refers to such consecrated circles for national deliberation among the Gauls (Bell. Gall. v), and Homer alludes to Grecian councils held within circles of stones (Il. xviii, 585; comp. Od. viii, 5). The following, figured from Ouseley (Travels in Persia, ii, 80-83), was called by the natives "Stone of the Fire Temple," and is surrounded by a low wall. It is ten or eleven feet high, and about three square. Two sides contain an inscription, in Pehlvi, within a sunken ported in a horizontal or slightly inclined position upon three or more, but usually three stones, set upright. That they were used as altars is almost instinctively suggested to every one that views them; and this conclusion is strengthened when, as is often the case, we observe a small circular hole through which probably the rope was run by which the victims, when slaughtered, were bound to the altar, as they were to the angular projections or "horns" of the Jewish altar (Psa. cxliii, 27). It was natural that when a sufficiency of large stones could not be found, heaps of smaller ones should be employed, and that, when practicable, a large flat stone would be placed on circle. There is a small cavity on the top, as if to contain fire. The pyramids (q. v.) of Egypt may likewise have been originally sites of worship.

Passing by the early and rude forms of altars still extant of the Mexican worship, since too little is known of the history and application of these to illustrate our subject in any definite manner, we notice those of Egypt as being first both in point of aptness and antiquity. The first of the accompanying specimens is of a purely Egyptian character, and is taken from the representations of sacrifice upon the monuments.

Egyptian Altar of Burnt-offering.

Among the ancient Egyptian pictures that have been discovered at Herculaneum are two of a very curious description, representing sacred ceremonies of the Egyptians, probably in honor of Isis.

In one the scene is in the area before a temple (as usual); the congregation is numerous, the music various, and the priests engaged are at least nine persons. The temple is raised, and an ascent of eleven steps leads up to it.

In the entire painting, of the birds or ibises one is lying down at ease, another is standing up without fear or apprehension; a third, perched on some piling, is looking over the heads of the people; and a fourth is standing on the back of a Sphinx, nearly adjacent to the temple, in the front of it. It deserves notice that this altar (and the other also) has at each of its four corners a rising, which continues square to about half its height, but from thence is gradually sloped off to an edge or a point. These are no doubt the horns of the altar, and probably this is their true figure (see Exod. xxvii, 2, etc.; xxix, 12; Ezek. xliii, 15). The priest is blowing up the fire, apparently with a fan, so as to avoid the pollution of the breath. The other figure, which we give more in full, shows the horns of the altar, formed on the same principle as the foregoing; but this is seen on its angle, and its general form is more elevated. It has no garlands, and perfumes appear to be burning on it. In this picture the assembly is not so numerous as in the other; but almost all, to the number of ten or a dozen persons, are playing on musical instruments.

Greco-Egyptian Altar of Incense.

The idolaters in the first ages of the world, who generally worshipped the sun, appear to have thought it improper to confine the supposed infinity of this imaginary deity within walls, and therefore they generally made choice of woods and mountains, as the most convenient places for their idolatry; and when, in later times, they had brought in the use of temples, yet for a long time they kept them open-roofed. With such a form of worship notions of gloomy sublimity were associated, and so prevalent was the custom, that the phrase "worshipping on high places," is frequently used to signify idolatry in the Old Testament. The worshipping on high-places was strictly forbidden to the Jews; not merely because the custom had a tendency to produce idolatry, but also because the customary form of that idolatry was the worst, the most cruel, and the most debasing. See HIGH-PLACE. It was before these altars, in groves and mountains, that human sacrifices were most frequently offered, that parents whose natural affections were blighted and destroyed by dark superstitions made their children pass through the fire to Moloch; and it was in such places that licentiousness and depravity were systematically made a part of public worship. See IDOLATRY. It does not appear from the monuments that altars on high-places were common in Egypt, though there are some traces of worship in groves. See ASHERAH.

The heathens at first made their altars only of turf, afterward of stone, marble, wood, and other materials. They differed in form as well as material, some being round, some square, and others triangular. All their altars turned toward the east, and stood lower than the statue of the god, and were adorned with sculptures representing the deity to whom erected, or the appropriate symbols. These altars were of two kinds, the higher and the lower; the higher were intended for the celestial gods, and were called by the Romans altaria; the lower were for the terrestrial and infernal gods, and were called arae. Those dedicated to the heavenly gods were raised a great height above the ground; those of the terrestrial gods were almost even with the surface, and those for the infernal deities were only holes dug in the ground, called scrobiculi. Most of the ancient Greek altars were of a cubical form; and hence, when the oracle of Apollo at Delphi commanded that a new altar should be prepared exactly double the size of that which already stood in the temple, a problem was given surpassing the powers of science in those days, which is well known to mathematicians under the name of the duplication of the cube. The great temples of Rome generally contained three altars; the first, in the sanctuary at the foot of the statue, for incense and libations; the second, before the gate of the temple, for the sacrifice of victims; and the third, like the table of shewbread, was a portable one for the offerings and vessels to lie upon.

Altars represented on Roman Coins.

The ALTAR AT ATHENS, inscribed "to the unknown God."—Paul, discoursing in that city on the resurrection of the dead, was carried by some of the philosophers before the judges of the Areopagus, where he uses this expression (Acts xvii, 22, 23): "Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious" (over-fond of gods); "for as I passed by, and beheld your sacred instruments, I found an altar with this inscription, 'To the unknown god,' him, therefore, whom ye worship as 'unknown,' him I declare" (represent, announce) "I unto you." The question is, What was this altar thus consecrated to the "unknown god?" Jerome says that it was inscribed "to the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africa:—to the unknown and strange gods;" and that the apostle uses the singular form because his design was only to demonstrate to the Athenians that they adored an unknown god (Comment. ad Tit. i, 12). Some, as Grotius, Vossius, Beza, believe that Paul speaks of altars extant in several places of Attica, without any inscription, erected after a solemn expiation for the country, by the philosopher Epimenides (Diog. Laert. Vit. Epim. i, 29). Others conceive that this altar was the one mentioned by Pausanias (i. 1) and Philostratus (Vit. Ap. vi, 3), who speak of altars at Athens consecrated "to the unknown gods." Lucian (Philopat. § 9) swears "by the unknown god at Athens." He adds, "Being come to Athens, and finding there the unknown god, we worshipped him, and gave thanks to him, with hands lifted up to heaven" (but see Niemeyer, Interp. Orat. Pauli in Areop. heb.). Peter Comestor relates that Dionysius the Areopagite, observing while he was at Alexandria the eclipse which, contrary to nature, happened at the death of our Saviour, from thence concluded that some unknown god suffered; and not being then in a situation to learn more of the matter, he erected at his return to Athens this altar "to the unknown god," which gave occasion to Paul's discourse at the Areopagus. Theophylact, Ecumenius, and others, give a different account of its origin and design, but each of their opinions, as also those we have noticed, has its difficulties. Augustine had no doubt that the Athenians, under the appellation of the unknown God, really worshipped the true one (comp. Hales, Analysis, iii, 519-531). See ATHENS. The most probable appears to be the conjecture of Eichhorn (Allgem. Biblioth. iii, 414), to which Niemeyer subscribes, that there were standing at Athens several very ancient altars, which had originally no inscription, and which were afterward not destroyed, for fear of provoking the anger of the gods to whom they had been dedicated, although it was no longer known who these gods were. He supposes, therefore, that the inscription ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ, to an

[some] unknown God, was placed upon them; and that one of these altars was seen by the apostle, who, not knowing that there were others, spoke accordingly. To this we may add the notion of Kuinōl (Comment. in loc.), who considers it proved that there were several altars at Athens on which the inscription was written in the plural number, and believes that there was also one altar with the inscription in the singular, although the fact has been recorded by no other writer; for no argument can be drawn from this silence to the discredit of a writer, like Paul, of unimpeached integrity. The altar in question, he thinks, had probably been dedicated ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ on account of some remarkable benefit received, which seemed attributable to some God, although it was uncertain to whom. See UNKNOWN GOD.

So much at least is certain, both from Paul's assertion and the testimony of Greek profane writers, that altars to an unknown god or gods existed at Athens. But the attempt to ascertain definitely whom the Athenians worshipped under this appellation must ever remain fruitless for want of sufficient data. The inscription afforded to Paul a happy occasion of proclaiming the Gospel; and those who embraced it found indeed that the Being whom they had thus "ignorantly worshipped" was the one only living and true God (Lardner's Works, vii, 319-321). See PARL.

II. Jewish.—Cain and Abel appear to have worshipped at some primitive form of altar (Gen. iv, 3, 4); but the first altar we read of in the Bible was that erected by Noah on leaving the ark. According to a rabbinical legend, it was partly formed from the remains of one built by Adam on his expulsion from Paradise, and afterward used by Cain and Abel, on the identical spot where Abraham prepared to offer up Isaac (Zohar, Gen. li, 3, 4; Jonathan's Targum, Gen. ix, 20; xxii, 29). Mention is made of altars erected by Abraham (Gen. xii, 7; xiii, 4; xxii, 9); by Isaac (xxvi, 25); by Jacob (xxxiii, 20; xxxv, 1, 3); by Moses (Exod. xvii, 15). After the giving of the law, the Israelites were commanded to make an altar of earth; they were also permitted to employ stones, but no iron tool was to be applied to them. This has been generally understood as an interdiction of sculpture, in order to guard against a violation of the second commandment. Altars were frequently built on high places (q. v.), the word being used not only for the elevated spots, but for the sacrificial structures upon them (Cruzer, Symbol. i, 159; Gesenius, Comment. zu Jesa. ii, 282). Thus Solomon built a high-place for Chemosh (1 Kings xi, 7), and Josiah broke down and burnt the high-place, and stamped it small to powder (2 Kings xxiii, 15). Such structures, however, were forbidden by the Mosaic law (Deut. xii, 13; xvi, 5), except in particular instances, such as those of Gideon (Judg. vi, 26) and David (2 Sam. xxiv, 18). It is said of Solomon that he "loved the Lord, walking in the statutes of David, his father, only he sacrificed and burnt incense on the high-places" (1 Kings iii, 3). Altars were sometimes built on the roofs of houses: in 2 Kings xxiii, 12, we read of the altars that were on the top of the upper chamber of Ahaz. In the tabernacle, and afterward in the temple, two altars were erected, one for sacrifices, the other for incense; the table for the shew-bread is also sometimes called an altar.

1. The ALTAR OF BURNT-OFFERING (בִּזְבֹּחַ הַעֹלֹת), Exod. xxx, 28, or brazen altar (בִּזְבֹּחַ הַבְּרָזָה), Exod. xxxix, 39, called in Mal. i, 7, 12, "the table of the Lord," perhaps also in Ezek. xliv, 16. This differed in construction at different times.

(a.) In the tabernacle (Exod. xxvii, xxxviii) this was a hollow square, five cubits in length and breadth, and three cubits in height; it was made of shittim-wood [see SHITTIM], and overlaid with plates of brass. In the middle there was a ledge or projection (בִּרְכָב, karkob, Rosenmüller, deambulatorium), on which the priest stood while officiating; immediately below this a brass grating was let down into the altar to support the fire, with four rings attached, through which poles were passed when the altar was removed. Some critics have supposed that this grating was placed perpendicularly, and fastened to the outward edge of this projection, thus making the lower part of the altar larger than the upper. Others have imagined that it extended horizontally beyond the projection, in order to intercept the coals or portions of the sacrifice which might accidentally fall off the altar. To this effect is a statement by the Targumist Jonathan. But for such a purpose (as Bähr remarks, Synbol. i, 480) a grating seems very unsuitable (comp. Josephus, Ant. iii, 6, 8). As the priests were forbidden to go up by steps to the altar (Exod. xx, 26; comp. Gell. x, 15; Servius, ad. En. iv, 646), a slope of earth was probably made rising to a level with the projection. According to the Jewish tradition, this was on the south side, which is not improbable; for on the east was "the place of the ashes" (Lev. i, 16), and the laver of brass was probably near the western side, so that only the north and south sides were left (Ezek. viii, 5). Those critics who suppose the grating to have been perpendicular or on the outside consider the injunction in Exod. xx, 24, as applicable to this altar, and that the inside was filled with earth; so that the boards of shittim-wood formed merely a case for the real altar. So Jarchi, on Exod. xxvii, 5. Its corners were ornamented with "horns" (Exod. xxix, 12; Lev. iv, 18 sq.). See HORN.

In Exod. xxvii, 3, the following utensils are mentioned as belonging to the altar, all of which were to be made of brass. 1. סִירֹת, siroth', pans or dishes to receive the ashes (q. v.) that fell through the grating. 2. גַּיְמִים, gayim', shovels (Vulg. forcipes), for cleaning the altar. 3. בַּזְּרִיקוֹת, mizrakoth' (Auth. Vers. basins; Sept. φιάλαι; Gesenius, patena sacrificia), vessels for receiving the blood and sprinkling it on the altar. 4. בַּזְּלָגוֹת, mizlagoth' (Auth. Vers. "flesh-hooks;" Sept. κρετέγραι; Vulg. fuscinule), large forks to turn the pieces of flesh, or to take them off the fire (see 1 Sam. ii, 13). 5. בַּחֲזֵיזוֹת, machoth' (Auth. Vers. "fire-pans;" Sept. τὸ πυρῆτω); the same word is elsewhere translated cuspers (Num. xvi, 17); but in Exod. xxv, 38, "snuff-dishes;" Sept. ὑποθίμαρα. (Comp. Lamy, De Tabern. p. 439 sq.; Meyer, Bibeldeut. p. 201 sq.; Van Til, De Tabernac. p. 57.)

(b.) The altar of burnt-offerings in Solomon's temple was of much larger dimensions, "twenty cubits in length and breadth, and ten in height" (2 Chron. iv, 1; comp. 1 Kings viii, 22, 64; ix, 25), and was made entirely of brass, i. e. bronze plates covering a structure of earth or stone (Cramer, De Ara exter. p. 29 sq.). It is said of Asa that he renewed (הִתְקַדְּשָׁה), that is, either repaired (in which sense the word is evidently used in 2 Chron. xxiv, 4) or reconstructed (Sept. ἰνκαυωτε) the altar of the Lord that was before the porch of the Lord (2 Chron. xv, 8). This altar was removed by King Ahaz (2 Kings xvi, 14); it was "cleansed" by Hezekiah; and in the latter part of Manasseh's reign was rebuilt. It is not certain whether this was one of the sacred utensils which the Babylonians broke up and removed their materials (Jer. lii, 17 sq.).

(c.) Of the altar of burnt-offering in the second temple, the canonical scriptures give us no information, excepting that it was erected before the foundations of the temple were laid (Ezra iii, 3, 6), on the same place where it had formerly been built (Josephus, Ant. xi, 4, 1). From the Apocrypha, however, we may infer that it was made, not of brass, but of unhewn stone (comp. Spencer, Leg. rit. p. 418 sq.; Bähr, Symbol. i, 489; Cramer, p. 32 sq.), for in the account of the restoration of the temple service by Judas Maccabæus, it is said, "They took whole stones, according to the law, and built a new altar according to the former" (1 Macc. iv, 47). When Antiochus Epiphanes pillaged Jerusalem, Josephus informs us that he left the temple bare, and took away the golden candlesticks, and the golden altar (of incense), and table (of shew-bread), and the altar of burnt-offering (Ant. xii, 5, 4).

(d.) The altar of burnt-offering erected by Herod is thus described by Josephus (Wars, v, 5, 6): "Before this temple stood the altar, fifteen cubits high, and equal both in length and breadth, each of which dimensions was fifty cubits. The figure it was built in was a square, and it had corners like horns, and the passage up to it was by an insensible acclivity from the south. It was formed without any iron tool, nor did any iron tool so much as touch it at any time." The dimensions of this altar are differently stated in the Mishna (Middoth, iii, 1). It is there described as a square 32 cubits at the base; at the height of a cubit it is reduced 1 cubit each way, making it 50 cubits square; at 5 cubits higher it is similarly contracted, becoming 28 cubits square, and at the base of the horns 26 cubits; and, allowing a cubit each way for the deambulacrum, a square of 24 cubits is left for the fire on the altar. Other Jewish writers place the deambulacrum 2 feet below the surface of the altar, which would certainly be a more suitable construction. The Mishna states, in accordance with Josephus, that the stones of the altar were unhewn, agreeably to the command in Exod. xx, 25; and that they were whitewashed every year at the Passover and the feast of tabernacles. On the south side was an inclined plane, 32 cubits long and 16 cubits broad, made likewise of unhewn stones. A pipe was connected with the south-west horn, through which the blood of the victims was discharged by a subterraneous passage into the brook Kedron. Under the altar was a cavity to receive the drink-offerings, which was covered with a marble slab, and cleansed from time to time. On the north side of the altar several iron rings were fixed to fasten the victims. Lastly, a red line was drawn round the middle of the altar to distinguish between the blood that was to be sprinkled above and below it (Roland, Antiq. Sacr. p. 97 sq.; Lamy, De Tabernac. table 16; L'Empereur, in the Mishna, in loc.; Cramer, De Ara exteriori Templi secundi, Lingl. Bat. 1697, and in Ugolini Thesaur. x; Ugolini Altare exteri, in his Thesaur. x; Otho, Lex. Hebr. p. 32 sq.).

According to Lev. vi, 6, the fire on the altar of burnt-offerings was not permitted to go out (Buxtorf, Historia ignis sacri, in his Exercit. p. 288 sq.; and in Ugolini Thesaur. x; Horeb, De igne Sacro, in Ugolini Thesaur. xxxii; Bohn, De igne Gentilium sacro in Israel, sacra injuria, in Ugolini Thesaur. x; comp. Marcel. xxiii, 6; Pausan. v, 15, 5; viii, 9, 1; Plutarch, Numa, ix; Solin. v; Serv. ad Æn. xii, 200; Val. Max. i, 1, 7; Zendavesta, iii, 237), and, according to the rabbinical traditions, renewed in like manner on several occasions (Gemara, Yoma, 21; Zebach, 61, 2; 2 Macc. i, 19 sq.; comp. Van Dale, De Idolatr. c. viii, p. 149 sq.). See BURNTOFFERING.

2. The second altar belonging to the Jewish Cultus was the ALTAR OF INCENSE (כִּנּוּרֵי הַקֶּדֶשׁ and כִּנּוּרֵי הַקֹּדֶשׁ, Exod. xxx, 1; Sept. θυσιαστήριον θυμιατῶτος), called also the golden altar (כִּנּוּרֵי הַקֹּדֶשׁ, Exod. xxxix, 38; Num. iv, 11) to distinguish it from the altar of burnt-offering, which was of less costly materials (Exod. xxxviii, 30). Probably this is meant by the "altar of wood" spoken of in Ezek. xli, 22, which is further described as the "table that is before the Lord," an expression precisely suitable to the altar of incense (see Delitzsch, Brief an die Hebr. p. 678). The name כִּנּוּרֵי הַקֶּדֶשׁ, "altar," was not strictly appropriate, as no sacrifices were offered upon it; but once in the year, on the great day of atonement, the high-priest sprinkled upon the horns of it the blood of the sin-offering (Exod. xxx, 10). It was placed between the table of shew-bread and the golden candlestick (Lev. xvi, 18), i. e. in the holy place, "before the vail that is by the ark of the testimony" (Exod. xxx, 6; xl, 5). Philo, too, speaks of it as "within the first vail," and as standing between the candlestick and the table of shew-bread. In apparent contradiction to this, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews enumerates it among the objects which were within the second vail, i. e. in the Holy of Holies. It is true that by ἑμυαρίων in this passage may be meant "a censor," in accordance with the usage of the Sept., but it is better understood of the altar of incense, which by Philo and other Hellenists is called θυμιατήριον. It is remarkable also that in 1 Kings vi, 22, this same altar is said to belong to "the oracle" (כִּנּוּרֵי הַקֹּדֶשׁ הַקֹּדֶשׁ הַקֹּדֶשׁ), or most holy place. This may perhaps be accounted for by the great typical and symbolical importance attached to this altar, so that it might be considered to belong to the "second tabernacle." (See Bleek on Heb. ix, 4, and Delitzsch, in loc.)

(a.) This altar in the tabernacle was made of shittim-wood overlaid with gold plates, and was one cubit in length and breadth, and two cubits in height. It had horns (Lev. iv, 7) of the same materials; and round the flat surface (כֶּפֶץ, gag, "top") was a border (כֶּסֶף, zer, Auth. Vers. "crown;" Sept. σπορητήν σιφάων) of gold, underneath which were the rings to receive "the staves" (כֶּסֶף, buddim, parts; Sept. σκιτάλαι) made of shittim-wood overlaid with gold, to bear it withal" (Exod. xxx, 1-5; Josephus, Ant. iii, 6, 8).

(b.) The altar in Solomon's temple was similar, but made of cedar (1 Kings vi, 20; vii, 48; 1 Chron. xxix, 18) overlaid with gold (comp. Isa. vi, 6).

(c.) The altar in the second temple was taken away by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. i, 23), and restored by Judas Maccabæus (1 Macc. iv, 49). On the arch of Titus there appears no altar of incense; it is not mentioned in Heb. ix, nor by Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 4. According to the Mishna (Chagigah, iii, 8; Tamid, vi, 2), it was overlaid with metal. From the circumstance that the sweet incense was burnt upon it every day, morning and evening (Exod. xxx, 7, 8), as well as that the blood of atonement was sprinkled upon it (v, 10), this altar had a special importance attached to it. It is the only altar which appears in the Heavenly Temple (Isa. vi, 6; Rev. viii, 3, 4). It was

3. Of other Jewish altars, we read only of (1.) Altars of brick. There seems to be an allusion to such in Isa. lxxv, 3. The words are, הַמִּזְבֵּחַ הַזֶּה יִבְנוּ בְרִיט,

"offering incense on the bricks," generally explained as referring to altars made of this material, and probably situated in the "gardens" mentioned just before. Rosenmüller suggests, however, that the allusion is to some Babylonian custom of burning incense on bricks covered over with magic formulæ or cuneiform inscriptions. This is also the view of Gesenius and Maurer.

III. Christian.—1. Significance.—The word altar is used, figuratively, to denote the Lord's table, not, however, in a sacrificial sense. As there is but the one sacrificing priest, the Lord Jesus, and the one propitiatory sacrifice, namely, the sacrifice of himself, so there is but the one altar, that upon which he gave himself a ransom for all. The apostles in no instance call the bread and wine a sacrifice, or the Lord's table an altar, or the Christian minister a priest. And this is the more remarkable in this case; for they do speak of priests, and sacrifices, and altars under the Christian dispensation, but never in reference to the Lord's Supper. There cannot but have been design in this omission. In the earliest age of Christianity the table was not called altar (Lardner, Works, iv, 212); at a later period both altar and table were used indifferently, the former word, however, not in a Jewish or pagan sense. When the ancient apologists were reproached with having no temples, no altars, no shrines, they simply replied, "Shrines and altars we have not." The more common word employed was table, with the addition of some epithet implying the peculiar use of it in a Christian church. In Chrysostom it is termed the mystical and tremendous table; sometimes the spiritual, divine, royal, immortal, heavenly table. Wherever the word altar was used, it was carefully distinguished from the Jewish altar on which bloody sacrifices were laid, and from heathen altars, connected with absurd idolatries.

The Church of England never uses the word "altar" for communion-table in her rubrics, and she carefully excludes the notion of a literal sacrifice, which altar would imply, by expressly referring in her communion-service to the sacrifice of Christ ("who, by his one oblation of himself once offered, made a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world"); and by studiously introducing into the same service the word "sacrifice" in the several figurative senses (warranted by Scripture) which it will bear; applying the word to our alms, to our offering of praise and thanksgiving, to the offering of ourselves, souls and bodies, but never applying it to the elements. That the English reformers wished to discountenance the notion of altars, and sacrifices thereon, appears from the fact that at the Reformation altars were ordered henceforth to be called tables, in consequence of a sermon preached by Bishop Hooper, who said, "that it would do well, that it might please the magistrate to turn 'altars' into 'tables,' according to the first institution of Christ; to take away the false persuasion of the people, which they have of sacrifice to be done upon the altars; for as long as altars remain, both the ignorant people and the ignorant and evil-persuaded priest will always dream of sacrifice" (Hooper's Writings, Parker Society, p. 488; Burnet, Hist. of Reformation, ii, 252, 253). Other Protestant Churches, in particular the Lutheran, have retained the use of an altar, at which the Liturgy is read, the Lord's Supper celebrated, and other ecclesiastical actions performed.

2. Material and Form.—In the time of Augustine it appears that the altars in the churches of Africa were of wood, and it is commonly thought that stone altars began to be used about the time of Constantine. In the time of Gregory Nyssen altars began to be made generally of stone; and the twenty-sixth canon of the council of Epaone, A.D. 517, forbids to consecrate any but a stone altar; from which and other evidence (see Martene, lib. i, cap. iii, art. 6, No. 5) it appears that wooden altars were in use in France till that and a much later period. In England wooden altars were originally in common use (William of Malmesbury, iii, 14, De Vita Wulstani, Ep. Wigorn.: "Erant tunc temporis altaria lignea, jam inde à prisca diebus in Anglia, ea ille per diocesan demolitus, ex lapidibus compaginavit alia"). At the English Reformation stone altars were removed and wooden tables substituted. The eighty-second canon of the synod of London, 1603, orders that a convenient and decent table shall be provided for the celebration of the holy communion, covered with a carpet of silk, or other decent stuff, and with a fair linen cloth at the time of communion. As to its position, the rubric before the communion-service states that it may stand in the body of the church, or in the chancel.

Altars in the Romish Church are built of stone, to represent Christ, the foundation-stone of the spiritual building, the Church. Every altar has three steps going up to it, covered with a carpet. It is decked with natural and artificial flowers, according to the season of the year, and no cost is spared in adorning it with gold, silver, and jewels. The tabernacle of the Holy Sacrament is placed on the holy altar, on each side of which are tapers of white wax, except at all offices for the dead, and during the last three days of Passion-week, at which time they are yellow. A crucifix is placed on the altar. There is a copy, written in a legible hand, of the Te igitur, a prayer addressed only to the first Person of the Trinity. The altar is furnished with a little bell, which is rung thrice when the priest kneels down, thrice when he elevates the host, and thrice when he sets it down. There is also a portable altar or consecrated stone, with a small cavity in the middle of the front side, in which are put the relics of saints, and it is sealed up by the bishop. Should the seal be broken, the altar loses its consecration. The furniture of the altar consists of a chalice and paten for the bread and wine, both of gold or silver; a pyx for holding the wafer, at least of silver-gilt; a veil, in form of a pavilion, of rich white stuff to cover the pyx; a thurible, of silver or pewter, for the incense; a holy-water pot, of silver, pewter, or tin; also corporals, palls, purificators, etc. About the time of Charlemagne it became common to have several altars in one church, a custom which spread, especially since the eleventh century. The side altars were usually erected on pillars, side walls, or in chapels, while the main or high altar stands always in the choir.—The Greek churches have generally only one altar.

3. The portable altar (altare portatile, gestatorium, or itinerarium) was one that might be carried about at convenience. These altars Martene refers to the very earliest ages of the Church, maintaining, with some reason, that during times of persecution portable altars were much more likely to be used than those which were fixed and immovable. The use of such portable altars was afterward retained in cases of necessity. The order of benediction is given by Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. (ii, 291).—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii, ch. vi, § 11-15; Procter, on Common Prayer, p. 29, 58; Collier, Eccl. Hist. vi, 257; Butler, Lives of Saints, iv, 418; Neal, Hist. of Puritans, i, 44, ii, 306.

4. The privileged altar (ara prerogativa) was one to which peculiar privileges are granted; e. g. an altar at which, by privilege of the pope, masses for the dead may be said on days when they are not permitted at other altars, and where, according to the modern Roman doctrine, the Church applies, in a peculiar manner, the merits of Jesus Christ and the saints to the souls in purgatory; "but not so that a soul is infallibly delivered from purgatory at each mass that is said, as some may imagine, because indulgences can only avail the dead in the way of suffrages."—Richard and Graud.

The origin of privileged altars in the Roman Church dates as lately as the time of Gregory XIII; i. e. between 1572 and 1585, although some writers have endeavored to assign them to an earlier period.—Landon.

In the earliest ages, the clergy only were allowed to approach the altar; not even the emperor himself, at first, was allowed this privilege, but afterward the rule was relaxed in favor of the imperial dignity (Canon 69, in Trullo). The approach of women to the altar was, if possible, even more strictly prohibited than that of men (Can. 44 of Laodicea, can. 4 of Tours, etc.). "In these days," says Martene, "the licentiousness of men has arrived at that pitch in the churches, that not only emperors and princes, but the very common people so fill the choir that scarcely is there sitting room left for the ministering clergy. Nay, more; with shame be it spoken, often women are found so lost to all reverence and shame, as not to hesitate to sit on the very steps of the altar!"—Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i, cap. 3; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Further literature on the subject of altars is contained in the treatises of Batellus, Abbatia basilica Vet. (Rom. 1702); Babel, De mensis euch. vet. (Argent. 1668); Chladenius, De altariis, (Vit. 1746); Cleffel, De expurg. altaris (Viteb. 1748); Fabricius, De altariis (Helm. 1698); Fries, *Altäre in ev. Al-tas'chith (Heb. al-tashcheth', אֲלֹתֵי שִׁחַת, destroy not; Sept. μὴ κατασθῆγγε), in the title of Psalms lvii, lviii, lxix, lxxv, seems to have been the commencement or name of a kind of poem or song, to the melody of which these Psalms were to be sung or chanted. This is the view taken by Aben-Ezra (Comment. on Psa. lvii). Others, however, of the Jewish interpreters (e. g. Rashi and Kimchi) regard these words as a compendium or motto to the contents of the Psalms to which it is prefixed. See PSALMS.

Alter, FRANZ CARL, a German Jesuit, and professor of Greek at the gymnasium in Vienna, was born at Engelberg, in Silesia, Jan. 27, 1749, and died March 29, 1804. He published a new critical edition of the New Testament (Novum Testamentum, 2 vols. Vienna, 1786-87) on the basis of the Codex Lambecii A, with which he collated 24 manuscripts, and the Slavic and Coptic versions of some parts of the N. T. Bishop Marsh, in his supplement to the Introduction of Michaelis, lays down the advantages and disadvantages of this edition. He also wrote an essay on Georgian Literature (in German, Vienna, 1798), published an edition of a number of Latin and Greek classics, and translated into German "The Classical Bibliography of Edward Harwood." He was a frequent contributor to the Memorialien of Paulus and the Leipzig Allgemeiner Literatur-Anzeiger, two Protestant papers.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, ii, 229; Landon, Eccl. Dictionary, s. v.

Althamer, ANDREAS, one of the German reformers, was born in 1498, at Brenz, in Suabia, and from this circumstance he is sometimes called Andreas Brentius. In 1527 and 1528 he assisted at the conferences at Berne on the mode of Christ's presence in the Eucharist, where he held with Luther the doctrine of consubstantiation. He died in 1564. Althamer published, 1. Conciliationes locorum scripture (1528, 8vo);—2. Annotationes in Jacobi Epistolam;—3. De Peccato Originis;—4. De Sacramento Altaris;—5. Scholia in Taciti Germania;—6. Sylva bibl. nominum (1530). J. A. Ballenstädt published a life of him in 1740 (Wolffenbüttel).—Hook, Eccl. Biog. i, 151; Ballenstädt, Vita Althameri, 1740; Bayle, Dictionary, s. v.

Alting, James, a Dutch theologian, son of the following, was born at Heidelberg, Dec. 27, 1618; made professor of Hebrew at Groningen 1667; died Aug. 20, 1679. He was an eminent Oriental scholar. His works are published under the title, Opera omnia theologica, analytica, exegetica, practica, problematica, et philologica (Amst. 1687, 5 vols. fol.). They include, among other writings, 1. Historia Academicarum in Populo Hebræorum;—2. Dissertatio maxime de Rebus Hebræorum;—3. Commentaries on most of the Books of the Bible;—4. A Syro-Chaldaic Grammar;—5. A Treatise on Hebrew Points.—Hoefler, Nour. Biog. Générale, ii, 235.

Alting, Joh. Heinrich, a learned reformed divine, was born at Emden, in Friesland, Feb. 17, 1683. In 1612 he went over into England with the electoral prince palatine; when he returned to Germany he was appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg. He was one of the deputies to the synod of Dort. After the sacking of Heidelberg by Tilly he retired to Emden, and afterward to Groningen, where he became professor in 1627, and died Aug. 25, 1644. Among his works are, Methodus Theologicæ didacticæ (Amst. 1650); —Scriptorium Theologicorum Heidelbergensium (3 vols. 4to, Amst. 1646); —Exegesis logica et theologica Augustinæ Confessionis (Amst. 1647, 4to); —Theologia problematica nova (Amst. 1662, 4to); —Theologia historica (Ibid. 1664); —Theologia elenctica nova (Basle, 1679, 4to); —Bayle, Dictionary, s. v.; Hoefler, Biog. Générale, ii. 234.

Alukah. See HORSE-LEECH.

A'lush (Heb. Alush', אלושׁ; perhaps desolation, according to the Talmud, a crowd of men; Sept. Alouic), the eleventh place at which the Hebrews rested on their way to Mount Sinai (Num. xxxiii, 13). It was between Dophkah and Rephidim, and was probably situated on the shore of the Red Sea, just south of Ras Jehan. See EXODE. The Jewish chronology (Sacer Otium, ch. v, p. 27) makes it twelve miles from the former and eight from the latter station. The Targum of Jonathan calls it "a strong fort;" and it is alleged (upon an interpretation of Exod. xvi, 30) that in Alush the Sabbath was instituted, and the first Sabbath kept. Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. Αλλουτ') has only this notice, "a region of leaders (?) in what is now Gebalene, near the city Petra."—Kitto, s. v.

Alva y Astorga, PETER of, a Spanish Franciscan, who assumed the habit of that order in Peru, and flourished in the seventeenth century. Upon his return to Spain, he spent his time chiefly in traveling about to obtain all the information in his power which might tend to support the privileges of his order. He published at Madrid in 1651 an absurd work, similar in design to the notorious Conformities of Albizzi (see ALBIZZI); it is entitled Nature Prodigium et Gratie Portentum, and contains 4000 pretended conformities between our Lord and St. Francis. Some years after he published another extraordinary work, "Funiculi nodi indissolubiles de conceptu mentis et conceptu ventris . . . ab Alexandro Magno VII, Pont. Max. solvendi aut scindendi" (Brussels, 1661, 8vo). It is a collection of all the opinions and disputes on the subject of the conception of the Blessed Virgin. He published on these and other matters an immense mass of writings, which amount to forty folio volumes. He died in the Low Countries in 1667.—Richard and Giraud, who cite Antonio, Bibl. Script. Hisp.; Landon, Ecll. Diet. s. v.

Al'vah (Heb. Alrah', אלווה, perh. cril; Sept. Γωλά), the second named of the Edomitic chieftains descended from Esau (Gen. xxxvi, 40; 1 Chron. i, 51, in which latter passage the name is Anglicized, "Aliah," after the text אלווה, Alyah'), B. C. post 1905.

Al'van (Heb. Alvan', אלוון, tall; Sept. Γωλάπ), the first named of the five sons of Shobal the Horite, of Mount Seir (Gen. xxxvi, 23); called less correctly ALIAN (Heb. Alyan', אלוון, Sept. Γωλάπ) in the parallel passage (1 Chron. i, 40). B. C. cir. 1927.

Alvarez or CORDOVA, (St.), was born at Cordova; a scion of the ancient house of the dukes of Cordova. He took the habit of the Dominicans in the convent of St. Paul, at Cordova, in 1368. Far from being satisfied with closely adhering to the rule of his order, he added to the strictness of it whatever was not actually forbidden. To the hair shirt he added commonly a chain of iron round his body; his fasts were rigorous, his watchings long, and his self-mortification continual; and he went throughout Spain, and even into Italy, proclaiming the Gospel (as he understood it) with the fervor of an apostle. He afterward proceeded to the Holy Land, and upon his return was selected first by Catherine, the wife of King Henry II, of Castile, and afterward by her son John II, to be their confessor. Alvarez, however, pined to be released from the worldly pomp and splendor of a court, and obtained permission to depart, for the purpose of building a new convent according to his own views and plan. This he did upon a mountain a short distance from Cordova, and gave to the new sanctuary the name of Scala cali. He died Feb. 19, 1420. His tomb became a great place of resort to persons of all ranks, even to ecclesiastics and bishops. Benedict XIV authorized the worship of this saint (!), and extended the worship to the whole order of St. Dominic. His festival is held on the 19th of February.—Touron, Hist. of Illustrious Men of the Order of St. Dominic; Landon, Ecll. Diet. s. v.

Alvarez, DIEGO (Jesuit), born at Toledo, 1560; after finishing his studies he went to Peru, and there became provincial of his order, which office he held until his death in 1620. A complete edition of his works was published under the title, Opera recognita et nunc primum in Germania edita (Mogunt. 1614-19, 3 vols. fol.).

Alverson, JOHN B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ontario County, N. Y., in 1793, and died at Perry, N. Y., April 21, 1850. At the age of twenty he joined the Church, and at twenty-four was admitted into the Genesee Conference as an itinerant preacher. After twenty years' service in circuits and stations he was appointed presiding elder of Genesee district in 1838, and of Rochester district in 1842. He possessed a discriminating mind, a prompt yet cautious judgment, a high sense of honor and integrity, a correct taste, and a well-furnished understanding, by which he secured for himself a high position in the confidence and affection of his brethren; in testimony of which he was intrusted with many offices of responsibility. In 1824, 1844, and 1848, he was a delegate to the General Conference, by the last of which he was appointed a member of the committee for the revision of the hymn-book. He was a man of commanding eloquence and power in the pulpit. For eight years he was president of the board of trustees of Genesee Wesleyan Seminary.—Minutes of Conferences, iv, 522.

Alypius, St., of Tagaste, in Numidia, was some years younger than Augustine, to whom he was strongly attached. From Carthage, whither he followed Augustine, he went to Rome to study the law, and there obtained a place in the imperial treasury. This charge he gave up in order to follow Augustine to Milan. Both of them up to this time had been Manichæans, and both were at this time converted to the Catholic faith, and baptized in the church of St. Ambrose on Easter-eve, A. D. 387. Upon their return to Africa they withdrew into a solitude near Tagaste; but when Augustine was ordained a priest of the church of Hippo, he drew Alypius from his solitude to take charge of the monastery which he had just built in Hippo. After this Alypius visited the Holy Land, and upon his return in 394 was elected bishop of Tagaste. In 403 he was present at a council held at Carthage in which the Donatists were invited to a conference, but refused; and in 411 he was named, with six others, to represent the Catholics in the celebrated conference between the Catholics and Donatists which the Emperor Honorius enjoined. It is believed that he was with Augustine at Hippo at the time of his death in 430, and it is uncertain how long he survived him. The Roman Martyrology commemorates him on the 15th of August.—S. Alypius, Sr., the Stylite, so called because he remained for more than fifty years on the top of a pillar, like Simeon and the other Stylites. He was born at Adrianople. At thirty-two years of age, having distributed to the poor all his property, he took up his abode at the top of a pillar, where he remained till his death, about 610, the precise date being unknown. His day in the Greek calendar is Nov. 26.—Bailet, Nov. 26.

Amad (Heb. Amad', אַמַּד, people of duration; Sept. Ἀμαδὺς v. Ἀμῶν, Vulg. Amad), a town near the border of Asher mentioned between Alammelech and Mischeal, as if in a southerly or westerly course (Josh. xix, 26). Schwarz (Païst, p. 192) thinks it is the modern village Al-Mead, a few miles north of Acco, meaning apparently the place called Em el-Amad, with extensive ruins near the sea-coast, the identity of which with the ancient Amad is also suggested by Thomson (Land and Pool, i, 469); but we should otherwise look for a more south-easterly position, and one on the boundary. The same objection applies to the location proposed by Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 284) at Um el-Amad, on the shore south of Tyre, which, however, contains no ruins (Robinson, later Researches, iii, 113). It may not improbably be identified with Shefa 'Omar or Shefa 'Amar (perhaps אַמַּר for אַמַּד), a large market-town on a ridge east of Haifa, with streets of shops and a large deserted castle (Robinson, later Researches, iii, 103).

Amad atha (Ἀμαθαζά, Esth. xvi, 10, 17) or Amad'athus (Ἀμαθαζός, Esth. xii, 6), the form of the name ἸΑΜΜΕΔΑΘΙΑ (q. v.) as given in the apocryphal additions to the book of Esth (these portions being found only in the Vulg. in most editions, although the name is given in the genitive, Ἀμαθαζού, throughout the book).

A'mal (Heb. Amal', אַמַּל, toil; Sept. Ἀμάλ), the last named of the four sons of Helem, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 35). B. C. prob. post 1658.

Amalarius, a priest of Metz in the 9th century. He wrote a treatise, De Divinis Officiis libri quatuor, giving an account of the church services, and a rationale of their meaning. Some passages in it favor the idea that he was free from the superstitions of his times as to the Lord's Supper. He also wrote De ordine Antiphonarū. Both this and the former treatise are given in Bibl. Max. Patr. xiv. He wrote many Letters, to be found in D'Achery, Spiu'leg. iii, 320. The sixth letter is occupied with a curious discussion, arising from the notion of our Lord's body being actually present in the sacrament. Amalarius was consulted about a person who had spit immediately after receiving the sacrament, whether he had thus spit away some of our Lord's body and blood, and whether he could be saved after such an act; he does not decide whether the person had voided some particles of Christ's body, but says that the health of the soul will not be endangered by this act which was done for the health of the body.—Clarke, Sac. Lit. ii, 471; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 812.

Am'alek (Heb. Amalek', אַמַּלֶּק, according to First, from the Arabic, dwellor in a valley; Sept. Ἀμαλῆκ; Vulg. Amalech, Amalec), the son of Eliphaz (the first-born of Esau) by his concubine Timna (Gen. xxxvi, 12; 1 Chron. i, 36); he was the chieftain, or emir ("Duke"), of an Idumean tribe (Gen. xxxvi, 16); which, however, was probably not the same with the AMALEKITES (q. v.) so often mentioned in Scripture (Num. xxiv, 20, etc.). B. C. post 1905. His mother came of the Horite race, whose territory the descendants of Esau had seized; and, although Amalek himself is represented as of equal rank with the other sons of Eliphaz, yet his posterity appear to have shared the fate of the Horite population, a "remnant" only being mentioned as existing in Edom in the time of Hezekiah, when they were dispersed by a band of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. iv, 43).

Am'alekito (Heb. Amalek', אַמַּלֶּקִּי, also the simple AMALEK, used collectively; Sept. Ἀμαλῆκ, Josephus Ἀμαλῆκίτης, Auth. Vers. often "Amalekites"), the title of a powerful people who dwelt in Arabia Petrea, between the Dead Sea and the Red Sea, or between Havilah and Shur (1 Sam. xv, 7), south of Idumaea, and east of the northern part of the Red Sea. The Amalekites are generally supposed to have been the descendants of Amalek, the son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau (Vater, Comm. üb. Pent. i, 140 sq.); but Moses speaks of the Amalekites long before this Amalek was born, i. e. in the days of Abraham, when Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, devastated their country (Gen. xiv, 7); from which Le Clerc inferred that there was some other and more ancient Amalek from whom this people sprung. The supposition that this people are there prophetically spoken of (Hengstenberg, Genuineness of the Pentateuch, ii, 247 sq.) is hardly a satisfactory solution of the difficulty (Kurtz, Hist. of the Old Covenant, iii, 1 sq.). Arabian historians represent them as originally dwelling on the shores of the Persian Gulf, whence they were pressed westward by the growth of the Assyrian empire, and spread over a portion of Arabia at a period antecedent to its occupation by the descendants of Joktan. This account of their origin harmonizes with Gen. xiv, 7; it throws light on the traces of a permanent occupation of central Palestine in their passage westward, as indicated by the names Amalek and mount of the Amalekites (Judg. v, 14; xii, 15); and it accounts for the silence of Scripture as to any relationship between the Amalekites and either the Edomites or the Israelites (Gen. xxxvi, 16, does not refer to the whole nation).

The physical character of the district which the Amalekites occupied [see ARABIA] necessitated a nomadic life, which they adopted to its fullest extent, taking their families with them even on their military expeditions (Judg. vi, 5). Their wealth consisted in flocks and herds. Mention is made of a nameless "town" (1 Sam. xv, 5), and Josephus gives an exaggerated account of the capture of several towns by Saul (Ant. vi, 7, 2); but the towns could have been little more than stations, or nomadic enclosures. The kings or chieftains were perhaps distinguished by the hereditary title Agag (Num. xxiv, 7; 1 Sam. xv, 8). Two important routes led through the Amalekite district, viz., from Palestine to Egypt by the Isthmus of Suez, and to Southern Asia and Africa by the Elanitic arm of the Red Sea. It has been conjectured that the expedition of the four kings (Gen. xiv) had for its object the opening of the latter route; and it is in connection with the former that the Amalekites first came in contact with the Israelites, whose progress they attempted to stop, adopting a guerrilla style of warfare (Deut. xxv, 18). The Amalekites, suspecting that the Israelites were advancing to take possession of the land of Canaan, did not wait for their near approach to that country, but came down from their settlements on its southern borders to attack them at Rephidim. Moses commanded Joshua with a chosen band to attack the Amalekites, while he, with Aaron and Hur, went up to the mount of Horeb. During the battle Moses held up his hands to heaven; and as long as they were maintained in this attitude the Israelites prevailed, but when through weariness they fell, the Amalekites prevailed. (See Verpoorten, De bello in Amalek, Ged. 1736; Sartorius, De bello Domini in Amalek, Danz. 1736.) Aaron and Hur, seeing this, held up his hands till the latter were entirely defeated with great slaughter (Exod. xvii, 8-13; comp. Deut. xxv, 17; 1 Sam. xv, 2). In union with the Canaanites they again attacked the Israelites on the borders of Palestine, and defeated them near Hormah (Num. xiv, 45). Thenceforward we hear of them only as a secondary power, at one time in league with the Moabites (Judg. iii, 13), when they were defeated by Ehud near Jericho; at another time in league with the Midianites (Judg. vi, 3), when they penetrated into the plain of Esdraelon, and were defeated by Gideon. Saul in his expedition overran their whole district and inflicted immense loss upon them, but spared Agag, their king, and the best of the cattle and the movables, contrary to the divine command (1 Sam. xiv, 48; xv, 2 sq.). After this the Amalekites scarcely appear any more in history (1 Sam. xxvii, 8; 2 Sam. viii, 12). Their power was thenceforth broken, and they degenerated into a horde of banditti (7373, predatory band). Such a "troop" came and pillaged Ziklag, which belonged to David (1 Sam. xxx); but he returned from an expedition which he had made in the company of Achish into the valley of Jezreel, pursued them, overtook and dispersed them, and recovered all the booty which they had carried off from Ziklag. This completed their political destruction, as predicted (Num. xxiv, 20); for the small remnant of Amalekites whose extinction by the Simeonites is spoken of in 1 Chron. iv, 43, were the descendants of another family. See AMALEK. Yet we meet again with the name of Amalek (according to Josephus, Ant. xi, 6, 5) in the history of Esther, in the person of Haman the Agagite, in Esth. iii, 1, 10; viii, 3, 5, who was most likely an Amalekite of the royal house of Agag (Num. xxiv, 7; 1 Sam. xv, 8), that fled from the general carnage, and escaped to the court of Persia.

The Arabians relate of the Amalek destroyed by Saul that he was the father of an ancient tribe in Arabia, which contained only Arabians called pure, the remains of whom were mingled with the posterity of Joktan and Adnan. According to Josephus (Ant. iii, 2, 1), the Amalekites inhabited Gobelitis (Psa. lxxiii, 8) and Petra, and were the most warlike of the nations in those parts (comp. Ant. ii, 1, 2); and elsewhere he speaks of them as "reaching from Pelusium of Egypt to the Red Sea" (Ant. vi, 7, 3). We find, also, that they had a settlement in that part of Palestine which was allotted to the tribe of Ephraim (Judg. xii, 15; see also v, 14). According to Schwarz (Pal. st. p. 219), traces of this name are preserved in that region to this day. The editor of Calmet supposes that there were no less than three distinct tribes of Amalekites: (1.) Amalek the ancient, referred to in Gen. xiv; (2.) A tribe in the region east of Egypt, between Egypt and Canaan (Exod. xvii, 8; 1 Sam. xv, etc.); (3.) Amalek, the descendants of Eliphaz. No such distinction, however, appears to be made in the biblical narrative, at least as regards the former two of these tribes: their national character is everywhere the same, and the different localities in which we find these Amalekites may be easily explained by their habits, which evidently were such as belong to a warlike nomade people (Reland, Pal. est. p. 78 sq.; Mannert, Geogr. VI, i, 183 sq.). Arabian writers mention Amalika, Amalik, Amalik, as an aboriginal tribe of their country, descended from Ham (Abulfeda says from Shem), and more ancient than the Ishmaelites (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v. Amal; De Sacy, Excerpta ex Abulf. in Pococke's Specim. p. 513 sq.; Michaelis, Spicilieg. i, 170 sq.). They also give the same name to the Philistines and other Canaanites, and assert that the Amalekites who were conquered by Joshua passed over to North Africa (Ewald, Isr. Gesch. i, 300, 450). Philo (Vit. Moysis, i, 39) calls the Amalekites who fought with the Israelites on leaving Egypt Phœnicians. The same writer interprets the name Amalek as meaning "a people that licks up or exhausts" (Legis Allegor. iii, 66). From the scriptural notices of their location south of Palestine (Num. xiii, 29), in the region traversed by the Israelites (Exod. xvii, 8 sq.), and their connection with the Ammonites (Judg. iii, 13), Midianites (Judg. vi, 3; vii, 12), Kenites (1 Sam. xv, 6), as well as their neighborhood to the Philistines (1 Sam. xxvii, 8), Mount Sair (1 Chron. v, 43), and the city of Shur or Pelusium (1 Sam. xv, 7), it is evident that their proper territory was bounded by Philistia, Egypt, Idumæa, and the desert of Sinai.—Van Iperen, Hist. Crit. Edm. et Amalecitar. (Leonard, 1768); Jour. of Sac. Lit. Apr. 1852, p. 89 sq.; Nöldeke, Ueber die Amalekiter. etc. (Götting, 1863). See CANAANITE.

AMALRIC of BENA, or of Chartres (in Latin, Amalricus or Emelricus; in French, Amaury), a celebrated theologian and philosopher of the Middle Ages, born at Bena, a village near Chartres, lived at Paris toward the close of the twelfth and the beginning of the thirteenth century. He gave instruction in dialectics and other liberal arts comprised in the Trivium and Quadrivium. He undertook to explain the metaphysical works of Aristotle, which had just been translated into Latin, partly from some new copies, partly from Arabic versions, which had been imported from the East. In these works Amalric advances the opinion that all beings proceed from a first matter, which in itself has neither form nor figure, but in which the motion is continual and necessary. The Arabs had long before begun to introduce this philosophy into Western Europe; for as early as the ninth century Scotus Erigena (q. v.) taught that the first matter was every thing, and that it was God. Although the temerity of this language was frequently complained of, the doctrine of Erigena was never expressly condemned, and Amalric was therefore not afraid of again professing it. He also maintained the ideality of God and the first matter, but he pretended to reconcile this view with the writings of Moses and the theology of the Catholic Church. From the continual and necessary movement of the first matter, he concluded that all particular beings were ultimately to re-enter the bosom of the Being of Beings, which alone is indestructible, and that before this ultimate consummation the vicissitudes of nature would have divided the history of the world and of religion into three periods corresponding to the three persons of the Trinity. See ALMERICIANS. He developed his ideas especially in a work entitled "Physion, a Treaty of Natural Things" This book was condemned by the University of Paris in 1204. Amalric appealed from this sentence to the pope, and went himself to Rome; but Pope Innocent III confirmed the sentence in 1207. Amalric was compelled to retract, which he did with great reluctance. He died from grief in 1209. In 1210, when ten of his chief followers were burned, the body of Amalric was also exhumed, and his bones burned, together with his books, inclusive of the metaphysics of Aristotle.—Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, i, 268; Hoefler, Biog. Générale, ii, 305.

A'mam (Heb. Amum, אָמוּם, gathering; Sept. Ἀμάμ), a city in the southern part of the tribe of Judah, mentioned between Hazor and Shema (Josh. xv, 26), being apparently situated in the tract afterward assigned to Simeon (Josh. xix, 1-9); probably about midway on the southern border between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea. The enumeration in Josh. xv, 32, shows that this name is to be taken in connection with the preceding, i. e. Hazor-Amam [see HAZOR], which probably designates the same place as KEROTH-HEZROM (q. v.). See TRIBE.

Amama, SIXTH, a Protestant theologian, and professor of Hebrew at Franeker, was born there Oct. 15, 1593, and died Nov. 9, 1639. He visited England in 1613. He wrote Censura Vulgate Latinæ Editionis Pentateuchi (1620), and, in reply to Mersenne, his Antibarbarus Biblicus (Franc. 1628, 4to), containing strictures on other books of the Vulgate, namely, the Historical Books, Psalms, Solomon's writings, and (in a posthumous edition) Isaiah and Jeremiah. He published also a collation of the Dutch version with the originals (Bybelsche Conferencie, Amst. 1623), and a Hebrew grammar (Amst 1625); and edited some posthumous works of Drusius.

A'man (Ἀμάν), the Græcized form (Tobit xiv, 10; Eccl. x, 7, etc.) of the name ἸΑΜΑΝ (q. v.).

Ama'na [many Am'ana] (Heb. Amānah', אַמָּנָה, a cornut, as in Neh. x, 1), the name of a river and of a hill.

1. The marginal reading (of many codices, with the Syriac, the Targum, and the Complutensian ed. of the Sept.) in 2 Kings v, 12, of the stream near Damascus called in the text ABANA (q. v.).

2. (Sept. πῶσις, Vulg. Amant.) A mountain mentioned in Cant. iv, 8, in connection with Shenir and Hermon, as the resort of wild beasts. Some have supposed it to be Mount Amanus in Cilicia, to which the dominion of Solomon is alleged to have extended northward. But the context, with other circumstances, leaves little doubt that this Mount Amana was rather the southern part or summit of Anti-Libanus, and was so called perhaps from containing the sources of the river Amāna or ABANA (q. v.). The rabbins, indeed, call Mount Lebanon various names (Reland, Palast, p. 320), among which appears that of Amanon (אֲמָנוֹן, Gittin, fol. viii, 1, v. r. אֲמָנוֹן, Umanus, or Mt. Her, according to Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 117).

Ama'nah, the correct form of the name ABANA (q. v.), which has probably crept in by an error of copyists. See AMASA.

Amandus, St., bishop of Maestricht, called "the apostle of Belgium," was born in 589 in Nantes, of a Roman family, and at twenty-one entered a monastery near Rochelle. After visiting Rome, he was in 626 ordained a missionary bishop without any fixed see, and he labored first in Brabant and Flanders, then in Slavonia near the Danube. After this he passed into Austrasia, but was driven away by Dagobert, whom he had reproved for his vices; afterward, however, the penitent prince recalled him, and made him the spiritual instructor of his son Sigebert. In the territory of Ghent, to which he went next, he was cruelly used, and, after being appointed bishop of Maestricht in 649, he resigned it at the end of three years, in order that he might resume his former mode of life. He was a great itinerant preacher, founded many monasteries, and died in 679, on the 6th of February.—Bailliet, February 6; Butler, Lives of Saints, i, 369; Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 41.

Amaranthine (ἀμαράνθινος, unfading), occurs in the original of 1 Pet. v, 4 (Auth. Vers. "that fadeeth not away;" comp. ἀμαράντος, 1 Pet. i, 4, Auth. Vers. id.), where the apostle seems to allude to the fading sprig, or crown of laurel awarded to him who came off victorious in the Grecian games (q. v.). Hence the word AMARANTH, the name of a class of flowers, so called from their not speedily fading (see Milton, Par. Lost, iii, in med.). They have a rich color, but dry flowers. Prince's-feather and cock's-comb are examples of the natural order of Amaranthaceæ, all the varieties of which are innocuous. To such unwithering garlands the apostle compares the Christian's crown of glory, won by faith and self-denial (1 Cor. ix, 25). See CROWN.

Amari'ah (Heb. Amariyah', אַמָּרְיָהּ, said [i. e. promised] by Jehovah, q. d. Theophrastus; also in the paragogic form Amariyah', אַמָּרְיָהוּ, 1 Chron. xxiv, 23; 2 Chron. xix, 11; xxxi, 15), the name of several men.

1. (Sept. Ἀμαριάς, Ἀμαρία.) A person mentioned in 1 Chron. vi, 7, 52, in the list of the descendants of Aaron by his eldest son Eleazar, as the son of Meraioth and the father of Ahitub, which last was (not the grandson and successor of Eli of the same name, but) the father of that Zadok in whose person Saul restored the high-priesthood to the line of Eleazar. The years during which the younger line of Ithamar enjoyed the pontificate in the persons of Eli, Ahitub, and Abimelech (who was slain by King Saul at Nob) were doubtless more than sufficient to cover the time of this Amariah and his son Ahitub (q. v.), if they were contemporary, and it has, therefore, been thought that they never were high-priests in fact, although their names are given to carry on the direct line of succession to Zadok. But it is more probable that Amariah was the last of the high-priests of Eleazar's line prior to its transfer (for some unknown reason) to the house of Ithamar in the person of Eli (q. v.), and that the Ahitub whose son Zadok was the first to regain the lost succession was a more distant descendant in private life, the intermediate names in the genealogy being omitted. See HIGH-PRIEST. B. C. ante 1125. Josephus (Ant. viii, 1, 3) calls him Arophueus (Ἀροφάουρος), and says he lived in private, the pontificate being at the time in the family of Ithamar.

2. (Sept. Ἀμαριά, Ἀμαρία.) A Levite, second son of Hebron and grandson of Kohath of the lineage of Moses (1 Chron. xxiii, 19; xxiv, 23). B. C. 1044.

3. A "chief-priest" active in the political reformation instituted by Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xix, 11); perhaps identical with the high-priest that appears to have intervened between Azariah and Johanan (1 Chron. vi, 9). See HIGH-PRIEST. B. C. 895. Josephus (Ant. ix, 1, 1) calls him "Amasias the priest" (Ἀμασίας ὁ ἱερεὺς); and says that he (as well as Zedabiah) was of the tribe of Judah, a statement probably due to the inaccuracy of the text (ἐκατέρωθεν, "both," being evidently spurious or corrupt, see Hudson, in loc.). In the list of Josephus (Ant. x, 8, 6) his name does not appear.

4. (Sept. Ἀμαρία, but Σαμαρία v. r. Σαμαρία in Ezra.) A high-priest at a somewhat later date, the son of another Azariah (q. v.), and also father of a different Ahitub (1 Chron. vi, 11; Ezra vii, 3), or rather, perhaps, of Urijah (2 Kings xvi, 10). See HIGH-PRIEST. B. C. prob. ante 740. Josephus (Ant. x, 8, 6) appears to call him Jotham (Ἰωθάμ), as also the Jewish chronicle Seder Olam.

5. (Sept. Ἀμαρία v. r. Μαρία.) One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah to superintend the distribution of the temple dues among the sacerdotal cities (2 Chron. xxxi, 15). B. C. 726.

6. (Sept. Ἀμαρία v. r. Ἀμωσία and Ἀμαρία.) The son of Hizkiah and father of Gedaliah, which last was grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. i, 1). B. C. long ante 640.

7. (Sept. Σαμαρία.) The son of Shephathiah and father of Zechariah, which last was grandfather of Athaliah, the Judahite descendant of Pharez, resident at Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. xi, 4). B. C. long ante 536.

8. (Sept. Ἀμαρία.) One of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. x, 3), B. C. 536, and afterward (in extreme age, if the same) sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. xii, 2), B. C. cir. 410. He appears to have been identical with the chief-priest the father of Jehohanan (Neh. xii, 13).

9. (Sept. Ἀμαρία v. r. Ἀμασία.) One of the Israelite "sons" of Bani, who divorced the Gentile wife whom he had married after the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 42). B. C. 459.

Amari'as (Ἀμαρίας), the Græcized form (1 Esdr. viii, 2; 2 Esdr. i, 2) of the name AMARIAH (q. v.).

Am'asa (Heb. Amasa', אֲמָסָא, burden), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Ἀμασαί; but v. r. Ἀμωσαί, and in 1 Chron. ii, 17, even Ἀμωσάβ.) The son of Abigail, a sister of King David, by Jether or Ithra (q. v.), an Ishmaelite (1 Chron. ii, 17; 2 Sam. xvii, 25; 1 Kings ii, 5, 32); a foreign paternity that appears to have caused his neglect in comparison with the more honored sons of David's other sister Zeruiah; until on the occurrence of Absalom's rebellion, whose party he naturally joined, and of which he was made general, his good conduct probably of the battle, although defeated, led David to offer him not only pardon, but the command of the army in the room of his cousin Joab (2 Sam. xix, 13), whose overbearing conduct had become intolerable to him, and to whom he could not entirely forgive the death of Absalom (q. v.). B. C. cir. 1023. But on the breaking out of Sheba's insurrection, Amasa was so tardy in his movements (probably from the reluctance of the troops to follow him) that David despatched Abishai with the household troops in pursuit of Sheba, and Joab joined his brother as a volunteer. When they reached "the great stone of Gibeon," they were overtaken by Amasa with the force he had been able to collect. Joab thought this a favorable opportunity of getting rid of so dangerous a rival, and immediately executed the treacherous purpose he had formed. See ABESHAI. He saluted Amasa, asked him of his health, and took his beard in his right hand to kiss him, while with the unheeded left hand he smote him dead with his sword. Joab then put himself at the head of the troops, and continued the pursuit of Sheba; and such was his popularity with the army that David was unable to remove him from the command, or call him to account for this bloody deed (2 Sam. xx, 4-12). B. C. cir. 1022. See JOAB. Whether Amasa be identical with the Amasai who is mentioned among David's commanders (1 Chron. xii, 18) is uncertain (Bertheau, Erklärung, p. 140). See DAVID.

2. (Sept. 'Amaaiac.) A son of Hadlai and chief of Ephraim, who, with others, vehemently and successfully resisted the retention as prisoners of the persons whom Pekah, king of Israel, had taken captive in a successful campaign against Ahaz, king of Judah (2 Chron. xxviii, 12). B. C. cir. 738.

Am'asai [some Amas'ai] (Heb. Amasay', אַמַּסַּי, burdensome), the name of several men. See also AMASHAI.

1. (Sept. 'Amaai and 'Amaic v. r. 'Amaai and 'Amaai.) A Levite, son of Elkanah, and father of Ahimoth or Mahath, of the ancestry of Samuel (1 Chron. vi, 25, 35). B. C. cir. 1410.

2. (Sept. 'Amaai.) The principal leader of a considerable body of men from the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, who joined David in "the stronghold," apparently the cave of Adullam; his fervent declaration of attachment instantly dispelled the apprehensions that David expressed at their coming (1 Chron. xii, 18), B. C. cir. 1061. There is not much probability in the supposition (Ewald, Isr. Gesch. ii, 544) that he was the same with AMASA (q. v.), the nephew of David.

3. (Sept. 'Amaai.) One of the priests appointed to precede the ark with blowing of trumpets on its removal from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv, 24), B. C. cir. 1043.

4. (Sept. 'Amaai.) Another Levite, father of a different Mahath, and one of the two Kohathites that were forward at the instance of Hezekiah in cleansing the temple (2 Chron. xxix, 12), B. C. 726.

Am'ashai (Heb. Amashay', אַמַּשַׁי, prob. an incorrect form of the name AMASAI; Sept. 'Amaai, 'Amaai, Vulg. Amassai), the son of Azareel, and chief of the valiant priests of his family, appointed by Nehemiah to reside at Jerusalem and do the work of the temple (Neh. xi, 13), B. C. cir. 440.

Amasi'ah (Heb. Amasyah', אַמַּסְיָהוּ, burden of [i. e. sustained by] Jehovah; Sept. 'Amaaiac v. r. Maaiac), the son of Zichri, and chieftain of the tribe of Judah, who volunteered to uphold King Jehoshaphat in his religious efforts, at the head of 200,000 chosen troops (2 Chron. xvii, 16), B. C. cir. 910.

Amāsis, supposed to be the Pharaoh whose house in Tahpanhes is mentioned in Jer. xliii, 9, and who reigned B. C. 569-525; he was the successor of Apries, or Pharaoh Hophra. Amasis, unlike his predecessors, courted the friendship of the Greeks; and, to secure their alliance, he married Laodice, the daughter of Battus, the king of the Grecian colony of Cyrene (Herod. ii, 161-182; iii, 1-16; Diod. i, 68, 95). He also contributed a large sum toward the rebuilding of the temple of Delphi, and is said to have been visited by Solon (Herod. i, 30; Plut. Solon, 26; Plato, Timæus, p. 21).—Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. See EGYPT.

Amath. See HAMATH; BORCEOS.

Amātha (Ἀμαθία, i. q. Hamath, q. v.; comp. Josephus, Ant. x, 5, 2), a place named by Jerome and Eusebius (Ἐμμαθία) in the Onomasticon (s. v. Emath, Ἀμάθ) as one of several places by that name, this being situated near Gadara, and having warm springs. It is apparently the modern ruin Amath, discovered by Setzen (Ritter, Erk. xv, 372), on the Nahr Yarmuk, not far from Um Keis (Burckhardt, Travels, p. 273, 276-278). See also AMATHIUS.

Amathe'is (rather Amath'as, Ἀμαθία), one of the "sons" of Bebai, who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 29); evidently a corruption from the ΑΘΛΑΙ (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 28).

Am'athis (1 Macc. xii, 25). See AMATHITIS.

Amathi'tis (Ἀμαθίτις, Eng. Vers. "Amathis"), a district to the north of Palestine, in which Jonathan Maccabæus met the forces of Demetrius (1 Macc. xii, 25); not around the city AMATHUS (q. v.) beyond the Jordan (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 3; War. i, 4, 3); but the neighborhood of the metropolis Amath or HAMATH (q. v.), on the Orontes (Drusius; Michaelis, in loc. Macc.). So the Sept. gives Ἀμαθί for אַמַּתִּי in Gen. x, 17.

Amāthus (Ἀμαθούς, -οὔντος, also τὴν Ἀμαθίαν), a strongly-fortified town beyond the Jordan, which Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Ætham) place twenty-one Roman miles south of Pella. It was taken by Alexander Jannæus (Josephus, War. i, 4, 3; Ant. xiii, 13, 3), and its importance is shown by the fact that Gabinius made it the seat of one of the five jurisdictions (συνέδρια) into which he divided the country (Ant. xiv, 5, 4; War. i, 8, 5). Josephus elsewhere (Ant. xvii, 10, 6) mentions that a palace was burnt at Amatha (q. v.) on the Jordan, which was probably the same place. It is mentioned as the seat of a Christian bishopric at the Council of Chalcedon (Concil. iv, 118). Reland (Palæst. p. 559 sq.) thinks it is mentioned in the Talmud by the name of Amathu (אִמַּתְיָהוּ), and that it may be the same with Ramoth-Gilead. Burckhardt passed the ruins of an ancient city standing on the declivity of the mountain, called Amata, near the Jordan, and a little to the north of the Zerka or Jabbok; and was told that several columns remain standing, and also some large buildings (Travels, p. 346). This is doubtless the site (Van de Velde, Memoir. p. 284), although not quite so far south as the Onomasticon would make it (Raumer, Paläst. p. 213).

Amaury. See AMALRIC.

Amazi'ah (Heb. Amazyah', אַמַּזְיָהוּ, strengthened by Jehovah, 2 Kings xii, 21; xiii, 12; xiv, 8; xv, 1; 1 Chron. iv, 34; vi, 45; Amos vij, 10, 12, 14; elsewhere in the prolonged form Amazyah'hu, אַמַּזְיָהוּ הוּ; Sept. 'Amaaiac, but Maaiac in 1 Chron. vi, 45), the name of four men.

1. A Levite, son of Hilkiah and father of Hahabiah, of the ancestry of Ethan the Merarite (1 Chron. vi, 45), B. C. considerably ante 1014.

2. The son and successor of Joash (by Jehoaddan, a female of Jerusalem), and the ninth king on the separate throne of Judah; he was twenty-five years old at his accession, and reigned twenty-nine years, B. C. 837-808 (2 Kings xiv, 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxv, 1). His reign was marked, in general, by piety as well as energy, but was not without its faults (2 Kings xiv, 3, 4; 2 Chron. xxv, 2). He commenced his sovereignty by punishing the murderers of his father; and it is mentioned that he respected the law of Moses by not including the children in the doom of their parents, which seems to show that a contrary practice had previously existed (2 Kings xiv, 5-7; 2 Chron. xxv, 3-5). The principal event of Amaziah's reign was his attempt to reimpose upon the Edomites the yoke of Judah, which they had cast off in the time of Jehoram (2 Kings viii, 20; comp. 1 Kings xxii, 48). The strength of Edom is evinced by the fact that Amaziah considered the unaided power of his own kingdom, although stated to have consisted of 300,000 troops, unequal to this undertaking, and therefore hired an auxiliary force of 100,000 men from the king of Israel for 100 talents of silver (2 Chron. xxv, 5, 6). This is the first example of a mercenary army that occurs in the history of the Jews. It did not, however, render any other service than that of giving Amaziah an opportunity of manifesting that he knew his true place in the Hebrew Constitution, as the viceroy and vassal of the King JEROMAN. A prophet commanded him, in the name of the Lord, to send back the auxiliaries, on the ground that the state of alienation from God in which the kingdom of Israel lay rendered such assistance not only useless, but dangerous. The king obeyed this seemingly hard command, and sent the men home, although by doing so he not only lost their services, but the 100 talents, which had been already paid, and incurred the resentment of the Israelites, who were naturally exasperated at the indignity shown to them (2 Chron. xxv, 7-10, 13). This exasperation they indicated by plundering the towns and destroying the people on their homeward march (Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.). The obedience of Amaziah was rewarded by a great victory over the Edomites (2 Chron. xxv, 14-16), ten thousand of whom were slain in battle, and ten thousand more savagely destroyed by being hurled down from the high cliffs of their native mountains (2 Chron. xxv, 11, 12). He even took the city of Petra (q. v.) by assault, and changed its name from Selah to Joktheel (2 Kings xiv, 7). But the Edomites afterward were avenged; for among the goods which fell to the conqueror were some of their idols, which, although impotent to deliver their own worshippers, Amaziah be-took himself to worship (Withof, De Amasia deos Edom. secum abducite, Ling. 1768). This proved his ruin (2 Chron. xxv, 14-16). Puffed up by his late victories, he thought also of reducing the ten tribes under his dominion, and sent a challenge to the rival kingdom to meet him in a pitched battle. After a scornful reply, he was defeated by King Joash of Israel, who carried him a prisoner to Jerusalem, which, according to Josephus (Ant. ix, 9, 3), opened its gates to the conqueror under a threat that otherwise he would put Amaziah to death—a statement evidently made conjecturally to explain the fact that the city was taken apparently without resistance (2 Kings xiv, 13). Joash broke down a great part of the city wall on the side toward the Israelitish frontier, plundered the city, and even laid his hands upon the sacred things of the temple. He, however, left Amaziah on the throne, but not without taking hostages for his good behavior (2 Kings xiv, 8-14; 2 Chron. xxv, 17-24), B.C. cir. 824. The disasters which Amaziah's infatuation had brought upon Judah probably occasioned the conspiracy in which he lost his life, although a space of fifteen years intervened (2 Kings xiv, 17). On receiving intelligence of this conspiracy he hastened to throw himself into the fortress of Lachish; but he was pursued and slain by the conspirators, who brought back his body "upon horses" to Jerusalem for interment in the royal sepulchre (2 Kings xiv, 19, 20; 2 Chron. xxv, 27, 28). His name, for some reason, is omitted in our Saviour's genealogy (Matt. i, 8; comp. 1 Chron. iii, 12).—KITTO. See JERMAN, KINGDOM OF.

3. The priest of the golden calves at Bethel, who, in the time of Jeroboam II, complained to the king of Amos's prophecies of coming evil, and urged the prophet himself to withdraw into the kingdom of Judah and prophesy there; for which he was threatened with severe family degradation in the approaching captivity of the northern kingdom (Amos vii, 10-17), B.C. cir. 790.

4. The father of Joshah, which latter was one of the Simeonite chiefs who expelled the Amalekites from the valley of Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv, 34). B.C. cir. 712.

Ambassador, a public minister sent from one sovereign prince, as a representative of his person, to another. At Athens ambassadors mounted the pulpit of the public orators, and there acquainted the people with their errand. At Rome they were introduced to the senate, and there delivered their commissions (Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Legatus).

In the Old Testament, the word מַלְאָכִים, malakim, one who goes on an errand, is thus rendered in Josh. ix, 4; Prov. xiii, 17; Isa. xviii, 2; Jer. xlix, 14; Obad. 1; and this translation is used for מַלְאָכִים, malakim, an interpreter, in 2 Chron. xxxii, 31; also for מַלְאָכִים, malakim, messenger, in 2 Chron. xxxv, 21; Isa. xxx, 4; xxxiii, 7; Ezek. xvii, 15. Ministers of the Gospel in the New Testament are said to be ambassadors (ἀποστέλλω), because they are appointed by God to declare his will to men, and to promote a spiritual alliance with Him (2 Cor. v, 20; Eph. vi, 20). See ALLIANCE.

The relations of the Hebrews with foreign nations were too limited to afford much occasion for the services of ambassadors. Still, the long course of their history affords some examples of the employment of such functionaries, which enable us to discover the position which they were considered to occupy. Of ambassadors resident at a foreign court they had, of course, no notion, all the embassies of which we read being "extraordinary," or for special services and occasions, such as to congratulate a king on his accession or victories, or to console with him in his troubles (2 Sam. viii, 15; x, 2; 1 Kings v, 1), to remonstrate in the case of wrong (Judg. xi, 12), to solicit favors (Num. xx, 14), or to contract alliances (Josh. ix, 3 sq.; 1 Macc. viii, 17).

The notion that the ambassador represented the person of the sovereign who sent him, or the dignity of the state from which he came, did not exist in ancient times in the same sense as now. He was a highly distinguished and privileged messenger, and his dignity (2 Sam. x, 1-5) was rather that of our heralds than of our ambassadors. It may have been owing, in some degree, to the proximity of all the nations with which the Israelites had intercourse that their ambassadors were intrusted with few, if any, discretionary powers, and could not go beyond the letter of their instructions. In general, their duty was limited to the delivering of a message and the receiving of an answer; and if this answer was such as required a rejoinder, they returned for fresh instructions, unless they had been authorized how to act or speak in case such an answer should be given.

The largest act performed by ambassadors appears to have been the treaty of alliance contracted with the Gibeonites (Josh. ix), who were supposed to have come from "a far country;" and the treaty which they contracted was in agreement with the instructions with which they professed to be furnished. In allowing for the effect of proximity, it must be remembered that the ancient ambassadors of other nations, even to countries distant from their own, generally adhered to the letter of their instructions, and were reluctant to act on their own discretion. Generals of armies must not, however, be confounded with ambassadors in this respect. The precept given in Deut. xx, 10, seems to imply some such agency; rather, however, that of a mere nuncio, often bearing a letter (2 Kings v, 5; xix, 14), than of a legate empowered to treat. The inviolability of such an officer's person may perhaps be inferred from the only recorded infraction of it being followed with unusual severities toward the vanquished, probably designed as a condign chastisement of that offence (2 Sam. x, 2-5; comp. xii, 26-31). The earliest examples of ambassadors employed occur in the cases of Edom, Moab, and the Amorites (Num. xx, 14; xxi, 21; Judg. xi, 17-19), afterward in that of the fraudulent Gibeonites (Josh. ix, 4, etc.), and in the instances of civil strife mentioned in Judg. xi, 12, and xx, 12 (see Cuneus de Rep. Hebr. ii, 20, with notes by Nicolaus in Ugolini The-saur. iii, 771-774). They are mentioned more frequently during and after the contact of the great adjacent monarchies of Syria, Babylon, etc., with those of Judah and Israel, e. g. in the invasion of Sennacherib. They were usually men of high rank, as in that case the chief captain, the chief cup-bearer, and chief of the eunuchs were deputed, and were met by delegates of similar dignity from Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii, 17, 18; see also Isa. xxx, 4). Ambassadors are found to have been employed, not only on occasions of hostile challenge or insolent menace (2 Kings xiv, 8; 1 Kings xx, 2, 6), but of friendly compliment, of request for alliance or other aid, of submissive deprecation, and of curious inquiry (2 Kings xiv, 8; xvi, 7; xviii, 14; 2 Chron. xxxii, 31). The dispatch of ambassadors with urgent haste is introduced as a token of national grandeur in the obscure prophecy in Isa. xviii, 2. Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v. See MESSEGER.

Amber (Heb. חַשְׁמַל, chashmal, Ezek. i, 4, 27; viii, 2) is a yellow or straw-colored gummy substance, originally a vegetable production, but reckoned to the mineral kingdom. It is found in lumps in the sea and on the shores of Prussia, Sicily, Turkey, etc. Externally it is rough; it is very transparent, and on being rubbed yields a fragrant odor. It was formerly supposed to be medicinal, but is now employed in the manufacture of trinkets, ornaments, etc. (Penny Cyclo-pædia, s. v.).

Piece of Amber with Flies imbedded.

In the above passages of Ezekiel, the Hebrew word is translated by the Sept. ἤλεκτρον, and Vulgate electrum, which signify not only "amber," but also a very brilliant metal, composed of silver and gold, much prized in antiquity (Pliny, xxxiii, 4, p. 23). Others, as Bochart (Hev. ii, p. 877), compare here the mixture of gold and brass, aurichalcum, of which the ancients had several kinds; by which means a high degree of lustre was obtained; e. g. as yppoum, as Corinthium, etc. (Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Bronze). Something similar to this was probably also denoted by the difficult term χαλκοῦργανον, "fine brass," in Rev. i, 15 (comp. Ezra viii, 27). See BRASS. The Hebrew word chashmal probably signifies smooth (i. e. polished) brass.—Calmet, s. v. See METAL.

Ambivivus (a Latin name, signifying doubtful as to the way; Græcized Ἀμβιβίσιος), surnamed MARCUS, procurator of Judea, next after Coponius, and before Rufus, A. D. 9 to 12 (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 2, 2).

Ambo, a raised platform or reading-desk, from which, in the primitive Church, the gospel and epistle were read to the people, and sometimes the sermon preached. Its position appears to have varied at different times; it was most frequently on the north side of the entrance into the chancel. The singers also had their separate ambo.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. iii, ch. vii.

Baldus and Durandus derive the name from the circumstance of there being a double flight of steps to the ambo; others, with more probability, from the Greek ἀναβαῖνω, to ascend. Treatises on this subject

Ambrose, deacon of Alexandria, flourished chiefly about the year 230; he was a man of wealth, and by his wife, Mavella, had many children. For some time he was entangled in the errors of the Valentinians and Marcionites, but Origen brought him to the true faith. With Origen he became closely intimate, and they studied together. He is said to have furnished Origen with seven secretaries, whom he kept constantly at work. Ambrose died about 250, after the persecution of Maximinus, in which he confessed the faith boldly with Protocletus, a priest of Cæsarea in Palestine. His letters to Origen, which St. Jerome commends highly, are lost. The Roman Church commemorates him as confessor on March 17.—Euseb. Ch. Hist. vi, 18; Landon, Eccl. Dictionary, i, 302.

Ambrose, bishop of Milan, was born about 340, at Treves (Augusta Trevirorum), where his father resided as prefect of the Prætorium, among the Gauls. It is said that while he was yet an infant a swarm of bees settled upon his mouth, which his father interpreted as a portent of future greatness. After his father's death his mother took him to Rome, where he received the education of an advocate under Anicius Probus and Symmachus. For some time he pleaded at the bar, and his success, together with his family influence, led to his appointment (about A. D. 370) as consular prefect of Liguria and Emilia, a tract of Northern Italy which extended, as near as can be ascertained, to Bologna. It is said that Anicius Probus, the prefect, when he sent him to his government, did so in these remarkable words, which may well be called prophetic, "Go, then, and act, not as a judge, but as a bishop." Ambrose made Milan his residence; and when Ausentius the bishop died, the people of Milan assembled to elect a successor. This the cruel divisions made in the Church by the Arian heresy rendered no easy matter; and the contest was carried on between Catholics and Arians with such violence that Ambrose was obliged to proceed himself to the church to exhort the people to make their election quietly and in order. At the close of his speech the whole assembly, Arians and Catholics, with one voice demanded him for their bishop. Believing himself to be unworthy of so high and responsible an office, he tried all means in his power to evade their call, but in vain, and he was at last constrained to yield (A.D. 374). He was yet only a catechumen; he had then to be baptized, and on the eighth day after he was consecrated bishop. He devoted himself to his work with unexampled zeal; gave all his property to the Church and poor, and adopted an ascetic mode of life. He opposed the Arians from the very beginning of his episcopacy, and soon acquired great influence both with the people and the Emperor Valentinian. In 382 he presided at an episcopal synod in Aquileia (summoned by the Emperor Gratian), at which the Arian bishops Palladius and Secundianus were deposed. In 385 he had a severe conflict with Justina (mother of Valentinian II), who demanded the use of at least one church for the Arians; but the people sided with Ambrose, and Justina desisted. In the year 390 he excommunicated the Emperor Theodosius for the massacre at Thessalonica, and did not absolve him till after a penance of eight months and a public humiliation. Ambrose was the principal instructor of Augustine in the Christian faith. He died at Milan, April 4, 397, and is commemorated in the Roman Church as a saint Dec. 7. His writings abound in moral lessons, plentifully interspersed with exhortations to celibacy and the other superstitions of the day. It is also recorded that he performed many astonishing miracles—stories that throw disgrace on an elevated character, which really needed not the aid of imposture to secure respect or even popularity. He has deserved from succeeding generations the equivocal praise that he was the first effectual assertor of those exalted ecclesiastical pretensions so essential to the existence of the Romish system, and so dear to the ambitious ministers of every Church. His services to church music were very great; he was the father of "hymnology" in the Western Church. The writings of the early fathers concur in recording the employment of music as a part of public worship, although no regular ritual was in existence to determine its precise form and use. This appears to have been first supplied by Ambrosius, who instituted that method of singing known by the name of the "cantus Ambrosianus," which is said to have had a reference to the modes of the ancients, especially to that of Ptolemaeus. This is rather matter of conjecture than certainty, although the Eastern origin of Christianity and the practice of the Greek fathers render the supposition probable. The effect of the Ambrosian chant is described in glowing terms by those who heard it in the cathedral of Milan. "The voices," says Augustine, "flowed in at my ears, truth was distilled into my heart, and the affection of piety overflowed in sweet tears of joy." Whether any genuine relics of the music thus described exist at the present time is exceedingly doubtful; the style of singing it may, however, have been preserved; and this is still said to be applied at Milan to compositions of a date comparatively recent (Biog. Diet. See. Useful Knowledge). His writings are more numerous than valuable. Ten of the many hymns which are ascribed to him are generally admitted to be genuine, but it is doubtful whether the Ambrosian Hymn or the Te Deum is by him. The best edition of his complete works has been published by the Benedictines under the title, Opera, ad manuscriptorum codicum Vaticanorum, Gallicanos, Belgicos, etc., necnon ad editiones veteres emendata, studio monachorum ordinis Benedicti (Par. 1686-90, 2 vols. fol.; also reprinted without the Indexes, Paris, 1836, 4 vols. large 8vo). The Appendix contains three lives of Ambrose. His writings are arranged as follows in the edition of 1636, 2 vols.: Vol. I contains Hexameron, lib. 3; De Parvulis; De Cain et Abel; De Noe et Arca; De Abraham; De Isaac et Anima; De Bona Mortis; De Fugit Sacerdoti; De Jacob et Vita beata; De Josepho Patriarcha; De Benedictibus Patriarchorum; De Elia et Jojua; De Nabuth Israelita; De Tobia; De Interpretatione Job et David; Apologia Prophetæ David; Enarrationes in Ambrose THE CAMALDULE, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born at Portico, a little town near Florence. He was but fourteen years of age when he entered the order of Camaldules, and afterward became one of the first men of his age in theology and Greek literature; his master in the latter was Emmanuel Chrysolaerus. In 1431 he became general of his order, and afterward was several times appointed to the cardinalate; but, whether or not he refused it, he never possessed that dignity. Eugenius IV sent him to the Council of Basle, where, as well as at Ferrara and Florence, he supported the pope's interests. He did all in his power to bring about the union of the Greek and Latin Churches, and he drew up the formula of union at the desire of the council. He died October 21, 1439. His works are, 1. Hodegoricum; an Account of a Journey taken to visit the various Monasteries of Italy, by the Pope's command (1678; Florence and Lucca, 1681. 4to).—2. Formula of union between the Churches (in the Coll. of Councils).—3. Life of St. Chrysostom, by Palladius; translated from the Greek into Latin (Venice, 1533).—4. The Four Books of Manuel Calocas against the Errors of the Greeks (Ingolstadt, 1608).—5. Nineteen Sermons of St. Ephrem Syrus.—6. St. Dionysius the Areopagite on the Celestial Hierarchy.—7. The Book of St. Basil on Virginité, and many other translations of the Greek Fathers, which have been printed at different times. The library of St. Mark at Florence contains also many MSS. by this writer, viz.: 1. A Chronicle of Monte-Cassino.—2. Two Books of his Proceedings while General of the Camaldules.—3. The Lives of certain Saints.—4. A Treatise of the Sacrament of the Body of Christ.—5. A Treatise against the Greek Doctrine of the Procession.—6. A Discourse made at the Council of Florence.—7. A Treatise against those who blame the monastic state. Besides these, Mabillon and Martene have discovered various other smaller works by this author, exclusive of twenty books of his letters given in the third volume of the Veterum Scriptorum, etc. . . . Ampl. Collectio, of the latter.—Landon, Eccle. Diet. i, 306; Hoefler, Biog. Générale, ii, 343.

Ambrose, Autpert, a French Benedictine monk, and abbot of St. Vincent de Volturne, about 760, in the time of Pope Paul, and Desiderius, king of the Lombards, as he himself tells us. He died July 19, 778. He wrote a Commentarius in Apocalypsin (Col. 1536, fol.), also published in the Bibl. Patrum, xiii, 403, and some other works, viz., Commentaries on the Psalms and Song of Solomon, the Combat between the Virtues and Vices, which goes under the names of St. Ambrose, and is inserted in the works of Augustine; a Homily on the Reading of the Holy Gospel (among the works of St. Ambrose), and another on the Assumption of the Virgin (which is the eighteenth of Augustine de Sanctis), and others. Mabillon gives as his, the Lives of SS. Pald, Vito, and Vaso, together with the History of his Monastery.—Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 631; Hist. Lit. de la France, t. iv; Landon, Eccle. Diet. i, 305.

Ambrose, Isaac, a Presbyterian minister, born in Lancashire, 1591, and educated at Oxford. He officiated as minister in Preston, and afterward at Garstang in Lancashire, from which he was ejected in 1662 for non-conformity. He was a man of great learning, which he adorned by sincere and ardent piety. He died in 1674. Amid the labors of an active ministry he found time to prepare several works of practical religion for the press. He was the author of The First, Middle, and Last Things, viz. Regeneration, Sanctification, and Meditations on Life, Death, and Judgment, etc. But his book entitled Looking unto Jesus is the one which has most of all received, and longest retained, the award of popular favor. Both these, with other writings, may be found in his Complete Works (Dundee, 1759, fol.).

Ambrose, archbishop of Moscow, with his family name Andrew Sertis-Kamensky, was born at Nejine, in the government of Tchernigoff, in 1708. After studying at the seminary of St. Alexander Nevski, he became, in 1735, one of its teachers. In 1739 he entered a monastic order, and, according to custom, changed his Christian name, assuming that of Ambrose. After being for some time prefect of studies at the academy of St. Alexander, he was transferred as archimandrite to the convent of New Jerusalem at Vosnecensk, and, in 1758, was consecrated bishop, first of Pereiaslavl, and later, of the diocese of Krusitzky, near Moscow. He was appointed archbishop of Moscow in 1761, and retained his dignity until his death. He had also been from 1748 a member of the Holy Synod. Ambrose displayed great zeal in the service of his Church. He established a number of new churches and monasteries, and distinguished himself by his zeal for the benevolent institutions of Moscow. His death was very tragical. In 1771 the pestilence raged in Moscow with extraordinary fury, and carried off, it is reported, nearly one hundred thousand people. The people, attributing a miraculous healing power to a sacred image of the Virgin (called "the Iberian"), the whole population of the city crowded around the chapel where this image was preserved. Ambrose, who was sufficiently enlightened to see that the contagion in this way would spread more rapidly than before, had the miraculous image removed during the night. On the next day the populace, charging at once the archbishop with the removal, rushed toward his house. The archbishop had retired to a monastery outside of the city. The populace followed him, and broke open the gates of the monastery. The archbishop concealed himself in the sanctuary of the church, where only priests are allowed to enter; but they found him out, and dragged him to the gate of the temple. The archbishop begged them for enough time to receive once more the eucharist; this was granted to him. The populace remained silent spectators of the ceremony; the archbishop was then dragged out of the church and strangled. Ambrose published a large number of translations from the Church fathers, some sermons, and a liturgy.—Hoefler, Biog. Générale, ii, 341.

Ambrosiaster, a Pseudo-Ambrosius, the usual name of the unknown author of the Commentaria in zii Epistolas B. Pauli, which is contained in the second volume of the Benedictine edition of the works of Ambrose. It appears from the book itself that it was compiled while Damasus was bishop of Rome. Augustine quotes a passage from this book, but ascribes it to St. Hilary, from which circumstance many have concluded that Hilary, a deacon of the Roman Church under Damasus, who joined the schism caused by Bishop Lucifer of Cagliari, was the author. But against this opinion it may be added that Augustine would not have given to a follower of Lucifer the title of saint.—Herzog, i, 277.

Ambrosius ad-Nemus (AMBROSE-AT-THE-N

WOOD), ORDER OF, monks of. The origin of the order is known from a bull of Gregory XI, addressed in 1375 to the monks of the church of St. Ambrose without the walls of Milan; from which it appears that these monks had for a long time been subject to a prior, but had no fixed rule, in consequence of which the pope, at the prayer of the archbishop, had ordered them to follow the rule of Augustine, permitted them to assume the above name, to recite the Ambrosian office, and directed that their prior should be confirmed by the archbishop of Milan. They afterward had many establishments in different parts of Italy; but they were independent of one another until Eugenius IV, in 1441, united them into one congregation, and exempted them from the jurisdiction of the ordinaries, making the convent at Milan the chief of the order. In 1579 they applied to St. Charles Borromeo to aid them in the reformation of their houses, whose discipline had become somewhat relaxed. In 1589 Sixtus V united them to the congregation of St. Barnabas; but in 1650 both were dissolved by Pope Innocent X.—Helyot, ed. Migne, i, 203.

Ambuscade and Ambush (Heb. אָרָב, arab', to lie in wait), in military phraseology, are terms used promiscuously, though it is understood that the first more properly applies to the act, and the second to the locality of a stratagem which consists mainly in the concealment of an army, or of a detachment, where the enemy, if he ventures, in ignorance of the measure, within the sphere of its action, is suddenly taken at a disadvantage, and liable to be totally defeated. The principles which must guide the contrivers of an ambuscade have been nearly the same in all ages; embracing concealment from the observation of an enemy so as to create no suspicion; a position of advantage in case of being attacked by superior forces; and having the means of retreating, as well as of issuing forth to attack, without impediment, when the proper moment is arrived. The example of Joshua at the capture of Ai (Josh. viii) shows the art to have been practised among the Jews on the best possible principles. The failure of a first attempt was sure to produce increased confidence in the assailed, who, being the armed, but not disciplined inhabitants of a strong place, were likely not to be under the control of much caution. Joshua, encamping within sight, but with a valley intervening, when he came up to make a false attack, necessarily appeared to disadvantage, the enemy being above him, and his retreat toward his own camp rendered difficult by its being likewise above him on the other side, and both sides no doubt very steep, as they are in general in the hills of this region. His men therefore fled, as directed, not toward the north, where the camp was, but eastward, toward the plain and desert; while in the hills, not behind, but on the west side, lay the ambuscade, in sufficient force alone to vanquish the enemy. This body of Israelites had not therefore the objectionable route to take from behind the city, a movement that must have been seen from the walls, and would have given time to close the gates, if not to warn the citizens back; but, rising from the woody hills, it had the shortest distance to pass over to come down directly to the gate; and, if an accident had caused failure in the army of Joshua, the detachment could not itself be intercepted before reaching the camp of the main body; while the citizens of Ai, pursuing down hill, had little chance of returning up to the gates in time, or of being in a condition to make an effectual onset (see Stanley, Sinai and Palest., p. 198). In the attempt to surprise Shechem (Judg. ix, 30 sq.) the operation, so far as it was a military manoeuvre, was unskillfully laid, although ultimately successful in consequence of the party spirit within, and the intelligence which Abimelech (q. v.) maintained in the fortress. Kitto, s. v. See WAR.

Amedians, Amadeists, an order of minor friars, instituted about 1452; so called from their professing themselves amantes Deum, loving God; or amati Deo, loved by God. Others derive the name from their founder, Amadeus or Amedeus, a Portuguese nobleman. They wore a gray habit and wooden shoes, and girt themselves with a cord. They had twenty-eight convents in Italy, besides others in Spain, and were united by Pope Pius V partly with the Cistercian order, and partly with that of the Soccolati, or wooden-shoe wearers.—Helyot, ed. Migne, i, 200.

'Amen' (Heb. amen', אָמֵן, âpîn), a particle of attestation adopted into all the languages of Christendom.

(I.) This word is strictly an adjective, signifying "firm," and, metaphorically, "faithful." Thus, in Rev. iii, 14, our Lord is called "the amen, the faithful and true witness." In Isa. lxxv, 16, the Heb. has "the God of amen," which our version renders "the God of truth," i. e. of fidelity. In its adverbial sense amen means certainly, truly, surely. It is used in the beginning of a sentence by way of emphasis—rarely in the Old Test. (Jer. xxviii, 6), but often by our Saviour in the New, where it is commonly translated "verily." In John's Gospel alone it is often used by him in this way double, i. e. "verily, verily." In the end of a sentence it often occurs singly or repeated, especially at the end of hymns or prayers, as "amen and amen" (Psa. xli, 14; lxxii, 19; lxxxix, 53). The proper signification of it in this position is to confirm the words which have preceded, and invoke the fulfilment of them: "so be it," fiat, Sept. γίνετο. Hence in oaths, after the priest has repeated the words of the covenant or imprecation, all those who pronounce the amen bind themselves by the oath (Num. v, 22; Deut. xxvii, 15, 17; Neh. v, 13; viii, 6; 1 Chron. xvi, 36; comp. Psa. evi, 48).—Kitto, s. v. See OATH.

(II.) In the public worship of the primitive churches it was customary for the assembly at large to say Amen at the close of the prayer; a custom derived from apostolic times (1 Cor. xiv, 16). Several of the fathers refer to it. Jerome says that in his time, at the conclusion of public prayer, the united voice of the people sounded like the fall of water or the noise of thunder. Great importance was attached to the use of this word at the celebration of the eucharist. At the delivery of the bread the bishop or presbyter, according to the Apostolical Constitutions, is directed to say, "The body of Christ;" at the giving of the cup the deacon is instructed to say, "The blood of Christ, the cup of life;" the communicant is directed on each occasion to say "Amen." This answer was universally given in the early Church. See RESPONSE.

(III.) It is used as an emphatic affirmation, in the sense "so be it," at the end of all the prayers of the Church of England. It is sometimes said in token of undoubting assent, as at the end of the creed, Amen, "So I believe." The order of the Church of England directs that "the people shall, at the end of all prayers, answer Amen."—Bingham, bk. xv, ch. iii, § 25.

Special treatises on the subject are Kleinschmidt, De particula Amen (Rint, 1696); Weber, De voce Amen (Jen. 1734); Wernsdorf, De Amen liturgico (Viteb, 1779); Brunner, De voce Amen (Helmst. 1678); Fogelmark, Putatus verbi אָמֵן (Upsal, 1761); Meier, Horæ philol. in Amen (Viteb, 1687); Treffentlich, De אָמֵן (Lips. 1700); Vejdel, De vocula Amen (Argent. 1681); Bechler, Horæ philol. in Amen (Wittemb. 1687).

Amenites, a subdivision of the Mennonites, so named from JACOB AMEN, a Mennonite minister of Amenthal, Switzerland. He was not a man of note, nor was he considered the founder of a sect. The perpetuation of his name in this way is due to a controversy in 1670 on minor points of doctrine between Jacob Amen and John Heisly, another Mennonite, which produced, finally, a schism in the Mennonite body. By a corruption of the name Amenite, the members of the sect in Pennsylvania, where they abound, are called Amish, Amish, or Omishers. See MENNONITES.

America. I. Church History.—Of the religious creeds of the American aborigines we treat in the article INDIANS (AMERICAN). The introduction of Christianity coincides with the discovery of America by Europeans. About the year 1000 the Icelanders and Norwegians are said to have established in Greenland twelve churches, two convents, and one bishopric (of Gandar) on the eastern shore, and four churches on the western; and in 1266 some priests are said to have made a voyage of discovery to regions which have recently become more known by Parry, John and James Ross, and others. All traces of Christianity, however, had disappeared when, in the sixteenth century, North America, and in particular Greenland, were discovered again. The discovery of America by Columbus was followed by the establishment of the Roman Church in South and Central America, in the West Indies, and on the southern coast of North America. Canada, the northern lakes, and the Mississippi valley were for a century under the sway of the French, and thus likewise under the influence of the Roman Church. But the temperate zone, the heart of the continent, was reserved for the Protestants of England, Germany, Holland, and the persecuted Huguenots. The Church of England was established in Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia; in Maryland after the decline of the Roman Catholic influence, and in New York after its cession by the Dutch. Its attempts at gaining ground in other colonies failed; and at the time of the Revolution its growth had remained far behind that of the persecuted and dissenting bodies of the Old World, which soon became the strength of the New. The Puritans and non-conformists occupied New England, the Quakers planted Pennsylvania, the Presbyterians and Methodists became numerous in the Middle States, and a number of minor denominations found here religious toleration, and helped to foster the spirit of religious liberty. The Declaration of Independence, by which thirteen British colonies freed themselves from the mother country in 1776, marks a new era not only in the church history of America, but in the general history of Christianity. The union between church and state was dissolved; the state renounced its claims over the consciences of men, and the church sought its support no longer from the state, but from the voluntary contributions of its members. See UNITED STATES. This principle, which was originally established in the United States only, soon began to exert an influence over the churches of the whole country, and even to spread across the Atlantic, where it prepared, slowly but steadily, an entire transformation of the relation between church and state. Protestantism has since not only brought the whole of North America and a part of the West Indies under its influence, but it is steadily pressing forward toward the south, and narrowing the territory of the Roman Church. The states of Central and South America have nominally remained connected with the Roman Church, but religious toleration has been established in most of them, and every where the Roman clergy has a hard stand against an advanced liberal party, which is determined to abolish all the privileges of the Roman Church, and to introduce unlimited religious liberty. For the details of American Church History, see the articles on the various states, UNITED STATES, MEXICO, etc. A brief and comprehensive survey of the development of American Church History is given in Smith's Tables of Church History.

II. Religious Statistics.—The "National Almanac" for 1864 (p. 538), gives the following table on the religious statistics of America:

	Total Population	Protestants	Roman Catholics.	Christians.
Russian America.	54,400	10,700
British America...	4,400,213	2,500,000	1,700,000	4,250,000
United States...	31,429,891	25,000,000	5,000,000	28,000,000
Mexico.....	7,661,000	7,661,000	7,661,000
Central America...	2,227,000	2,227,000	2,227,000
South America...	21,278,743	50,000	21,200,000	21,250,000
French Possessions	501,323	280,000	280,000
Dutch "	85,792	32,600	30,000	62,000
Danish "	47,029	55,000	10,000	65,000
Swedish "	18,000
Spanish "	2,032,062	2,032,000	2,032,000
Haiti.....	560,000	10,000	550,000	560,000
Free Indians	319,000
Total.....	60,415,153	27,737,600	38,150,000	66,516,600

It appears from the above table that Protestant Christianity prevails in the United States, in British America, and in the Dutch, Danish, and Swedish possessions in the West Indies and South America. In the rest of America the Protestant population consists mostly of foreigners. But in Brazil a large immigration from Germany and Switzerland has already established the foundation of a native Church; and in New Granada, Chili, the Argentine Confederation, Uruguay, and Hayti flourishing congregations labor for the same end. The Roman Church prevails in Mexico, the West Indies, and all the Central and South American states, and is also numerously represented in the United States and in the British possessions. In Russian America all the native Russian population belongs to the Greek Church. A number of pagan Indians still live in nearly all parts of America. Their number is estimated at about 1,000,000. Jews, Mormons, and Spiritualists are found almost only in the United States, where there are also a number of other congregations which expressly place themselves outside of Christianity, without having established any other positive creed (see Schem, Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859, p. 14-16).

American and Foreign Bible Society. See BIBLE SOCIETIES.

American and Foreign Christian Union, a religious association of the United States, organized in the city of New York in May, 1849. It was formed by the fusion of three societies which had existed for several years, the Foreign Evangelical Society, the American Protestant Society, and the Philo-Italian Society. The Foreign Evangelical Society was organized in 1839 to advance the work of evangelization in papal countries generally. It had been preceded by the French Association, which was founded in 1834, in order to assist the evangelical efforts made by the French Protestants, and, in 1836, changed its name into that of Evangelical Association. The receipts of the French Association and the Evangelical Association were $19,759, those of the Foreign Evangelical Society during the ten years of its existence, $154,345. At the request of the French Association, Rev. Dr. Baird went, in 1835, for three years to Paris, for the purpose of learning what could be done by the American churches to aid their Protestant brethren in France, and later, at the request of the Foreign Evangelical Society, travelled for four more years extensively on the Continent in prosecution of the same work. In 1849 the society had missionaries in France, Belgium, Sweden, Canada, Hayti, and South America, besides having aided the work in Germany, Poland, Russia, and Italy. The American Protestant Society was formed in 1843 in consequence of the large immigration of Roman Catholics into the United States. Its objects were: To enlighten Protestants of this country in regard to the errors of Rome, and to convert and save the members of the Roman Church in the United States. A number of colporteurs and other missionaries were maintained, laboring mostly among the Irish and German immigrants. The total receipts from 1843 to 1849 were $92,160. The Philo-Italian Society, which later took the name of the Christian Alliance, was also founded in 1843. As the proceedings of this society were not published, little is known of it farther than that it employed an active agent, a Protestant Italian, for years on the confines of Italy. The American and Foreign Christian Union, which arose in 1849 out of a union of these three societies, undertook the work and assumed the responsibilities of them all combined. Its objects are "to diffuse and promote, by missions, colportage, the press, and other appropriate agencies, the principles of religious liberty, and a pure and evangelical Christianity, both at home and abroad, wherever a corrupted Christianity exists." In the first two years of its existence, 1850 and '51, it expended nearly $15,000 for the removal to Illinois of some 500 or 600 Portuguese exiles, who had been exiled from Madeira for having embraced Protestantism. The receipts from 1849 to 1859 have ranged from $45,000 to $80,000, making a total of over $600,000 in ten years. In 1863 they were $59,663; in 1864, $73,778. It publishes a monthly magazine of 32 pages, the "Christian World" (formerly the "Am. and For. Chr. Un."), which has a large circulation. The society has also published a Sabbath-school library, consisting of 21 volumes, mostly exposing the doctrines and usages of the Roman Church. The agents of the society in the home field preach the Gospel to Roman Catholics, viz., English, Irish, French, Italian, Spanish, German, and Bohemian. In the foreign field, the society sustains missionaries itself, or supports the Protestant missions of other societies in Canada, Hayti, Mexico, South America, Ireland, Western or Azore Islands, Sweden, Belgium, Switzerland, Piedmont, France. The number of laborers employed in the home field was, in 1859, 63; the number of teachers, male and female, 375; making a force of 438 persons endeavoring to counteract the influence of the papacy. The aggregate number of children and youth which were reported, up to May, 1859, as having been brought under evangelical influences, was upward of 14,250. The total number of converts from the Roman Catholic Church amounted, in 1859, to 1404.

Amerÿtha (Ἀμερῦθᾶ according to some copies, see Hudson, in loc., while others have Ἀμερῦθα; according to Reland, Palæst. p. 560, both by erroneous transcription for Μερῦθᾶ, which most editors give; see ACHABARA), a town of Upper Galilee, which Josephus fortified against the Romans (Life, 37); probably the same as MEROTH (q. v.), which terminated Upper Galilee westward (Josephus, War, iii, 3, 1); and conjectured by Reland (Palæst. p. 875) to have been the Mearah of the Sidonians (Josh. xiii, 4).

Ames (OR AMESIUS), WILLIAM, a celebrated Puritan divine, born in Norfolk, 1576, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, under Dr. Perkins, by whom he was taught evangelical religion. Appointed chaplain to the university, he gave great offence by a sermon in which he inveighed against some of the bad practices of the university, e. g. card-playing, etc., and, to avoid expulsion, he left England and became English chaplain at the Hague, and afterward divinity professor at Franeker in Friesland. He attended the synod of Dort, and died at Rotterdam in 1633. He wrote many works, among them, 1. Puritanismus Anglicanus (1623, in English, 1641):—2. De Conscientia (1630, in English, 1643):—3. A Reply to Bishop Morton (on Ceremonies):—4. Fresh Suit against human Ceremonies in God's Worship (1633):—5. Antisynodalia, 1629 (against the Remonstrants):—6. Medulla Theologica (1623 and often after, both Lat. and Eng.). His Latin works are collected under the title Opera, quæ Lat. scripsit, omnia (Amst. 1658, 5 vols. 12mo). Ames was eminent in casuistry (q. v.), and was a strong opponent of Arminianism.—Neal, Hist. of Puritans, i, 572 sq.; Brooks, Lives of Puritans, ii, 405; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. c. xvi, sec. iii, pt. ii, ch. ii, § 371 n.

Amethyst (ἀμῆθυστος, achamaah'; Sept. and N. T. ἀμῆθυστος, Vulg. amethystus), a precious stone mentioned in Scripture as the ninth in the breastplate of the high-priest (Exod. xxviii, 19; xxxix, 12), and the twelfth in the foundations of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi, 20). The transparent gems to which this name is applied are of a color which seems composed of a strong blue and deep red, and, according as either of these prevails, exhibit different tinges of purple, sometimes approaching to violet, and sometimes declining even to a rose color. From these differences of color the ancients distinguished five species of the amethyst; modern collections afford at least as many varieties, but they are all comprehended under two species—the Oriental amethyst and the Occidental amethyst. These names, however, are given to stones of essentially different natures, which were, no doubt, anciently confounded in the same manner. The Oriental amethyst is very scarce, and of great hardness, lustre, and beauty. It is, in fact, a rare variety of the adamantine spar, or corundum. Next to the diamond, it is the hardest substance known. It contains about 90 per cent. of alumine, a little iron, and a little silica. Of this species emery, used in cutting and polishing glass, etc., is a granular variety. To this species also belongs the sapphire, the most valuable of gems next to the diamond, and of which the Oriental amethyst is merely a violet variety. Like other sapphires, it loses its color in the fire, and comes out with so much of the lustre and color of the diamond that the most experienced jeweller may be deceived by it. The more common, or Occidental amethyst, is a variety of quartz, or rock crystal, and is found in various forms in many parts of the world, as India, Siberia, Sweden, Germany, Spain; and even in England very beautiful specimens of tolerable hardness have been discovered. This also loses its color in the fire (Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v.). Amethysts were much used by the ancients for rings and cameos; and the reason given by Pliny, because they were easily cut (Hist. Nat. xxxvii, 9), shows that the Occidental species is to be understood. The ancients believed that the amethyst possessed the power of dispelling drunkenness in those who wore or touched it (Anthol. Gr. iv, 18; Pliny, xxxvii, 9, Marbodius, De Gemmis, c. 4) and hence its Greek name ("from a privative, and $\mu\theta\acute{\iota}\omega\varsigma$, to get drunk," Martini, Excurs. p. 158). In like manner the rabbins derive its Jewish name (from אֶמֶתֶּת , to dream), from its supposed power of procuring dreams to the wearer. (See Brückmann, Abhandlung von den Edelsteinen; Hill's Theophrastus, notes; Hillier, De gemmis in pector. pontif.; Rosenmüller, Mineralogy of the Bible; Braun, De vestitu sacerdot. ii, 16; Bellarmin, Urim und Thummim, p. 55; Moore's Anc. Mineralogy, p. 168.)—Kitto, s. v. See GEM.

Amharic Language, a degenerate Shemitic dialect, mixed with many African words, spoken with the greatest purity in Amhara, one of the principal divisions of the Abyssinian empire. See ABYSSINIA. It is apparently referred to by Agatharcides (Hudson, Geogr. Min. i, 46), about B.C. 120, under the name Κατάφα Λίθια , as the language of the Troglodytes of Ethiopia. It began to prevail in Abyssinia over the Geez language about A.D. 1300, and is more or less prevalent throughout that country to the present day. Its literature is nearly confined to a few theological treatises and translations of portions of the Holy Scriptures, which have been printed mostly by the British and Foreign Bible Society, in Ethiopic characters. (See Gesenius, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopædie, s. v. Amharische Sprache.) The Amharic has the same alphabet as the Ethiopic, with the addition of seven characters, which have, respectively, the sound nearly of sh, ch (soft), nasal n, guttural (German) ch, weak (French) ch, g (soft), and z (as in azure). The vowels and diphthongs are the same in number and sound as in Ethiopic; also the same rules of pronunciation prevail as in that language. The formation of nouns differs very little from the Ethiopic. The indication of gender is the same. Declension takes place by means of certain particles; but the accusative case exhibits the peculiar Arabic "annation." See ARABIC LANGUAGE. The verb appears in four modifications, as active (neuter), a two-form factive, and passive. The preterite, present, and future are clearly distinguished by a change in formation. Besides the "conjunctive" form of the present imperative and infinitive, there is also a peculiar kind of participle. Numerals and pronouns are, as to their form and use, entirely after the Shemitic analogies. The same is almost universally true of the particles. In the arrangement of words the nominative follows the other cases, and some of the conjunctions are placed at the end of the sentence. The best known specimens of Amharic literature are contained in Ehbrazzer's Catechesis Christ. lingue Amharicæ (Rome, 1787). Ludolph prepared a brief Grammatica lingue Amharicæ, with a Lexicon Amharico-Latinum attached (Gref, 1698, fol.). The Church Mission Society (of Great Britain) has published a Grammar of the Amharic Language, by Isenberg (Lond. 1812, 8vo). Further details may be found in Jowett's Christian Researches, p. 197-213; Platt, Ethiopic MSS. (Lond. 1823); Seetzen, Linguistischer Nachlass (Leipz. 1816-18), p. 145 sq.; Schmidt's Bibl. f. Kritik, i, 307-310. See ETHIOPIC LANGUAGE.

Am'i (Heb. Ami', אָמִי , prob. a corrupted form of the name Amon; Sept. Ἰμῖ), the chief of a family that returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 57); more properly called AMON (q. v.) in the parallel passage (Neh. vii, 59).

Amianthus (ἀμιανθός , unstained, i. e. by sin; Heb. vii, 3, "undefiled," and so tropically, Jas. i, 27; undecaying, 1 Pet. i, 4; chaste, Heb. xiii, 4), the name of a fibrous mineral substance commonly called asbestos. This extraordinary mineral was well known to the ancients. It occurs in long, parallel, extremely slender and flexible fibres; it is found in all countries more or less abundantly, and exists, forming veins, in serpentine, mica, slate, and primitive limestone rocks; the most delicate variety comes most plentifully from Savoy and Corsica. Its fibrous texture, and the little alteration it undergoes in strong heats, caused it to be used by the Eastern nations as an article for the fabrication of cloth, which, when soiled, was purified by throwing it into the fire, from whence it always came out clear and perfectly white; hence it obtained the name of amianthus, or unsold. By the Romans this cloth was purchased at an exorbitant price, for the purpose of wrapping up the bodies of the dead, previous to their being laid upon the funeral pile, in order to prevent their ashes from being mingled with those of the wood.—Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. and Penny Cyclopædia, s. v. Asbestos.

Amiatine Manuscript (CODEX AMIATINUS), the most valuable of the Latin uncial MSS. of the Vulgate translation, of which it is designated as am (Tischendorf, N. T. Gr. 7th ed. proleg. p. cexlvii; Scrivener, Introd. to N. T. Crit. p. 264). Its name is derived from the Cistercian Monastery of Monte Amiatino in Tuscany, whence it was brought into the Laurentian Library at Florence, where it still remains. It was written by the Abbot Servandus about A.D. 541, and contains both Testaments, with scarcely any defect, in one very large volume, stichometrically written in a good bold hand. Bandini first pointed out its value, although it had been slightly used for the Sixtine ed. of the Vulg. in 1587-90. Fleck wretchedly edited the N. T. part in 1840; Tischendorf collated it in 1843, and Tregelles in 1846 (Del Furea comparing it for the differences); and it was published by Tischendorf in 1850 (Testamentum Novum, Latine interpretæ Hieronymo; ex celeberrimo cod. Amiatino, etc., Lips. 4to), and again in 1854. The O. T. has been but little examined. The Latin text of Tregelles' N. T. is taken from this MS. (Davidson, Bib. Criticism, ii, 254; Tregelles, in Horne's Introd. iv, 253). See VULGATE.

Amice (amicus, amiculum sacrum). In Roman antiquity, this was an upper garment worn over the tunic. In ecclesiastical writers, it is a square-shaped linen cloth worn by the clergy. It is called by Isidore the anabologium, and, he says, was originally a veil worn by women to cover the shoulders. Its use was formerly, as now, different in different places; sometimes it was worn round the neck, and sometimes over the head. When worn over the shoulders and neck, it was called the super-humerale, or simply humerale. It was originally worn under the alb, not, as now, over it—a custom which is still preserved among the Maronites. It is still in use in the Roman Catholic Church, but not in the Church of England.

Ami't'ai (Heb. Amittay', אֱמִי־תַי , true; Sept. Ἀμῖ-ἄι), the father of the prophet Jonah, a native of Gath-hepher (2 Kings xiv, 25; Jon. i, 1). B.C. ante 820.

Am'mah (Heb. Ammah', אִמָּה , a cubit, as often; Sept. Ἀμμά v. r. Ἀμμά), a hill "that lieth before Giah by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon;" the sun went down as Joab and Abishai reached this place in pursuit of Abner (2 Sam. ii, 24). The description appears to indicate some eminence immediately east of Gibeon (q. v.). Josephus (Ant. vii, 1, 3) renders, "a place called Ammata" ($\text{ῥόσος τῆς, ὄν' Ἀμμάτων καλοῦσι}$); compare the Amta (אַמְטָא) of Jonathan's Targum. Both Symmachus (ἀμμή) and Theodotion (ὄμπα) γωγύς) agree with the Vulgate in an allusion to some water-course here. It is possibly to the "excavated fountain" "under the high rock," described as near Gibeon (El-Jib) by Robinson (Recherches, ii, 136). See also METHEG-AMMAH.

Am'mi (Heb. Ammi', אַמִּי, my people, Sept. λαβ μου), a figurative name given by Jehovah to the people of Israel (Hos. ii, 1) to denote their restoration from Babylon (Henderson, Comment. in loc.). See LO-AMMI.

Ammiānus MARCELLINUS, a Latin historian, "the last subject of Rome who composed a profane history in the Latin language," was a native of Antioch, born in the fourth century, and, in his youth, served with distinction in Germany, Gaul, and Persia. Retiring from a military life, he went to reside at Rome, where he wrote a valuable history of the Roman emperors, from Nerva, A.D. 91, where the Annals of Tacitus end, to Valens, A.D. 378. It consisted of thirty-one books, of which the first thirteen are lost. He died A.D. 390 or 410. The value of his writings for general history are fully acknowledged by Gibbon (ch. xxvi), and they are important to Church history for their details as to Julian and the state of Christianity in his time. There has been much controversy as to the question whether Ammiānus himself was a Christian or not. Chifflet (De Ammiani Marcellini vita et libris rerum gestarum memorabilium, Lovan. 1627) advocated the opinion that Ammiānus was a Christian; while Moller (Dissertat. de Ammiāno Marcellino, Altdorf, 1685, 4to), Ditzl (De Ammiāno Marcellino, Rüssel, 1841), and Heyne (Censura Ingenii et Historiar. Ammiani Marcell., p. 3 sq.) combated it. It is now generally admitted that he was not a member of the Christian Church. His work contains many caustic remarks on the doctrines of Christianity. When speaking of the martyrs, of synods and other points of the Christian system, he frequently adds remarks which clearly point to a non-Christian author. It is, however, on the other hand, equally certain that he was not addicted to the then common belief of paganism. He recognised a supreme numen which curbs human arrogance and avenges human crime, and, in general, professes views which we find in Herodotus, Sophocles, and others of the best Greek writers, and which approach a monotheistic stand-point. It seems probable that he believed primitive, unadulterated Christianity to have been, as well as the philosophy of enlightened pagans, a form of deism. From this point of view Ammiānus could consistently speak favorably of many things he found among the Christians. He censures Constantine's interference in the Arian controversy, and calls it a confusion of the absolute and plain Christian religion with obsolete superstition (Christianam religionem absolutam et simplicem nulli superstitione confundens). By this obsolete superstition, as the connection shows, he meant in particular the controversy concerning the Trinity and Divinity of Christ. He censured Julian the Apostle for forbidding the Christians to receive instruction in liberal studies, while he did not blame the restoration of pagan sacrifices. He was not opposed to the paganism of Julian, but to the violation of religious toleration.—See Retzog, Real-Encyclopädie, i, 279 sq. The best edition of his history is that of Wagner (Leipz. 1808, 3 vols. 8vo). An English translation was published by Philemon Holland (Lond. 1609). Bähr, Gesch. der röm. Literatur (Carlsruhe, 1845), ii, 194.

Ammid'ioi [some editions corruptly ΑΜΜΙΔΙΟΙ] (Αμμίδιοι v. r. Αμμιδάιοι), one of the persons whose descendants (or rather places whose inhabitants) are said to have returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 20); but the name is apparently an interpolation, or at least inextricably confused, as nothing corresponding to it is found in the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 25; Neh. vii, 29); this, with the previous two names (Pira and Chadias), being inserted between Beroth (Beeroth) and Cirama (Ramah). Perhaps it is compounded of the following names, Harim and Hadid, which otherwise are not given in the list of Esdras.

Am'miēl (Heb. Ammiēl', אַמִּיֵּל, people [i. e. friend] of God; Sept. Αμμιάλ), the name of four men:

1. The son of Gemalli, of the tribe of Dan, one of the twelve spies sent by Moses to explore the land of Canaan (Num. xiii, 12), B.C. 1657. He was, of course, among the ten who perished by the plague for their unfavorable report (Num. xiv, 37).

2. The father of Machir of Lo-debar, which latter was one of David's friends (2 Sam. ix, 4, 5; xvii, 27). B.C. ante 1023.

3. The father of Bathsheba, wife of U'riah, and afterward of David (1 Chron. iii, 5). In 2 Sam. xi, 3, he is called (by transposition) ELIAM (q. v.).

4. The sixth son of Obad-edom, the Levite (1 Chron. xxvi, 5), B.C. 1014.

Ammi'hud (Heb. Ammihud', אַמִּיחֻד, people of glory, i. e. renowned; Sept. Αμμυὺδ, but in 1 Chron. Αμμοὺδ), the name of five men.

1. The father of Elishama, which latter was the Ephraimite chief in the time of the Exode (Num. i, 10; ii, 18; vii, 48, 53; x, 22). He was the son of Laadan, and the fifth or sixth in descent from Ephraim (1 Chron. vii, 26). B.C. ante 1658.

2. The father of Shemuel, which latter was a Simeonite chief of the period of the Exode (Num. xxxiv, 20). B.C. ante 1618.

3. The father of Pedahel, which latter was the chief of the tribe of Naphtali at the same period (Num. xxxiv, 28). B.C. ante 1618.

4. The father of Talmai, the king of Geshur, to whom Absalom fled after his murder of Amnon (2 Sam. xiii, 37, where the text has אַמִּיחֻר, Ammi'chur', margin "Ammi'hur"). B.C. ante 1033.

5. The son of Omri the descendant of Pharez, and the father of Uthai, which last was one of those who lived at Jerusalem on the return from Babylon (1 Chron. ix, 4). B.C. ante 536.

Ammin'adab (Heb. Amminadab', אַמִּינָדָב, kindred of the prince, Gesen.; man of generosity, Fürst, who ascribes to דָּב the sense "homo" as its primitive meaning; the passages, Psa. cx, 3; Cant. vi, 12, margin, seem, however, rather to suggest the sense my people is willing; Sept. and New Test. Αμινάδᾰβ), but in Exod. vi, 23, Αμινάδᾰβ), the name of three men. See AMMINADIB.

1. The father of Nahshon, which latter was phylarch of the tribe of Judah at the time of the Exode (Num. i, 7; ii, 3; vii, 12, 17; x, 14). B.C. ante 1658. His father's name was Ram, and he was the fourth in descent from Judah, the sixth in ascent from David, and the forty-sixth from Christ (Ruth iv, 19, 20; 1 Chron. ii, 10; Matt. i, 4; Luke iii, 33). His daughter Elishaba was married to Aaron (Exod. vi, 23).

2. A son of Kohath, the second son of Levi (1 Chron. vi, 22, 2, 18, in which latter two verses he seems to be called IZHAR, q. v.).

3. A leader of the 112 descendants of Uzziel the Levite, who were appointed by David to remove the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv, 10, 11), B.C. cir. 1043.

Ammin'adib (אַמִּינָדִיב), perhaps another form of the name AMMINADAB; Sept. Αμινάδᾰβ), a person whose chariots are mentioned as proverbial for their swiftness (Cant. vi, 12); from which he appears to have been, like Jehu, one of the most celebrated characters of his day. In many MSS. the Hebrew term is divided into two words, אַמִּי נָדִיב, ammi nadib, "of my willing" or "loyal people," which has been followed in the Syriac, by the Jews in their Spanish version, and by many modern translators; but, taken in this way, it is difficult to assign any satisfactory meaning to the passage.—Good's Song of Songs, in loc.

Ammishad'daï (Heb. Ammishadday', אַמִּישַׁדַּדַּי, people [i. e. servants] of the Almighty; Sept. Ἀμμισηδδαι), the father of Abiezer, which latter was the chief of the Danites at the Exode (Num. i, 12; ii, 25). B.C. ante 1658.

Ammiz'abad (Heb. Ammizabad', אַמִּיזַבָּד, people of the Girir, i. e. servant of Jehorah; Sept. Ἀμμιζαβδ v. r. Ζαβδ), the son and subaltern of Benaiah, which latter was the third and prominent captain of the host under David (1 Chron. xxvii, 6), B.C. 1014.

Am'mon (Heb. Ammon', אַמּוֹן, another form of the name Ben-Ammi; Sept. Ἀμμών), the son of Lot by his younger daughter (Gen. xix, 38), B.C. 2063. See BEN-AMMI. It also stands for his posterity (comp. Psa. lxxxiii, 7, 8), usually in the phrase "children of Ammon." See AMMONITE. The expression most commonly employed for this nation is (in the original) "Bene-Ammon;" next in frequency comes "Ammoni" or "Ammonim;" and least often "Ammon." The translators of the Auth. Vers. have, as usual, neglected these minute differences, and have employed the three terms, children of Ammon, Ammonites, Ammon, indiscriminately. For No-Ammon, see AMON, and No. The name is perpetuated in the modern ruins called Amman, which represent RABBAH-AMMON (q. v.).

Ammon, CHRISTOPHER FREDERICK, a German theologian, born at Bayreuth, January 16, 1766. He became, in 1789, professor of philosophy in Erlangen; in 1792, professor of theology at the same university; in 1791, professor of theology at Göttingen. In 1804 he was called back to Erlangen, and was at the same time appointed superintendent and consistorial councillor at Ansbach. In 1813 he was called as chief court-preacher (Oberhofprediger) and chief-consistorial preacher to Dresden. In 1831 he became a member of the state council of Saxony, and of the ministry of worship and public instruction, and, subsequently, vice-president of the supreme consistory. He resigned in 1849, and died at Dresden on May 21, 1850. He is chiefly known by his work on the Development of Christianity as a Universal Religion (Fortbildung d. Christenthums zur Weltreligion, 4 vols. Leip. 1833-1840), in which he argues in favor of such a development of doctrine as may keep theology in harmony with the progress of science. Ammon was a leader of the Rationalist school. He was a man of extensive learning, and a copious author. Among his writings are Geschichte d. Homiletik (Gött. 1804); Kanzelbelehren (1799 and 1812, 8vo); Opuscula Theologica (2 vols. 1793, 1803); Bibl. Theologia (2d ed. 1801-2, 3 vols. 8vo); Suum Theologie (3d ed. 1816); Christologie (Erl. 1791, 8vo); besides many minor works. He was regarded as one of the first pulpit orators of Germany, and is the author of many volumes of sermons. He also edited the Magazin für christliche Prediger (Magazine for Christian preachers, Hanover, 1816-21, 6 vols.). A biographical sketch of Ammon is given in the pamphlet "Christoph Friedrich v. n. Ammon nach Leben, Ansichten und Wirken" (Leipsic, 1850). See also Bibliotheca Sacra, x, 241.—Winer, Theol. Literatur.

Am'monite (Heb. Ammon', אַמּוֹנִי, Sept. Ἀμμωνίτης and Ἀμμωνίτης; also אַמּוֹנִי בְנֵי, "children of Ammon;" Sept. vici Ἀμμών), the usual designation of the people descended from Ben-Ammi, the son of Lot by his younger daughter (Gen. xix, 38; comp. Psa. lxxxiii, 7, 8), as Moab was by the elder; and dating from the destruction of Sodom. The near relation between the two peoples indicated in the story of their origin continued throughout their existence; from their earliest mention (Deut. ii) to their disappearance from the biblical history (Jud. v, 2) the brother-tribes are named together (comp. Judg. x, 10; 2 Chron. xx, 1; Zeph. ii, 8, etc.). Indeed, so close was their union, and so near their identity, that each would appear to be occasionally spoken of under the name of the other. Thus the "land of the children of Ammon" is said to have been given to the "children of Lot," i. e. to both Ammon and Moab (Deut. ii, 19). They are both said to have hired Balaam to curse Israel (Deut. xxxiii, 4), whereas the detailed narrative of that event omits all mention of Ammon (Num. xxii, xxiii). In the answer of Jephthah to the king of Ammon the allusions are continually to Moab (Judg. xi, 15, 18, 25), while Chemosh, the peculiar deity of Moab (Num. xxxi, 29), is called "thy god" (ver. 24). The land from Arnon to Jabbok, which the king of Ammon calls "my land" (ver. 13), is elsewhere distinctly stated to have once belonged to a "king of Moab" (Num. xxi, 26). "Land" or "country" is, however, but rarely ascribed to them, nor is there any reference to those habits and circumstances of civilization—the "plentiful fields," the "hay," the "summer fruits," the "vineyards," the "presses," and the "songs of the grape-treaders"—which so constantly recur in the allusions to Moab (1-a. xv, xvi; Jer. xlviii); but, on the contrary, we find everywhere traces of the fierce habits of marauders in their incursions, thrusting out the right eyes of whole cities (1 Sam. xi, 2), ripping up the women with child (Amos i, 13), and displaying a very high degree of crafty cruelty (Jer. xli, 6, 7; Jud. vii, 11, 12) to their enemies, as well as a suspicious discourtesy to their allies, which on one occasion (2 Sam. x, 1-5) brought all but extermination on the tribe (xii, 3f). Ner is the contrast less observable between the one city of Ammon, the fortified hold of Rabbah (2 Sam. xi, 1; Ezra xxv, 5; Amos i, 13), and the "streets," the "house-tops," and the "high-places" of the numerous and busy towns of the rich plains of Moab (Jer. xlviii; Isa. xv, xvi). Taking the above into account, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that, while Moab was the settled and civilized half of the nation of Lot, the Bene-Ammon formed its predatory and Bedouin section. A remarkable confirmation of this opinion occurs in the fact that the special deity of the tribe was worshipped, not in a house or on a high place, but in a booth or tent designated by the very word which most keenly expressed to the Israelites the contrast between a nomadic and a settled life (Amos v, 26; Acts vii, 43). See STUBBORN. (See Stanley, Palest. App. § 89.) On the west of Jordan they never obtained a footing. Among the confusions of the times of the judges we find them twice passing over; once with Moab and Amalek, seizing Jericho, the "city of palm-trees" (Judg. iii, 13), and a second time "to fight against Judah and Benjamin, and the house of Ephraim;" but they quickly returned to the freer pastures of Gilead, leaving but one trace of their presence in the name of Chephar ha-Ammonai, "the handlet of the Ammonites" (Josh. xviii, 24), situated in the portion of Benjamin somewhere at the head of the passes which lead up from the Jordan valley, and form the natural access to the table-land of the west country.

Unlike Moab, the precise position of the territory of the Ammonites is not ascertainable. They originally occupied a tract of country (sometimes called Ammonitis, Ἀμμωνίτις, 2 Macc. iv, 26; comp. Joseph. Ant. v, 7, 9; xi, 2, 1) east of the Amorites, and separated from the Moabites by the river Arnon, and from Bashan or Gilead by the Jabbok (Deut. iii, 16; Josh. xii, 2). The capital of this naturally well-fortified territory (Num. xxi, 24) was Rabbah-Ammon (Deut. iii, 11; Amos i, 11; comp. Ireland, Palest. j, 103 sq.; Cellarii Notit. ii, 671 sq.). It was previously in the possession of a gigantic race called Zamzumim [Deut. ii, 20], "but the Lord destroyed them before the Ammonites, and they succeeded them and dwelt in their stead." The Israelites, on reaching the borders of the promised land, found Sihon, king of Heshbon, in possession by conquest of the district adjoining the Dead Sea (Num. xxi, 26), but were commanded not to molest the children of Ammon, for the sake of their progenitor Lot (Deut. ii, 19). But, though thus preserved from the annoyance which the passage of such an immense host through their country might have occasioned, they showed them no hospitality or kindness; they were therefore prohibited from "entering the congregation of the Lord" (i. e. from being admitted into the civil community of the Israelites) "to the tenth generation forever" (Deut. xxiii, 3). This is evidently intended to be a perpetual prohibition, and was so understood by Nehemiah (Neh. xiii, 1). The first mention of their active hostility against Israel occurs in Judges iii, 13: "The king of Moab gathered unto him the children of Ammon and Amalek, and went and smote Israel." Later we are informed that the children of Israel forsook Jehovah and served the gods of various nations, including those of the children of Ammon, and the anger of Jehovah was kindled against them, and he sold them into the hands of the Philistines and of the children of Ammon. The Ammonites crossed over the Jordan, and fought with Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, so that "Israel was sore distressed." In answer to Jephthah's messengers (Judg. xi, 12), the king of Ammon charged the Israelites with having taken away that part of his territories which lay between the rivers Arnon and Jabok, which, in Joshua xiii, 25, is called "half the land of the children of Ammon," but was in the possession of the Amorites when the Israelites invaded it; and this fact was urged by Jephthah, in order to prove that the charge was ill-founded. Jephthah "smote them from Aroer to Minnith, even twenty cities, with a very great slaughter" (Judg. xi, 33; Josephus, Ant. v, 7, 10). The Ammonites were again signally defeated by Saul (1 Sam. xi, 11), and, according to Josephus, their king, Nahash, was slain (Ant. vi, 5, 3). His successor, who bore the same name, was a friend of David, and died some years after his accession to the throne. In consequence of the gross insult offered to David's ambassadors by his son Hanun (2 Sam. x, 4; Joseph. Ant. vii, 6, 1), a war ensued, in which the Ammonites were defeated, and their allies, the Syrians, were so daunted "that they feared to help the children of Ammon any more" (2 Sam. x, 19). In the following year David took their metropolis, Rabbah, and great abundance of spoil, which is probably mentioned by anticipation in 2 Sam. viii, 12 (2 Sam. x, 14; xii, 26-31; Joseph. Ant. vii, 7, 8). In the reign of Jehoshaphat the Ammonites joined with the Moabites and other tribes belonging to Mount Seir to invade Judah; but, by the divine intervention, were led to destroy one another. Jehoshaphat and his people were three days in gathering the spoil (2 Chron. xx, 25). The Ammonites "gave gifts" to Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi, 8), and paid a tribute to his son Jotham for three successive years, consisting of 100 talents of silver, 1000 measures of wheat, and as many of barley. When the two and a half tribes were carried away captive, the Ammonites took possession of the towns belonging to the tribe of Gad (Jer. xlix, 1). "Bands of the children of Ammon" and of other nations came up with Nebuchadnezzar against Jerusalem, and joined in exulting over its fall (Ezek. xxv, 3, 6). Yet they allowed some of the fugitive Jews to take refuge among them, and even to intermarry (Jer. xl, 11; Neh. xiii, 13). Among the wives of Solomon's harem are included Ammonite women (1 Kings xi, 1), one of whom, Naamah, was the mother of Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv, 31; 2 Chron. xii, 13), and henceforward traces of the presence of Ammonite women in Judah are not wanting (2 Chron. xxiv, 26;

Neh. xiii, 23; Ezra ix, 1; see Geiger, Urschrift, p. 47, 49, 299). In the writings of the prophets terrible denunciations are uttered against the Ammonites on account of their rancorous hostility to the people of Israel, and the destruction of their metropolis, Rabbah, is distinctly foretold (Zeph. ii, 8; Jer. xlix, 1-6; Ezek. xxv, 1-5, 10; Amos i, 13-15). See RABBAH. On the return of the Jews from Babylon the Ammonites manifested their ancient hostility by deriding and opposing the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Neh. iv, 3, 7, 8). Both Ezra and Nehemiah expressed vehement indignation against those Jews who had intermarried with the heathen (Ezra x; Neh. xiii, 25), and thus transgressed the divine command (Deut. vii, 3). The last appearances of the Ammonites in the biblical narrative are in the books of Judith (v, vi, vii) and of the Maccabees (1 Macc. v, 6, 30-43), and it has been already remarked that their chief characteristics—close alliance with Moab, hatred of Israel, and cunning cruelty—are maintained to the end. Judas Maccabeus fought many battles with the Ammonites, and took Jazer, with the towns belonging to it (1 Macc. v, 6, 3-43). In the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, Josephus (Ant. xiii, 8, 1) speaks of a certain Zeno Cotylas as ruler of Philadelphia (the older Rabbah). Justin Martyr affirms that in his time the Ammonites were numerous (Dial. cum Tryph. § 119). Origen speaks of their country under the general denomination of Arabia (In Job. c. i). Josephus says that the Moabites and Ammonites were inhabitants of Cœle-Syria (Ant. i, 11, 5; xi, 5, 8). See AMMON.

The tribe was governed by a king (Judg. xi, 12, etc.; 1 Sam. xii, 12; 2 Sam. x, 1; Jer. xl, 14) and by "princes," מְלָכִים (2 Sam. x, 3; 1 Chron. xix, 3). Their national idol was Molech or Milcom (see Jour. Sac. Lit. 1852, p. 365 sq.), whose worship was introduced among the Israelites by the Ammonitish wives of Solomon (1 Kings xi, 5, 7), and the high-places built by that sovereign for this "abomination" were not destroyed till the reign of Josiah (2 Kings xxiii, 13). Besides Nahash and Hanun, an Ammonitish king, Baalis, is mentioned by Jeremiah (xl, 14) and Josephus (Ant. x, 9, 3). The following Ammonite names are preserved in the sacred text: Achior (Judith v, 5, etc.), Baalis (Jer. xl, 14), Hanun (2 Sam. x, 1, etc.), Molech, Naamah (1 Kings xiv, 21, etc.), Nac-hash (1 Sam. xi, 1, etc.), Shobi (2 Sam. xvii, 27), Timotheus (1 Macc. v, 6, etc.), Tobijah (Neh. ii, 10, etc.), Zelek (2 Sam. xxiii, 37); to which may probably be added the name Zamzummim, applied by the Ammonites to the Rephaim whom they dispossessed.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v. CANAANITE.

Am'monitess (Heb. Ammonith', מְאֻמֹּנִיתַיִת or מְאֻמֹּנִיתַיִת; Sept. Ἀμμωνίτις, in Chron. Ἀμμωνίτις and Ἀμμωνίτις), a female (1 Kings xiv, 21, 31; 2 Chron. xii, 13; xxiv, 26) AMMONITE (q. v.).

Ammonius, a Christian philosopher, sometimes confounded with Ammonius Saccas, lived at Alexandria in the third century. He is the author of a "Harmony in the Gospel," a work which by several critics is attributed to Tatian, and which is said to have induced Eusebius to write his "Canons." There is a Latin translation of this work by Victor of Capua, entitled Ammonii, vulgo Tatiani, diatessaron, sive harmonie in quatuor evangelia (Mayence, 1524, 8vo). A life of Christ was extracted from this work by Nachtigal (Latinized Luscinus), under the title Vita Jesu Christi, ex quatuor evangelistis ex Ammonii Alex. fragmentis graecis latine versa, per O. Luscinum (Erfurt, 1544). This Ammonius is perhaps also the author of a metaphrase of the gospel of John, which is generally attributed to Nonnus, and which is found in MS. in the library of St. Mark at Venice.—Hofer, Biographie Générale, ii, 324.

Ammonius Saccas, or Saccophōrus (so called because he was a porter in early life), a philosopher of Alexandria toward the end of the second century. He is considered as the founder of the Neo-Platonic Philosophy. Plotinus, Longinus, and Origen, were among his pupils. His object was to reconcile Plato and Aristotle, and hence his school was called eclectic. Ammonius had been educated in Christianity; and he seems never to have abandoned the name of the faith, while he was disparaging its doctrines and its essence. Porphyry asserts that Ammonius deserted Christianity. Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vi, 19) that he adhered to it. To these two opinions, variously advocated by most modern divines, others have added a third, that Eusebius mistook a Christian writer of the same name for the heathen philosopher; and this is warmly maintained by Lardner (Works, ii, 439; vii, 446). He was a man of great talents and energy, and indefatigable in the pursuit of knowledge.—Waddington, Ch. Hist. ch. iii; Tennemann, Hist. Phil. § 203; Brucker, Hist. Phil. ii, 205; Mosheim, Comm. ii, 348, 7; Simon, Hist. de l'école d'Alexandrie, i, 204; Dehaut, Essai sur Ammonius Saccas (Bruxelles, 1836, 4to). Am'non (Heb. Amnon', אֲמֹנִים [2 Sam. xiii, 20, אֲמֹנִים, Amnon'], faithful; Sept. Ἀμῶν), the name of two men.

1. The first named of the four sons of Shimon or Shammai, of the children of Ezra, the descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 20, comp. ver. 17), B.C. prob. post 1612.

2. The eldest son of David by Ahinoam of Jezreel (1 Chron. iii, 1), born at Hebron (2 Sam. iii, 2), B.C. cir. 1052. He is only known for his violation of his half sister Tamar, B.C. cir. 1031, which her full brother Absalom revenged two years after, by causing him to be assassinated while a guest at his table (2 Sam. xiii). See ABSALOM. The Sept. (in a clause added in 2 Sam. xiii, 21, but wanting in the Hebrew) assigns as the reason for David's refraining from executing the penalty due to Amnon, that "he loved him because he was his first-born"—a fact that no doubt formed an additional incentive to the ambitious Absalom for putting him out of the way. See DAVID.

A'mok (Heb. Amok', אֲמוֹק, d ep; Sept. Ἀμοῦκ, Ἀμῖκ), the father of Eber, and a chief among the priests that returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii, 7, 20), B.C. 536.

Amolo or Amulo, archbishop of Lyons, A.D. 841, was one of the opponents of Gotteschalvus, but seems to have been of a different spirit from some of them, Hinemar especially. He wrote, 1. An Epistle to Theobald, about certain pretended relics of saints and the false miracles which were promulgated by the scoundrels who sold them. Amolo declared it all imposture. 2. To Gotteschalvus, an epistle (Sismond's Opera, ii, 893) written with a great deal of brotherly love, and declaring that "God had predestinated no man to damnation." Also "Opuscula duo de Predestinatione," to be found in Eib. Max. Patr. xiv, 329.

Amōmum (ἀμῶμον). This word is only found in Rev. xviii, 13 (between "cinnamon" and "odors"), and is even there omitted in the received text. It denoted an odoriferous plant or seed, used in preparing precious ointment. It probably differed from the modern amomum of the druggists (Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v.), but the exact species is not known. It was of various qualities, growing in Armenia and Media, and also in Pontus, with seeds in clusters like grapes (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xii, 28; Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. ix, 7).

A'mon (Heb. Ammon', אֲמֹנִים, builder [the deriv. of No. 3 is prob. different]), the name of three men and a deity.

1. (Sept. Ἀμῶν and Ἐπίῳ v. r. Σαμῆῳ.) The governor of the city of Samaria in the time of Ahab, to whose custody the prophet Micaiah was delivered (1 Kings xxii, 26; 2 Chron. xviii, 25), B.C. 895.

2. (Sept. Ἀμῶν v. r. Ἀμῶς.) The son of Manasseh (by Meshullemeth the daughter of Haruz of Jotbah), and fifteenth separate king of Judah, B.C. 642-640. He appears to have derived little benefit from the instructive example which the sin, punishment, and repentance of his father offered; for he restored idolatry, and again set up the images which Manasseh had cast down. To Amon's reign we must refer the terrible picture which the prophet Zephaniah gives of the moral and religious state of Jerusalem; idolatry supported by priests and prophets (i, 4; iii, 4), the poor ruthlessly oppressed (iii, 3), and shameless indifference to evil (iii, 11). He was assassinated in a court conspiracy; but the people put the regicides to death, and raised to the throne his son Josiah, then but eight years old (2 Kings xxi, 18-26; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 20-25). He is mentioned among the ancestors of Christ (Ἀμῶν, Matt. i, 10; comp. 1 Chron. iii, 14; Jer. i, 2; xxv, 3; Zeph. i, 1). See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

3. (Sept. Ἀμμῶν.) AMMON, an Egyptian and Libyan god, in whom the classical writers unanimously recognise their own Zeus and Jupiter (Ἀμμῶν, Herod. ii, 42; Ἀμμῶν, Diod. Sic. i, 13). The primitive seat of his worship appears to have been at Meroë, from which it descended to Thebes, and thence, according to Herodotus (ii, 54), was transmitted to the oasis of Siwah and to Dodona; in all which places there were celebrated oracles of this god (Plut. Isid. c. 9; Alex. c. 72; Arnobius, vi, 12; Justin, xi, 11; Strabo, i, 49 sq.; xvii, 814). His chief temple and oracle in Egypt, however, were at Thebes, a city peculiarly consecrated to him, and which is probably meant by the No and No-Amon of the prophets, the Diospolis of the Greeks. He is generally represented on Egyptian monuments by the seated figure of a man with a ram's head, or by that of an entire ram, and of a blue color (Wilkinson, 2 ser. i, 243 sq.). In honor of him, the inhabitants of the Thebaid abstained from the flesh of sheep, but they annually sacrificed a ram to him and dressed his image in the hide. A religious reason for that ceremony is assigned by Herodotus (ii, 42); but Diodorus (iii, 72) ascribes his wearing horns to a more trivial cause. There appears to be no account of the manner in which his oracular responses were given; but as a sculpture at Karnak, which Creuzer (Symbol. i, 507) has copied from the Description de l'Égypte, represents his portable tabernacle mounted on a boat and borne on the shoulders of forty priests, it may be conjectured, from the resemblance between several features of that representation and the description of the oracle of Jupiter Ammon in Diodorus, xvii, 50, that his responses were communicated by some indication during the solemn transportation of his tabernacle. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. Ammon.) That the name of this god really occurs in the passage "Behold, I will punish the multitude (literally, Amon) of No" (Jer. xlv, 25), is a view favored by the context and all internal grounds; but in the parallel passage, Ezek. xxx, 15, the equivalent hamon, אֲמוֹנִים, is employed. Comp. also Ezek. xxx, 4, 10, for the use of the latter word with reference to Egypt. These cases, or at least the former two, seem therefore to be instances of paronomasia (comp. Isa. xxx, 7; lxxv, 11, 12). It is also undoubtedly referred to in the name No-AMON [see No], given to Thebes (Nahum iii, 8, where the English text translates "populous No"). The etymology of the name is obscure. Eustathius (ad Dionys. Perieg. p. 125, ed. Bernhardt) says that, according to some, the word means shepherd. Jablonski (Pauth. Egypt. i, 181) proposed an etymology by which it would signify producing light; and Champollion originally regarded it as meaning glory (Egypte sous les Pharaons, i, 247), but, in his latest interpretation (after Mancho in Plut.), assigned it the sense of hidden. The name accompanying the above figure on the monuments is written Amm, more fully Amm-Re, i. e. "Amon-Sun" (Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 115). Macrobius asserts (Saturnal. i, 21) that the Libyans adored the sun under the form of Ammon; and he points to the ram's horns as evidence of a connection with the zodiacal sign Aries (Müller, Archäol. p. 276; Pauly, Real-Encycl. i, 407 sq.); but this has been disputed (Jomard, Descr. de l'Égypte; Bähr, Symbolik d. Mos. Cultus, ii, 296, 641), although it would seem unsuccessfully (Creuzer, Symbolik, ii, 205; Schmidt, De Zodiaci origine, Fg. p. 33, in his Opusc. quibus res. Eg. illustrantur, Carolis, 1765). —Kitto, s. v. See EGYPT; HIEROGLYPHS.

4. (Sept. Ἰμειρ v. r. Ἰμειρ.) The head or ancestor of one of the families of the Nethiim that returned from Babylon (Neh. vii, 59); called AMI in Ezra ii, 57. B. C. ante 536.

Am'orite (Heb. Emori', אֲמֹרִי, Sept. Ἀμορῆαιος), the designation of the descendants of one of the sons of Cauaan (Gen. x, 16, in like manner, with the art., אֲמֹרִי, Sept. ὁ Ἀμορῆαιος, Auth. Vers. "the Amorite.") Gesenius, however, prefers the derivation suggested by Simonis, from an obsolete אֲמֹר, height, q. d. mountaineer; comp. Ewald, Isr. Gesch. i, 279 sq.). They were the most powerful and distinguished of the Canaanitish nations (Gen. x, 16; Exod. iii, 8; xiii, 5; xxxiii, 2). We find them first noticed in Gen. xiv, 7, "the Amorites that dwell in Hazezon-tamar" (q. v.), afterward called Engedi, a city in the wilderness of Judea not far from the Dead Sea (Num. xiii, 29; Deut. i, 7, 20). In the promise to Abraham (Gen. xv, 21), the Amorites are specified as one of the nations whose country would be given to his posterity. But at that time three confederates of the patriarch belonged to this tribe—Mamre, Aner, and Eshcol (Gen. xiv, 13, 24). When the Israelites were about to enter the promised land, the Amorites occupied a tract on both sides of the Jordan. Josephus calls it Amoritis (Ἀμορῆαιος, Ant. iv, 5, 1; 7, 3) and Amoria (Ἀμορία v. r. Ἀμορία, Ant. v, 1, 1). They seem to have originally inhabited the southern slopes of the mountains of Judaea (hence called the mount of the Amorites, Deut. i, 7; xix, 20), but whether as aborigines or as dispossessors of an earlier race is uncertain, probably the former. It appears, therefore, that from the barren heights west of the Dead Sea (Gen. xiv, 7) they had stretched west to Hebron (Gen. xiv, 13; comp. xiii, 18). From this, their ancient seat, they may have crossed the valley of the Jordan, tempted by the high table-lands on the east, for there we next meet them at the date of the invasion of the country. Sihon, their then king, had taken the rich pasture-land south of the Jabbok, and had driven the Moabites, its former possessors, across the wide chasm of the Arnon (Num. xxi, 26, 13), which thenceforward formed the boundary between the two hostile peoples

(Num. xxi, 13). That part of their territories which lay to the east of the Jordan was allotted to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh. This district was under two kings—Sihon, king of Heshbon (frequently called king of the Amorites), and Og, king of Bashan, who "dwelt at Ashtaroth [and] in [at] Edrei" (Deut. i, 4, compared with Josh. xii, 4; xiii, 12). The Israelites apparently approached from the south-east, keeping "on the other side" (that is, on the east) of the upper part of the Arnon, which there bends southward, so as to form the eastern boundary of the country of Moab. Their request to pass through his land to the fords of Jordan was refused by Sihon (Num. xxi, 21; Deut. ii, 26); he "went out" against them (xxi, 23; ii, 32), was killed with his sons and his people (ii, 33), and his land, cattle, and cities, taken possession of by Israel (xxi, 21, 25, 31; ii, 34-56). This rich tract, bounded by the Jabllok on the north, the Arnon on the south, Jordan on the west, and "the wilderness" on the east (Judg. xi, 21, 22)—in the words of Josephus, "a land lying between three rivers after the manner of an island" (Ant. iv, 5, 2)—was, perhaps, in the most special sense, the "land of the Amorites" (Num. xxi, 31; Josh. xii, 2, 3; xiii, 9; Judg. xi, 21, 22); but their possessions are distinctly stated to have extended to the very foot of Hermon (Deut. iii, 8; iv, 48), embracing "all Gilead and all Bashan" (iii, 10), with the Jordan valley on the east of the river (iv, 49), and forming together the land of the "two kings of the Amorites," Sihon and Og (Deut. xxxi, 4; Josh. ii, 10; ix, 10; xxiv, 12). Og also gave battle to the Israelites at Edrei, and was totally defeated. After the capture of Ai, five kings of the Amorites, whose dominions lay within the allotment of the tribe of Judah, leagued together to wreak vengeance on the Gibeonites for having made a separate peace with the invaders. Joshua, on being apprised of their design, marched to Gibeon and defeated them with great slaughter (Josh. x, 10). Another confederacy was shortly after formed on a still larger scale; the associated forces are described as "much people, even as the sand upon the sea-shore in multitude, with horses and chariots very many" (Josh. xi, 4). Josephus says that they consisted of 300,000 armed foot-soldiers, 10,000 cavalry, and 20,000 chariots (Ant. v, 1, 8). Joshua came suddenly upon them by the waters of Merom (the lake Semechonitis of Josephus, Ant. v, 5, 1, and the modern Bahr el-Huleh), and Israel smote them until they left none remaining (Josh. xi, 8). Still, after their severe defeats, the Amorites, by means of their war-chariots and cavalry, confined the Danites to the hills, and would not suffer them to settle in the plains; they even succeeded in retaining possession of some of the mountainous parts (Judg. i, 34-36). It is mentioned as an extraordinary circumstance that in the days of Samuel there was peace between Israel and the Amorites (1 Sam. vii, 14). In Solomon's reign a tribute of bond-service was levied on the remnant of the Amorites and other Canaanitish nations (1 Kings ix, 21; 2 Chron. viii, 8). See CANAAN.

A discrepancy has been supposed to exist between Deut. i, 41, and Num. xiv, 45, since in the former the Amorites are said to have attacked the Israelites, and in the latter the Amalekites; the obvious explanation is, that both terms are used synonymously for the "Canaanites" named in the same connection. Thus the Gibeonites in Josh. ix, 7, are called Hivites, yet in 2 Sam. xxi, 2, they are said to be "of the remnant of the Amorites," probably because they were descended from a common stock, and were in subjection to an Amoritish prince, as we do not read of any king of the Hivites. The Amorites, on account of their prominence among the Canaanitish tribes, sometimes stand (Josh. xxiv, 18; Amos ii, 9; 1 Kings xxi, 26) as the representatives of the Canaanites in general (Hamel-weld, iii, 56 sq.; Kurtz, on the primitive inhabitants of Palestine, in the Luther. Zeitschr. 1845, iii, 48 sq.; Jour. of Sac. Lit. Oct. 1851, p. 166; Apr. 1852, p. 76; Jan. 1853, p. 306; Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. II, i, 255; Ireland, Palust. p. 138). But although the name generally denotes the mountain tribes of the centre of the country, yet this definition is not always strictly maintained, varying probably with the author of the particular part of the history, and the time at which it was written. Nor ought we to expect that the Israelites could have possessed very accurate knowledge of a set of small tribes whom they were called upon to exterminate—with whom they were forbidden to hold any intercourse—and, moreover, of whose general similarity to each other we have convincing proof in the confusion in question. Thus, Hebron is "Amorite" in Gen. xiii, 18, xiv, 13, though "Hittite" in xxiii, and "Canaanite" in Judg. i, 10. The "Hivites" of Gen. xxxiv, 2, are "Amorites" in xlvi, 22; and so also in Josh. ix, 7; xi, 19, as compared with 2 Sam. xxi, 12. Jerusalem is "Amorite" in Josh. x, 5, 6, but in xvii, 63; xviii, 28; Judg. i, 21; xix, 11; 2 Sam. v, 6, etc., it is "Jebusite." The "Canaanites" of Num. xiv, 45 (comp. Judg. i, 17), are "Amorites" in Deut. i, 44. Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglen were in the low country of the Shefelá (Josh. xv 35, 39), but in Josh. x, 5, 6, they are "Amorites that dwell in the mountains;" and it would appear as if the "Amorites" who forced the Danites into the mountain (Judg. i, 34, 35) must have themselves remained on the plain. Notwithstanding these few differences, however, from a comparison of the passages previously quoted, it appears plain that "Amorite" was in general a local term, and not the name of a distinct tribe. This is confirmed by the following facts: 1. The wide area over which the name was spread. 2. The want of connection between those on the east and those on the west of Jordan—which is only once hinted at (Josh. ii, 10). 3. The existence of kings like Sihon and Og, whose territories were separate and independent, but who are yet called "the two kings of the Amorites," a state of things quite at variance with the habits of Semitic tribes. 4. Beyond the three confederates of Abram and these two kings no individual Amorites appear in history (unless Araamah or Ornan the Jebusite be one). 5. There are no traces of any peculiar government, worship, or customs, different from those of the other "nations of Canaan." See CANAANITE.

All mountaineers are warlike; and, from the three confederate brothers who at a moment's notice accompanied "Abram the Hebrew" in his pursuit of the five kings, down to those who, not depressed by the slaughter inflicted by Joshua and the terror of the name of Israel, persisted in driving the children of Dan into the mountain, the Amorites fully maintained this character. From the language of Amos (ii, 9) it has been inferred that the Amorites in general were men of extraordinary stature, but perhaps the allusion is to an individual, Og, king of Bashan, who is described by Moses as being the last "of the remnant of the giants." His bedstead was of iron, "nine cubits in length and four cubits in breadth" (Deut. iii, 21). One word of the "Amorite" language has survived—the name Senir (not "Shenir" for Mount Hermon (Deut. iii, 9); but may not this be the Canaanitish name as opposed to the Phœnician (Sirion) on the one side and the Hebrew on the other?—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v. Amort, EUSEBIUS, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at the Bibernmühle (beaver mill) near Teolz, Bavaria, Nov. 15, 1692. He entered the order of the Augustines at Pollingen, when he subsequently became professor of philosophy, theology, and ecclesiastical law. He followed Cardinal Cervari to Rome, where he gained the favor of Pope Clement XII. He returned to Bavaria in 1735, and died Feb. 5, 1775. He wrote two works to vindicate the authorship of Thomas à Kempis to the book "De Imitatione Christi" (Scutum Kempense, Cologne, 1728, 4to; and Deductio Critica, Augsburg, 1761, 4to). Among his numerous other works are a manual of theology in four volumes (Theologia eclectica, moralis et scholastica, Augsb. 1751), and a defence of the Roman Catholic Church (Demonstratio critica Religionis Catholicæ, Augsb. 1751). See Hoefler, Biographie Générale, ii, 393; Wetzer and Welte, Kirchen-Lexicon, i, 208.

Amory, THOMAS, D.D., an English dissenting minister, born at Taunton, Jan. 28, 1701, and educated under the care of his uncle, Mr. H. Grove, who had an academy for training young ministers at Taunton. In 1730 he was ordained to the pastoral office. On the death of Mr. Grove, in 1738, Mr. Amory succeeded him as chief tutor in the academy at Taunton, where he was greatly esteemed, not only by his own congregation and sect, but by all the neighboring congregations and ministers, as well of the Independent and Baptist denominations as of the Church of England. In October, 1759, he removed to London, as afternoon preacher to the society in the Old Jewry, belonging to Dr. S. Chandler. In London he was not popular; his sermons, though practical and affecting to the attentive hearer, were rather too close, judicious, and philosophical for the common run of congregations. When the dissenting ministers, in 1772, formed a design of endeavoring to procure an enlargement of the Toleration Act, Dr. Amory was one of the committee appointed for that purpose. He died on the 24th of June, 1774. He was a good Biblical critic, and an excellent scholar. His principal works are, Sermons (5 vols. v. y.)—A Letter to a Friend on the Perplexities to which Christians are exposed—A Dialogue on Devotion after the manner of Xenophon (Lond. 1746);—Forms of Devotion for the Closet. He also wrote the Life and edited the Writings of the Rev. Henry Grove (Lond. 1740); also edited the Sermons of Grove, and Grove's System of Moral Philosophy; he wrote the Life and edited the Writings of Dr. George Benson, and edited the Posthumous Sermons of Dr. Chandler.—Jones, *Chr. A'mos (Heb. Amos, אָמוֹס, borne; Sept. and New Test. Ἀμώκ), the name of two men.

1. One of the twelve minor prophets, and a contemporary of Isaiah and Hosea. He was a native of Tekoah, about six miles south of Bethlehem, inhabited chiefly by shepherds, to which class he belonged, being also a dresser of sycamore trees, and not trained in any of the prophetic schools (i, 1; vii, 14, 15). Though some critics have supposed that he was a native of the kingdom of Israel, and took refuge in Tekoah when persecuted by Amaziah, yet a comparison of the passages Amos i, 1; vii, 14, with Amaziah's language, vii, 12, leads us to believe that he was born and brought up in that place. The period during which he filled the prophetic office was of short duration, unless we suppose that he uttered other predictions which are not recorded. It is stated expressly that he prophesied in the days of Uzziah, king of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam, the son of Joash, king of Israel, two years before the earthquake (Amos i, 1). This earthquake, to which there is an allusion in Zechariah (xiv, 5), is represented by Josephus (Ant. ix, 10, 4) and some other Jewish writers as a mark of the divine displeasure against Uzziah (in addition to his leprosy) for usurping the priest's office some time before his death. This agrees with the sacred narrative, which informs us that Jotham, his son, acted as regent during the remainder of his reign; for we must understand the accession spoken of in 2 Kings xv, 33, when he was twenty-five years old, to refer to this association with his father. See JOTHAM. As Uzziah and Jeroboam were contemporaries for about twenty-seven years (B.C. 808–782), the latter part of this period will mark the date when Amos prophesied. This agrees with the intimation in ch. vii, 10, of the proximity of Jeroboam's death. Amos speaks of the conquests of this warlike king as completed (vi, 13; comp. 2 Kings xiv, 25); on the other hand the Assyrians, who toward the end of his reign were approaching Palestine (Hos. x, 6; xi, 5), do not seem as yet to have caused any alarm in the country. Amos predicts, indeed, that Israel and other neighboring nations will be punished by certain wild conquerors from the north (i, 5; v, 27; vi, 14), but does not name them, as if they were still unknown or unheeded. (See Niemeyer, Charakt. d. Bibel, v, 302 sq.)

Book of Amos.—When Amos received his commission (B.C. 783), the kingdom of Israel, which had been "cut short" by Hazael (2 Kings x, 33) toward the close of Jehu's reign, was restored to its ancient limits and splendor by Jeroboam II (2 Kings xiv, 25). But the restoration of national prosperity was followed by the prevalence of luxury, licentiousness, and oppression, to an extent that again provoked the divine displeasure; and Amos was called from the sheepfolds to be the harbinger of the coming judgments. The poor were oppressed (viii, 4), the ordinances of religion thought burdensome (viii, 5), and illness, luxury, and extravagance were general (iii, 15). The source of these evils was idolatry, of course that of the golden calves, not of Baal, since Jehu's dynasty occupied the throne, though it seems probable from 2 Kings xiii, 6, which passage must refer to Jeroboam's reign [see BENHADAD III], that the rites even of Astarte were tolerated in Samaria, though not encouraged. Calf-worship was specially practised at Bethel, where was a principal temple and summer palace for the king (vii, 13; comp. iii, 15), also at Gilgal, Dan, and Beersheba in Judah (iv, 4; v, 5; vii, 14), and was offensively united with the true worship of the Lord (v, 14, 21-23; comp. 2 Kings xvii, 33). Amos went to rebuke this at Bethel itself, but was compelled to return to Judah by the high-priest Amaziah, who procured from Jeroboam an order for his expulsion from the northern kingdom. Not that his commission was limited entirely to Israel. The thunder-storm (as Rückert poetically expresses it) rolls over all the surrounding kingdoms, touches Judah in its progress, and at length settles upon Israel. Chapters i; ii, 1-5, form a solemn prelude to the main subject; nation after nation is summoned to judgment, in each instance with the striking idiomatic expression (similar to that in Prov. xxx, 15, 18, 21), "For three transgressions—and for four—I will not turn away the punishment thereof." Israel is then addressed in the same style, and in chap. iii (after a brief rebuke of the twelve tribes collectively) its degenerate state is strikingly portrayed, and the denunciations of divine justice are intermingled, like repeated thunder-claps, to the end of chap. vi. The seventh and eighth chapters contain various symbolical visions, with a brief historical episode (vii, 10-17). In the ninth chapter the majesty of Jehovah and the terrors of his justice are set forth with a sublimity of diction which rivals and partly copies that of the royal Psalmist (comp. ver. 2, 3, with Psa. cix, and ver. 6 with Psa. civ). Toward the close the scene brightens; and from the eleventh verse to the end the promises of the divine mercy and returning favor to the chosen race are exhibited in imagery of great beauty taken from rural life. The allusions in the writings of this prophet are numerous and varied; they refer to natural objects, as in iii, 4, 8; iv, 7, 9; v, 8; vi, 12; ix, 3; to historical events, i, 9, 11, 13; ii, 1; iv, 11; v, 26; to agricultural or pastoral employments and occurrences, i, 3; ii, 13; iii, 5, 12; iv, 2, 9; v, 19; vii, 1; ix, 9, 13, 15; and to national institutions and customs, ii, 8; iii, 15; iv, 4; v, 21; vi, 4-6, 10; viii, 5, 10, 14. The book presupposes a popular acquaintance with the Pentateuch (see Hengstenberg, Beiträge zur Einleitung ins Alte Testament, i, 83-125), and implies that the ceremonies of religion, except where corrupted by Jeroboam I, were in accordance with the law of Moses. As the book is evidently not a series of detached prophecies, but logically and artistically connected in its several parts, it was probably written by Amos as we now have it after his return to Tekoah from his mission to Bethel (see Ewald, Propheten des Alten Bundes, i, 84 sq.) (Smith, s. v.).

The canonicity of the book of Amos is amply supported both by Jewish and Christian authorities. Philo, Josephus, and the Talmud include it among the minor prophets. It is also in the catalogues of Melito, Jerome, and the 60th canon of the Council of Laodicea. Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho (§ 22), quotes a considerable part of the fifth and sixth chapters, which he introduces by saying, "Hear how he speaks concerning these by Amos, one of the twelve." There are two quotations from it in the New Testament; the first (v, 25, 26) by the proto-martyr Stephen, Acts vii, 42; the second (ix, 11) by the Apostle James, Acts xv, 16. (See, generally, Knobel, Prophet, ii, 147 sq.; Hitzig, Kl. Prophet., p. 29; Carpov, Introd., iii, 314 sq.; Eichhorn, Einl., iv, 397 sq.; Jahn, II, ii, 401 sq.; Bertholdt, iv, 161 sq.; Davidson, in Horne's Introd., new ed. ii, 960 sq.)—Kitto, s. v.

Special exegetical works on the book of Amos are the following, of which the most important are designated by an asterisk [*] prefixed: Ephraem Syrus, Explanatio (in Opp., v, 255); *Kimchi, Commentarius (in Hebr. ed. 2. The ninth in the maternal line of ascent from Christ, being the son of Nahum (or Johanan), and the father of Mattathiah (Luke iii, 25), B.C. cir. 400. His name perhaps would be more properly Anglicized AMOZ, and in that case it would have the same derivation as under that article.

Amour, Saint. See SAINT AMOUE.

A'moz (Heb. Amot's, אֲמוֹז, strong; Sept. Amōwē), the father of the prophet Isaiah (2 Kings xix, 2, 20; xx, 1; 2 Chr. xxxvi, 22; xxxii, 20, 32; Isa. i, 1; ii, 1; xiii, 1; xx, 2), B.C. ante 756. He is also traditionally said to be the son of King Joash, and brother of Amaziah. The rabbins assert that the father of Isaiah was also a prophet, according to a rule among them, that when the father of a prophet is called in Scripture by his name it is an indication that he also had the gift of prophecy (Clem. Alex. Stromat., 1). Augustine conjectured (De Civit. Dei, xviii, 27) that the prophet Amos was the father of Isaiah; but the names of these two persons are written differently. Besides, the father of Isaiah, as well as Isaiah himself, was of Jerusalem. Some are of opinion that this Amoz was the man of God who spoke to King Amaziah, and obliged him to send back the hundred thousand men of Israel, whom he had purchased to march against the Edomites (2 Chron. xxv, 7, 8); but this opinion is supported by no proofs.

Amphibālum (outer coat, from ἀμφιβάλω, to throw around), the outermost dress worn by the priest in the service of the altar; not used in the Church of England, but retained in the Roman and Greek churches. It resembled in form the pænula, which took the place of the Roman toga. The pænula formed a circle, with an aperture to admit the head, while it fell down so as to envelop the person of the wearer. The Romish Church has altered it by cutting it away laterally, so as to expose the arms, and leave only a straight piece before and behind. The Greek Church retains it in its primitive shape. See VESTMENT.

Amphilochius, St., bishop of Iconium, was born in Cappadocia, and studied for the bar; but, after discharging for some time the office of advocate and judge, he retired into a solitude, where he led a self-denying life. In 374 he was consecrated bishop of Iconium, the metropolitan see of Lycaonia. He attended the second œcumenical council in 381, and in 383 held a synod at Side against the Messalians. The time of his death is unknown, but Jerome speaks of him as still living in 392. He opposed Arianism (Sozomen, Hist. Ec. vii, 6). Jerome also mentions a treatise concerning the Holy Spirit, written by Amphilochius, in which he proved the godhead of the Holy Ghost. Theodoret, in his dialogues, cites some passages of certain homilies of Amphilochius on the words of our Saviour, "My Father is greater than I," and "The Son can do nothing of Himself," etc. All these fragments were collected and published by Combefis (fol. Paris, 1644). Among them are: 1. A Discourse on the Birth of Jesus Christ:—2. A Discourse on the Circumcision:—3. Another on the Meeting with the Lord:—4. Three Homilies—on Lazarus, on the Woman that was a Sinner, and on Holy Saturday. The fourth, given by Combefis, on Penance, certainly is not his; neither is the life of Basil, and some other pieces which that father has inserted in his collection as the works of Amphilochius. Both Greeks and Latins commemorate him as a saint on the 23d of November.—Theodoret, Ch. Hist. lib. v, cap. 16; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 370; Cotelier, Mon. Eccl. Gr. ii.

Amphipolis (Ἀμφίπολις, city on both sides), a city of Macedonia, through which Saul and Silas passed on their way from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts xvii, 1; see Conybeare and Howson, Life of Paul, i, 318 sq.). It was distant 33 Roman miles from Philippi (Itin. Anton. p. 320). It was situated along the Egean Way, on the left bank of the river Strymon (by which it was nearly surrounded [hence its name]), just below its egress from the lake Kerkiné (now Takino), and about three miles above its influx into the sea (Leake, North or Greece, iii, 181 sq.; Cousinery, Voyage dans le Macédoine, i, 128). This situation upon the banks of a navigable river, a short distance from the sea, with the vicinity of the woods of Kerkiné and the gold-mines of Mount Pangæus, rendered Amphipolis a place of much importance (see Kutzen, De Amphipoli, Lips. 1836), and an object of contest between the Thracians, Athenians, Lacedæmonians, and Macedonians, to whom it successively belonged (Thucyd. i, 109; iv, 102 sq.; Herod. vii, 117; Diod. Sic. xvi, 8; Appian, iv, 104 sq.; Plin. iv, 17; Liv. xlv, 29; Celler, Nat. i. 1053 sq.). It was a colony of the Athenians, and was memorable in the Peloponnesian war for the battle fought under its walls, in which both Brasidas and Cleon were killed (Thuc. v, 6-11). It has long been in ruins; and a village of about one hundred houses, called Neukhorio ("New Town," in Turkish Jeni-ken), now occupies part of its site (Tafel, Thessalonica, p. 498 sq.). There is a miserable place near it called Enboli by the Turks, a corruption of the ancient name. It was called Popolia in the time of the Byzantine empire. (See Anthon's Class. Dict. s. v.; Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.)

Coins of Amphipolis.

Amphōra, a general term among the Greeks and Romans, as often in the Vulgate, for a pitcher (q. v.) or vessel to hold wine or water. Thus the passage in Luke xxii, 10, is rendered, "There shall a man meet you bearing a pitcher of water"—(κεράμιον) amphoran aqua portans. At other times it is taken for a certain measure. The Roman amphora contained forty-eight sextaries, equal to about seven gallons one pint English wine measure; and the Grecian or Attic amphora contained one third more. Amphora was also a dry measure used by the Romans, and contained about three bushels (Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v.).

Amphoræ were generally tall and narrow, with a small neck, and a handle on each side (whence the name, from ἀμφί, on both sides, and φέρω, to carry), and terminating at the bottom in a point, which was let into a stand or stuck in the ground. They were commonly made of earthenware. Homer mentions amphoræ of gold and stone, and the Egyptians had them of brass; glass vessels of this form have been found at Pompeii.

Amphora.

Amplias (Ἀμπιάς), a Christian at Rome, mentioned by Paul as one whom he particularly loved (Rom. xvi, 8), A.D. 55. It is not known with certainty who Amplias was; but the Greeks say that he was ordained bishop of Odyssopolis, in Mæsia, by the Apostle Andrew, and was an apostolical person, at least one of the seventy-two disciples, and a martyr. His festival, in the Greek calendar, is observed Oct. 31.

Ampulla, (1.) the name, among Roman ecclesiastical writers, of one of the vessels used at the altar to hold the wine. (2.) The vessel for holding the oil in chrismation, consecration, coronation, etc., which frequently appears in the inventory of church furniture, was also called ampulla. The ampulla is used in the coronation of the sovereigns of England.

Amram (Heb. Amram, אֲמֵרָם, kindred of the High. i. e. friend of Jehovah; Sept. in Exod. vi, 20, Ἀμβράμ; in 1 Chron. i, 41, Ἐμρών v. r. Ἀμαά, [where the text has Ἰσραήλ, Chamran, marg. Hamran]; elsewhere Ἀμράμ), the name of two or three men.

1. The son of Kohath, the son of Levi; he married Jochebed, "his father's sister," by whom he had Aaron, Miriam, and Moses (Exod. vi, 18; Num. iii, 19). He died in Egypt, aged 137 years (Exod. vi, 20), B.C. ante 1658. Before the giving of the law, it was permitted to marry a father's sister, but this was afterward forbidden (Levit. xviii, 12). His descendants were sometimes called Amramites (Num. iii, 27; 1 Chron. xxvi, 23).

2. One of the "sons" of Bani, who, after the return from Babylon, separated from his Gentile wife (Ezra x, 34), B.C. 459.

3. A descendant of Esau (1 Chron. i, 41). In Gen. xxxvi, 26, he is called more correctly HEMDAN (q. v.).

Am'ramite (Heb., always with the art., ha-Amrami', אֲמֵרָמִי; Sept. ὁ Ἀμράμ ἐῖς and Ἀμράμ), a title of the descendants of the Levite AMRAM (Num. iii, 27; 1 Chron. xxvi, 23).

Am'raphel (Heb. Amraphel', אֲמֵרָפֶל, apparently the Sanscrit amarapāla, "keeper of the gods;" Sept. Ἀμαράφελ, Josephus Ἀμράφελος, Ant. i, 9, 1), a king (perhaps Hamite, comp. Rawlinson's Herodotus, i, 446) of Shinar (i. e. Babylonia), confederated with Chedorlaomer (q. v.), king of Elam, and two other kings, to make war against the kings of Pentapolis, viz., Sodom, Gomorrah, and the three neighboring cities, which they plundered; among the captives whom they carried off was Lot, Abraham's nephew; but Abraham (q. v.) pursued them, retook Lot, and recovered the spoil (Gen. xiv, 1, 4), B.C. cir. 2080.

Amsdorf, NICOLAS, born near Wurtzen, in Misnia, Dec. 3, 1483, was a celebrated disciple and warm supporter of Luther. Educated at Leipsic and Wittenberg, he became licentiate of theology in 1511, and accompanied Luther in 1519 to the Leipsic disputation, and in 1521 to Worms. He was greatly instrumental in introducing the Reformation into Magdeburg and Goslar. In 1542 he was consecrated bishop of Naumburg by Luther; but his life in this office was embittered by strife, and in 1548 he had to flee to Jena. In the adiaphoristic controversy he opposed Melancthon strenuously. A work having a title purporting that good works are pernicious, and a hindrance to salvation, came from his pen (reprinted in Baumgarten, Geschichte der Religionspartei, p. 1172-78). He died May 14, 1565. A biography of Amsdorf, with a selection from his works, has been published by Pressel, in the collective work Leben und ausgewählte Schriften der Väter d. luth. Kirche, vol. viii (also published separately, Ellerbeld, 1862, 8vo). See also Mosheim, Ch. Hist. iii, 147; Bibliotheca Sacra, 1863, p. 641.

Amulet (Lat. amuletum, from amolior, to avert evil; French amulette; according to others, originally from the Arabic hamul, a locket suspended from the neck). From the earliest ages the Orientals have believed in the influences of the stars, in spells, witchcraft, and the malign power of envy; and to protect themselves against the maladies and other evils which such influences were supposed to occasion, almost all the ancient nations wore amulets (Plin. Hist. Nat. xxx, 15). These consisted, and still consist, chiefly of tickets inscribed with sacred sentences (Shaw, i, 365; Lane's Mod. Egypt. ii, 365), and of certain stones (comp. Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxvii, 12, 34) or pieces of metal (Richardson, Dissertation; D'Arvieux, iii, 208; Chardin, i, 243 sq.; iii, 205 sq.; Niebuhr, i, 65; ii, 162). Not only were persons thus protected, but even houses were, as they still are, guarded from supposed malign influences by certain holy inscriptions upon the doors. The previous existence of these customs is implied in the attempt of Moses to turn them to becoming uses by directing that certain passages extracted from the law should be employed (Exod. xiii, 9, 16; Deut. vi, 8; xi, 18). The door-schedules being noticed elsewhere [see DOOR-POSTS], we here limit our attention to personal amulets. By this religious appropriation the then all-pervading tendency to idolatry was in this matter obviated, although in later times, when the tendency to idolatry had passed away, such written scrolls degenerated into instruments of superstition (q. v.).

The "ear-rings" in Gen. xxxv, 4 (נְזָמִים, nezanim'; ζυώρια, insures), were obviously connected with idolatrous worship, and were probably amulets taken from the bodies of the slain Shechemites. They are subsequently mentioned among the spoils of Midian (Judg. viii, 24), and perhaps their objectionable character was the reason why Gideon asked for them. Again, in Hos. iii, 13, "decking herself with ear-rings" is mentioned as one of the signs of the "days of Baalim." Hence in Chaldee an ear-ring is called נְזָמִים, kaldisha', sanctity. But amulets were more often worn round the neck, like the golden bulla or leather loram of the Roman boys. Sometimes they were precious stones, supposed to be endowed with peculiar virtues. In the "Mirror of stones" the strangest properties are attributed to the amethyst, Kinectus, Alectoria, Ceraunium, etc.; and Pliny, speaking of succinum, says "It is useful to bind upon children like an amulet" (xxxvii, 12, 37). They were generally suspended as the centre-piece of a necklace (q. v.), and among the Egyptians often consisted of the emblems of various deities, or the symbol of truth and justice ("Thmei"). A gem of this kind, formed of sapphires, was worn by the chief judge of Egypt (Diod. i, 48, 75), and a similar one is represented as worn by the youthful deity Harpocrates (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. iii, 364). The Arabs hang round their children's necks the figure of an open hand, a custom which, according to Shaw, arises from the unluckiness of the number 5. This principle is often found in the use of amulets. See SERAPHIM.

The נְזָמִים (lechashim', charms) of Isa. iii, 20 (Sept. περιδείξια, Vulg. insures, Auth. Vers. ear-rings), it is now allowed, denote amulets, although they served also the purpose of ornament. They were probably precious stones, or small plates of gold or silver, with sentences of the law or magic formulae inscribed on them, and worn in the ears, or suspended by a chain round the neck. "Ear-rings" is not perhaps a bad translation. It is certain that ear-rings were sometimes used in this way as instruments of superstition, and that at a very early period, as in Gen. xxxv, 4, where Jacob takes away the ear-rings of his people along with their false gods. Ear-rings, with strange figures and characters, are still used as charms in the East (Chardin, in Harmer, iii, 314). Schroeder, however, deduces from the Arabic that these amulets were in the form of serpents, and similar probably to those golden amulets of the same form which the women of the pagan Arabs wore suspended between their breasts, the use of which was interdicted by Mohammed (Schroeder, De Vestitu Mulierum, cap. xi, p. 172, 173; Grotefend, art. Amulette, in Ersch and Gruber's En- egypt.; Rosenmüller, ad Isa. iii, 20; Gesenius, ad eund.; and in his Thesaurus, art. לְהַשִּׁיב). Thus the basilisk is constantly engraved on the talismanic scarabæi of Egypt, and, according to Jahn (Bibl. Arch. § 131), the lechashim of Isa. iii, 23, were "figures of serpents carried in the hand" (more probably worn in the ears) "by Hebrew women." The word is derived from לְהַשִּׁיב, lechashib, to hiss, and means both "enchancements" (comp. Isa. iii, 3) and the magical gems and formularies used to avert them (Gesenius, s. v.). It is doubtful whether the Sept. intends περιπέζα as a translation of this word (Schleusner's Thesaurus). For a like reason the phallus was among the sacred emblems of the Vestals (Smith's Dict. of Ant. s. v. Fascinum). See EAR-RING. That these lechashim were charms inscribed on silver and gold, was the opinion of Aben-Ezra. The Arabic has boxes of amulets, manifestly concluding that they were similar to those ornamental little cases for written charms which are still used by Arab women. These are represented in the first figure of cut 1. Amulets of this kind are called cheqab, and are specially adapted to protect and preserve those written charms, on which the Moslems, as did the Jews, chiefly rely. The writing is covered with waxed cloth, and enclosed in a case of thin embossed gold or silver, which is attached to a silk string or a chain, and generally hung on the right side, above the girdle, the string or chain being passed over the left shoulder. In the specimen here figured there are three of these cheqabs attached to one string. The square one in the middle is almost an inch thick, and contains a folded paper; the others contain scrolls. Amulets of this shape, or of a triangular form, are worn by women and children; and those of the latter shape are often attached to children's head-dress (Lane's Modern Egyptians, ii, 365). Charms, consisting of words written on folds of papyrus tightly rolled up and sewed in linen, have been found at Thebes (Wilkinson, l. c.), and our English translators possibly intended something of the kind when they rendered the curious phrase (in Isa. iii) לְהַשִּׁיב הַשֵּׁם (houses of the spirit) by "tablets." It was the danger of idolatrous practices arising from a knowledge of this custom that probably induced the sanction of the use of phylacteries (Deut. vi, 8; ix, 18, תְּפִלִּינֹת, tilpilot, "frontlets"). The modern Arabs use scraps of the Koran (which they call "telesmes" or "alakakirs") in the same way. See PHYLACTERY.

The superstitious connected with amulets grew to a great height in the later periods of the Jewish history. "There was hardly any people in the whole world," says Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. xxiv, 24), "that more used or were more fond of amulets, charms, mutterings, exorcisms, and all kinds of enchantments. . . . The amulets were either little roots hung about the neck of sick persons, or, what was more common, bits of paper (and parchment) with words written on them, whereby it was supposed that diseases were either driven away or cured. They wore such amulets all the week, but were forbidden to go abroad with them on the Sabbath, unless they were 'approved amulets'; that is, were prescribed by a person who knew that at least three persons had been cured by the same means. In these amulets mysterious names (especially the tetragrammaton, or sacred name, יהוה) and characters were occasionally employed in lieu of extracts from the law. One of the most usual of these was the cabalistic hexagonal figure known as 'the shield of David' and 'the seal of Solomon'" (Bartoloc. Bibliotheca Rabbinica, i, 576; Lakemacher, Observant. Philol. ii, 143 sq.). The reputation of the Jews was so well established in this respect that even in Arabia, before the time of Mohammed, men applied to them when they needed charms of peculiar virtue (Mishkat ul-Masabih, ii, 377). A very large class of amulets depended for their value on their being constructed under certain astronomical conditions. Their most general use was to avert ill-luck, etc., especially to nullify the effect of the "evil eye" (ὄφθαλμὸς βλάστανος), a belief in which is found among all nations. Some animal substances were considered to possess such properties, as we see from Tobit. Pliny (xxviii, 47) mentions a fox's tongue worn on an amulet as a charm against bleed-eyes, and says (xxx, 15) that beetles' horns are efficacious for the same purpose—perhaps an Egyptian fancy. In the same way one of the Roman emperors wore a seal-skin as a charm against thunder. Among plants, the white bryony and the Hypericon, or Fuga demonum, are mentioned as useful. On the African "pieces of medicine"—a belief in which constitutes half the religion of the Africans (see Livingstone's Travels, p. 285 et passim).—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

Many of the Christians of the first century wore amulets marked with a fish, as a symbol of the Redeemer. See ICURUS. Another form is the pentangle (or pentacle, vide Scott's Antiquary), which "consists of three triangles intersected, and made of five lines, which may be so set forth with the body of man as to touch and point out the places where our Saviour was wounded" (Sir Thos. Brown's Judg. Errors, i, 10). Under this head fall the "curious arts" (τὰ περίεργα) of the Ephesians (Acts xix, 19), and in later times the use of the word "Abracadabra," recommended by the physician Serenus Samoniacus as a cure of the hemitritæus. Among the Gnostics, Abraxas gems (q. v.) were used as amulets. At a later period they were formed of ribbons, with sentences of Scripture written on them, and hung about the neck. They were worn by many of the Christians in the earlier ages, but were condemned by the wiser and better of the clergy as disgraceful. Chrysostom mentions them for the purpose of reprehension (In Psal. ix, 15; also Hom. vi, Cont. Judæos). The Council of Laodicea, A.D. 364, condemns those of the clergy who pretend to make them, declaring that such phylacteries, or charms, are bonds and fetters to the soul, and ordering those who wore them to be cast out of the Church (Can. 36). Augustine (Tract. 7, in Ion.) expostulates with those that wore them in this language: "When we are afflicted with pains in the head, let us not run to enchanters and fortune-tellers, and remedies of vanity. I mourn for you, my brethren; for I daily find these things done. And what shall I do? I cannot yet persuade Christians to put their only trust in Christ. With what face can a soul go unto God that has lost the sign of Christ, and taken upon him the sign of the devil?" The practice of wearing these periapta was most probably taken from the custom of the Jews, who wore the tephilin, or phylacteries. The Council of Trullo ordered the makers of all amulets to be excommunicated, and deemed the wearers of them guilty of heathen superstition. Faith in the virtue of amulets was almost universal in the ancient world; it need not, therefore, excite our surprise that some of the less-informed should have adhered to the heathenish practice after their admission into the Christian Church. —Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xvi, ch. v, § 6.

AMYOT, JOSEPH, a Jesuit missionary to China, was born at Toulon in 1718. At the close of 1759 he arrived at Macao in company with two Portuguese Jesuits, and the brethren of that order already established at Peking presented a petition to the reigning emperor, Kien-Loong, to the effect that the newcomers were well acquainted with mathematics, music, and medicine. A persecution against the Christians was going on, but the reply of the emperor was favorable, and he directed the missionaries to be conveyed to Peking at the public expense. Amyot gives an interesting account of the journey in a letter inserted in the "Lettres Edifiantes et Curieuses," from which these particulars are taken. On arriving at the capital, where an underhand sort of toleration was extended to the missionaries, he applied himself to the study of the Chinese, and afterward to the Manchoo-Tartar language and literature, in both of which he made great proficiency. From that time he appears to have acted rather as a missionary of learning than of religion. While his name scarcely figures at all in the "Lettres Edifiantes," not a year seems to have passed without his dispatching to Europe some information on the history and manners of the Chinese and Tartars, to the illustration of which he contributed more than any other writer of the 18th century. He remained at Peking 43 years, during which time the order to which he belonged was dissolved, and more than one vigorous persecution was directed against the Christians in China. At the time of Lord Macartney's embassy in 1793, Amyot wrote a letter to the ambassador on his arrival in Peking, "expressive of the most fervent wishes for his success, and offering every assistance that his experience could supply;" but he was then so infirm as not to be able to wait on Lord Macartney. In the following year, 1794, he died at Peking, at the age of 76. Among his works are: 1. Abregé histor. des principaux traits de la vie de Confucius (Paris, 1789), the best history of the Chinese philosopher, the material of which has been carefully selected from the most authentic Chinese sources;—2. Dictionnaire Tartare-Mancheou-François, edit. by Langlès (Paris, 1789, 3 vols.);—3. Grammaire Tartare-Mancheou (in the 3d vol. of the Mém. concernant la Chine)—Lettres Edifiantes, tom. xxviii.

AMYRALDISM. See AMYRAUT.

AMYRAUT (or AMYRALDUS), MOÏSE, a French Protestant theologian of the seventeenth century; born at Bourgueil, in Anjou, in 1596, and instructed in theology at Saumur. He was nominated to succeed John Daille, at Saumur, and was appointed professor of theology in that academy with Louis Cappel and Joshua de la Place (Plærens) in 1633. In 1631 he was sent to attend the national synod of French Protestants at Charenton, who deputed him to deliver a harangue to the king, which is inserted in the Mercurie François of 1631. His conduct in this affair gained him the esteem of Richelieu. The eminence of the three Saumur professors drew students from many parts of Europe; but it soon began to be reported that their teaching was subversive of the doctrines of Dort on Predestination and Grace. The views of Amyraut on these topics were derived from Cameron (q. v.), and were first published in a tract, De Prædeterminatione (Traité de la Prædetermination et de ses principales conséquences), in 1634. His views were called Universalist and Arminian, but they were neither. Amyraut asserted a gratia universalis, indeed, but he meant by it simply that God desires the happiness of all men, provided they will receive his mercy in faith; that none can obtain salvation without faith in Christ; that God refuses to none the power of believing, but that he does not grant to all his assistance, that they may improve this power to saving purposes; that none can so improve it without the Holy Spirit, which God is not bound to grant to any, and, in fact, only does grant to those who are elect according to his eternal decree. "In defending his doctrine of universal atonement, Amyraut appealed confidently to the authority of Calvin; indeed, he wrote a treatise, entitled Echanailon de la doctrine de Calvin touchant la Prædetermination, to show that Calvin supported his views concerning the extent of the atonement, and was in all respects a very moderate Calvinist" (Cunningham, The Reformers, p. 395). Universal grace (as Amyraut held the doctrine of it) is of no actual saving benefit to any. He distinguished between objective and subjective grace. Objective grace offers salvation to all men on condition of repentance and faith, and is universal; subjective grace operates morally in the conversion of the soul, and is particular, i. e. only given to the elect. The aim of Amyraut was to reconcile the Lutherans and Calvinists; and his views were received widely, as seeming to soften down the rigid Predestinarianism of Dort. The true peculiarity of Amyraut's theology is the combination of a real particularism, in the full Calvinistic sense, with an ideal universality of grace, which, in fact, never saves a single soul (Schweizer, in Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.). Charges were brought against him by Du Moulin and others, but he was acquitted of heresy by the Synod of Alençon (1637), and afterward at Charenton (1644). Daille and Blondel favored the views of Amyraut. He died in 1664. Eleven years after (1675) the Formula Consensus Helvetica (q. v.) was drawn up and published, chiefly against the so-called heresies of the Saumur professor. Amyraldism was, in substance, the theory adopted by Baxter (q. v.), and has been sustained, with various modifications, in recent times, by Williams (Essay on Sovereignty, 1813), Payne (Lectures on Sovereignty and Election, 1838), Wardlaw (On the Atonement, 1844); by Fuller and Hinton among Baptists; by T. Scott and Milner in the Church of England; by many Congregationalists and New-School Presbyterians in America; and, of late, by many ministers of the U. P. Church of Scotland. Among his writings are, 1. Paraphrases on various books of the N. T. and of the Psalms (12 vols. 8vo, 1644-1662);—2. De la Vocation des Pasteurs (Saumur, 1649, small 8vo);—3. Morale Chrétienne (Saumur, 1652-1660, 6 vols. 8vo);—4. Traité des Religions (Saumur, 1631, 8vo; transl. into English, A Treatise concerning Religions, etc. Lond. 1660, small 8vo);—5. In Symbolum Apostol. exercitatio (Saumur, 1663, small 8vo); besides various sermons and tracts on the disputed question of predestination and grace. A list of his works is given by Haag, La France Protestante, i, 72.—Nichols, Calvinism and Arminianism, i, 220-220; Morrison, Lectures on Rom. ix, p. 376; Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, ii, 680; Schweizer, in *Baur u. Am'zi (Heb. Amzi', אַמְזִי, strong), the name of two Levites.

1. (Sept. 'Ameai.) A Levite, son of Bani, and father of Hilkiah, a descendant of Merari (1 Chron. vi, 46). B.C. long ante 1034.

2. (Sept. 'Auaai.) A priest, son of Zechariah, and father of Pellaiah, in the family of Adaiiah (Neh. xi, 12). B.C. considerably ante 536.

A'nab (Heb. Anab', אַנָּב, grape-town; Sept. Ανάβ v. r. Αραβου and Αρω), one of the cities in the mountains of Judah, from which Joshua expelled the Anakim (Josh. xi, 21; xv, 50). Nearly west of Main (Maon) Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 195) observed a place called Anab, distinguished by a small tower. Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Anob) both confound it with a Beth-Anab (q. v.) lying a few miles from Diospolis or Lydda (Reland, Palrest. p. 560). Schwarz (Palst. p. 136) says it is the village Anabak, three English miles east of Ramleh, meaning doubtless the Anabak marked on Zimmermann's Map; but this is not at all in the mountains of Judah, as stated in both passages of Joshua.

Anabaptists (ἀνά, again, and βαπτίζω, I baptize), a name given to those who reject infant-baptism, because they rebaptize such as join their communion; and who maintain that this sacrament is not valid if it be administered by sprinkling and not by immersion, and if the persons baptized be not in a condition to give the reasons of their faith. The name is sometimes given reproachfully to the modern BAPTISTS (q. v.); but, as they disclaim the title, it should not be applied to them.

1. The term Anabaptists, or Rebaptizers, is connected with the controversies of the third century. In Asia Minor and in Africa, where the spirit of controversy had raged long and bitterly, "baptism was considered to be only valid when administered in the orthodox church." In the Western Church the great principle of baptism rested on the invocation of the name of Christ or of the Trinity; and, therefore, "any baptism administered in the name of Christ or of the Trinity, let it be performed by whomsoever it might, was held valid," so that heretics baptized by heretics, coming over to the Church, were received as baptized Christians. So high were the disputes on this question, that two synods were convened to investigate it, one at Iconium, and the other at Synnada, in Phrygia, which confirmed the opinion of the invalidity of heretical baptism. From Asia the question passed to Northern Africa: Tertullian accorded with the decision of the Asiatic councils in opposition to the practice of the Roman Church. Agrippinus convened a council at Carthage, which came to a similar decision with those of Asia. Thus the matter rested, till Stephen, bishop of Rome, prompted by ambition, proceeded to excommunicate the bishops of Asia Minor, Cappadocia, Galatia, and Cilicia, and applied to them the epithets of Rebaptizers and Anabaptists, A. D. 253.

2. A fanatical sect of Anabaptists arose in Germany in the early part of the sixteenth century who brought the name into great disrepute. It originated at Zwickau, in Saxony, in the year 1520, and its leaders, by their lawless fanaticism, completely separated themselves from the cause of the reformers, and with the subject of adult baptism connected principles subversive of all religions and civil order. The vast increase of their adherents from the year 1521, especially among the common people on the Rhine, in Westphalia, Holsstein, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, was soon met by severe measures on the part of the magistrates. Imperial and ecclesiastical decrees were issued against them, and many were put to death, after being urged to recant. But persecution produced its usual fruits. Still new associations were perpetually formed by itinerant prophets and teachers, whose doctrines consisted of the following propositions: "Impiety prevails everywhere. It is therefore necessary that a new family of holy persons should be founded, enjoying, without distinction of sex, the gift of prophecy, and skill to interpret divine revelations. Hence they need no learning: for the internal word is more than the outward expression. No Christian must be suffered to engage in a legal process, to hold a civil office, to take an oath, or to hold any private property; but all things must be in common." With such sentiments, John Boehhold, or Bockel, a tailor, of Leyden, aged 26, and John Matthias, or Matthiesen, a baker, of Harlem, came, in 1553, to Münster, in Westphalia, a city which had adopted the doctrines of the Reformation. Here they soon gained over a portion of the excited populace, and among the rest, Rothmann, a Protestant clergyman, and the councillor Knipperdolling. The magistrates in vain excluded them from the churches. They obtained possession of the council-house by violence. Their numbers daily increased, and toward the end of the year they extorted a treaty, securing the religious liberty of both parties. Being strengthened by the accession of the restless spirits of the adjacent cities, they soon made themselves masters of the town by force, and expelled their adversaries. Matthiesen came forward as their prophet, and persuaded the people to devote their gold, and silver, and movable property to the common use, and to burn all their books but the Bible; but in a sally against the bishop of Münster, who had laid siege to the city, he lost his life. He was succeeded in the prophetic office by Boehhold and Knipperdolling. The churches were destroyed, and twelve judges were set over the tribes, as in Israel; but even this form of government was soon abolished, and Boehhold, under the name of John of Leyden, raised himself to the dignity of king of New Zion (so the Anabaptists of Münster styled their kingdom), and caused himself to be formally crowned. From this period (1534) Münster was a theatre of all the excesses of fanaticism, lust, and cruelty. The introduction of polygamy, and the neglect of civil order, concealed from the infatuated people the avarice and madness of their young tyrant and the daily increase of danger from abroad. Boehhold lived in princely luxury and magnificence; he sent out seditious proclamations against neighboring rulers—against the Pope and Luther; he threatened to destroy with his mob all who differed in opinion from him; made himself an object of terror to his subjects by frequent executions, and while famine and pestilence raged in the city, persuaded the wretched, deluded inhabitants to a stubborn resistance of their besiegers. The city was at last taken, June 24, 1535, by treachery, though not without a brave defence, in which Rothmann and others were killed, and the Kingdom of the Anabaptists destroyed by the execution of the chief men. Boehhold, and two of his most active companions, Knipperdolling and Krechting, were tortured to death with red-hot pincers, and then hung up in iron cages on St. Lambert's steeple, at Münster, as a terror to all rebels. In the mean time, some of the twenty-six apostles, who were sent out by Boehhold to extend the limits of his kingdom, had been successful in various places; and many independent teachers, who preached the same doctrines, continued active in the work of founding a new empire of pure Christians, and propagating their visions and revelations in the countries above mentioned. It is true that they rejected the practice of polygamy, community of goods, and intolerance toward those of different opinions, which had prevailed in Münster; but they enjoined upon their adherents the other doctrines of the early Anabaptists, and certain heretical opinions in regard to the humanity of Christ, occasioned by the controversies of that day about the sacrament. The most celebrated of these Anabaptist prophets were Melchior Hoffmann and David Joris. The former, a furrier from Suabia, first appeared as a teacher in Kiel in 1527; afterward, in 1529, in Emden; and finally in Strasburg, where, in 1540, he died in prison. He formed, chiefly by his magnificent promises of a future elevation of himself and his disciples, a peculiar sect, whose scattered members retained the name of Hoffmannists in Germany till their remains were lost among the Anabaptists. They have never owned that Hoffmann recanted before his death. David Joris, or George, a glass-painter of Delft, born 1501, and rebaptized in 1534, showed more depth of mind and warmth of imagination in his various works. Amid the confusion of ideas which prevails in them, they dazzle by their elevation and fervor. In his endeavors to unite the discordant parties of the Anabaptists, he collected a party of quiet adherents in the country, who studied his works (as the Gichtelians did those of Böhme), especially his book of miracles, which appeared at Deventer in 1542, and revered him as a kind of new Messiah. Unsettled in his opinions, he travelled a long time from place to place, till at last, to avoid persecution, in 1554, he became a citizen of Basil, under the name of John of Bruges. In 1556, after an honorable life, he died there among the Calvinists. In 1559 his long-concealed heresy was first made public. He was accused, though without much reason, of profligate doctrine and conduct, and the Council of Basil condemned him, and ordered his body to be burnt. A friend of Joris was Nicholas, the founder of the Familists, who do not, however, belong to the Anabaptists.

It must not be supposed that all the Anabaptists of Germany were engaged in the excesses above recited. In fact, between these excesses and the doctrines of the Anabaptists, properly so termed, there does not seem to be the slightest connection. The fanaticism of some of the early Anabaptists is sufficiently explained by the obvious tendency which exists in human nature to rush into extremes. The iron hold of the papacy, which had cramped the church for ages, being suddenly relaxed, men had yet to learn what were the true conditions whether of civil or religious liberty. But these considerations were overlooked, and the reformed churches, with one consent, regarded the Anabaptists with horror and disdain. The correspondence of the Reformers is full of allusions to the subject. They are seldom spoken of but with the severest reprobation, and no distinction is drawn between the sober Christians and the worst fanatics of the party. It is probable, at least, that their faults have been exaggerated even by the best writers. A modern writer on their own side asserts that "it has been proved by irrefragable evidence from state papers, public confessions of faith, and authentic books, that the Spanheims, Heidegger, Hoffmann, and others, have given a fabulous account of the German Baptists, and that the younger Spanheim had taxed them with holding thirteen heresies, of which not a single society of them believed one word; yet later writers quote these historians as devoutly as if all they affirmed were allowed to be true."—Robinson, History of the Baptists; Marsden, Churches and Sects, i, 81; Ottii Annal. Anabaptist. (Basil, 1672); Cornelius, Geschichtsquellen des Bisthums Münster (Münst. 1853); Hase, Das Reich der Wiedertäufer (Leipz. 2d edit. 1860); Cornelius (Rom. Anachorets or Anchorites (ἀναχωρίται, to separate, to retire, to withdraw), monks, so called from their retiring from society, and living privately in cells. When the ascetics withdrew to the lonely and remote districts of the Egyptian desert, they assumed particular appellations, expressive of their solitary mode of life: monks, from the Greek μόνος, alone, one who dwells alone; eremites, corrupted into hermits, from ἐρημος, a desert; and anachorets, those who withdraw from society. These terms were afterward employed to define more accurately the various shades of austerity by which these ascetics were distinguished. Thus, monks denoted those who adopted a secluded habit of life, but were still disposed occasionally to dwell intercourse with society, and later, as canonites, to dwell in communities; the hermits were those who withdrew to sequestered places, but who did not deny themselves a fixed place of shelter, or that supply of food which might be obtained from cultivating the ground; the anachorets were most excessive in their austerities, and chose the wildest localities as their retreats. Many of the anchorites voluntarily subjected themselves to the vicissitudes of the weather, without proper habitation or clothing, restricted themselves to coarse and scanty fare, wore chains and iron rings, and even throughout many years maintained painful postures, such as standing on the top of a pillar [see STYLITES], thus displaying an earnestness which greater enlightenment might have directed to the good of mankind. Paul (q. v.) the Hermit, and Antony (q. v.), were among the first and most celebrated anchorites. The anchorites were not able always to preserve their solitude unbroken. The fame of their sanctity drew many to visit them; their advice was often sought; and the number of their visitors was much increased by the belief that maladies, particularly mental diseases, were cured by their blessing. Sometimes, also, they returned for a short time to the midst of their fellow-men to deliver warnings, instructions, or encouragements, and were received as if they had been inspired prophets or angels from heaven. The number of anchorites, however, gradually diminished, and the religious life of convents was preferred to that of the hermitage. The Western Church, indeed, at no time abounded in anchorites like the Eastern, and perhaps the reason may in part be found in the difference of climate, which renders a manner of life impossible in most parts of Europe that could be pursued for many years in Egypt or Syria.—Helyot, Ordres Relig. t. i. See CENOBITE; MONACHISM; ASCETICISM.

Anacletus or Cletus, bishop of Rome, said to have been elected in A. D. 83, and to have died A. D. 86. The Roman Church honors him as a martyr, as she does the other popes who lived during this period, upon the ground that those among them who were not actually put to death by the sword did not suffer less for the faith.—Baillet, July 13; Eusebius, lib. iii, cap. 13, 15.

Anacletus II, Antipope. His name was Peter of Leon, cardinal of Santa Maria beyond the Tiber, and upon the death of Honorius II he was elected in opposition to Innocent II. A part of the cardinals at the same time seceded and elected Innocent. Anacletus kept Innocent besieged in the palace of the Lateran, and obtained possession of the city of Rome and the entire papal dominions. He wrote to all the princes of Europe in order to be recognised, but in this he met with no success. He was condemned by the Councils of Rheims and Pisa, rejected by the larger portion of the clergy of the Roman Catholic world, not recognised by any sovereign except Roger of Sicily, to whom he had given his sister in marriage, and the duke of Aquitania; but in Rome he maintained himself, notwithstanding the arms of the Emperor Lothaire, who protected Innocent. This schism lasted eight years, until the death of Anacletus in 1138. Voltaire calls him, ironically, the Jewish pope, because he descended from a Jewish family which had grown rich at the expense of the church. Anacletus was a disciple of Arnold of Brescia (q. v.), and found implacable enemies in St. Bernard and Arnoul, archdeacon of Seez.—Hofer, Biog. Générale, ii, 468; Riddle, Hist. of Papacy, ii, 169.

An' aël (Ἀναίη), prob. contracted for Anaie), the brother of Tobit, and father of Achiachartus (Tob. i, 21).

Anagnostēs (ἀναγνώστης), reader, the name of a class of officers in the early church. In the Greek Church they held the first rank in the lower order of officers; in the Roman Church they were next to the sub-deacons. They have sometimes been regarded as an order instituted by the apostles, and by them derived from the Jewish synagogue. Compare Luke iv, 16; Acts xiii, 15, 27; 2 Cor. iii. There were among the Jews persons who performed the same office as readers among the Christians. There is not, however, any proof of the early appointment of a special minister in the capacity of reader; the office was probably instituted in the third century. Tertullian distinguishes the lector from the episcopus, presbyter, and diaconus; and the church observed a fixed rule respecting the office and duty of these respective ministers. Both in the synagogue and in the early Christian Church, any person who was able to discharge the duty was allowed to hold the office of reader, without reference to age. Boys of twelve, ten, and eight years of age, were frequently employed in this manner. The office was a favorite one with youths in the higher classes of society. Julian, afterward the apostate, in his younger years was reader in a church in Nicomedia. —Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. iii, ch. v.

Anagogical (ἀναγωγός, to lead or bring up), in the older writers on interpretation, is one of the four senses of Scripture, viz. the literal, allegorical, anagogical, and tropic. The anagogical sense is when the sacred text is explained with regard to eternal life; for example, the rest of the Sabbath, in the anagogical sense, signifies the repose of everlasting happiness.

A'nah (Heb. Anah', אָנָה, speech or affliction; Sept. Ἀνά), the name of one or two Horites.

1. The fourth mentioned of the sons of Seir, and head of an Idumean tribe preceding the arrival of Esau (Gen. xxxvi, 20, 29; 1 Chron. i, 38), B.C. much ante 1964. It seems most natural to suppose him to be also the one referred to in Gen. xxxvi, 25, as otherwise his children are not at all enumerated, as are those of all his brothers (Hengstenberg, Genealogy of the Pentateuch, ii, 229), although from ver. 2 some have inferred that another person of the same name is there meant. See also DISHON; ABOLIBANAH.

2. The second named of the two sons of Zibeon the Hivite, and father of Esau's wife Abolibanah (Gen. xxxvi, 18, 24). B.C. ante 1964. While feeding asses in the desert he discovered "warm springs" (aquæ calidæ), as the original, אַנְוִים, genim', is rendered by Jerome, who states that the word had still this significance in the Punic language. Gesenius and most modern critics think this interpretation correct, supported as it is by the fact that warm springs are still found in the region east of the Dead Sea. The Syriac has simply "waters," which Dr. Lee seems to prefer. Most of the Greek translators retain the original as a proper name, ἄναϊμα, probably not venturing to translate. The Samaritan text, followed by the Targums, has "Emius," giants. Our version of "mules" is now generally abandoned, but is supported by the Arabic and Veneto-Greek versions.—Kitto. See MULE.

In verse 2, 14, of the above chap. Anah is called the daughter of Zibeon, evidently by an error of transcription, as the Samaritan and Sept. have son; or (with Winer, Hengstenberg, Tuch, Knobel, and many others) we may here understand it to mean grand-daughter, still referring to Abolibanah (Turner's Compan. to Gen. p. 331). See ZIBEON. He had but one son, Dishon (ver. 25; 1 Chron. i, 40, 41), who appears to be named because of his affinity with Esau (q. v.) through his sister's marriage. We may further conclude, with Hengstenberg (Pent. ii, 280; Engl. transl. ii, 229), that the Anah mentioned among the sons of Seir in v. 20 in connection with Zibeon is the same person as is here referred to, and is therefore the grandson of Seir. The intention of the genealogy plainly is not so much to give the lineal descent of the Seirites as to enumerate those descendants who, being heads of tribes, came into connection with the Edomites. It would thus appear that Anah, from whom Esau's wife sprang, was the head of a tribe independent of his father, and ranking on an equality with that tribe. Several difficulties occur in regard to the race and name of Anah. By his descent from Seir he is a Horite (Gen. xxxvi, 20), while in v. 2 he is called a Hivite, and again in the narrative (Gen. xxvi, 34) he is called Beeri the Hittite. Hengstenberg's explanation of the first of these difficulties, by supposing that one of the descendants of Seir received the specific epithet Hori (i. e. Troglodyte, or dweller in a cave) as a definite proper name (Pent. ii, 228), is hardly adequate, for others of the same family are similarly named; it is more probable that the word Hivite (הִיטִי) is a mistake of transcribers for Horite (הֹרִי), or rather that all the branches of the Hivites were, in course of time, more particularly called Horites, from their style of habitation in the caves of Mt. Seir. See HORITE. As the name Beeri signifies fountain, i. e. "man of the fountain" (בְּעֵרִי), this has been thought to be his designation with reference to the above noticed "warm springs" of Callirrhoe discovered by him; whereas in the genealogy proper he is fitly called by his original name Anah.—Smith. See BEERI.

Anah'rath (Heb. Anaharath', אֲנַחְרַת, pass, Fürst; Sept. Ἀναρηθ, Vulg. Anaharath), a town on or within the border of Issachar, mentioned between Shihon and Rabbith (Josh. xix, 19). Its site was apparently unknown in the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Ἀνάθη, Anarith). It was, perhaps, in the northern part of the tribe, possibly at Meskarah, where there are ruins (Van de Velde, Mop).

Ana'rah (Heb. Anayah', אֲנַיָה, answered by Jehovah; Sept. Ἀναριά, Aracé), one of those who stood on the right hand of Ezra while he read the law to the people (Neh. viii, 4), and probably the same with one of the chief Israelites who joined in the sacred covenant (Neh. x, 22). B.C. cir. 410.

A'nak' (Heb. Anak', אֲנָק, [in Josh. xxi, 11, Anok', אֲנֹק], long-necked, i. e. a giant; Sept. Ἐνάκ, the son of Arba, who founded Kirjath-Arba (afterward Hebron), the progenitor of a race of giants called ANAKIM (Josh. xv, 13). B.C. ante 1658.

Anakah. See FERRIS.

An'akim (Heb. Anakim', אֲנָקִים, Dent. ii, 10, 11, 21; Josh. xi, 21, 22; xiv, 12, 15; also called sons of Anak, אֲנָקִים בְּנֵי אֲנָק, Num. xiii, 33; אֲנָקִים בְּנֵי אֲנָק, Josh. xv, 14; children of Anak, אֲנָקִים בְּנֵי אֲנָק, Num. xiii, 22; Josh. xv, 14; sons of the Anakim, אֲנָקִים בְּנֵי אֲנָקִים, Deut. ix, 2; Sept. Ἐρακίμ υἱοὶ Ἐράκ, yevei' Erák, yevei' Erák, yevei' Erák, yevei' Erák; Vulg. Enacim, filii Enacim, filii Enac, stirps Enac; Auth. Vers. "Anakims," "sons of Anak," "children of Anak," "sons of the Anakims"), a nomadic tribe of giants (Num. xiii, 34; Dent. ix, 2) [see NEPHILIM] descended from a certain Arba (Josh. xiv, 15; xv, 13; xxi, 11), and bearing the name of their immediate progenitor, Anak (Josh. xi, 21), dwelling in the southern part of Palestine, particularly in the vicinity of Hebron (q. v.), which was called Kirjath-Arba (city of Arba) from their ancestor (Gen. xxiii, 2; Josh. xv, 13). These designations serve to show that we must regard Anak as the name of the race as well as that of an individual, and this is confirmed by what is said of Arba, their progenitor, that he "was a great man among the Anakim" (Josh. xiv, 15). The Anakim appear (see Bochart, Chanaan, i, 1) to have been a tribe of Cushite wanderers from Babel, and of the same race as the Philistines, the Phœnicians, the Philistim, and the Egyptian shepherd-kings (see Jour. Sac. Lit. July, 1852, p. 303 sq.; Jan. 1853, p. 293 sq.). The supposition of Michaelis (Syntag. Comment. i, 196; also Lowth, p. 133) that they were a fragment of the aboriginal Troglodytes is opposed to Josh. xi, 21 (see Faber, Archæol. p. 44 sq.). They consisted of three tribes, descended from and named after the three sons of Anak—Ahiman, Sesai, and Talmai (Josh. xv, 14). When the Israelites invaded Canaan, the Anakim were in possession of Hebron, Debir, Anab, and other towns in the country of the south (Josh. xi, 21). Their formidable stature and warlike appearance struck the Israelites with terror in the time of Moses (Num. xiii, 28, 33; Deut. ix, 2); but they were nevertheless dispossessed by Joshua, and utterly driven from the land, except a small remnant that found refuge in the Philistine cities, Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (Josh. xi, 22). Their chief city, Hebron, became the possession of Caleb, who is said to have driven out from it the three sons of Anak mentioned above—that is, the three families or tribes of the Anakim (Josh. xv, 14; Judg. i, 20). The Philistine giants [see GOLIATH] that David on several occasions encountered (2 Sam. xxi, 15-22) seem to have sprung from the remnant of this stock. Josephus says (Ant. v, 2, 3) that their bones were still shown at Hebron, and Benjamin of Tudela tells a story respecting similar relics at Damascus (Itin. p. 56). See GIANT. According to Arabic tradition, Oz, king of Bushan, was of this race, and the same dubious authority states that the prophet Shoaib or Jethro was sent by the Lord to instruct the Anakim, having been born among them (D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 105). They are thought to be depicted on the Egyptian monuments. See TALMAI.

Analogy (ἀναλογία), proportion. 1. As applied to the works of God generally, it leads to the conclusion that since He is the chief of intelligent agents, a part of any system of which He is the author must, in respect of its leading principles, be similar to the whole of that system; and, farther, that the work of an intelligent and moral being must bear in all its lineaments the traces of the character of its author. In accordance with these principles of analogy, it is maintained that the revelation of God in the Holy Scriptures is in all respects agreeable to what we know of God, from the works of nature and the order of the world, and that such agreement amounts to a strong evidence that the book professing to contain this revelation of God's mind and purposes is really and truly indited by Him. The best exposition of this argument is to be found in Bishop Butler's immortal Analogy of Religion to the Constitution and Course of Nature (best ed. by Crooks, N. Y. 12mo). See BUTLER.

2. The analogy of faith is the correspondence of the several parts of divine revelation in one consistent whole. Its use is pointed out by the apostle in his direction (Rom. xii, 6) that "prophecy"—that is, preaching—be according to "the proportion of faith." His rule, of course, extends to all interpretation and exposition of Scripture. The parts of Scripture must be explained according to the tenor of the whole; and, in order to his doing this, the reader must understand the design of the whole. If he do not, he will be continually liable to fall into error. Prejudices and leanings of our own will dispose us to interpret particular parts of the word of God according to the analogy of our own system, rather than according to the total sense of the divine word. Almost every sect and school of divinity has fallen into this error. A prerequisite for following the analogy of faith is the simple love of truth for its own sake. This, more than any thing else, will protect the mind of a student of Scripture from destroying the proportions of sacred truth. The course necessary to avoid these errors is well stated by Dr. Campbell, as follows: "In vain do we search the Scriptures for their testimony concerning Christ, if, independently of these Scriptures, we have received a testimony from another quarter, and are determined to admit nothing as the testimony of Scripture which will not perfectly quadrate with that formerly received. This was the very source of the blindness of the Jews in our Saviour's time. They searched the Scriptures as much as we do; but, in the disposition they were in, they would never have discovered what that sacred volume testifies of Christ. Why? Because their great rule of interpretation was the analogy of the faith; or, in other words, the system of the Pharisaean scribe, the doctrine then in vogue, and in the profound veneration of which they had been educated. This is that veil by which the understandings of that people were darkened, even in reading the law, and of which the apostle observed that it remained unremoved in his day, and of which we ourselves have occasion to observe that it remains unremoved in ours. Is it not precisely in the same way that the phrase is used by every sect of Christians for the particular system or digest of tenets for which they themselves have the greatest reverence? The Latin Church, and even the Greek, are explicit in their declarations on this article. With each, the analogy of the faith is their own system alone. That different parties of Protestants, though more reserved in their manner of speaking, aim at the same thing, is undeniable; the same, I mean, considered relatively to the speakers; for, absolutely considered, every party means a different thing." But Chalmers remarks on this, "I think Dr. Campbell sets too little value on the analogy of faith as a principle of interpretation. He seems never to speak of a system of divinity without the lurking imagination that there must be human invention in it, whereas such a system may be as well grounded as Scripture criticism" (Chalmers, Institutes of Theology, i, 370; and see further at that place).

There has just appeared (1864) a work entitled Analogy considered as a Guide to Truth, and applied as an Aid to Faith, by J. Buchanan, D.D., professor of theology, New College, Edinburgh. The following notice of it is from the Bibliotheca Sacra, January, 1865: "Archbishop King, and after him Dr. Copleston and Archbishop Whately, define analogy as 'a resemblance of relations or ratios,' so that there may be an analogy between things that have no direct resemblance at all. Between the seed and the plant, the egg and the bird, there is a resemblance of 'relations,' although no external likeness. 'A sweet taste gratifies the palate,' says Dr. Whately, 'so does a sweet sound gratify the ear, and hence the same word "sweet" is applied to both, though no flavor can resemble a sound in itself.' This limitation Dr. Buchanan thinks is too narrow. While it is true to a certain extent, it omits the use which we make of analogy in connection with concrete objects and substantive realities. It is liable also, he thinks, to the objection that is founded on a comparatively small part of human knowledge, viz. the sciences of number and quantity. Without attempting a logical definition, the author of this volume seems to apply the term to all cases where a resemblance exists."—Campbell, Prelim. Dissert. iv, § 13; Horne, Introd. ii, 342; Knapp, Theol. Introd. § 5; Angus, Bible Hand-book, § 304-307; Horne, Introd. ii, 243. See FAITH.

Anam or Annam, an empire of Farther India. The statements of its extent and population greatly differ. The latter amounts, according to the report of the missionaries, to more than twenty millions, while many geographers give to all Farther India not more than fifteen millions. It is divided into four different realms: Tonkin, Cochin China, Cambodia, and Laos. Most of the inhabitants profess Buddhism, although also the Kami religion, which before the spreading of Buddhism prevailed in all Farther India, still has adherents. Anam is one of the principal missionary fields of the Roman Church. The first missions were established by Spanish Dominicans, who came from the Philippine Islands, more than 200 years ago, and they have survived to the present day, in spite of frequent and cruel persecutions. Especially since 1820 the persecution has raged with great intensity, and thousands of Christians have been either put to death or forced into apostasy. In 1858 France and Spain sent a joint expedition against Cochín (China, which, in September of that year, conquered the fort and the bay of Turon. The war continued until 1862, when the power of the emperor of Anam was so completely broken that he made overtures for the cessation of hostilities. On June 5, 1862, a treaty of peace was signed, by which the provinces of Saigon, Bienhoa, and Mytho were ceded to France; three ports of Tonkin were opened to commerce; the other provinces of Lower Cochín China not ceded to France were to reserve only such number of troops as the French government should permit; Christianity was to be tolerated, and the Christians protected in their lives and property throughout the empire. In 1863 the French concluded a special treaty with the king of Cambodia, by which this whole kingdom was placed under the protectorate of France, and liberal stipulations were made in favor of Roman Catholic missionaries. The Roman Church had, in 1859, eight vicariates apostolic, viz.: 1. Eastern Tonkin; 2. Middle Tonkin; 3. Western Tonkin; 4. South Tonkin; 5. North Cochín China; 6. Eastern Cochín China; 7. Western Cochín China; 8. Cambodia. The first two are under the administration of Spanish Dominicans, the others under that of French Lazarists. The number of native converts was estimated in 1854 at about 500,000 or 600,000, but has since considerably decreased, in consequence of the persecution. The number of the native priests amounted to about 300, and there were also numerous congregations of native nuns. In 1859 the letters of several missionaries represented the churches of Tonkin and Cochín China as being almost a complete wreck.—Wetzler and Welte, s. vv. Tonkin and Asien (in vol. xii); Schem, Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859, p. 18, 33; Annual American Encyclop. 1862, p. 224; 1863, p. 148. An'amim (Heb. Amimim', אַנְאִימִים, signif. unknown; Sept. Ἐπισημίτι v. r. Ἀνεπισμίτι, in Chron. Aracim, Vulg. Anamim), the name of some Egyptian tribe, descended from Mizraim (Gen. x, 13; 1 Chron. i, 11). Some compare the city ANEM (q. v.) in Palestine (Josh. xv, 34) as having possibly been settled by an Egyptian colony. Others (as Bochart, Phaleg, iv, 30), on very precarious etymological grounds (Arab. anam, a shepherd; transposed, amim), refer the name to the nomadic custodians of the temple of Jupiter Ammon (but see Michaelis Suppl. 1932 sq.). Still others (as Calmet) regard the Anamim as the Ammonites or Garamantes in the oasis Phazania on the river (Cinyphus (q. d. אֲנִיפְּחוֹס) in north-western Africa (Strabo, xvii, 835; Ptol. iv, 6; Plin. v, 4; Mel. i, 8), but with little probability (see Schulthess, Parod. p. 154). Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 1052) calls especial attention to a geographical name, Eneomis, found on the Egyptian monuments (Champollion, Gram. i, 150) as perhaps meaning these people (B being the article); or else he thinks they may be the Benjams, a people of Upper Egypt (Champollion, L'Égypte sous les Pharaons, i, 256). Among the old versions, Sauidas interprets Alexandrinus, the Chaldee paraphrasts (comp. Beck, ad Targ. Chron. i, 9 sq.) inhabitants of Mareotis (אֲנִיפְּחוֹס or אֲנִיפְּחוֹס). (See generally Michaelis, Synkrit. i. 260 sq.; Vater, Comm. i, 131.)—Winer, s. v.

Anam'melech (Heb. Anam'melek, אַנְאִימֵלֶךְ, Sept. Ἀναμ'λεχ, Vulg. Anam'lech) is mentioned, together with Adrammelech, as a god whom the people of Sopheraim, who colonized Samaria, worshipped by the sacrifice of children by fire (2 Kings xvii, 31). No satisfactory etymology of the name has been discovered. The latter part of the word is the Heb. for king, but as the former part is not found in that language (unless it be for the Arabic anam, a statue, Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 1052), the whole is probably foreign. Ireland (De vet. Ling. Persarum, § 9) renders it king of grief (from the Persic); but Hyde (Rel. vet. Persar. p. 131) understands it as referring (from אֲנִי, i. q. אֲנִי, sheep) to the Arabian constellation Cepheus, containing the shepherd and the sheep. Benfey (Monatsnamen einiger alter Völker, p. 188) proposes the name of the Persian goddess Ananit or that of the Ized Aniram, as containing the first part of the title Anam'melech. So Rawlinson (Herodotus, i, 498), who understands the female power of the sun to be meant, derives it from the name of the Assyrian goddess Ananit. Other conjectures are still more fanciful. The same obscurity prevails as to the form under which the god was worshipped. The Babylonian Talmud states that his image had the figure of a horse; but Kimchi says that of a pheasant or quail (Carpzov's Apparatus, p. 516).—Kitto, s. v. See ADRAMMELECH.

Δ'nan (Heb. Anan', אֲנָנִי, cloud; Sept. Ἠνάν v. r. Ἠνάπ), one of the chief Israelites that sealed the sacred covenant on the return from Babylon (Neh. x, 26), B. C. cir. 410.

In the apocryphal list of the "temple-servants," whose descendants returned from the captivity, the same name (Ανάπ) occurs (1 Esdr. v, 39) in place of the HANAN (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 46).

Ananēlus (Ἀνανηλος, i. q. Hananēol), a descendant of one of the sacerdotal families still resident in Babylonia, appointed by Herod high-priest (B. C. 37) on his own elevation to royalty (Josephus, Ant. xv, 3, 1), but removed to make room for the youth Aristobolus (ib. 2, 7), upon whose murder he was replaced (ib. 3, 3), B. C. cir. 34.

Ana'ni (Heb. Anani', אֲנָנִי, protected, or perh. a shortened form of the name Ananiah; Sept. Ἀναρί v. r. Ἀναρί), the last named of the seven sons of Elioenai, a descendant of the royal line of David after the captivity (1 Chron. iii, 24), B. C. cir. 404.

Anani'ah (Heb. Anani'ah, אֲנָנִיָּהּ, protected by Jehovah), the name of a man and of a place. See also ANANIAS.

1. (Sept. Avaria.) The father of Maaseiah and grandfather of Azariah, which last prepared part of the walls of Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. iii, 23). B. C. considerably ante 446.

2. (Sept. Avia.) A town in the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned between Nob and Hazor as inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi, 32). Schwarz (Palest. p. 133) regards it as the modern Beit Hawana, three miles north of Jerusalem; a small village, tolerably well built of stone, on a rocky ridge, with many olive-trees (Robinson, Res. iii, 68; comp. Tollner, Topog. von Jerus. ii, 414).

Anani'as (Avariac, the Greek form of the name Anani'ah, q. v.), the name of several men, principally in the Apocrypha and Josephus. See also HANANIAH, etc.

1. (Ανρίε v. r. Ανρίαε.) One of the persons (or places) whose "sons," to the number of 101, are said to have returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 16); but the genuine text (Ezra ii, 15, 16) has no such name.

2. One of the priests, "sons" of Emmer (i. e. Immer), who renounced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (1 Esdr. ix, 21); evidently the HANANI (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 20).

3. An Israelite of the "sons" of Bebai, who did the same (1 Esdr. ix, 29); evidently the HANANIAH (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra x, 28).

4. One of the priests who stood at the right hand of Ezra while reading the law (1 Esdr. ix, 43); the ANAIAH (q. v.) of the genuine text (Neh. viii, 4).

5. One of the Levites who aided Ezra in expounding the law (1 Esdr. ix, 48); the HANAN (q. v.) of the true text (Neh. viii, 7).

6. A person called "Ananias the Great," the son of "that great Samaias," the brother of Jonathas, and father of Azarias, of the family of Tobit; who the angel that addressed Tobit assumed to be (Tob. v, 12, 13). The names are apparently allegorical (see Fritzsche, Han. ib. in loc.).

7. The son of Gideon and father of Eleia, in the ancestry of Judith (Judith viii, 1).

8. The Greek form (Song of Three Children, ver. 66) of the original name, HANANIAH (q. v.), of Shadrach, (Dan. i, 7). See also in 1 Macc. ii, 59.

9. One of the Jewish ambassadors in Samaria, to whom the decree of Darius in favor of the Jews was addressed (Josephus, Ant. xi, 4, 9).

10. A son of Onias (who built the Jewish temple at Heliopolis), high in favor with the Egyptian queen Cleopatra (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 10, 4), who made a league with Alexander Jannæus at his instance as general of her army in Palestine (ib. 13, 2).

11. A Christian belonging to the infant church at Jerusalem, who, conspiring with his wife Sapphira to deceive and defraud the brethren, was overtaken by sudden death, and immediately buried (Acts v, 1 sq.), A. D. 29.

The Christian community at Jerusalem appear to have entered into a solemn agreement that each and all should devote their property to the great work of furthering the Gospel and giving succor to the needy. Accordingly they proceeded to sell their possessions, and brought the proceeds into the common stock of the church. Thus Barnabas (Acts iv, 36, 37) "having land, sold it, and brought the money, and laid it at the apostles' feet." The apostles, then, had the general disposal, if they had not also the immediate distribution, of the common funds. The contributions, therefore, were designed for the sacred purposes of religion.—As all the members of the Jerusalem Church had thus agreed to hold their property in common for the furtherance of the holy work in which they were engaged, if any one of them withheld a part, and offered the remainder as the whole, he committed two offences—he defrauded the church, and was guilty of falsehood; and as his act related, not to secular, but to religious affairs, and had an injurious bearing, both as an example and as a positive transgression against the Gospel while it was yet struggling into existence, Ananias lied, not unto man, but unto God, and was guilty of a sin of the deepest dye. Had Ananias chosen to keep his property for his own worldly purposes, he was at liberty, as Peter intimates, so to do; but he had, in fact, alienated it to pious purposes, and it was therefore no longer his own. Yet he wished to deal with it in part as if it were so, showing, at the same time, that he was conscious of his misdeed, by presenting the residue to the common treasury as if it had been his entire property. He wished to satisfy his selfish cravings, and at the same time to enjoy the reputation of being purely disinterested, like the rest of the church.

That the death of these evil-doers was miraculous seems to be implied in the record of the transaction, and has been the general opinion of the church. That this incident was no mere physical consequence of Peter's severity of tone, as some of the German writers have maintained (Ammon, Krit. Journ. d. theol. Lit. i, 249), distinctly appears by the direct sentence of a similar death pronounced by the same apostle upon his wife Sapphira a few hours after. See SAPPHIRA. It is, of course, possible that Ananias's death may have been an act of divine justice unlooked for by the apostle, as there is no mention of such an intended result in his speech; but in the case of the wife, such an idea is out of the question. Niemeyer (Charakteristik der Bibel, i, 574) has well stated the case as regards the blame which some have endeavored to cast on Peter in this matter (Wolffenb. Fragm. p. 256) when he says that not man, but God, is thus animadverted on: the apostle is but the organ and announcer of the divine justice, which was pleased by this act of deserved severity to protect the morality of the infant church, and strengthen its power for good.

The early Christian writers were divided as to the condition of Ananias and Sapphira in the other world. Origen, in his treatise on Matthew, maintains that, being purified by the punishment they underwent, they were saved by their faith in Jesus. Others, among whom are Augustine and Basil, argue that the severity of their punishment on earth showed how great their criminality had been, and left no hope for them hereafter.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

12. A Christian of Damascus (Acts ix, 10; xxii, 12), held in high repute, to whom the Lord appeared in a vision, and bade him proceed to "the street which is called Straight, and inquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarsus; for, behold, he prayeth." Ananias had difficulty in giving credence to the message, remembering how much evil Paul had done to the saints at Jerusalem, and knowing that he had come to Damascus with authority to lay waste the Church of Christ there. Receiving, however, an assurance that the persecutor had been converted, and called to the work of preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles, Ananias went to Paul, and, putting his hands on him, bade him receive his sight, when immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales; and, recovering the sight which he had lost when the Lord appeared to him on his way to Damascus, Paul, the new convert, arose, and was baptized, and preached Jesus Christ (see Walch, Dissert. in Act. Apost. ii, 78 sq.), A. D. 30.

Tradition (Menolog. Græcor. i, 79 sq.) represents Ananias as the first that published the Gospel in Damascus, over which place he was subsequently made bishop; but having roused, by his zeal, the hatred of the Jews, he was seized by them, scourged, and finally stoned to death in his own church.—Kitto, s. v.

13. A son of Nebedæus (Josephus, Ant. xx, 5, 2), was made high-priest in the time of the procurator Tiberius Alexander, about A. D. 48, by Herod, king of Chalcis, who for this purpose removed Joseph, son of Camydus, from the high-priesthood (Josephus, Ant. xx, 1, 3). He held the office also under the procurator Cumanus, who succeeded Tiberius Alexander, A. D. 52. Being implicated in the quarrels of the Jews and Samaritans, Ananias was, at the instance of the latter (who, being dissatisfied with the conduct of Cumanus, appealed to Ummidius Quadratus, president of Syria), sent in bonds to Rome, together with his associate Jonathan and a certain Ananus (Josephus, War. ii, 12, 6), to answer for his conduct before Claudius Cæsar (Josephus, Ant. xx, 6, 2). The emperor decided in favor of the accused party. Ananias appears to have returned with credit, and to have remained in his priesthood until Agrippa gave his office to Ismael, the son of Phabi (Josephus, Ant. xx, 8, 8), who succeeded (Wieseler, Chronol. Synopsis, p. 187 sq.) a short time before the departure of the procurator Felix (Josephus, Ant. xx, 8, 5), and occupied the station also under his successor Festus (Josephus, Ant. xx, 6, 3). Ananias, after retiring from his high-priesthood, "increased in glory every day" (Josephus, Ant. xx, 9, 2), and obtained favor with the citizens, and with Albinus, the Roman procurator, by a lavish use of the great wealth he had hoarded. His prosperity met with a dark and painful termination. The assassins (sicarii) who played so fearful a part in the Jewish war, set fire to his house in the commencement of it, and compelled him to seek refuge by concealment; but, being discovered in an aqueduct, he was captured and slain, together with his brother Hezekiah (Josephus, War. ii, 17, 9), A. D. 67.—Kitto, s. v.

It was this Ananias before whom Paul was brought, in the procuratorship of Felix (Acts xxiii), A. D. 55. The noble declaration of the apostle, "I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day," so displeased him that he commanded the attendant to smite him on the face. Indignant at so unprovoked an insult, the apostle replied, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall"—a threat which the previous details serve to prove wants not evidence of having taken effect. Paul, however, immediately restrained his anger, and allowed that he owed respect to the office which Ananias bore. After this hearing Paul was sent to Caesarea, whither Ananias repaired in order to lay a formal charge against him before Felix, who postponed the matter, detaining the apostle meanwhile, and placing him under the supervision of a Roman centurion (Acts xxiv). Paul's statement, "I wist not (οὐκ ᾔδειν), brethren, that he was the high-priest" (Acts xxiii, 5), has occasioned considerable difficulty (see Cramer, De Paulo in Synedrio verba faciente, Jen. 1735; Brunsmann, An Paulus vere ignoravit Ananiam esse suum sacerdotem, in his Heudecad. Diss. Hafn. 1691, p. 44 sq.), since he could scarcely have been ignorant of so public a fact, and one indicated by the very circumstances of the occasion; but it seems simply to signify that the apostle had at the moment overlooked the official honor due to his partisan judge (see Kuinöl, Comment. in loc.). See PAUL.

14. An eminent priest, son of Masambalus, slain by Simon during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War. v, 13, 1).

Anan'iël (Ανανιήλ, i. q. Hanan'el, q. v.), the son of Aduel, father of Tobiel, and grandfather of Tobit (Tob. i, 1).

Anānus (Ανανος, prob. a Greek form of Hannu, q. v.), the name of several men in Josephus.

1. The senior of that name, whose five sons all enjoyed the office of high-priest (Josephus, Ant. xx, 9, 1), an office that he himself filled with the greatest fidelity (War. iv, 3, 7). He is probably the same as Ananus, the son of Seth, who was appointed high-priest by Cyrenius (Ant. xxiii, 2, 1), and removed by Valerius Gratus (ib. 2). He is apparently the ANNAS (q. v.) mentioned in the Gospels.

2. Son of the preceding, high-priest three months, A. D. 62, by appointment of Azrippa (Josephus, Ant. xx, 9, 1). He was a man extremely bold and enterprising, of the sect of the Sadducees; who, thinking it a favorable opportunity, after the death of Festus, governor of Judæa, and before the arrival of Albinus, his successor, assembled the Sanhedrim, and therein procured the condemnation of James, the brother (or relative) of Christ, who is often called the bishop of Jerusalem, and of some others, whom they stigmatized as guilty of impiety, and delivered to be stoned. This was extremely displeasing to all considerate men in Jerusalem, and they sent privately to King Agrippa, who had just arrived in Judæa, entreating that he would prevent Ananus from taking such proceedings in future. He was, in consequence, deprived of his office. He was exceedingly active in inflaming the Zealots (Josephus, Life, 38; War. iv, 3, 9-14), and, in consequence, was put to death at Jerusalem at the beginning of the Jewish wars, A. D. 67 (ib. iv, 5, 2).

3. Son of Bamadus, the most barbarous of all the guards of Simon the tyrant during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War. v, 13, 1). He was from Emmaus, and deserted to the Romans before the capture of the city (ib. vi, 4, 2).

4. A governor (of the Temple), sent by Quadratus as a prisoner to Rome, along with the high-priest Ananias (Josephus, Ant. xx, 6, 2); called in the parallel passage (War. ii, 12, 6) the son of this Ananias. He was perhaps the same elsewhere (War. ii, 19, 5) called the son of Jonathan (comp. War. ii, 12, 5).

Anaphah. See HERON.

Anaphōra (ἀναφορά, raising up), in the Greek Church Liturgy, is that part of the service which includes the consecration of the elements. The book containing the service is also called Anaphora. The term answers to the canon missæ of the Roman Liturgy.—Palmer, Or'g. Liturg. i, 20.

Anastasia, a martyr of the fourth century, of Roman descent, instructed in the principles of Christianity by Chrysoygonus. Her father, being a pagan, gave her in marriage to a man of his own faith named Pothius, who informed against her as a Christian. By command of Florus, governor of Ilyricum, she was put to the torture; but, her faith remaining unshaken, he ordered her to be burnt, which sentence was executed December 25, A. D. 304, about one month after the martyrdom of Chrysoygonus, her instructor. The Greeks commemorate her as a saint on Dec. 22; the Latins, Dec. 25.—Bailet, under Dec. 25.

Anastāsīs. See RESURRECTION.

Anastāsīs I. Pope, a native of Rome, succeeded Siricus about the year 398. He was a contemporary of St. Jerome, who speaks highly of his probity and apostolic zeal. He condemned the doctrine of Origen, and excommunicated Rufinus, who, in a controversy with Jerome, had been the advocate of Origen. Anastasius is said to have acknowledged that he did not understand the controversy. Rufinus wrote an apology, which is found in Constant's collection of the "Epistles of the Popes." Anastasius died in 402, and was succeeded by Innocent I.—Riddle, Hist. of Popacy, i, 150; Bailet, under April 27.

II, Pope, a native of Rome, succeeded Gelasius I in 496. He endeavored to put an end to the schism then existing between the see of Constantinople and that of Rome about the question of precedence. Two letters written by him on the occasion to the Emperor Anastasius are still extant. He also wrote a congratulatory letter to Clovis, king of the Franks, on his conversion to Christianity. He endeavored to revoke the condemnation of Acacius (q. v.), and thus brought upon himself the hatred of the Roman clergy (Baronius, sub anno 497). He died A. D. 498.—Riddle, Hist. of Popacy, i, 192; Baronius, Annal. A. D. 496.

III, Pope, likewise a Roman, succeeded Sergius III in 911, and died the following year.

IV, Cardinal Conrad, bishop of Sabina, was elected pope in 1153, after the death of Eugenius III. Rome was then in a very disturbed state, owing to the movements of Arnold of Brescia and his followers. Anastasius died in 1154, and was succeeded by Adrian IV. He wrote a work on the Trinity.

Anastāsīs, Anti-pope, elected about 855 in opposition to Benedict III. Emperor Louis, at the request of the people and clergy of Rome, induced him to resign.

Anastāsīs, St., patriarch of Antioch, was raised to that throne in 561. The Emperor Justinian, who favored the errors of the Aphthartodocæ (who held that our Lord before his resurrection was, as to his flesh, incorruptible and incapable of suffering), did all in his power to induce Anastasius to support them also, but he persisted in opposing them. Justin II banished him from Antioch, which he did not revisit until 593, after twenty-three years of exile. He died in 598 or 599, amid the heaviest afflictions. Gregory the Great wrote often to him to console him, and to congratulate him on his return. In the second council of Nicaea, a letter of Anastasius was read, in which he drew the distinction between the worship due to God, and that which we render to men and angels, viz., that we serve God alone. His remains may be found in Bib. Max. Patr. tom. ix., and in Combefis, Nor. Auct. tom. i. He is often confounded with Anastasis Sinaita (q. v.).—London, Ecol. Dict. i, 336.

Anastasius, Sr., surnamed ASTRIC, the apostle of Hungary, born in 954, died Sept. 10, 1044. He entered the Benedictine order at Rouen, France. Subsequently he went to Bohemia with Adalbert, bishop of Prague, by whom he was made abbot of Braunau. When Adalbert had to flee from Bohemia, Atric left with him. He found an asylum at the court of Duke Stephen of Hungary, who, in the year 1000, put him at the head of the Benedictine abbey of St. Martin. Stephen having divided his duchy into ten bishoprics, that of Coeloza was accorded to Atric, who henceforth assumed the name Anastasius. The duke then sent him to Rome to obtain from the pope, Sylvester II, the sanction of the ecclesiastical organization of Hungary, and for him (Stephen) the title of king. Anastasius was successful in this mission; he brought back for Stephen, with the royal crown and the double cross, the right to regulate the affairs of the Hungarian Church. Being proclaimed king by the nation, Stephen was consecrated and crowned by Anastasius. The latter was, during three years, provisional metropolitan of Hungary, the archbishop of Strigonia being, by a temporary loss of sight, prevented from discharging the duties of his office. While provisional metropolitan, Anastasius was present at the assembly of Frankfurt, and blessed the marriage of the king with Gisella, sister of the Emperor Henry. When the archbishop of Strigonia recovered his sight, Anastasius retired into his diocese, when he devoted himself until his death to the propagation of the Christian faith.—Oesterreichisches biographisches Lexicon (Vienna, 1851); Hoefer, Biog. Générale, ii, 480.

Anastasius SINAITA, a monk of Mt. Sinai, born, it is supposed, about 600, though the date is undecided. He is said to have travelled much in Egypt and Syria, defending the faith against the Acephalists, Severians, and Theodosians. In his "Odegos," or "Guide to the Right Path," he speaks of John who was the Theodosian patriarch of Alexandria from 677 to 686; he was consequently alive about that period, but when he died is not known. He is honored as a saint in the Greek Church. His principal work, the Odegos just mentioned, has been attributed by some writers to the patriarch Anastasius, who died in 598; but the fact just mentioned, viz., that John of Alexandria, who was patriarch from 677 to 686, is spoken of in it, will prove the impossibility of this. This work was published by Gretser, at Ingolstadt, in 1606. Some of the MSS. do not, however, contain the Exposition of the Faith, which is contained in Gretser's edition at the beginning, and differ in many other particulars. The complete works of Anastasius Sinaita have been published by Migne, in Patrolologia Græca, tom. lxxxix (Paris, 1860).

Anastasius, a Persian martyr who was baptized at Jerusalem. After his baptism he retired into the monastery of Anastasius, and thence imbibing the superstitious desire of martyrdom, he journeyed to Cæsarea. When there, he was brought before the governor Barzabanes, who endeavored, first by bribes, and afterward by tortures, to induce him to forsake the faith; failing in his attempts, he sent him into Persia, where he was first strangled, and then beheaded by order of Chosroës, January 22, 628, the day on which he is commemorated as a saint both in the East and West.—Baillet, Vies des Saints, Jan. 22; Landon, Ecol. Dict. s. v.

Anastasius (Bibliothecarius), librarian of the Vatican, and abbot of St. Maria Trans-Tiberim at Rome, a celebrated and learned writer of the ninth century. The dates of his birth and death are unknown. He was on terms of intimacy with the learned men of his age, especially with Photius and Hincmar. He was present in 869 at the eighth council of Constantinople, where Photius was condemned. He translated the Acts of the Council from Greek into Latin. He wrote a Historia Ecclesiastica (Paris, ed. by Fabrotti, 1649, fol.); but the most important of his writings is a History of the Popes, under the title De Vitis Romanorum pontificum, a Petro Apostolo ad Nicolavum I, ajectis ritibus Hadriani II et Stephani IV (Rome, 1718-1735, 4 vols. fol., and several other editions).—Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 870; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, ii, 479.

A'nath (Heb. Anath, אָנַת, an anewer, i. e. to prayer; Sept. Ανάθ), the father of Shamgar, one of the judges of Israel (Judg. iii, 31; v, 6). B.C. ante 1429.

Anath'ema (ἀνάθεμα), literally any thing bid up or suspended (from ἀνατίθημι, to lay up), and hence any thing laid up in a temple set apart as sacred (2 Macc. ix, 16). In this general sense the form employed is ἀνάθημα, a word of not infrequent occurrence in Greek classic authors, and found once in the N. T., Luke xxi, 5. The form ἀνάθημα, as well as its meaning, appears to be peculiar to the Hellenistic dialect (Valckenauer, Schol. i, 593). The distinction has probably arisen from the special use made of the word by the Greek Jews. In the Sept. ἀνάθημα is the ordinary rendering of the Hebrew word חֲנֻף, che'ven (although in some instances it varies between the two forms, as in Lev. xxvii, 28, 29), and in order to ascertain its meaning it will be necessary to inquire into the signification of this word. The Alexandrine writers preferred the short penultimate in this and other kindred words (e. g. ἐπιθήμα, ἀνάθημα); but occasionally both forms occur in the MSS., as in Judg. xvi, 19; 2 Macc. xiii, 15; Luke xxi, 5; no distinction therefore existed originally in the meanings of the words, as had been supposed by many early writers. The Hebrew חֲנֻף, cherem, is derived from a verb signifying primarily to shut up, and hence to (1) consecrate or devote, and (2) exterminate. Any object so devoted to the Lord was irredeemable: in an inanimate object, it was to be given to the priests (Num. xviii, 14); if a living creature, or even a man, it was to be slain (Lev. xxvii, 28, 29); hence the idea of extermination as connected with devoting. Generally speaking, a vow of this description was taken only with respect to the idolatrous nations who were marked out for destruction by the special decree of Jehovah, as in Num. xxi, 2; Josh. vi, 17; but occasionally the vow was made indefinitely, and involved the death of the innocent, as is illustrated in the case of Jephthah's daughter (Judg. xi, 31), according to many, and certainly in that of Jonathan (1 Sam. xiv, 24), who was only saved by the interposition of the people. The breach of such a vow on the part of any one directly or indirectly participating in it was punished with death (Josh. vii, 25). In addition to these cases of spontaneous devotion on the part of individuals, the verb חֲנֻף, charan', is frequently applied to the extermination of idolatrous nations: in such cases the idea of a vow appears to be dropped, and the word assumes a purely secondary sense (Sept. ἐξολοθισμός); or, if the original meaning is still to be retained, it may be in the sense of Jehovah (Isa. xxxiv, 2) shutting up, i. e. placing under a ban, and so necessitating the destruction of them, in order to prevent all contact. The extermination being the result of a positive command (Exod. xxii, 20), the idea of a vow is excluded.

although doubtless the instances already referred to (Num. xxi, 2; Josh. vi, 17) show how a vow was occasionally superadded to the command. It may be further noticed that the degree to which the work of destruction was carried out varied. Thus it applied to the destruction of (1) men alone (Dent. xx, 13); (2) men, women, and children (Dent. ii, 34); (3) virgins excepted (Num. xxxi, 17; Judg. xxi, 11); (4) all living creatures (Dent. xx, 16; 1 Sam. xv, 3); the spoil in the former cases were reserved for the use of the army (Dent. ii, 35; xx, 14; Josh. xxii, 8), instead of being given over to the priesthood, as was the case in the recorded vow of Joshua (Josh. vi, 19). See Vow.

1. We thus find that the cherem was a person or thing consecrated or devoted irrevocably to God, and that it differed from any thing merely vowed or sanctified to the Lord in this respect, that the latter could be redeemed (Lev. xxviii, 1-27), while the former was irremediable (Lev. xxvii, 21, 28); hence, in reference to living creatures, the devoted thing, whether man or beast, must be put to death (Lev. xxvii, 29). The prominent idea, therefore, which the word conveyed was that of a person or thing devoted to destruction, or accursed. Thus the cities of the Canaanites were anathematized (Num. xxi, 2, 3), and, after their complete destruction, the name of the place was called Hormalh (חֲרָמָה; Sept. ἀνάθεμα). Thus, again, the city of Jericho was made an anathema to the Lord (Josh. vi, 17); that is, every living thing in it (except Rahab and her family) was devoted to death; that which could be destroyed by fire was burnt, and all that could not be thus consumed (as gold and silver) was forever alienated from man and devoted to the use of the sanctuary (Josh. vi, 24). The prominence thus given to the idea of a thing accursed led naturally to the use of the word in cases where there was no reference whatever to consecration to the service of God, as in Dent. vii, 26, where an idol is called חֲרָמָה, or ἀνάθεμα, and the Israelites are warned against idolatry lest they should be anathema like it. In these instances the term denotes the object of the curse, but it is sometimes used to designate the curse itself (e. g. Dent. xx, 17, Sept.; comp. Acts xxiii, 14), and it is in this latter sense that the English word is generally employed.

In this sense, also, the Jews of later times use the Hebrew term, though with a somewhat different meaning as to the curse intended. The חֲרָמָה, cherem, of the rabbins signifies excommunication or exclusion from the Jewish Church. The more recent rabbinical writers reckon three kinds or degrees of excommunication, all of which are occasionally designated by this generic term (Elias Levita, in Sepher Tisbi). (1.) The first of these, חֲרָמָה, nihal' i, separation, is merely a temporary separation or suspension from ecclesiastical privileges, involving, however, various civil inconveniences, particularly seclusion from society to the distance of four cubits. The person thus excommunicated was not debarred entering the temple, but instead of going in on the right hand, as was customary, he was obliged to enter on the left, the usual way of departure; if he died while in this condition there was no mourning for him, but a stone was thrown on his coffin to indicate that he was separated from the people and had deserved stoning. Buxtorf (Lex. Talm. col. 1301) enumerates twenty-four causes of this kind of excommunication: it lasted thirty days, and was pronounced without a curse. If the individual did not repent at the expiration of the term (which, however, according to Buxtorf, was extended in such cases to sixty or ninety days), the second kind of excommunication was resorted to. (2.) This was called simply and more properly חֲרָמָה, cherem, curse. It could only be pronounced by an assembly of at least ten persons, and was always accompanied with curses. The formula employed is given at length by Buxtorf (Lex. col. 828). A person thus excommunicated was cut off from all religious and social privileges: it was unlawful either to eat or drink with him (comp. 1 Cor. v, 11). The curse could be dissolved, however, by three common persons, or by one person of dignity. (3.) If the excommunicated person still continued impenitent, a yet more severe sentence was, according to the rabbins, pronounced against him, which was termed חֲרָמָה, shammata', imprecation (Elias Levita, in Tisbi). It is described as a complete excision from the Church and the giving up of the individual to the judgment of God and to final perdition. There is, however, reason to believe that these three grades are of recent origin. The Talmudists frequently use the term by which the first and last are designated interchangeably, and some rabbinical writers (whom Lightfoot has followed in his Horæ Hebr. et Talm. ad 1 Cor. v, 5) consider the last to be a lower grade than the second; yet it is probable that the classification rests on the fact that the sentence was more or less severe according to the circumstances of the case; and though we cannot expect to find the three grades distinctly marked in the writings in the N. T., we may not improbably consider the phrase "put out of the synagogue," ἀποσυράγαρον ποιῆν, John xvi, 2 (comp. ix, 22; xii, 42), as referring to a lighter censure than is intended by one or more of the three terms used in Luke vi, 22, where perhaps different grades are intimated. The phrase "deliver over to Satan" (1 Cor. v, 5; 1 Tim. i, 20) has been by many commentators understood to refer to the most severe kind of excommunication. Even admitting the allusion, however, there is a very important difference between the Jewish censure and the formula employed by the apostle. In the Jewish sense it would signify the delivering over of the transgressor to final perdition, while the apostle expressly limits his sentence to the "destruction of the flesh" (i. e. the depraved nature), and resorts to it in order "that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." See ACCURSED.

II. But, whatever diversity of opinion there may be as to the degrees of excommunication, it is on all hands admitted that the term חֲרָמָה, with which we are more particularly concerned as the equivalent of the Greek ἀνάθεμα, properly denotes, in its rabbinical use, an excommunication accompanied with the most severe curses and denunciations of evil. We are therefore prepared to find that the anathema of the N. T. always implies execration; but it yet remains to be ascertained whether it is ever used to designate a judicial act of excommunication. That there is frequently no such reference is very clear: in some instances the individual denounces the anathema on himself, unless certain conditions are fulfilled. The noun and its corresponding verb are thus used in Acts xxiii, 12, 14, 21, and the verb occurs with a similar meaning in Matt. xxvi, 74; Mark xiv, 71. The phrase "to call Jesus anathema" (1 Cor. xii, 3) refers not to a judicial sentence pronounced by the Jewish authorities, but to the act of any private individual who execrated him and pronounced him accursed. That this was a common practice among the Jews appears from the rabbinical writings. The term, as it is used in reference to any who should preach another gospel, "Let him be anathema" (Gal. i, 8, 9), has the same meaning as let him be accounted execrable and accursed. In none of these instances do we find any reason to think that the word was employed to designate specifically and technically excommunication either from the Jewish or the Christian Church. There remain only two passages in which the word occurs in the N. T., both presenting considerable difficulty to the translator.

(a.) With regard to the first of these (Rom. ix, 3), Grotius and others understand the phrase "accursed from Christ," ἀνάθεμα εἶναι ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, to signify excommunication from the Christian Church, while most of the fathers, together with Tholuck, Rückert, and a great number of modern interpreters, explain the term as referring to the Jewish practice of excommunication. On the other hand, Deyling, Olshausen, De Wette, and many more, adopt the more general meaning of accursed. The great difficulty is to ascertain the extent of the evil which Paul expresses his willingness to undergo; Chrysostom, Calvin, and many others understand it to include final separation, not, indeed, from the love, but from the presence of Christ; others limit it to a violent death; and others, again, explain it as meaning the same kind of curse as that under which they might be delivered by repentance and the reception of the Gospel (Deylingii Observat. Sacrae, pt. ii, p. 495 and sq.). It would occupy too much space to refer to other interpretations of the passage, or to pursue the investigation of it further. There seems, however, little reason to suppose that a judicial act of the Christian Church is intended, and we may remark that much of the difficulty which commentators have felt seems to have arisen from their not keeping in mind that the apostle does not speak of his wish as a possible thing, and their consequently pursuing to all its results what should be regarded simply as an expression of the most intense desire (ἠχέωμαι = ἠχέομαι ἄν, I could wish, i. e. were such a thing proper or available, see Winer, Idioms, p. 222). Some have even thought (taking the verb as a historical Imperfect) that the apostle was simply referring to his former detestation of Christ, when yet unconverted (see Bloomfield, Recessio Synopt. in loc.), and Tregelles proposes (Account of Gr. Text of N. T. p. 219) to remove the difficulty altogether in this way, by enclosing the clause in question in a parenthesis. See Wolfii Curra, in loc.; Poli Synopsis, in loc.; Trantermann, Illustratio (Jen. 1758); Meib. Quart. Rev. 1863, p. 420 sq. Comp. BAN.

(b.) The phrase ANATHEMA MARAN-ATHA, ἀνάθεμα μαρὰν ἀθά (1 Cor. xvi, 22), has been considered by many to be equivalent to the שַׁמְנָתָא, shammata, of the rabbins, the third and most severe form of excommunication. This opinion is derived from the supposed etymological identity of the Syriac phrase itself, maran-atha (q. v.), מָרַן אָתָּה, "the Lord cometh," with the Hebrew word which is considered by these commentators to be derived from שֵׁם אָתָּה, shem attha, "the Name (i. e. Jehovah) cometh." This explanation, however, can rank no higher than a plausible conjecture, since it is supported by no historical evidence. The Hebrew term is never found thus divided, nor is it ever thus explained by Jewish writers, who, on the contrary, give etymologies different from this (Buxtorf, Lex. col. 2466). It is, moreover, very uncertain whether this third kind of excommunication was in use in the time of Paul; and the phrase which he employs is not found in any rabbinical writer (Lightfoot, Horæ Hebr. et Talm. on 1 Cor. xvi, 22). The literal meaning of the words is clear, but it is not easy to understand why the Syriac phrase is here employed, or what is its meaning in connection with anathema. Lightfoot supposes that the apostle uses it to signify that he pronounced this anathema against the Jews. However this may be, the supposition that the anathema, whatever be its precise object, is intended to designate excommunication from the Christian Church, as Grotius and Augusti understand it, appears to rest on very slight grounds; it seems preferable to regard it, with Lightfoot, Olshausen, and most other commentators, as simply an expression of detestation. Though, however, we find little or no evidence of the use of the word anathema in the N. T. as the technical term for excommunication, it is certain that it obtained this meaning in the early ages of the Church; for it is thus employed in the apostolic canons, in the canons of various councils, by Chrysostom, Theodoret, and other Greek fathers (Suiceri Theaurus Eccl. s. vv. ἀνάθεμα and ἀφορισμός).—Kitto, s. v. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

III. Anathema, in ecclesiastical usage, is the cutting off any person from the communion or privileges of a society. The anathema differed from simple excommunication in being attended with curses and execrations. It signifies not only to cut off the living from the Church, but the dead from salvation. It was practised in the early Church against notorious offenders. The form has been preserved: the following was pronounced by Synesius against one Andronicus: "Let no Church of God be open to Andronicus and his accomplices, but let every sacred temple and church be shut against them. I admonish both private men and magistrates to receive them neither under their roof nor to their table; and priests, more especially, that they neither converse with them living nor attend their funerals when dead." When any one was thus anathematized, notice was given to the neighboring churches, and occasionally to the churches over the world, that all might confirm and ratify this act of discipline by refusing to admit such a one into their communion. The form of denouncing anathemas against heresies and heretics is very ancient. But as zeal about opinions increased, and Christians began to set a higher value on trifles than on the weightier matters of the law, it became a common practice to add anathemas to every point in which men differed from each other. At the Council of Trent a whole body of divinity was put into canons, and an anathema affixed to each. How fearful an instrument of power the anathema was in the hands of popes in the Middle Ages is attested by history. Popes still continue to hurl anathemas against heretics, which are little regarded.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xvi, ch. ii, § 16. See INTERDICT.

Treatises on this subject are the following: Dürr, De anathemate (Alta. 1662); Balwin, De anathematismis (Viteb. 1620); Bose, in Winckler's Tempo sacre, p. 231 sq.; Fecht, De precibus contra alios (Rost. 1708); Pipping, De imprecationibus (Lips. 1721); Pisanski, Vindicia Psalterium ob execrationes (Regiom. 1779); Poncius, De imprecationibus in impiis, in the Bibl. Lubec. p. 565 sq. See IMPRECATION.

An'athoth (Heb. Anathoth, אַנְתוֹת, answers, i. e. to prayers; Sept. Ἀναθώθ), the name of one city and of two men.

1. One of the towns belonging to the priests in the tribe of Benjamin, and as such a city of refuge (Josh. xxi, 18). It is omitted from the list in Josh. xviii, but included "suburbis" (1 Chron. vi, 60 [45]). Hither, to his "fields," Abiathar was banished by Solomon after the failure of his attempt to put Adonijah on the throne (1 Kings ii, 26). This was the native place of Abiezer, one of David's 30 captains (2 Sam. xxiii, 27; 1 Chron. xi, 28; xxvii, 12), and of Jehu, another of the mighty men (1 Chron. xii, 3). The "men" (אַנְתוֹת, not אַנְתוֹת, as in most of the other cases; compare, however, Netophah, Michmash, etc.) of Anathoth returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 23; Neh. vii, 27; 1 Esdr. v, 18). It is chiefly memorable, however, as the birthplace and usual residence of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. i, 1; xi, 21-23; xxix, 27; xxxii, 7-9), whose name it seems to have borne in the time of Jerome, "Anathoth of Jeremiah" (Onomast. s. v.). The same writer (Comment. in Jer. i, 1) places Anathoth three Roman miles north of Jerusalem, which correspond with the twenty stadia assigned by Josephus (Ant. x, 7, 3). In the Talmud (Yoma, 10) it is called Anath (אַנְת). (For other notices, see Reland's Palæst. p. 561 sq.) Anathoth lay on or near the great road from the north to Jerusalem

(Isa. x, 30). The traditional site at Kuriet el-Enab does not fulfil these conditions, being 10 miles distant from the city, and nearer west than north. Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 109) appears to have discovered this place in the present village of Anata, at the distance of an hour and a quarter from Jerusalem (Tobler, Topogr. v. Jerus. ii, 394). It is seated on a broad ridge of hills, and commands an extensive view of the eastern slope of the mountainous tract of Benjamin, including also the valley of the Jordan, and the northern part of the Dead Sea (see Hackett's Illustr. of Script. p. 191). It seems to have been once a walled town and a place of strength. Portions of the wall still remain, built of large hewn stones, and apparently ancient, as are also the foundations of some of the houses. It is now a small and very poor village; yet the cultivation of the priests survives in tilled fields of grain, with figs and olives. From the vicinity a favorite kind of building-stone is carried to Jerusalem. Troops of donkeys are employed in this service, a hewn stone being slung on each side; the larger stones are transported on camels (Raumer's Palästina, p. 169; Thomson's Land and Book, ii, 548).

Its inhabitants were sometimes called ANATHOTHITES (Anethothit', אֲנֶתוֹתִי, "Anethothite," 2 Sam. xxiii, 27; or Anthothit', אֲנֹתוֹתִי, "Anthothite," 1 Chron. xi, 28; "Anetothite, xxvii, 12). See ANOTHIITE.

2. The eighth named of the nine sons of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 8). B.C. post 1856.

3. One of the chief Israelites that sealed the covenant on the return from Babylon (Neh. x, 19), B.C. cir. 410.

Anatolius, bishop of Laodicea, in Syria, was born at Alexandria, in Egypt, about 230. He excelled, according to Jerome, in arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, physics, logic, and rhetoric. About 264 he travelled into Syria and Palestine; and while at Cæsarea, Theoctenus, bishop of that see, made him his coadjutor, meaning that he should have succeeded him; but as he passed through Laodicea, on his way to the council of Antioch in 269, he was retained to be bishop of that see. He signaled his episcopate by his constant endeavors to destroy heresy and idolatry, and to cause virtue to flourish. He seems to have lived until the time of Diocletian, and to have died in peace. The Roman Martyrology marks his festival on the 3d of July. He left a Treatise on Arithmetic, in ten books, and one on Easter, Canon Paschalis, a fragment of which is given by Eusebius. A Latin translation of the entire Canon Paschalis, published by Egidius Bucher (Amsterd. 1634; reprinted in Gallandii Bibl. Patr. t. iii), has been shown by Ideler (Handbuch der Chronologie, ii, 266 sq.) to be spurious.—Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. vii, 32.

Anchieta, José de, a Jesuit, born in 1533 at Teneriffe, was from 1554 to 1558 missionary in Brazil, where he distinguished himself more than any other member of his order. He is often called the Apostle of Brazil. He had an extraordinary influence over the Indians, who, under his guidance, aided in establishing the city of Rio, and in expelling the French from the country. He is the author of a grammar of the Brazilian Indians, which is still regarded as a classic work on that subject (see Ausland, 1835, p. 650 sq.). Although a large number of miracles were reported of him, he has not yet been canonized. He died in 1597. A Latin biography of him was published by Beretarius in Cologne, 1617.

Anchor (ἄγκυρα), the instrument fastened in the bottom of the sea to hold a vessel firm during a storm (Acts xxvii, 29, 30, 40); from which passage it appears that the vessels of Roman commerce had several anchors, and that they were attached to the stern as well as prow of the boat (see Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, ii, 335). The anchors used by the Romans were for the most part made of iron, and their form resembled that of the modern anchor. The anchor as here represented, and as commonly used, was called bidens, because it had two teeth or flukes. Sometimes it had one only. The following expressions were used for the three principal processes in managing the anchor: Ancoram solvere, ἄγκυραν χαλᾶν, "to loose the anchor;" Ancoram jacere, βάλλειν, ῥίπτειν, "to cast anchor;" Ancoram tollere, αἶρειν, ἀναοῖσθαι, ἀνάσπασθαι, "to weigh anchor." The anchor usually lay on the deck, and was attached to a cable (fumis), which passed through a hole in the prow, termed oculus. In the heroic times of Greece we find large stones, called εἰρῆαι (sleepers), used instead of anchors (Hom. Iliad, i, 436). See SHIP.

In Heb. vi, 19, the word anchor is used metaphorically for a spiritual support in times of trial or doubt; a figure common to modern languages. See HOPE.

Anchorets. See ANACHORETS.

Ancient of Days (Chald. אֲנִיִּים יְהִיִּים, Sept. παλαιὸς ἡμῶν, Vulg. antiquus dierum), an expression applied to Jehovah thrice in a vision of Daniel (ch. vii, 9, 13, 22), apparently much in the same sense as Eternal. See JEHOVAH. The expression, viewed by itself, is somewhat peculiar; but it is doubtless employed by way of contrast to the successive monarchies which appeared one after another rising before the eye of the prophet. These all proved to be ephemeral existences, partaking of the corruption and evanescence of earth; and so, when the supreme Lord and Governor of all appeared to pronounce their doom, and set up his own everlasting kingdom, He is not unnaturally symbolized as the Ancient of Days—one who was not like those new formations, the offspring of a particular time, but who had all time, in a manner, in his possession—one whose days were past reckoning. See DANIEL (BOOK OF).

Ancillon, David, was born March 17, 1617, at Metz, where his father was an eminent lawyer. After studying at the Jesuits' College in Metz, he went to Geneva in 1633, to complete his studies in philosophy and theology, and in 1641 was licensed to preach by the Protestant Synod of Charenton, and appointed minister of Meaux, where he remained till 1653, when he returned to Metz; and here he continued to officiate with great reputation till the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, when he retired to Frankfort, and afterward to Berlin, where he was received with great favor by the Elector of Brandenburg. He died Sept. 3, 1692. Among his writings are, Traité de Tradition (Sedan, 1657, 4to); Vie de Farel (Amst. 1691, 12mo), etc. Perhaps, however, the most favorable impression of his varied learning is to be obtained from the work entitled "Mélanges Critiques de Littérature, recueilli des Conversations de feu M. Ancillon," published at Basle in 1698 by his son Charles, who was a man of literary distinction (see Haag, La France Protestante, i, 80; Bayle, Dict. s. v.).

Ancillon, Jean Pierre Frédéric, a descendant of David Ancillon, was born at Berlin on the 30th of April, 1766. He studied theology, and on his return from the university he was appointed teacher at the military academy of Berlin, and preacher at the French church of the same town. He began his literary career by a work entitled "Mélanges de Littérature et de Philosophie" (Berlin, 1801, 2 vols. 8vo); and a few years after he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences of Berlin, and was, at the same time, appointed its historiographer. His preaching at Berlin attracted the attention of the king, and he was drawn into political life. In 1806 he was appointed instructor of the Crown Prince of Prussia, and was further distinguished by the title of Councillor of State. In 1825 he was made Minister of Foreign Affairs, in which office he died, April 10, 1837.—Biog. Dict. Soc. Useful Knowledge; Haag, La France Protestante, i, 90.

Ancyra, a city in Galatia (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.), where three councils were held: I. In 314, attended by twelve or eighteen bishops; the subject of apostates was discussed, and twenty-five canons framed. II. Semi-Arian, in 358, on the second formula of Sirmium (q. v.). III. In 375, when Hypsius, bishop of Parnassus, was deposed.—Smith, Tables of Church Hist.

Anderson, Christopher an English Baptist minister, born at Edinburgh, and educated at the Baptist College, Bristol, under Dr. Ryland. In 1806 he commenced his labors as a city missionary in Edinburgh at his own expense; and in ten years a church was established, of which he remained pastor until his death. He was one of the principal founders of the Edinburgh Bible Society (1809) and of the Gaelic School Society (1811). He died Feb. 21, 1852. Besides fugitive essays on missions, etc. he wrote "The Design of the Domestic Constitution" (Lond. 8vo).—Historical Sketches of the Ancient Irish (Edinb. 1828, 12mo).—Annals of the English Bible (Lond. 1845, 2 vols. 8vo).—Jamieson, Relig. Biog. p. 16

Anderson, John, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, born in Guilford, N.C., April 10, 1767. Licensed to preach in 1791, he itinerated in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio until 1801, when he became pastor at Upper Buffalo, Washington Co., Pa., where he remained till 1833. He was made D.D. by Washington College, 1821. He died Jan. 5, 1835. Many ministers of eminence studied in Dr. Anderson's house.—Sprague, Annals, iii, 588.

Anderson (or ANDREAE), Lars (or LAURENT), chancellor of Gustavus Vasa, born in Sweden in 1480. He was at first a priest at Strengnes, and became subsequently archdeacon at Upsal. On his return from a journey to Rome he passed through Wittenberg, and became convinced of the truth of Luther's doctrines. Arriving in Sweden, he was made chancellor by Gustavus Vasa, who readily seconded all his efforts for promoting the Reformation in Sweden. At the request of the king, Anderson, together with Olaus Petri, translated the Bible into Swedish. The Reformation was established by the Diet of Westeras in 1527. Anderson was high in office and favor until 1540, when he was charged with having failed to disclose a conspiracy against the king of which he had knowledge, and he was sentenced to death. He was, however, let off for a sum of money, and retired to Strengnes, where he died in 1552.—Hoefler, Biog. Générale, ii, 520.

Anderson, Peyton, a Methodist preacher of Virginia, born 1795, entered the Virginia Conference at nineteen, and preached in the principal cities and stations until his death in 1823, aged twenty-eight. Mr. Anderson was a teacher previous to his ministry, and, being well-educated, modest, faithful, and circumspect, and greatly devoted to his calling, his promise of future usefulness to the church was rapidly maturing, when he died.—Minutes of Conferences, 1824.

Andrada, Antonio d', a Portuguese Jesuit and missionary, born at Villa de Oleiros about 1580, died August 20, 1633. He entered the order of Jesuits at Coimbra in 1596, and was, in 1601, sent as missionary to India. Having been appointed superior of the missions of Mongolia, he learned that in Thibet certain vestiges of Christianity, or some form of religious worship similar to that of the Roman Catholic Church, was to be found. He accordingly concluded to visit that, until then, almost entirely unknown country. He successfully accomplished the hazardous journey, and reached Caparanga, a city which was the residence of the military chief of Thibet. It is said that he was well received by the grandees and the court, and that he was allowed to preach and to erect a temple to the Virgin Mary. He returned to Mongolia in order to associate with himself other missionaries. With these he went a second time to Thibet, where he again met with a favorable reception. Subsequently he was elected provincial of the residence of Goa, where he remained until his death. Andrada published an account of his first journey to Thibet under the title Nova Descobrimto do Grao Catayo, ou dos Reynos de Thibet (Lisb. 1626, 4to).—(New Discovery of the Great Catayo, or the Kingdoms of Thibet). This work was translated into many other languages—into French in 1629.—Hoefler, Biog. Générale, ii, 546.

Andrade, Diogo PAVVA D', a Portuguese theologian, was born at Coimbra in 1528, and became grand treasurer of King John. He distinguished himself at the Council of Trent, concerning which he wrote Questionum Orthodoxorum libri x, against Chemnitz Examen Conc. Trid. (Venice, 1564, 4to); also Defensio Fidei Trident. lib. vi (Lisb. 1578, 4to); De Conciliorum Auctoritate; and several volumes of sermons. He died in 1575.—Alegambe, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jesu; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, i, 533.

Andrade, or Thomas de Jesus, brother of the last, and monk of the Augustine monastery at Coimbra. He laid the foundation in 1578 of the Discalceats. He followed King Don Sebastian into Africa, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Alcaeer, August 4, 1578, and thrown by the infidels into a dungeon, where no other light penetrated but that which came to him through the cracks in the door. Here he wrote, in Portuguese, The Labors of Jesus, which obtained great celebrity, and has been translated into Spanish, Italian, and French. He died April 17, 1582, in the place of his confinement, where, in spite of the ransom sent by his sister, the Countess of Lihahes, he preferred to remain, that he might comfort, during the remainder of his days, the Christian captives imprisoned with him. Father Alexis de Menses has written his Life, which is appended to "The Labors of Jesus," printed in 1631.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. i, 350.

Andrä, Jakob, a celebrated Lutheran theologian, born at Waiblingen, in Würtemberg, March 25, 1528. In 1543 he took the degree of B.A. in the University of Tübingen, and in 1553 that of doctor in theology. In 1546 he became deacon in Stuttgart; and when the Spanish troops took the town, he alone, of all the Protestant pastors, remained. In 1555 and 1556 he labored successfully in planting the Reformation in Oettingen and Baden. In 1557 he attended the diets of Frankfort and Ratishon, and was one of the secretaries at the Conference of Worms. In 1557 he published his work De Cæni Domini, and in the year following he published a reply to the work of Staphylus (who had gone over to the Roman Church) against Luther, in which that writer had made a collection of the various opinions of all the different Protestant sects, and attributed them to Luther as the origin of all. In 1562 he was made professor of theology and chancellor of the University of Tübingen. He went, in 1563, to Strasburg, where Zanchius had been propounding the doctrine that the elect cannot fall from grace, sin as they will, and persuaded Zanchius to sign a confession of faith which he drew up. See ZANCHIUS. During the next eight years he travelled largely in Germany and Bohemia, consolidating the Reformation. In 1571 he combated the notion of Flaccius Illyriensis that sin is a substance. But the most important labor of his life was his share in the preparation of the Formula Concordiæ, composed by a meeting of divines at Torgau, 1576, and revised in April, 1577, at the monastery of Berg, by Andrea, Chemnitz, and Schnekker. This Liber Bergensis was accepted by Augustus, elector of Saxony, who caused his clergy to sign it, and invited those of other German states to sign also. Many refused. The book, previously revised by Musculus, Cornerus, and Chytraeus, with a preface by Andrea, was printed in 1579. (See Francke, Libri Symbolici, part iii, Prolegom.; and see FORMULA CONCORDIÆ.) It is thoroughly polemical, on the Lutheran side, against the Calvinistic view of the sacraments. An account of the controversies caused by the Formula is given by Mosheim (Ch. Hist., cent. xvi, sec. iii, pt. ii, ch. i). Andrea labored earnestly to gain general assent to the Formula; for five years he travelled widely, conferring with princes, magistrates, and pastors. In 1583 and 1584 he labored at a voluminous work on the ubiquity of Christ. In 1586 he disputed with Beza at the colloquy of Montbelliard, and died at Tübingen Jan. 7, 1590. He wrote more than one hundred and fifty different works, chiefly polemical.—Mosheim, Ch. Hist., cent. xvi, pt. ii, ch. i, § 38-40; Niedner's Zeitschrift, 1853, Heft iii; Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, s. v.

Andraeæ, ABRAHAM, Lutheran archbishop of Upsala, a native of Angermundland, died in 1607. While rector of the university of Stockholm he offended King John, the son of Gustavus Wasa, who wished to re-establish the Roman Catholic Church in Sweden. In order to escape imprisonment he fled to Germany, where he spent thirteen years, during which time he published most of his works. In 1593, after the death of John, and during the absence of Sigismund, his successor, who was at the same time king of Poland, the Swedish clergy met at Upsal, resolved to maintain the Confession of Augsburg, and unanimously elected Andraeæ archbishop. King John Sigismund, on his arrival at Stockholm, had to confirm the election, and he was crowned by Andraeæ. Duke Charles, the prince regent of Sweden, charged him with reorganizing the church affairs; but on the tour which he undertook to this end he raised the indignation of the people by his rigor, and incurred the displeasure of the regent. Being moreover accused of a secret understanding with Sigismund, he was deprived of his office and imprisoned in the castle of Gripsholm, where he died. Andraeæ wrote a work against the Adiaphorists (Formæ Adiaphororum, Wittenberg, 1587, 8vo), with several other works. He also translated a commentary on Daniel by Draconitis, and published several works of his father-in-law, Laurentius Petri de Nerike.—Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, ii, 574.

Andraëas CRETENSIS (Andrew of Crete), so called because he was archbishop of that island. Born at Damascus about 635, he embraced the monastic state at Jerusalem, for which reason he is sometimes styled Hierosolymitanus. He was a vehement antagonist of the Monothelites, was ordained deacon at Constantinople, and shortly after was made archbishop of Crete, which church he governed for many years, and died at Mitylene at the end of the seventh century. Besides his sermons, homilies, and orations, he wrote many hymns, some of which are still sung in the Greek churches. The Greek Church commemorates him as a saint on July 4. His remains are gathered under the title Opera Gr. et Lat. cum notis Combesii, fol. (Paris, 1644).—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 635; Landon, Eccles. Diet. i, 352.

Andreas, archbishop of Crain in Austria, one of the forerunners of Luther, lived in the second half of the fifteenth century. Having been sent by the Emperor Frederick III to Rome, he was scandalized at the manners of the Roman court. Andreas urged the necessity of a reform of the church upon the cardinals and the pope, who at first praised his zeal, but when Andreas became more urgent had him put in prison in 1482. Having been liberated through the intervention of Emperor Frederick III, he went to Basle, and attempted to convoke another general council. Public opinion and the universities showed to him a great deal of sympathy, but the pope excommunicated him and all who would give him an asylum. When the city of Basle refused to expel Andreas, the papal legate put it under the interdict, to which, however, no one paid any attention except the Carmelite monks, who on that account were refused any alms by the citizens, and nearly starved to death. After a long negotiation between the pope and the emperor, Andreas was summoned to retract, and when he refused he was put in prison, where, after a few months, he was found hung, in 1484—on the same day, it is said, when Luther was born. His body was put in a barrel, and, through the executioner, thrown into the Rhine.—Hoefcr, Biog. Générale.

Andraëas, or Andraëa JOHANN VALENTIN, grandson of James, was born at Herrenberg, Aug. 17, 1586. After completing his academic course at Tübingen, he travelled for some years as tutor. In 1614 he became deacon at Vaihingen, where he labored zealously six years as preacher and writer, directing his efforts mainly against formalism and mysticism. Himself a practical Christian, he mourned over the frivolous learning and pedantry of the time, and directed his life and labors against it. But instead of attacking them in the usual way, he adopted wit and satire as his weapons. He wrote Menippus, sive Satyriconum dialogorum centuria against unpractical orthodoxy, and Athea Eul against cabalistic theosophy. His Fana Fraternalitatis Rose Crucis (1614), and Confessio fraternalitatis R. C. (1615), were an ironical attack on the secret societies of his times. Those who did not understand the mystification ascribed to him the foundation of the Rosicrucians (q. v.). He wrote again, and book after book, to show that his first work was fictitious, and designed to teach a useful lesson; but nobody would believe him at first. But finally he was understood, and "no satire was probably ever attended with more beneficial results." His real object was to overthrow the idols of the time in literature and religion, and to bring the minds of men back to Christ; and no writer of his time did more to accomplish this end. He removed to Caly in 1629, where, after the battle of Nördlingen, 1634, he lost his library and other property. He died at Adelsberg, June 27, 1654. For a further account of him, see Hossbach, Andraëa und sein Zeitalter (Berlin, 1819); Hurst, History of Rationalism, chap. i; Rheinwald, Andraëa Vita ab ipso conscripta (Berl. 1849); Haase, Church History, § 380.

An'drew (Ἀνδρέας, manly), one of the twelve apostles. His name is of Greek origin (Athen. xv. 675; vii, 312), but was in use among the later Jews (Josephus, Ant. xii, 2, 2; see Dio Cass. lxxviii, 32; comp. Diod. Sic. Excerpta Vat. p. 11, ed. Lips.), as appears from a passage quoted from the Jerusalem Talmud by Lightfoot (Harmony, Luke v, 10). He was a native of the city of Bethsaida in Galilee (John i, 44), and brother of Simon Peter (Matt. iv, 18; x, 2; John i, 41). He was at first a disciple of John the Baptist (John i, 39), and was led to receive Jesus as the Messiah in consequence of John's expressly pointing him out as "the Lamb of God" (John i, 36), A. D. 26. His first care, after he had satisfied himself as to the validity of the claims of Jesus, was to bring to him his brother Simon. Neither of them, however, became at that time stated attendants on our Lord; for we find that they were still pursuing their occupation as fishermen on the Sea of Galilee when Jesus, after John's imprisonment, called them to follow him (Matt. iv, 18 sq.; Mark i, 16, 17), A. D. 27. See PETER. In two of the lists of the apostles (Matt. x, 2; Luke vi, 13) he is named in the first pair with Peter, but in Mark iii, 18, in connection with Philip, and in Acts i, 13, with James. In accompanying Jesus he appears as one of the confidential disciples (Mark xiii, 3; John vi, 8; xii, 22), but he is by no means to be confounded (as by Lützelberger, Kirchl. Tradit. über Joh. p. 199 sq.) with the beloved disciple of the fourth Gospel (see Lücke, Comm. üb. Joh. i., 653 sq.; Maier, Comm. zu Joh. i., 43 sq.). Very little is related of Andrew by any of the evangelists; the principal incidents in which his name occurs during the life of Christ are the feeding of the five thousand (John vi, 9), his introducing to our Lord certain Greeks who desired to see him (John xii, 22), and his asking, along with his brother Simon and the two sons of Zebedee, for a further explanation of what our Lord had said in reference to the destruction of the temple (Mark xiii, 3). Of his subsequent history and labors we have no authentic record. Tradition assigns Scythia (Eusebius, iii, 1, 71), Greece (Theodoret, i, 1425; Jerome, Ep. 148 ad Mar.), and, at a later date, Asia Minor, Thrace (Hippolytus, ii, 30), and elsewhere (Niceph. ii, 30), as the scenes of his ministry. It is supposed that he founded a church in Constantinople, and ordained Stachys (q. v.), named by Paul (Rom. xvi, 9), as its first bishop. At length, the tradition states, he came to Patrae, a city of Achaia, where Ægeus, the proconsul, enraged at his persisting to preach, commanded him to join in sacrifices to the heathen gods; and upon the apostle's refusal, he ordered him to be severely scourged and then crucified. To make his death the more lingering, he was fastened to the cross, not with nails, but with cords. Having hung two days, praising God, and exhorting the spectators to the faith, he is said to have expired on the 30th of November, but in what year is uncertain. The cross is stated to have been of the form called Cruce decussata (X), and commonly known as "St. Andrew's cross;" but this is doubted by some (see Lepsius, De cruce, i, 7; Sagittar. De cruciatib. martyri., viii, 12). His relics, it is said, were afterward removed from Patrae to Constantinople. (Comp. generally Fabric. Cod. Apocryph. i, 456 sq.; Salut. Lux Evng. p. 98 sq.; Menolog. Græcor. i, 221 sq.; Peronius l'it. Apostol. p. 82 sq.; Andr. de Sassy, Andreas frater Petri, Par. 1646.) See APOSTLE.

An apocryphal book, bearing the title of "The Acts of Andrew," is mentioned by Eusebius (iii, 25), Epiphanius (Hæc. xlvj, 1; lxvii, 1), and others. It seems never to have been received except by some heretical sects, as the Encratites, Origenians, etc. (Fabric. Cod. Apocryph. ii, 747; Kleuker, Ueb. die Apocr. d. N. T. p. 351 sq.). This book, as well as a "Gospel of St. Andrew," was declared apocryphal by the decree of Pope Gelasius (Jones, On the Canon, i, 179 sq.). Tischendorf has published the Greek text of a work bearing the title "Acts of Andrew," and also of one entitled "Acts of Andrew and Matthew" (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Lpz. 1841). See Hammerschmid, Andreas descriptus (Prag, 1699); Hanke, De Andrea apostolo (Lips. 1698); Lemnius, Memoria Andree apostoli (Viteb. 1705); Woog, Presbyterorum et diaconorum Achaie de martyrio S. Andree epistola (Lips. 1749). See ACTS, SPIRITUS; GOSPELS, SPIRITUS.

Andrew, bishop of Caesarea, in Cappadocia, lived at the close of the fifth century (according to others, toward the close of the ninth). See ARETAS. He wrote in the Greek language a commentary on the Apocalypse, which was translated into Latin by Peltanus, and published under the title, Andree, Cæsariæ Cappadociae Episcopi, Commentarii in Johannis Apostoli Apocalypsim (Ingolstadt, 1584, 4to). The original was published, with notes, at Heidelberg, in 1596 (fol.), and again, together with the works of Aretas and others, in 1862, at Paris (S. P. N. Andree Cæsariæ, etc. Opera, 8vo). They also attribute to him a Therapeutica Spirituális, which is to be found in manuscript at the library of Vienna. The work on the Apocalypse, which gives the views of Gregory, Cyril, Papias, Irenæus, Methodius, and Hippolytus, is of some importance for establishing the canonicity of the Apocalypse.—Hoefler, Biog. Gen. ii, 549; Rettig, Ueber Andree und Aretas, in Stud. u. Krit. (1838, p. 748); Lardner, Works, v, 77-79.

Andrew, archbishop of Crain. See ANDREAS.

Andrewes, LANCELOT, bishop of Winchester, was born in London 1555, educated at Merchant-Tailors' School, whence he was removed to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. As divinity lecturer of Pembroke Hall, he delivered, in 1583, his well-known lectures on the Ten Commandments, which were first published in 1642, and a new and complete edition in 1650. He afterward had the living of Alton, in Hampshire; then that of St. Giles'-without, Cripplegate, in London, and was made canon residentiary of St. Paul's, prebendary of Southwell, and master of Pembroke Hall. By King James I he was created, in 1605, bishop of Chichester; then, in 1609, bishop of Ely; and lastly, in 1618, was translated to Winchester, which he held to the day of his death in 1626. His piety, learning, and auteness are well known; and so charitable was he, that in the last six years of his life he is said to have given, in private charity alone, £1360, a very large sum in those days. He translated the authorized version of the historical books of the Old Testament from Joshua to Chronicles. Casaubon, Cluverius, Grotius, Vossius, and other eminent scholars of the time, have all highly eulogized the extensive erudition of Bishop Andrewes, which was wont, it appears, to overflow in his conversation, as well as in his writings. He was also celebrated for his talent at repartee. He united to the purest conscientiousness a considerable degree of courtly address, of which the following anecdote has been preserved as a curious instance. Neale, bishop of Durham, and he, being one day at dinner in the palace, James surprised them by suddenly putting this question, "My lords, cannot I take my subjects' money when I require it, without all the formality of a grant by Parliament?" Bishop Neale immediately replied, "God forbid, sire, but you should. You are the breath of our nostrils." "Well," said James, turning to the bishop of Winchester, "what do you say?" "Sire, I am not qualified to give an opinion in Parliamentary affairs," was the evasive reply. "Come, now, Andrewes, no escape, your opinion immediately," demanded the king. "Then, sire," answered he, "I think it perfectly lawful to take my brother Neale's, for he has offered it."

Bishop Andrewes was indisputably the most learned of his English contemporaries, excepting Usher, in the Fathers, ecclesiastical antiquities, and canon law. He was the head of that school which began to rise in England in the 16th century, which appealed to antiquity and history in defence of the faith of the Church of England in its conflicts with Rome. To express his theological tenets briefly, he was of the school which is generally called the school of Laud, holding the doctrines of apostolic succession, that "the true and real body of Christ is in the Eucharist." He was strongly opposed to the Puritans, who in turn charged him with popery and superstition because of the ornaments of his chapel, and the ceremonies there. He was a man of the most fervent devotion. Five hours every day did he dedicate almost entirely to devotional exercises. Prayer might be said to be the very element he breathed. During the illness that laid him on a bed of languishing and death, his voice was almost constantly heard pouring forth ejaculatory prayers; and when, through failure of strength, he could no longer articulate, his uplifted hands and eyes indicated the channel in which his unexpressed thoughts continued to flow. He died September 25, 1626, at the age of seventy-one. His chief work is his Sermons, ninety-six in all, the best edition of which is that published in the Anglo-Catholic Library (Oxford, 5 vols. 8vo, 1841-43). He also wrote Tortura Torti (Lond. 1609), being an answer to Bellarmine on King James's Book concerning the Oath of Allegiance (Oxford, 1851, 8vo); Preces Private (1648); and lately in English by the Rev. P. Hall, 1839); The Pattern of Catholical Doctrine (Lond. 1650, fol.; Oxf. 1846, 8vo); Posthumous and Orphan Lectures, delivered at St. Paul's and St. Giles' (Lond. 1657, fol.); Opuscula quoddam posthuma (Lond. 1629, 4to; reprinted in Anglo-Catholic Library, Oxford, 1851, 8vo). The Rev. C. Daubery published Seventeen Sermons of Andrews, "modernized for general readers" (Lond. 1821, 8vo). See Isaacson, Life of Bishop Andrews; Cassan, Lives of the Bishops of Winchester (London, 1827); Fuller, Church History of Britain; British Critic, xxxi, 169; Darling, Cyclopædia Bibliographica, i, 78; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 61.

Andrews, Elisha, a Baptist minister, was born at Middletown, Conn., Sept. 29, 1768. He was converted at an early age, and soon resolved to become a Baptist minister. His opportunities of education were limited, but he made the most of them, and was occupied as a teacher and surveyor, with occasional attempts at preaching, until he was ordained as pastor in Fairfax, Va., in 1793. He labored successively in Hopkinton, N. H.; Nottingham West (now Hudson), in the same state; Templeton, Mass., in which region he is still remembered as the "apostle of the Baptists;" Hinsdale, N. H.; the region west of Lake Champlain; Princeton; Leominster; South Gardiner and Royalston. Amid all his labors, his desire for study was irrepresible, and he mastered Greek, Hebrew, and German. In January, 1833, he had an attack of paralysis, and a second in 1834, which disabled him almost wholly. He died Feb. 3, 1840. Mr. Andrews published several essays, tracts, and sermons; also The Moral Tendencies of Universalism (18mo); Review of Winchester on universal Restoration; Vindication of the Baptists (12mo).—Sprague, Annals, vi, 268.

Andrews, Jedediah, the first Presbyterian minister in Pennsylvania, was born at Hingham, Mass., in 1671, graduated at Harvard 1695, and settled in 1698 at Philadelphia, where he was ordained in 1701. In the division of the church in 1744, Mr. Andrews remained with the Old Side. Toward the close of his life he was suspended for immorality, but afterward restored. He died in 1747.—Sprague, Annals, iii, 10.

Andrews, Lorin, LL.D., president of Kenyon College, Ohio, was born in Ashland Co., Ohio, April 1, 1819. He was educated at Kenyon College. On leaving college, he became a teacher, and was engaged in various educational positions of importance until 1861, when he was elected president of Kenyon College. The college was then at its lowest ebb. There were scarcely thirty students, and but a remnant of a faculty. Yet in six years of his administration the number of students grew to 250, the faculty was enlarged, and new buildings added. When the war of the Rebellion broke out in 1861, President Andrews felt it to be his duty to come forward with all his energies and influence in support of the government. He raised a company at Knox County, of which he was made captain; and afterward was elected colonel of the 4th Ohio Regiment. His first post was at Camp Dennison, from whence he was ordered with his regiment to Virginia. After fatiguing service on the field, he was stationed at Oakland, where he remained on duty until the end of August. But the great exposure to which he was subjected, wore so much on his health that he was prostrated with camp fever. He was ordered at once to proceed home, and arrived there only to be placed on the bed from which he never rose. He died at Gambier, September 18, 1861. A large part of his activity had been devoted to the common school system of Ohio; and its present excellence is largely due to his labors. Eminent as a teacher, orator, and college officer, he crowned the glory of an active and faithful life by a patriotic and glorious death for his country.—Episcopal Recorder, Nov. 28, 1861.

Andrew's, St., SEE AND UNIVERSITY OF, county of Fife, Scotland. The legendary story is that "Regulus, a Greek monk of Patrae, in Achaia, warned by a vision, carried with him in a ship the relics of St. Andrew. After long storms the ship was wrecked near the place where the city of St. Andrew's now stands; Regulus and his company escaped, and brought the relics safe to shore. This was in the time of Herogustus, king of the Picts (about the year 370), who erected a church there, afterward called the church of St. Regulus, or St. Rule's church, the ruins of which still remain. Kenneth, 3d king of the Scots († 994), transferred the see of Abernethy to this city, and ordered it to be called the church of St. Andrew, and the bishop thereof was styled Maximus Scotorum Episcopus." The present incumbent of "St. Andrew's, Dunkeld, and Dumblane," is Charles Wordsworth, D.D., consecrated in 1852. The University, the oldest in Scotland, was founded by Bishop Wardlaw in 1410. It consists of the United College of St. Salvador, founded by Bishop Kennedy in 1456, and St. Leonard, founded in 1512; and St. Mary's College, founded by Beaton in 1537. The education in the latter is exclusively theological. The number of chairs in the colleges which constitute the university is 14, and the attendance of late years has been rather less than 200. Here, in the centre of the papal jurisdiction in Scotland, the Reformation first made its appearance; Scotland's proto-martyr, Patrick Hamilton, suffered here in 1527, and George Wishart in 1546, and here John Knox first opened his lips as a preacher of the Reformed faith.—Chambers, Encyclopædia; Landon, Ecol. Dict., i, 358.

Andronicans, followers of a certain Andronicus, who taught the errors of Severus. They believed the upper part of the woman to be the creation of God, and the lower part the work of the devil.—Eriph. Hæres. xlv; Landon, Ecol. Dictionary, s. v.

Andronicus (Ἀνδρόνικος, man-conquering), the name (frequent among the Greeks) of several men in Scripture history.

1. An officer left as viceroy (καὶ ἐξάρχωνος, 2 Macc. iv, 31) in Antioch by Antiochus Epiphanes during his absence (B.C. 171). Menelaus availed himself of the opportunity to secure his good offices by offering him some golden vessels which he had taken from the temple. When Onias III (q. v.) was certainly assured that the sacrifice had been committed, he sharply reproved Menelaus for the crime, having previously taken refuge in the sanctuary of Apollo and Artemis at Daphne. At the instigation of Menelaus, Andronicus induced Onias to leave the sanctuary, and immediately put him to death in prison (παρέκλεισεν, 2 Macc. iv, 34?). This murder excited general indignation; and on the return of Antiochus, Andronicus was publicly degraded and executed (2 Macc. iv, 30-38), B.C. 169. Josephus places the death of Onias before the high-priesthood of Jason (Ant. xii, 5, 1), and omits all mention of Andronicus; but there is not sufficient reason to doubt the truthfulness of the narrative in 2 Macc., as Wernsdorf has done (De fide libr. Macc. p. 90 sq.).—Smith, s. v.

2. Another officer of Antiochus Epiphanes who was left by him on Gerizim (2 Macc. v, 23), probably in occupation of the temple there. As the name was common, it seems unreasonable to identify this general with the former one, and so to introduce a contradiction into the history (Ewald, Gesch. d. Volkes Isr. iv, 335 n.; comp. Grimm, 2 Macc. iv, 38). He was possibly the same with the Andronicus, son of Messalamus, mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xiii, 3, 4) as having convinced Ptolemy (Philometor) of the orthodoxy of the temple at Jerusalem in opposition to that of the Samaritans.

3. A Jewish Christian, the kinsman and fellow-prisoner of Paul, who speaks of him as having been converted to Christianity before himself, and as now enjoying the high regards of the apostles for his usefulness (Rom. xvi, 7), A. D. 55. According to Hippolytus, he became bishop of Pannonia; according to Dorotheus, of Spain. See the treatises of Bose, De Andronico et Junio (Lips. 1742); Orlog, De Romanis quibus Paulus epistolam misit (Hafn. 1722).

Andronicus. See ANDRONICIANS.

Andrus, LUMAN, a pious and devoted Methodist preacher, born in Litchfield, Ct., 1778, and entered the ministry in 1810, laboring effectively in Connecticut and New York until superannuated in 1834. He died in 1852.

Anecdōta (ἀνεκδότα, not given out), a term applied to the unpublished works of ancient writers. Thus Muratori entitles the works of the Greek fathers which he gathered from various libraries, and published for the first time, Anecdota Græca. Martene styles his work of a similar nature Thesaurus Anecdotorum Novus.

A' nem (Heb. Anem', אָנֵם, two fountains; Sept. 'Arāu v. r. Aivāv), a Levitical city with "suburbs," in the tribe of Issachar, assigned to the Gershonites, and mentioned in connection with Ramoth (1 Chron. vi, 73). It is called EN-GANNIM (q. v.) in Josh. xix, 21; xxi, 29.

A'ner (Heb. Aner', אָנֵר, perhaps a boy), the name of a man and of a place.

1. (Sept. Avāv.) A Canaanitish chief in the neighborhood of Hebron, who, with two others, Eshcol and Mamre, joined his forces with those of Abraham in pursuit of Chedorlaomer and his allies, who had pillaged Sodom and carried Lot away captive (Gen. xiv, 13, 24), B. C. cir. 2080. These chiefs did not, however, imitate the disinterested conduct of the patriarch, but retained their portion of the spoil. See ABRAMAM.

2. (Sept. Evāv v. r. 'Arāv.) A city of Manasseh, given to the Levites of Kohath's family (1 Chron. vi, 70). Gesenius supposes this to be the same with the TAAACH (q. v.) of Judg. i, 27, or TANACH (Josh. xxi, 25).

An'ethothite, An'etothite, less correct forms of Anglicizing the word ANATHOTHITE. See ANATHOTH. The variations in the orthography of the name, both in Hebrew and the A. V., should be noticed. 1. The city: In 1 Kings ii, 26, and Jer. xxxii, 9, it is אֲנֶתוֹת, and similarly in 2 Sam. xxiii, 27, with the article; Anathoth. 2. The citizens: Anethothite, 2 Sam. xxiii, 27; Anetothite, 1 Chron. xxvii, 12; Autothite, 1 Chron. xi, 28; xii, 3. "Jeremiah of Anathoth," Jer. xxix, 27, should be "Jeremiah the Anathothite."

Anëthum. See ANISE.

Angareuo (ἀγγαρεύω, to impress; Vulg. angario; Matt. v, 41; Mark xv, 21), translated "compel" (q. v.) in the Auth. Vers., is a word of Persian, or rather of Tatar origin, signifying to compel to serve as an ἀγγαρος or mounted courier (Xenoph. Cyrop. viii, 6, 17 and 18; Athen. iii, 94, 122; Esch. Agam. 282; P.

Pers. 217; Plut. De Alex. p. 326). The word ankarid or ancharid, in Tatar, means compulsory work without pay. Herodotus (viii, 98) describes the system of the ἀγγαρεία. He says that the Persians, in order to make all haste in carrying messages, have relays of men and horses stationed at intervals, who hand the dispatch from one to another without interruption either from weather or darkness, in the same way as the Greeks in their λαμπάκηφορία. This horse-post the Persians called ἀγγαρίων. In order to effect the object, license was given to the couriers by the government to press into the service men, horses, and even vessels (comp. Esth. viii, 14). Hence the word came to signify "press," and ἀγγαρεία is explained by Suidas (Lex. s. v.) as signifying to extort public service. Persian supremacy introduced the practice and the name into Palestine; and Lightfoot (On Matt. v, 41) says the Talmudists used to call any oppressive service אָנְרָוּ (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 131). Among the proposals made by Demetrius Soter to Jonathan the high-priest, one was that the beasts of the Jews should not be taken (ἀγγαρεύουσαι) for the public use (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 2, 3). The system was also adopted by the Romans, and thus the word "angario" came into use in later Latin. Pliny (Ep. x, 14, 121, 122) alludes to the practice of thus expediting public dispatches. Chardin (Travels, p. 257) and other travellers (e. g. Col. Cambell, Trav. pt. ii, p. 92 sq.) make mention of it. The ἀγγαροι were also called αστάνται (Stephens, Thesaur. Gr. p. cccclxxx). The word is also applied to the imposition of our Saviour's cross upon Simon the Cyrenian (Matt. xxvii, 32). See Kuinol, Comment. on Matt. v, 41, and the literature there referred to; Rawlinson's Herodotus, iv, 285.

Angel (ἄγγελος, used in the Sept. and New Test. for the Hebrew אֲנֹכִי, malak'), a word signifying both in Hebrew and Greek a messenger (q. v.), and therefore used to denote whatever God employs to execute his purposes, or to manifest his presence or his power; hence often with the addition of אֲנֹכִי, Schorah, or אֲנֹכִי, E'ohim. In later books the word אֲנֹכִי, kedoshim, holy ones, or ἄγιοι, is used as an equivalent term. In some passages it occurs in the sense of an ordinary messenger (Job i, 14; 1 Sam. xi, 3; Luke vii, 4; ix, 52); in others it is applied to prophets (Isa. xliii, 19; Hag. i, 13; Mal. iii); to priests (Ecd. v, 5; Mal. ii, 7); to ministers of the New Testament (Rev. i, 20). It is also applied to impersonal agents; as to the pillar of cloud (Exod. xiv, 19); to the pestilence (2 Sam. xxiv, 16, 17; 2 Kings xix, 36); to the winds ("who maketh the winds his angels," Psa. civ, 4); so likewise plagues generally are called "evil angels" (Psa. lxxviii, 49), and Paul calls his thorn in the flesh an "angel of Satan" (2 Cor. xii, 7).

But this name is more eminently and distinctly applied to certain spiritual beings or heavenly intelligences, employed by God as the ministers of his will, and usually distinguished as angels of God or angels of Schorah. In this case the name has respect to their official capacity as "messengers," and not to their nature or condition. The term "spirit," on the other hand (in Greek πνεῦμα, in Hebrew אֲנֹכִי), has reference to the nature of angels, and characterizes them as incorporeal and invisible essences. When, therefore, the ancient Jews called angels spirits, they did not mean to deny that they were ended with bodies. When they affirmed that angels were incorporeal, they used the term in the sense in which it was understood by the ancients; that is, free from the impurities of gross matter. This distinction between "a natural body" and "a spiritual body" is indicated by Paul (1 Cor. xv, 44); and we may, with sufficient safety, assume that angels are spiritual bodies, rather than pure spirits in the modern acceptance of the word. (See Ode, De Angelis, Tr. ad Rh. 1739.)

It is disputed whether the term Elohim (q. v.) is ever applied to angels; but in Psa. viii, 5, and xxvii, 7, the word is rendered by angels in the Sept. and other ancient versions; and both these texts are so cited in Heb. i, 6; ii, 7, that they are called Sons of God. But there are many passages in which the expression, the "angel of God," the angel of Jehovah, is certainly used for a manifestation of God himself. This is especially the case in the earlier books of the Old Testament, and may be seen at once by a comparison of Gen. xxii, 11 with 12, and of Exod. iii, 2 with 6 and 14, where He who is called the "angel of God" in one verse is called "God," and even "Jehovah," in those that follow, and accepts the worship due to God alone (contrast Rev. xix, 10; xxi, 9). See also Gen. xvi, 7, 13; xxi, 11, 13; xviii, 15, 16; Num. xxii, 22, 32, 35; and comp. Isa. lxxiii, 9 with Exod. xxxiii, 14, etc., etc. The same expression, it seems, is used by Paul in speaking to heathens (see Acts xxvii, 23; comp. with xxiii, 11). More remarkably, the word "Elohim" is applied in Psa. lxxxii, 6, to those who judge in God's name.

It is to be observed also that, side by side with these expressions, we read of God's being manifested in the form of man; e. g. to Abraham at Mamre (Gen. xviii, 2, 22; comp. xix, 1), to Jacob at Peniel (Gen. xxxii, 24, 30), to Joshua at Gilgal (Josh. v, 13, 15), etc. It is hardly to be doubted that both sets of passages refer to the same kind of manifestation of the Divine Presence. This being the case, since we know that "no man hath seen God" (the Father) "at any time," and that "the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath revealed him" (John i, 18), the inevitable inference is that by the "Angel of the Lord" in such passages is meant He who is from the beginning, the "Word," i. e. the Manifestor or Revealer of God. These appearances are evidently "foreshadowings of the incarnation" (q. v.). By these God the Son manifested himself from time to time in that human nature which he united to the Godhead forever in the virgin's womb. See JEHOVAH.

This conclusion is corroborated by the fact that the phrases used as equivalent to the word "angels" in Scripture, viz., the "sons of God," or even in poetry, the "gods" (Elohim), the "holy ones," etc., are names which, in their full and proper sense, are applicable only to the Lord Jesus Christ. As He is "the Son of God," so also is He the "angel" or "messenger" of the Lord. Accordingly, it is to his incarnation that all angelic ministrations are distinctly referred, as to a central truth, by which alone its nature and meaning can be understood (comp. John i, 51, with Gen. xxviii, 11-17, especially ver. 13). (See an anon. work, Angels, Cherubim, and Gods, Lond. 1861.) See LOGOS.

I. Their Existence and Orders.—In the Scriptures we have frequent notices of spiritual intelligences existing in another state of being, and constituting a celestial family or hierarchy, over which Jehovah presides. The Bible does not, however, treat of this matter professedly and as a doctrine of religion, but merely adverts to it incidentally as a fact, without furnishing any details to gratify curiosity. The practice of the Jews of referring to the agency of angels every manifestation of the greatness and power of God has led some to contend that angels have no real existence, but are mere personifications of unknown powers of nature; and we are reminded that, in like manner, among the Gentiles, whatever was wonderful, or strange, or unaccountable, was referred by them to the agency of some one of their gods. It may be admitted that the passages in which angels are described as speaking and delivering messages might be interpreted of forcible or apparently supernatural suggestions to the mind, but they are sometimes represented as performing acts which are wholly inconsistent with this notion (Gen. xvi, 7, 12; Judg. xiii, 1-21; Matt. xxviii, 2-4); and other passages (e. g. Matt. xxii, 30; Heb. i, 4 sq.) would be without force or meaning if angels had no real existence. (See Winer's Zeitschr. 1827, ii.)

That these superior beings are very numerous is evident from the following expressions: Dan. vii, 10, "thousands of thousands," and "ten thousand times ten thousand;" Matt. xxvii, 53, "more than twelve legions of angels;" Luke ii, 13, "multitude of the heavenly host;" Heb. xii, 22, 23, "myriads of angels." It is probable, from the nature of the case, that among so great a multitude there may be different grades and classes, and even natures—ascending from man toward God, and forming a chain of being to fill up the vast space between the Creator and man, the lowest of his intellectual creatures. Accordingly, the Scripture describes angels as existing in a society composed of members of unequal dignity, power, and excellence, and as having chiefs and rulers. It is admitted that this idea is not clearly expressed in the books composed before the Babylonish captivity; but it is developed in the books written during the exile and afterward, especially in the writings of Daniel and Zechariah. In Zech. i, 11, an angel of the highest order, one who stands before God, appears in contrast with angels of an inferior class, whom he employs as his messengers and agents (comp. iii, 7). In Dan. x, 13, the appellation "one of the chief princes" (אֲנֹכִי הַרְבֵּי), and in xii, 1, "the great prince" (אֲנֹכִי הַגָּדוֹל), are given to Michael. The Grecian Jews rendered this appellation by the term ἀρχαγγέλος, archangel (q. v.), which occurs in the New Test. (Jude 9; 1 Thess. iv, 16). The names of several of them even are given. See GABRIEL, MICHAEL, etc. The opinion, therefore, that there were various orders of angels was not peculiar to the Jews, but was held by Christians in the time of the apostles, and is mentioned by the apostles themselves. The distinct divisions of the angels, according to their rank in the heavenly hierarchy, however, which we find in the writings of the later Jews, were almost or wholly unknown in the apostolical period. The appellations ἀγγέλαι, ἔξουσιαί, ἐνέργειαι, θρόνοι, κριστηριεῖς, are, indeed, applied in Eph. i, 21; Col. i, 16, and elsewhere, to the angels; not, however, to them exclusively, or with the intention of denoting their particular classes; but to them in common with all beings possessed of might and power, visible as well as invisible, on earth as well as in heaven. (See Henke's Magaz. 1795, iii; 1796, vi.) See PRINCIPALITY.

II. Their Nature.—They are termed "spirits" (as in Heb. i, 14), although this word is applied more commonly not so much to themselves as to their power dwelling in man (1 Sam. xviii, 10; Matt. viii, 16, etc. etc.). The word is the same as that used of the soul of man when separate from the body (Matt. xiv, 26; Luke xxiv, 37, 39; 1 Pet. iii, 19); but, since it properly expresses only that supersensuous and rational element of man's nature, which is in him the image of God (see John iv, 24), and by which he has communion with God (Rom. viii, 16); and since, also, we are told that there is a "spiritual body" as well as a "natural (ψυχικόν) body" (1 Cor. xv, 44), it does not assert that the angelic nature is incorporeal. The contrary seems expressly implied by the words in which our Lord declares that, after the Resurrection, men shall be "like the angels" (ἀσάρκατοι) (Luke xx, 36); because (as is elsewhere said, Phil. iii, 21) their bodies, as well as their spirits, shall have been made entirely like His. It may also be noticed that the glorious appearance ascribed to the angels in Scripture (as in Dan. x, 6) is the same as that which shone out in our Lord's Transfiguration, and in which John saw Him clothed in heaven (Rev. i, 14-16); and moreover, that whenever angels have been made manifest to man, it has always been in human form (as in Gen. xviii, xix; Luke xxiv, 4; Acts i, 10, etc. etc.). The very fact that the titles "sons of God" (Job i, 6; xxxviii, 7; Dan. iii, 25, comp. with 28), and "gods" (

(Psa. viii, 5; xcvi, 7), applied to them, are also given to men (see Luke iii, 38; Psa. lxxxiii, 6, and comp. our Lord's application of this last passage in John x, 34-37), points in the same way to a difference only of degree and an identity of kind between the human and the angelic nature. The angels are therefore revealed to us as beings, such as man might be and will be when the power of sin and death is removed, partaking in their measure of the attributes of God, Truth, Purity, and Love, because always beholding His face (Matt. xviii, 10), and therefore being "made like Him" (1 John iii, 2). This, of course, implies finiteness, and therefore (in the strict sense) "imperfection" of nature, and constant progress, both moral and intellectual, through all eternity. Such imperfection, contrasted with the infinity of God, is expressly ascribed to them in Job iv, 18; Matt. xxiv, 36; 1 Pet. i, 12; and it is this which emphatically points them out to us as creatures, fellow-servants of man, and therefore incapable of usurping the place of gods. This finiteness of nature implies capacity of temptation (see Butler's Anal. pt. i, c. 5), and accordingly we hear of "fallen angels." Of the nature of their temptation and the circumstances of their fall we know absolutely nothing. All that is certain is, that they "left their first estate" (την πρώτην ἀρχήν), and that they are now "angels of the devil" (Matt. xxv, 41; Rev. xii, 7, 9), partaking therefore of the falsehood, uncleanness, and hatred, which are his peculiar characteristics (John viii, 44). All that can be conjectured must be based on the analogy of man's own temptation and fall. On the other hand, the title especially assigned to the angels of God, that of the "holy ones" (see Dan. iv, 13, 23; viii, 13; Matt. xxv, 31), is precisely the one which is given to those men who are renewed in Christ's image, but which belongs to them in actuality and in perfection only hereafter. (Comp. Heb. ii, 10; v, 9; xii, 23.) Its use evidently implies that the angelic probation is over, and their crown of glory won.

In the Scriptures angels appear with bodies, and in the human form; and no intimation is anywhere given that these bodies are not real, or that they are only assumed for the time and then laid aside. It was manifest, indeed, to the ancients that the matter of these bodies was not like that of their own, inasmuch as angels could make themselves visible and vanish again from their sight. But this experience would suggest no doubt of the reality of their bodies; it would only intimate that they were not composed of gross matter. After his resurrection, Jesus often appeared to his disciples, and vanished again before them; yet they never doubted that they saw the same body which had been crucified, although they must have perceived that it had undergone an important change. The fact that angels always appeared in the human form does not, indeed, prove that they really have this form, but that the ancient Jews believed so. That which is not pure spirit must have some form or other; and angels may have the human form, but other forms are possible. See CHURCH.

The question as to the food of angels has been very much discussed. If they do eat, we can know nothing of their actual food; for the manna is manifestly called "angels' food" (Psa. lxxviii, 25; Wisd. xvi, 20) merely by way of expressing its excellence. The only real question, therefore, is whether they feed at all or not. We sometimes find angels, in their terrene manifestations, eating and drinking (Gen. xviii, 8; xix, 3); but in Judg. xiii, 15, 16, the angel who appeared to Manoah declined, in a very pointed manner, to accept his hospitality. The manner in which the Jews ovulated the apparent discrepancy, and the sense in which they understood such passages, appear from the apocryphal book of Tobit (xii, 19), where the angel is made to say, "It seems to you, indeed, as though I did eat and drink with you; but I use invisible food which no man can see." This intimates that they were supposed to simulate when they appeared to partake of man's food, but that yet they had food of their own, proper to their natures. Milton, who was deeply read in the "angelic" literature, derides these questions (Par. Lost, v, 433-439). But if angels do not need food; if their spiritual bodies are inherently incapable of waste or death, it seems not likely that they gratuitously perform an act designed, in all its known relations, to promote growth, to repair waste, and to sustain existence.

The passage already referred to in Matt. xxii, 30, teaches by implication that there is no distinction of sex among the angels. The Scripture never makes mention of female angels. The Gentiles had their male and female divinities, who were the parents of other gods, and Gesenius (Theol. Heb. s. v. 72, 12) insists that the "sons of God" spoken of in Gen. vi, 2, as the progenitors of the giants, were angels. But in the Scriptures the angels are all males; and they appear to be so represented, not to mark any distinction of sex, but because the masculine is the more honorable gender. Angels are never described with marks of age, but sometimes with those of youth (Mark xvi, 5). The constant absence of the features of age indicates the continual vigor and freshness of immortality. The angels never die (Luke xx, 36). But no being besides God himself has essential immortality (1 Tim. vi, 16); every other being, therefore, is mortal in itself, and can be immortal only by the will of God. Angels, consequently, are not eternal, but had a beginning. As Moses gives no account of the creation of angels in his description of the origin of the world, although the circumstance would have been too important for omission had it then taken place, there is no doubt that they were called into being before, probably very long before the acts of creation which it was the object of Moses to relate. See SOUS OF GOD.

That they are of superhuman intelligence is implied in Mark xiii, 32: "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, not even the angels in heaven." That their power is great may be gathered from such expressions as "mighty angels" (2 Thess. i, 7); "angels, powerful in strength" (Psa. ciii, 20); "angels who are greater [than man] in power and might." The moral perfection of angels is shown by such phrases as "holy angels" (Luke ix, 26); "the elect angels" (2 Tim. v, 21). Their felicity is beyond question in itself, but is evinced by the passage (Luke xx, 36) in which the blessed in the future world are said to be ἰαγγελοι, και υιοι του θεου, "like unto the angels, and sons of God." (See Timpson, Angels of God, Lond. 1837.)

III. Their Functions.—Of their office in heaven we have, of course, only vague prophetic glimpses (as in 1 Kings xxii, 19; Isa. vi, 1-3; Dan. vii, 9, 10; Rev. vi, 11, etc.), which show us nothing but a never-ceasing adoration, proceeding from the vision of God. Their office toward man is far more fully described to us. (See Whately, Angels, Lond. 1851, Phil. 1856.)

1. They are represented as being, in the widest sense, agents of God's providence, natural and supernatural, to the body and to the soul. Thus the operations of nature are spoken of, as under angelic guidance fulfilling the will of God. Not only is this the case in poetical passages, such as Psa. civ, 4 (commented upon in Heb. i, 7), where the powers of air and fire are referred to them, but in the simplest prose history, as where the pestilences which slew the first-born (Exod. xii, 23; Heb. xi, 28), the disobedient people in the wilderness (1 Cor. x, 10), the Israelites in the days of David (2 Sam. xxiv, 16; 1 Chron. xxi, 16), and the army of Sennacherib (2 Kings xix, 35), as also the plague which cut off Herod (Acts xii, 23), are plainly spoken of as the work of the "Angel of the Lord." Nor can the mysterious declarations of the Apocalypse, by far the most numerous of all, be resolved by honest interpretation into mere poetical imagery. (See especially Rev. viii and ix.) It is evident that angelic agency, like that of man, does not exclude the action of secondary, or (what are called) "natural" causes, or interfere with the directness and universality of the providence of God. The personifications of poetry and legends of mythology are obscure witnesses of its truth, which, however, can rest only on the revelations of Scripture itself.

2. More particularly, however, angels are spoken of as ministers of what is commonly called the "supernatural," or, perhaps, more correctly, the "spiritual" providence of God; as agents in the great scheme of the spiritual redemption and sanctification of man, of which the Bible is the record. The representations of them are different in different books of Scripture, in the Old Testament and in the New; but the reasons of the differences are to be found in the differences of scope attributable to the books themselves. As different parts of God's providence are brought out, so also arise different views of His angelic ministers.

(1.) In the Book of Job, which deals with "Natural Religion," they are spoken of but vaguely, as surrounding God's throne above, and rejoicing in the completion of His creative work (Job i, 6; ii, 1; xxxviii, 7). No direct and visible appearance to man is even hinted at. (See Rawson, Holy Angels, N. Y., 1858.)

(2.) In the Book of Genesis there is no notice of angelic appearances till after the call of Abraham. Then, as the book is the history of the chosen family, so the angels mingle with and watch over its family life, entertained by Abraham and by Lot (Gen. xviii, xix), guiding Abraham's servant to Padan-Aram (xxiv, 7, 40), seen by the fugitive Jacob at Bethel (xxviii, 12), and welcoming his return at Mahanaim (xxxii, 1). Their ministry hallows domestic life, in its trials and its blessings alike, and is closer, more familiar, and less awful than in after times. (Contrast Gen. xviii with Judg. vi, 21, 22; xiii, 16, 22.)

(3.) In the subsequent history, that of a chosen nation, the angels are represented more as ministers of wrath and mercy, messengers of a King, than as common children of the One Father. It is, moreover, to be observed that the records of their appearance belong especially to two periods, that of the judges and that of the captivity, which were transition periods in Israelitish history, the former destitute of direct revelation or prophetic guidance, the latter one of special trial and unusual contact with heathenism. During the lives of Moses and Joshua there is no record of the appearance of created angels, and only obscure references to angels at all. In the Book of Judges angels appear to rebuke idolatry (ii, 1-4), to call Gideon (vi, 11, etc.), and consecrate Samson (xiii, 3, etc.) to the work of deliverance.

(4.) The prophetic office begins with Samuel, and immediately angelic guidance is withheld, except when needed by the prophets themselves (1 Kings xix, 3; 2 Kings vi, 17). During the prophetic and kingly period angels are spoken of only (as noticed above) as ministers of God in the operations of nature. But in the captivity, when the Jews were in the presence of foreign nations, each claiming its tutelary deity, then to the prophets Daniel and Zechariah angels are revealed in a fresh light, as watching, not only over Jerusalem, but also over heathen kingdoms, under the providence, and to work out the designs, of the Lord. (See Zech. passim, and Dan. iv, 13, 23; x, 10, 13, 20, 21, etc.) In the whole period they, as truly as the prophets and kings, are God's ministers, watching over the national life of the subjects of the Great King. (See Heigel, De angelis fœderis, Jen. 1660.)

(5.) The Incarnation marks a new epoch of angelic ministrations. "The Angel of Jehovah," the Lord of all created angels, having now descended from heaven to earth, it was natural that His servants should continue to do Him service here. Whether to predict and glorify His birth itself (Matt. i, 20; Luke i, ii, to minister to Him after His temptation and agony (Matt. iv, 11; Luke xxii, 43), or to declare His resurrection and triumphant ascension (Matt. xxviii, 2; John xx, 12; Acts i, 10, 11), they seem now to be indeed "ascending and descending on the Son of Man," almost as though transferring to earth the ministrations of heaven. It is clearly seen that whatever was done by them for men in earlier days was but typical of and flowing from their service to Him. (See Psa. xci, 11; comp. Matt. iv, 6.)

(6.) The New Testament is the history of the Church of Christ, every member of which is united to Him. Accordingly, the angels are revealed now as "ministering spirits" to each individual member of Christ for his spiritual guidance and aid (Heb. i, 14). The records of their visible appearance are but infrequent (Acts v, 19; viii, 26; x, 3; xii, 7; xxvii, 23); yet their presence and their aid are referred to familiarly, almost as things of course, ever after the Incarnation. They are spoken of as watching over Christ's little ones (Matt. xviii, 10), as rejoicing over a penitent sinner (Luke xv, 10), as present in the worship of Christians (1 Cor. xi, 10), and (perhaps) bringing their prayers before God (Rev. viii, 3, 4), and as bearing the souls of the redeemed into paradise (Luke xvi, 22). In one word, they are Christ's ministers of grace now, as they shall be of judgment hereafter (Matt. xiii, 39, 41, 49; xvi, 27; xxiv, 31, etc.). By what method they act we cannot know of ourselves, nor are we told, perhaps lest we should worship them instead of Him, whose servants they are (see Col. ii, 18; Rev. xxii, 9); but, of course, their agency, like that of human ministers, depends for its efficacy on the aid of the Holy Spirit.

The ministry of angels, therefore, a doctrine implied in their very name, is evident, from certain actions which are ascribed wholly to them (Matt. xiii, 41, 49; xxiv, 31; Luke xvi, 22), and from the scriptural narratives of other events, in the accomplishment of which they acted a visible part (Luke i, 11, 26; ii, 9 sq.; Acts v, 19, 20; x, 3, 19; xii, 7; xxvii, 23), principally in the guidance of the destinies of man. In those cases also in which the agency is concealed from our view we may admit the probability of its existence, because we are told that God sends them forth "to minister to those who shall be heirs of salvation" (Heb. i, 14; also Psa. xxxiv, 8, 91; Matt. xviii, 10). But the angels, when employed for our welfare, do not act independently, but as the instruments of God, and by His command (Psa. ciii, 20; civ, 4; Heb. i, 13, 14): not unto them, therefore, are our confidence and adoration due, but only to him (Rev. xix, 10; xxii, 9) whom the angels themselves reverently worship. (See Mostyn, Ministry of Angels, Lond. 1841.)

3. Guardian Angels.—It was a favorite opinion of the Christian fathers that every individual is under the care of a particular angel, who is assigned to him as a guardian. See GUARDIAN ANGEL. They spoke also of two angels, the one good, the other evil, whom they conceived to be attendant on each individual: the good angel prompting to all good, and averting ill, and the evil angel prompting to all ill, and averting good (Hermes, ii, 6). See ABADDON. The Jews (excepting the Sadducees) entertained this belief, as do the Moslems. The heathen held it in a modified form—the Greeks having their tutelary dæmon (q. v.), and the Romans their genius. There is, however, nothing to support this notion in the Bible. The passages (Psa. xxxiv, 7; Matt. xviii, 10) usually referred to in support of it have assuredly no such meaning. The former, divested of its poetical shape, simply denotes that God employs the ministry of angels to deliver his people from affliction and danger; and the celebrated passage in Matthew cannot well mean any thing more than that the infant children of believers, or, if preferable, the least among the disciples of Christ, whom the ministers of the Church might be disposed to neglect from their apparent insignificance, are in such estimation elsewhere that the angels do not think it below their dignity to minister to them.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v. See SATAN.

IV. Literature.—For the Jewish speculations on Angelology, see Eisenmenger, Entdecktes Judenthum, ii, 370 sq.; the Christian views on the subject may be found in Storr and Flatt's Lehrbuch der Chr. Dogmatik, § xlviii; Scriptural views respecting them are given in the American Biblical Repository, xii, 356-368; in the Bibliotheca Sacra, i, 766 sq.; ii, 108 sq.; on the ministry of angels, see *Journal Sac. Angela, MERICI, better known as Angela of Brescia, founder of the order of the Ursulines, was born in 1511, at Dezenzano. She entered a Franciscan convent, and made a journey to the Holy Land. On her return, in 1537, she assembled at Brescia a company of women, to whom she gave the name of St. Ursula, whom she made the patron of the order. During her lifetime they lived each in the house of her parents; but after her death, which happened Mar. 21, 1540, the Ursulines began to live together. Paul III approved the institution in 1544. So rapid was the growth of the order, that within a century there were 350 convents in France alone.—London, Eccl. Dict. i, 318; Helyot, Ord. Monastiques, iv, 150. See URSULINES.

Angelic Hymn, the hymn or doxology (q. v.) Gloria in Excelsis, beginning with "Glory be to God on high," etc. It is so called from the former part of it having been sung by the angels to announce the birth of the Redeemer. The Greek original, as restored by Bunsen from the Cod. Alex., is given in his Analeceta Antenicana, iii, 87; also in Procter, On Common Prayer, p. 351.—See Palmer, Orig. Liturg. iv, § 23; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. lxiv, ch. ii, § 2. See GLORIA.

Angelici, a heretical sect of the 3d century, supposed to have gained the appellation in consequence of their worship of angels. The practice was initiated in the time of Chrysostom, and called forth his animadversions in his Homilies on the Colossians; and the Council of Laodicea enacted a severe canon accompanied with the denunciation of anathema to restrain it. That council says, "Christians ought not to forsake the Church of God, and go aside, and hold conventicles to invoke or call upon the names of angels; which things are forbidden. If any one, therefore, be found to exercise himself in this private idolatry, let him be accursed, because he hath forsaken our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and gone over to idolatry."—Epiphanius, Har. 60; Lardner, Works, ii, 602.

Angelis (or ANGELI DEGLI), GIROLAMO, a Jesuit born at Castro Giovanni, in Sicily, in 1567, died Dec. 4, 1623. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1585, and prepared himself for the Eastern missions. He embarked in 1596, and, after a long navigation, was cast upon the coast of Brazil, where he was seized by pirates and brought to England. Having from thence returned to Portugal, he was, in 1602, sent to Japan, in which country he labored as a missionary until the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1614. With the permission of his superiors, Angelis put on a Japanese dress, and remained on the island of Niphon for nine more years. He is said to have been the first European who visited the neighboring islands. In Jeddo he is said to have converted ten thousand natives to Christianity. Ultimately he was arrested, imprisoned, and burned alive, with ninety of his converts, after a stay in Japan of twenty-two years. A work on Jeddo (Relazione del regno di Yezo), which was published at Rome in 1625, is attributed to him.—Hoefer, Biog. Generale, ii, 646.

Angelites, a sect in the reign of the Emperor Anastasius, about the year 494, so called from Angelium, a place in the city of Alexandria, where they held their first meetings. They held that the persons of the Trinity are not the same; that neither of them exists of himself, and of his own nature; but that there is a common God or Deity existing in them all, and that each is God by a participation of this Deity.—Buck, Theol. Dict. s. v. See SABELLIANS.

Angelo, ROCCA, of the order of St. Augustine, educated at Rome, Venice, Perugia, and Padua. Pope Sixtus V employed him to superintend the printing of the Bible, Councils, and Fathers; and to his care the Augustines of Rome owe "the Bibliotheca Angelica," the "Library of the Vatican," that "of Theology and Holy Scripture," etc. He died at Rome, April 7, 1620.—London, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Angelus, a prayer to the Virgin, commonly said in the Roman Church three times a day, viz., in the morning, at noon, and in the evening, when the bell is sounded thrice, three strokes each time. Pope John XXII instituted this office in 1316, and several popes have granted indulgences to those who say the Angelus on their knees.—London, Eccl. Dict. i, 370.

Angelus, CHRISTOPHER, a Greek scholar, born in the Peloponnesus about the middle of the 16th century, died Feb. 1, 1638. Being compelled by the Turks to leave his country, he fled to England, where he was enabled by the support of the bishop of Norwich and of several members of the clergy to study at the universities of Cambridge and Oxford. He was subsequently appointed teacher of Greek in Baliol College, Oxford, which position he retained until his death. He published an account of his flight from Greece (Oxford, 1619, in Greek and in English); a work on the Greek religion (Euchiridion de Institutis Grecis, Cambridge, 1619, in Greek and Latin); Encomium on the Kingdom of Great Britain (Cambridge, 1619); De Apos Anger (usually ἄγῆ, aph, àpḡh), the emotion of instant displeasure, which arises from the feeling of injury done, or the discovery of injury intended, or, in many cases, from the discovery of the omission of good offices to which we supposed ourselves entitled; or, it is simply the emotion of displeasure itself, independent of its cause or its consequences. "Like most other emotions, it is accompanied by effects on the body, and in this case they are of a very marked kind. The arterial blood-vessels are highly excited; the pulse, during the paroxysm, is strong and hard, the face becomes red and swollen, the brow wrinkled, the eyes protrude, the whole body is put into commotion. The secretion of bile is excessive, and it seems to assume a morbid consistency. In cases of violent passion, and especially in nervous persons, this excitement of the organs soon passes to the other extreme of depression; generally, this does not take place till the anger has subsided, when there follows a period of general relaxation. The original tendency to anger differs much in individuals according to temperament; but frequent giving way to it begets a habit, and increases the natural tendency. From the nature of anger, it is easy to see that it must be—often at least—prejudicial to health. It frequently gives rise to bile-fever, inflammation of the liver, heart, or brain, or even to mania. These effects follow immediately a fit of the passion; other evil effects come on, after a time, as the consequence of repeated paroxysms, such as paralysis, jaundice, consumption, and nervous fever. The milk of a mother or nurse in a fit of passion will cause convulsions in the child that sucks; it has been known even to occasion instant death, like a strong poison. The controlling of anger is a part of moral discipline. In a rudimentary state of society, its active exercise would seem to be a necessity; by imposing some restraint on the selfish aggressions of one individual upon another, it renders the beginnings of social co-operation and intercourse possible. This is its use, or, as it is sometimes called, its final cause. But the more social intercourse comes to be regulated by customs and laws, the less need is there for the vindictive expression of anger. It seems an error, however, to suppose that the emotion ever will be—or that it ought to be—extirpated. Laws themselves lose their efficacy when they have not this feeling for a background; and it remains as a last resource for man, when society—as it does every now and then—resolves itself into its elements. Even in the most artificial and refined states of society, those minor moralities on which half the happiness of social intercourse depends, are imposed upon the selfish, in great measure, by that latent fund of anger which every man is known to carry about with him."—Chambers, Encyclopædia, s. v.

Anger is not evil per se. The mind is formed to be angry as well as to love. Both are original susceptibilities of our nature. If anger were in itself sinful, how could God himself be angry? How could He, who was separate from sin and sinners, have looked round upon men with anger? An essentially immoral character cannot attach to it if it be the mere emotion of displeasure on the infliction of any evil upon us. Anger may be sinful, when it arises too soon, without reflection, when the injury which awakens it is only apparent, and was designed to do good. The disposition which becomes speedily angry we call passionate. When it is disproportionate to the offence; when it is transferred from the guilty to the innocent; when it is too long protracted. It then becomes revengeful (Eph. iv, 26; Matt. v, 22; Col. iii, 8). When anger, hatred, wrath, are ascribed to God, they denote his holy and just displeasure with sin and sinners. In him they are principles arising out of his holy and just nature, and are, therefore, steady and uniform, and more terrible than if mere emotions or passions. See Paley, Mor. Phil. ch. vii, vol. i; Secker, Sermons, serm. xxviii; Fawcett, Essay on Anger; Seed, Posth. Serm. II; Buck, Dict. s. v.

Angers (ANDEGAVENSE), a town in France, where the following councils were held: 453, for celibacy; 1055, against Berengar, archdeacon of Angers, for heresy; 1062, on the same subject; 1279, where four canons were made for the regulation of the clergy; 1366, on discipline; 1448, for reforms.—Smith, Tables of Church Hist.; Landon, Manual of Councils.

Angilbert, St., a noble Frank, first councillor of the Italian King Pepin and of Charlemagne. He is said to have been married to Bertha, the daughter of Charlemagne, but to have retired in 790, with the consent of his wife, to the convent of Centule (now St. Riquier). In 794 he became abbot of this convent, and died Feb. 18, 814. He is the author of a history of the abbey of Centule and of several poetical works, and was surnamed the Homer of his times. See Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 18; Ceillier, Anteurs sacris, vol. xviii.

Angilram, bishop of Metz from 768 to 791, also abbot of the monastery Senones, and arch-chaplain of Charlemagne. After 789 he bore the title archbishop as a personal distinction. His name is celebrated in the history of the Canon Law by a collection of laws respecting legal proceedings against bishops, called Capitula Angilrami. According to some Codd. they were presented by Angilram to Pope Adrian, but, according to others, presented by Adrian to Angilram. They are generally regarded as spurious (see Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i, 501; and Herzog, s. v. Angilram), and as extracts from the Pseudo-Decretals; but their authenticity has been defended by Wasserschleben, Beiträge zur Geschichte der falschen Decretalen.—Hase, Church History, p. 185. See DECRETALS.

Anglican Church, another name of the Established Church of England. The phrase "Anglican Churches" is coming into general use as the collective title of the Established Church of England and Ireland, the Scottish Episcopal Church, the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, and the missionary churches established by any of these three bodies. The Churchman's Calendar for 1865 gives the following synoptical view of the Anglican Churches: 1. England, 2 archbishops, 26 bishops; 2. Ireland, 2 archbishops, 10 bishops; 3. Scotland, 8 bishops; 4. Mediterranean, 1 bishop; 5. United States, 38 bishops; 6. British America, 9 bishops; 7. West Indies, 6 bishops; 8. Asia, 8 bishops; 9. Africa, 8 bishops; 10. Oceania, 14 bishops. See ENGLAND, CHURCH OF.

Angling, the art of taking fish with a hook and line. The word חַקְקָה, chakkah', which the Auth. Vers. renders "angle" in Isa. xix, 8; Hab. i, 15, is the same that is rendered "hook" in Job xli, 1, 12. The Scriptures contain several allusions to this mode of taking fish. The first of these occurs as early as the time of Job: "Canst thou draw out leviathan with an hook; or his tongue [y]pdate, which is usually pierced by the hook] with a cord [line], which thou lettest down? Canst thou put a hook into his nose, or bore his jaw through with a thorn?" (Job xli, 1, 2). This last phrase obviously refers to the thorns which were sometimes used as hooks, and which are long after mentioned as the thorns of fishing (Amos iv, 2), in the Auth. Vers. "fish-hooks." Of the various passages relating to this subject, the most remarkable is that which records, as an important part of the "burden of Egypt," that "the fishers also shall mourn; and all they that cast eagle [the hook] into the brooks shall lament, and they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish" (Isa. xix, 8). In this poetical description of a part of the calamities which were to befall Egypt, we are furnished with an account of the various modes of fishing practised in that country, which is in exact conformity with the scenes depicted in the old tombs of Egypt. See FISU. Angling appears to have been regarded chiefly as an amusement, in which the Egyptians of all ranks found much enjoyment. The Egyptian hooks were of bronze, as appears from the specimens that have been found. Insects, natural or artificial, were not used in angling, ground bait being exclusively employed; and the float does not appear to have been known (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, iii, 54). The fish caught in the lake of Tiberias were, some time since, taken exclusively with the rod and line, in the absence of boats upon that water; and probably this is the case still. An instance of this occurs in the case of Peter, who was directed by Christ in this manner to procure a miraculous supply of money to pay the temple tax (Matt. xvii, 27).—Kitto, s. v. See HOOK.

Anglo-Saxon Versions of the Holy Scriptures. No translation of the entire Bible was made into the language of the Anglo-Saxons; although the substance of the Bible history was fragmentarily thrown into verse by the bards, especially Cædmon (Metrical Paraphrase of Parts of the Holy Scriptures in Anglo-Saxon, with an English translation, notes, etc. by Benjamin Thorpe, Lond 1832, 8vo). See AUTHORIZED VERSION. At an early period, however, glosses, or interlineary translations of the Vulgate into the vernacular tongue of our ancestors, began to be made by the monks. Some of these are still extant. The oldest is the celebrated Durham Book, preserved among the Cotton MSS. in the British Museum. The Latin text of this MS. was written by Eadfrith, bishop of the Church of Holy Isle, some time before the year 688; it received many decorations from the combined skill of Bi-hop Ethilwold and Billfrith the anchorite, and it was finally glossed over into English (of glossale on English) by Aldred, who describes himself as “Presbyter indignus et miserimus,” and ascribes his success to “Godes fultume & Sei Cuthberhtes.” The work existed first in four separate volumes, but these were at an early period collected into one. The date of Aldred’s gloss is supposed to be before A.D. 900. The next of these versions is the Rushworth Gloss of the Gospels, preserved in the Bodleian Library at Oxford; it closely resembles the Durham book in form, arrangement, and style of execution, and is regarded as of almost equal antiquity with it. Its authors were Farnen and Owen, priests at Harewood, and the Latin text was written by one Maeregol. Another Anglo-Saxon translation of the gospels is extant, the author of which is unknown; it is believed to have been executed near the time of the Norman conquest, and bears traces of having been made from one of the ante-hieronymian Latin versions. A translation of the Heptateuch, or first seven books of the Bible, was made by Ælfric, archbishop of Canterbury, who died in 1006; and there is in the Cottonian Collection a MS. of a translation of the Book of Job, also ascribed to him. Of the same date is a gloss on the Proverbs by an unknown author, also among the Cotton MSS. Of the Psalter an interlineary translation was made at a very early period (about 706) by Adhelm, bishop of Sherborn, but of this no

MS. remains. It is reported that King Alfred was also engaged at the time of his death on a translation of the Psalms (William of Malmsbury, De Gest. Reg. Angl. p. 44, E. T. p. 121, ed. Bohn), and other parts of the Bible are said also to have been translated by him. There are other versions of the Psalms in Anglo-Saxon extant in MS. An edition of the Four Gospels was printed at London in 1571, in 4to, with an English translation; it was edited by Archbishop Parker, with a preface by John Fox, the archyriologist. This edition was reprinted by Dr. Marshall, with improvements from the collation of several MSS. by Fr. Junius, Jr. (Dort, 1665, 4to; reissued with a new title-page, Amst. 1684). The best edition of the Gospels is that of Thorpe (London, 1842, 12mo). Ælfric's Heptateuch and Job were published by Thwaites (Oxford, 1699, 8vo). Two editions of the Anglo-Saxon Psalter have been issued: the former by Spelman (London, 1640, 4to); the latter by Thorpe (Oxford, 1835, 4to). Mill made use of the Anglo-Saxon versions for critical purposes in his edition of the Greek Testament. Critics are divided as to their value in this respect. Tischendorf has, however, made use of them in his edition (see his Prolegomena, p. 253, ed. 1859). — Kitto, s. v. See VERSIONS (OF THE BIBLE).

Anglus, THOMAS, a Roman Catholic theologian of the 17th century, was born in England. He was for some time principal of the English College at Lisbon, and assistant principal of the English College at Douai. He lived for a long time at Rome and Paris, defended the peripatetic philosophy against Descartes, tried to develop the theological doctrines of freedom and grace from Aristotelian principles, and was involved in a controversy with the Molinists (q. v.) and the Jansenists. He wrote a number of mystical books, most of which have been put into the Index. His principal works are: De mundo (Paris, 1642); Institutiones peripateticæ (Lyons, 1646); Institutiones theologice (1652). He assumed sometimes the names Candidus, Albius, Bianchi, and Richworth, but his true name seems to have been White. — Biog. Britannica, s. v.; Bayle.

Angola, a country on the western coast of Africa. It was discovered in 1482 by the Portuguese, who soon after began to form settlements on the river Congo and at various points south of that river. They still have a number of forts and commercial establishments at different places, in some instances extending many hundreds of miles into the interior, where the Portuguese colonists and natives meet for the purpose of trading. The Portuguese claim dominion over a population of about 360,000 souls. Toward the middle of the 16th century the diocese of Angola was established, and a large number of the inhabitants nominally received into the Roman Catholic Church; but with the decline of the Portuguese, also the hold which the church had of the native population became weaker. A large portion of them, however, are desirous to be regarded as members of the Roman Catholic Church, although in 1857 there were only six priests for all Angola. The Roman Catholic population may be estimated at about 100,000 souls. — Schem, Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859, p. 21. See AFRICA.

Anhalt, the name of a German duchy. At the beginning of the present century there were three duchies of Anhalt, denominated Anhalt-Dessau, Anhalt-Bernburg, and Anhalt-Koethen. The line of the reigning family in Anhalt-Koethen became extinct in 1847, and that of Anhalt-Bernburg in 1863, and thus the whole of Anhalt was united under one prince. The area of Anhalt is 1017 square miles. The population amounted, in 1864, to 193,046, of whom about 2000 are Roman Catholics and an equal number Jews; the remainder belong to the Protestant State Church, which has superintendents at Dessau and Bernburg, and about 150 ministers. Anhalt was one of the first German states which joined the Reformation, and several dukes distinguished themselves in the defence of German Protestantism. Until 1590 Lutheranism prevailed in the whole country, but in that year the controversies arising from the Formula of Concord (q. v.) induced the princes, with a large number of the clergy, to go over to the Reformed Church. How large a proportion of the people followed this example has not yet been established. The "Union" (between the Lutherans and Reformed) was introduced into Bernburg in 1820, into Dessau and Koethen in 1827. Since 1855 the governments of the duchies issued several decrees, which again bind the clergymen more strictly to the symbolical books of the two denominations. See GERMANY.

A'niám (Heb. Aniám', אַנְיָאָם, sighing of the people; Sept. Ἀνάμ v. r. Ἀνάμ), the last named of the four sons of Shemidai, of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii, 19). B. C. post 1856.

Aniánus, a native of Campania and ardent adherent of Pelagius, whose cause he defended at the council of Diospolis in 415. He wrote a work, Contra Epistolam Hieronymi ad Ctesiphontem, which is lost, and translated the homilies of Chrysostom on the Gospel of Matthew. According to the testimony of Richard Simon, Huët, and Casaubon, he was one of the ablest translators of the ancient church. His translation of Chrysostom is reprinted in the Benedictine edition. — Dupin, Ecl. Writers, vol. iii.

Anicētus, a bishop of Rome, followed Pius I about 157, and is called a martyr in the Roman and other martyrologies, although it is not certain whether he shed his blood for the faith. He received, about 160, a visit from Polycarp, and tolerated the custom of the Asiatics in celebrating Easter on the fourteenth day of the first moon after the vernal equinox with the Jews. He had to combat the heretics Valentine and Marcion, and died 168. He is commemorated as a saint by the Roman Church on April 17. — Butler, Lives of the Saints, April 17.

A'nim (Heb. Anim', אַנִּים, fountains; comp. Anon; Sept. Ἀέμ v. r. Ἀεάμ), a city in the mountains of the tribe of Judah, mentioned between Eshtemoah and Goshen (Josh. xv, 50), in the district southwest of Hebron (Keil, Comment. in loc.). Eusebius and Jerome appear to call it Anaa (Ἀραία), and state that it was wholly inhabited by Jews, lying 9 Roman miles south of Hebron, near another village (with which the name likewise closely agrees) called Ansem (Ἀνσημ), wholly inhabited by Christians (Onomast. s. v. Ἀράμ, Anab). Schwarz (Palest. p. 105) says it is the modern village Ben-Euim, 2 English miles E. N. E. of Hebron, meaning probably Beit-Anim; but this is in a different direction, and is probably the ancient Bethanath (q. v.). Van de Velde (Memoir. p. 285), although apparently wrong in thinking it may be the Levitical Ain (Josh. xxi, 16), is probably correct in agreeing with the identification by Wilson (Lands of Bible, i, 354; ii, 636) with the village Ghuwein, one hour south of Semoa, on the road from Hebron to Moladah; but unnecessarily supposes the Ain mentioned along with Rimmon (q. v.) in the "south" (Josh. xv, 32), and apportioned to Simeon (Josh. xix, 7), to have been a different one, as he is thus obliged to do. See AIN.

Anima Mundi, "the soul of the world," according to some philosophical systems, a soul-substance penetrating the entire world in a similar way as the human soul penetrates the body. Whether the Pythagoreans assumed a particular anima mundi is not certain; but Plato regards the existence of the cosmos as essentially mediated through the anima mundi. To him it is a product of the architect of the world, of the highest reason, as a connecting link between pure reason and the sensuous, which gives measure and order to the latter. Aristotle did not assume a particular anima mundi. With the Stoics, the conception of it coincides with that of a primitive divine power producing every thing from itself. With Plotin and the Neo-Platonists the anima mundi is not an immediate product of the highest primitive unit, but emanates from it through the voûg (reason). Plotin sometimes distinguished between a higher anima mundi, which is a being absolutely non-sensuous and separated from the corporeal world, and a lower anima mundi, which is connected with the bodies of the universe in a similar manner as the individual soul is connected with its body. The origin of this philosophical opinion must be sought in the desire to find between the primitive cause of all things and the phenomenal world connecting links which are to make the origin of the latter from the former more easily comprehensible. Christianity, which derives the origin of the world from an immediate creative act of God, rejects altogether the notion of a particular anima mundi.—Pierer, xix, 89. See PANTHEISM.

Animal (designated by various Heb. terms, rendered "creature," "living thing," "cattle," etc.), an organized living body, endowed with sensation. See BEAST. The Hebrews distinguished animals into pure and impure, clean and unclean; or those which might be eaten and offered, and those whose use was prohibited. The sacrifices which they offered were: (a.) of the beeve kind, a cow, bull, or calf. The ox could not be offered, because it was mutilated. Where it is said in our version oxen were sacrificed, we are to understand bulls (Exod. xx, 24). (b.) Of the goat kind, a he-goat, a she-goat, or kid (Levit. xxii, 21). (c.) Of the sheep kind, a ewe, ram, or lamb. When it is said sheep are offered, rams are chiefly meant, especially in burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sins. See SACRIFICE. Besides these three sorts of animals used in sacrifices, many others might be eaten, wild or tame. All that have not cloven hoofs, and do not chew the cud, were esteemed impure, and could neither be offered nor eaten. See CLEAN. Commentators on the Scriptures are much divided with relation to the legal purity or impurity of animals. It would appear that this distinction obtained before the Flood, since God commanded Noah (Gen. vii, 2) to carry seven couples of clean animals into the ark and two of unclean. See FOOD. The following is a complete list of all the Biblical animals, both clean and unclean (many of them named in Deut. xiv; Lev. xi), exclusive of BIRDS, FISHES, INSECTS, and REPTILES (all which see in their order), arranged under their true English names (with the Hebrew or Greek term in italics), so far as these have been discovered. (See Kinniburgh, Scriptural Animals, Edinb. 1852; Anonymous, Scriptural Quadrupeds, Lond. 1858). Compare ZOOLOGY.

WORSHIP OF ANIMALS.—The reasons of the choice of animals consecrated to receive worship among the Egyptians, the great practisers of this superstition, are now involved in much obscurity; some are probably connected with the beasts themselves, some with astronomical allegories, and some, perhaps, with now lost historical facts. tians, abridgm. i, 245 sq.) See IDOLATRY. The ox, the sheep, and the ichnenmon were held in almost general veneration; the cat and the asp had their distinguishing homage; and the Egyptian custom of selecting some in preference to others, as the objects of veneration by different cities, extended to other countries, and was adopted by the Lemnians and Thessalians.

ans. The bloody wars occasioned by the variety of homage paid to animals, such as that caused by the inhabitants of Cynopolis eating the oxyrinchus, and the Oxyrinchians the dog, prove how fiercely the superstition was cherished. Herodotus says that the hippopotamus was sacred only in the Papemitic Nome, and he adds the eel and water-snake to the list of hallowed fishes, and the fox-goose to that of hallowed birds. Sacred serpents were kept at Thebes, and in the mysteries and many other pagan rites they were pre-eminently conspicuous. "The cats," Herodotus observes, "when dead, are carried to sacred buildings, and, after being embalmed, are buried in the city Bubastis. Dogs and ichneumons are buried wherever they happen to die. The shrew-mouse and the hawk are removed to Butos; the ibis to Hermonopolis; bears and wolves are buried in whatever place they die, but not, like the dogs, in consecrated chests" (Herod. ii, 65-67). The solar deities of the Egyptians are usually represented with the head of a hawk. In the procession at Dendera, several of these hawk-headed divinities appear with an ornament upon the head, composed of the circle, and a serpent with an inflated neck, or, as it is usually termed, a basilisk. The worship of the serpent appears to have been at an early period almost universal, which may be accounted for by considering that reptile as the earliest type of the solar influence, which in later times gave place to other emblems, possibly on account of the venomous properties of the creature, which rendered it an unsuitable representation of that from which it was supposed all good proceeded. See WORSHIP. Lands were set apart for the support of the sacred animals; men and women were employed in feeding and maintaining them. If a person killed any of these creatures designedly, he was punished with death; if involuntarily, his punishment, in some cases, was referred to the priest; but if the animal killed were either a cat, a hawk, or an ibis, and that whether by design or not, the culprit was to die, without mercy, and the enraged multitude seldom waited even for the formalities of a trial. A Roman, in the time of one of the Ptolemies, who killed a cat accidentally, was torn in pieces by the populace on the spot, in spite of all the efforts of the king's guard to save him. When any of these animals died, great lamentation was made, and vast sums expended on their funeral. We are told that in the beginning of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, the bull Apis dying, his keeper expended more than fifty talents of silver, or £13,000, on his interment (see Wilkinson's Anc. Eg. i, 226 sq.). The Israelites often debased themselves by an imitation of this demonolatry, for which they were severely punished by God, because it was one grand design of the Mosaic law to keep their theology free from these gross appendages. See APIS; CAT; CROCODILE; IBIS; ICHEUMON; SERPENT; SATYR, etc.

Animâles (animals), an opprobrious epithet bestowed by the Origenites on persons who differed from them in opinion as to the resurrection of the body. The doctrine of the Origenites was that men would have spiritual bodies in the next world; and they ridiculed others who maintained that the same body, altered in quality but not in substance, would be raised. They gave them the opprobrious names of simplices and philosophes, idiots and lovers of the flesh; carnei, animales, juncti, carnal, sensual, animals; luti, earthly; pilositor, from pilus, hair, because it was asserted that the body would rise perfect in all its parts.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. i, ch. iii; Farrar, s.v.

Anise (ἄνησον, anethum) occurs in Matt. xxiii, 23, "Woe unto you—for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin." By the Greek and Roman writers it was employed to designate a plant used both medicinally and as an article of diet (Pliny, xix, 61; xx, 74; Apicius, vi, 5, 9). The Arabian translators of the Greek medical authors give as its synonyme shabî, the name applied in Eastern countries to an umbelliferous plant with flattened fruit commonly called "seed," which is surrounded with a dilated margin. In Europe the word has always been used to denote a similar plant, which is familiarly known by the name of dill. Hence there is no doubt that, in the above passage, instead of "anise," ἄνησον should have been translated "dill;" and it is said to be rendered by a synonymous word in every version except our own.

The common dill, or Anethum graveolens, is an annual plant, growing wild among the corn in Spain and Anethum Graveolens.

Portugal; and on the coast of Italy, in Egypt, and about Astrachan. It resembles fennel, but is smaller, has more glaucous leaves, and a less pleasant smell; the fruit or seeds, which are finely divided by capillary segments, are elliptical, broader, flatter, and surrounded with a membranous disk. They have a warm and aromatic taste, owing to the presence of a pale yellow volatile oil, which itself has a hot taste and a peculiar penetrating odor. The error in translation pointed out above is not of very great consequence, as both the anise and the dill are umbelliferous plants, which are found cultivated in the south of Europe. The seeds of both are employed as condiments and carminatives, and have been so from very early times; but the anethum is more especially a genus of Eastern cultivation, since either the dill or another species is reared in all the countries from Syria to India, and known by the name shabî; while the anise, though known, appears to be so only by its Greek name ἀνκλιον. In the Talmudical tract Masseroth (of Tithes), iv, 5, we read, "The seed, the leaves, and the stem of dill (דליל, shobath) are, according to Rabbi Eliezer, subject to tithing" (comp. Gemara, Abodt Sara, i, 2), which indicates that the herb was eaten, as is indeed the case with the Eastern species in the present day; and, therefore, to those acquainted with the cultivated plants of Eastern countries, the dill will appear more appropriate than anise in the above passage (see Celsii Hierobot. i, 494 sq.). See DILL.

The proper anise (Gr. ἀνισον) is the Pimpinella anisum of Linnaeus, an Eastern annual umbelliferous plant, the seeds of which are principally employed in the manufacture of cordials or liqueurs, and as a remedy against flatulence. Indeed all these kinds of plants, like the common fennel, possess a warming medicinal property. See AROMATICS.

There is another plant very dissimilar in external character to the two named above, the leaves and capsules of which are powerfully carminative. This is the "star anise," or anised-tree (Illicium anisatum), which belongs to the natural order Magnoliaceae. In China this is frequently used for seasoning dishes, etc.; but the species of this genus are not natives of the Bible lands, and must not be confused with the umbelliferous plants noticed in this article. See BOTANY.

Anklet. This word does not occur in Scripture, but the ornament which it denotes is clearly indicated by "the tinkling (or jingling) ornaments (צפצפים, e'kes) about the feet" mentioned in the curious description of female attire which we find in Isa. iii. See ATTIRE. Even in the absence of special notice, we might very safely conclude that an ornament to which the Oriental women have always been so partial (Thomson's Land and Book, i, 182) was not unknown to the Jewish ladies. The Egyptian monuments represent them as worn by men likewise (Wilkinson, iii, 375). The figures below represent different styles of anklets, as found on the Egyptian monuments, and in use at present (particularly by females) among the Egyptians, Persians, Arabs, and Hindoos. Anklets of solid gold or silver are worn by some ladies, but are more uncommon than they formerly were. They are, of course, very heavy, and knocking together as the wearer walks, make a ringing noise; hence it is said in a song, "The ringing of thy anklets has deprived me of reason" (Lane's Mod. Egyptians, ii, 410). This practice, nevertheless, is forbidden in the Koran (xxiv, 31). This prohibition, however, perhaps rather refers (see Chardin, i, 133, 148, 194) to the small bells used by females, especially dancing girls, around the ankles (Lane, ib. ii, 368). To increase this pleasant sound, pebbles were sometimes enclosed in them (Calmet, s. v. Perisecelides, Bells). Tertullian discommenances them (De cult. femm. ii, 13). They were sometimes of great value, but the poorer village children wear them of iron. For their use among the ancient Egyptians, see Wilkinson, iii, 374, and among the ancient Greeks and Romans, Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Perisecelis. They do not, we believe, occur in the Nineveh sculptures. Livingstone writes of the favorite wife of an African chief, "She wore a profusion of iron rings on her ankles, to which were attached little pieces of sheet iron to enable her to make a tinkling as she walked in her mincing African style" (p. 273). On the weight and inconvenience of the copper rings worn by the chiefs themselves, and the odd walk it causes them to adopt, see id. p. 276. See BRACELET.

An'na (Ἄννα, the Greek form of the name Hannah [q. v.]; it also occurs in the cognate Punic as that of the sister of Dido, Virgil, Æn. iv, 9), the name of two women.

1. The wife of Tobit, whose history is contained in the apocryphal book that bears his name (Tob. i, 9 sq.).

2. An aged widow, daughter of Phanael, of the tribe of Asher. She had married early, but after seven years her husband died, and during her long widowhood she daily attended the morning and evening services of the temple. Anna was eighty-four years old when the infant Jesus was brought to the temple by his mother, and, entering as Simeon pronounced his thanksgiving, she also broke forth in praise to God for the fulfilment of his ancient promises (Luke ii, 26, 37), B.C. 6. See Mayer, De Anna prophetissa vidua (Gryph. 1706).

Anna, St., the name, according to tradition, of the mother of the Virgin Mary, and wife of Joachim. The names of Anna and Joachim are not found in Holy Scripture, but are gathered from the fathers. According to a legend, her body was brought, in 710, from Jerusalem to Constantinople, and from that time many churches of Europe pretended to possess some relic of it. Her festival is kept in the Greek Church July 25th, in the Roman, July 26th.—Butler, Lives of Saints, iii, 212; comp. Binerus, De Joachimo, Anna et Josepho (Antw. 1638); Goetze, De cultu Anne (Lips. 1702); Willisch, *Ehemal. An'naäs (Σαράακ), a man whose posterity (or a place whose residents) returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 23); evidently the SENAAN (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 35).

An'nas (Ἄννας, probably a contracted form of the name Ananiah in its Greek form, Ἄννανος), a high-priest of the Jews mentioned in Luke (iii, 2) as being high-priest along with Caiaphas his son-in-law. Our Lord's first hearing (John xviii, 13) was before Annas, who then sent him bound to Caiaphas. In Acts iv, 6, he is plainly called the high-priest, and Caiaphas merely named with others of his family. He is called by Josephus Ananus (q. v.) the son of Seth; and was first appointed to that office in his 37th year by Quirinus, procurator of Syria, about A.D. 7 (Ant. xviii, 2, 1), but was afterward deprived of it by Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judæa (A.D. 14), who gave the office first to Ismael the son of Phabaus, and a short time after to Eleazar the son of Annas (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 2, 1 and 2). He held the office one year, and was then succeeded by Simon the son of Camithus, who, after another year, was followed by Joseph, also called Caiaphas, the son-in-law of Annas, A.D. ante 27, who continued in office until A.D. 37. In the passages of the New Testament above cited, therefore, it is apparent that Caiaphas was the only actual and proper high-priest; but Annas, being his father-in-law, and having been formerly himself high-priest, and being also perhaps his substitute (aggon), had great influence and authority, and could with great propriety be still termed high-priest along with Cai-phas. (See Anger, De temp. p. 185; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 744 sq.; Rus, Harmon. Erang. i, 313 sq.; III, ii, 962 sq.; Vitringa, Obserr. Sacr. vi, 529 sq.; Casaubon, Ezere. antihar. p. 216 sq.; Wieseler, Chronol. Synops. p. 186 sq.; Selden, De Suedriis, ii, 655; Saubert, De Sacerdotio Ebreor. i, 5; Kuinöl, Comment. on Luke iii, 2.) See HIGH-PRIEST. He died at an advanced age, and was succeeded by his first son in the sacerdotal dignity (Josephus, Ant. xx, 9, 1).

An' nas (Ανάη v. r. Ἀναή) likewise occurs in the Apocrypha (Vulg. Nuus) as one of the Israelites who had married Gentile wives after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 32); evidently a corruption for the HARM (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 31).

Annâtes, or First-fruits, in the ecclesiastical law, means the value of every spiritual living for a whole year (hence the name, from the Latin word annus, a year), which the pope, claiming the disposition of every spiritual benefice within Christendom, reserved out of every living. This impost was at first only levied from persons appointed to bishoprics; but it was afterward extended to the inferior clergy. The value of these annates was calculated according to a rate made under the direction of Pope Innocent IV (A. D. 1253), but which was afterward increased by Pope Nicholas III (A. D. 1292). This papal exaction was abolished in England by the act 25 Henry VIII, c. 20, and by an act passed in the following year of the same reign, 26 Henry VIII, c. 3, the right to annates, or first-fruits, was annexed to the crown. The various statutes subsequently passed on this subject have all been consolidated by an act (the 1 Vict. c. 20) regulating the collection of the money so levied.—Gieseler, Ch. Hist. iii, 54-63. See FIRST-FRUIITS; QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY.

Annesley, SAMUEL, D. D., maternal grandfather of John Wesley, was one of the leading non-conformist divines of his day, and a man of good family, being a nephew of the earl of Anglesea. He was born near Warwick in 1620, and educated at Oxford, where, like his grandson, he was noted for his piety and diligence. He served the national church as chaplain at sea, and as parish priest at Cliff, in Kent, at St. John the Apostle's and at St. Giles's, two of the largest congregations in London. He refused to "conform" to the "Act of Uniformity," and endured a series of severe persecutions, which were attended by many of those "remarkable interpositions" that distinguish the later history of the family. One of his persecutors fell dead while preparing a warrant for his apprehension. He became a leader of the Puritans during the troubles of the times, preaching almost daily, providing pastors for destitute congregations, and relief for his ejected and impoverished brethren. After a ministry of more than half a century, and of sore trials, under which he never once faltered, he died in 1696, exclaiming, "I shall be satisfied with thy likeness; satisfied, satisfied." De Foe, who sat under his preaching, has drawn his character as perfect, in an elegy. The non-conformists considered him a second St. Paul. Richard Baxter pronounced him totally devoted to God (Clarke, Wesley Family, p. 298). He was endeared to all who knew him intimately; and his noble relative, the countess of Anglesea, desired, on her death-bed, to be buried in his grave. He had a manly countenance and dignified person; a rich estate, which he devoted to charity; robust health, which was capable of any fatigue. Calamy (Non-conformist's Memorial, vol. i) calls him an Israelite indeed.—Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, i, 35; Crowther, Portraiture of Methodism, p. 3.

Annihilation, the act of reducing any thing to nothing. Whether matter can be utterly destroyed or not, is a question that has been much agitated in the schools. According to some, nothing is so difficult; according to others, nothing is so easy. Existence, say the last, is a state of violence; all things are continually endeavoring to return to their primitive nothing; no power is required to effect it; it would be accomplished of itself; nay more, an infinite power is required to prevent it. As to human beings, the majority of the Greek philosophers opposed the doctrine; the Brahmins held that at stated intervals all created things are annihilated; the Siamese held annihilation to be the greatest reward of virtue (Buck, Theol. Dictionary, s. v.). The theory of the annihilation of the ánwá has been set on foot at different periods, and has recently been revived. See ANNIHILATIONISTS.

Annihilationists, a name given to the holders of the theory that the wicked will not be kept in eternal misery, but will suffer a total extinction of being. See ANNIHILATION.

1. There are only a few traces of this doctrine in early church history. Some are disposed to find the first hint of it in Justin (Dialog. cum Tryphon. c. 5), where it is said that the souls of the wicked should be punished as long as ἕως ἂν ἀβύσσος καὶ ἕως καὶ κόλασησται ὁ Θεὸς θέλει (as long as God wishes them to exist and to be punished). Similar expressions are used by Irenæus (ii, 34; Quod dicitur ea Deus et esse et perseverare voluerit), and Clem. Rom. iii, 3. In clearer terms the doctrine was propounded by Ariobius (q. v.) at the beginning of the 4th century. See HELL.

2. The theory of annihilation was maintained in the last century in England by a few writers of inferior note, as Samuel Bourne (Sermons), J. N. Scott, and others. They took the name of Destructionists, assuming the point in dispute, viz., that the word destruction in Scripture means annihilation. Their proper designation is "Annihilationists." Among the more eminent supporters of this doctrine was Taylor of Norwich (q. v.); and Macknight is also claimed as among its advocates. Jonathan Edwards, in his answer to Dr. Chauncey, on the salvation of all men, says that this scheme was provisionally retained by Dr. Chauncey, i. e. in case the scheme of universal salvation should fail him; and Edwards, in his examination of that work, appropriates a chapter to the consideration of it. Among other reasonings against it are the following: "1. The different degrees of punishment which the wicked will suffer according to their works, proves that it does not consist in annihilation, which admits of no degrees. 2. If it be said that the punishment of the wicked, though it will end in annihilation, yet shall be preceded by torment, and that this will be of different degrees, according to the degrees of sin, it may be replied, this is making it to be compounded partly of torment and partly of annihilation. The latter also appears to be but a small part of future punishment, for that alone will be inflicted on the least sinner, and on account of the least sin; and that all punishment which will be inflicted on any person above that which is due to the least sin is to consist in torment. Nay, if we can form any idea in the present state of what would be dreadful or desirable in another, instead of its being any punishment to be annihilated after a long series of torment, it must be a deliverance, to which the sinner would look forward with anxious desire. And is it credible that this was the termination of torment that our Lord held up to his disciples as an object of dread? Can this be the destruction of body and soul in hell? Is it credible that everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, should constitute only a part, and a small part, of future punishment; and such too as, after a series of torment, must, next to being made happy, be the most acceptable thing that could befall them? Can this be the object threatened by such language, as recompensing tribulation, and taking vengeance in flaming fire? (2 Thess. I). Is it possible that God should threaten them with putting an end to their miseries? Moreover, this destruction is not described as the conclusion of a succession of torments, but as taking place immediately after the last judgment. When Christ shall come to be glorified in his saints then shall the wicked be destroyed. 3. Everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, cannot mean annihilation, for that would be no exertion of divine power, but merely the suspension of it; for let the upholding power of God be withheld for one moment, and the whole creation would sink into nothing. 4. The punishment of wicked men will be the same as that of wicked angels (Matt. xxv, 41): Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. But the punishment of wicked angels consists not in annihilation, but torment. Such is their present punishment in a degree, and such, in a greater degree, will be their punishment hereafter. They are 'cast down to hell;' they 'believe, and tremble;' they are reserved in chains under darkness to the judgment of the great day; they cried, saying, 'What have we to do with thee? Art thou come to torment us before our time?' Could the devils but persuade themselves they should be annihilated, they would believe, and be at ease rather than tremble. 5. The Scriptures explain their own meaning in the use of such terms as death, destruction, etc. The second death is expressly said to consist in being cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, and as having a part in that lake (Rev. xx, 14; xxi, 8), which does not describe annihilation, nor can it be made to consist with it. The phrase cut him asunder (Matt. xxiv, 51) is as strong as those of death or destruction; yet that is made to consist of having their portion with hypocrites, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. 6. The happiness of the righteous does not consist in eternal being, but eternal well-being; and as the punishment of the wicked stands everywhere opposed to it, it must consist, not in the loss of being, but of well-being, and in suffering the contrary." Bishop Law (+ 1789) maintained that spiritual death is an entire destruction—an annihilation of the soul, with the resolution of the body into its original dust (Theory of Religion, 7th ed. p. 339-351). The name of Archbishop Whately is probably to be enrolled among the modern supporters of annihilationism in England. In his work on the future state (A View of the Scripture Revelations concerning a Future State, Philad. 1855) he argues the opinion fully. He says, that in the passages in which the words "death," "destruction," "eternal death," are spoken of, these words may be taken as signifying literal death, real destruction, an utter end of things. The "unquenchable fire" may mean that fire which utterly consumes what it is burning upon. The "worm that dieth not" may be that which entirely devours what it feeds upon. "Everlasting perdition" may mean that perishing from which the soul cannot be saved, but it will be final annihilating. The passage "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death," affords, according to Whately, some ground for thinking that there may be a "final extinction of evil and suffering by the total destruction of such as are incapable of good and happiness. If eternal death means final death—death without any revival—we can understand what is meant by death being destroyed, viz., that none henceforth are to be subjected to it" (p. 184). And Whately concludes this scriptural argument by this sentence: "On the whole, therefore, I think we are not warranted in concluding, as some have done so positively concerning the question, as to make it a point of Christian faith to interpret figuratively the 'death and destruction' spoken of in the Scriptures as the doom of the condemned, and to insist on the belief that they are to be left alive forevermore."

3. The revival of annihilationism in this country seems to have begun with the publication of Six Sermons on the Question "Are the wicked immortal?" by George Storrs, answered by Prof. Post, in the New Englander, Feb. and May, 1856. One of the most respectable advocates of the doctrine, and a very moderate one, is Dr. McCulloh, of Baltimore, in his Analytical Investigations concerning the Scriptures (Baltimore, 1852, 2 vols. 8vo). He maintains that after the final decisions of the judgment, the wicked will be utterly destroyed by a dreadful visitation of Almighty wrath. The ablest work produced on the side of destructionism is Hudson, Debt and Grace, as related to the Doctrine of a Future State (Boston, 1857, 12mo). This work "denies that the natural immortality of the soul is ever expressed or even implied in the Bible. On the contrary, life and immortality are brought in fulness by the Redeemer to the redeemed alone; while all others are not only naturally mortal, soul and body, at death, but, after that mortal suspension of positive existence, are raised at the final resurrection and cast into the lake of fire as the second death. It denies that endless conscious suffering is ever affirmed to be the nature of future penalty; but affirms that the penalty consists in privation, and in its perpetuity consists the eternity of future punishment. The class of Scripture terms by which eternal misery is usually understood to be designated, such as condemnation, damnation, perdition, destruction, the writer understands to express the painful and penal consignment of the entire nature to the disorganization and complete non-existence from which it sprang" (Meth. Quar. Rev. Jan. 1858, p. 149). An exhaustive reply to Mr. Hudson, and a thorough examination of the whole controversy, is given by Landis in his treatise On the Immortality of the Soul and the final Condition of the Wicked (N. Y. 1859, 12mo). The subject is also ably treated by Mattison in his work, The Immortality of the Soul (Philad. 1861). See also Alvah Hovey, State of Impenitent Dead (1859); J. R. Annus, or JOHN NANXI, born July 7, at Viterbo, in 1432. Having entered the order of Dominicans, he became a proficient in the Latin, Greek, and Oriental languages, and in theology. He published two works, entitled, 1. Tractatus de Imperio Turcarum; and 2. De Futuris Christianorum triumphis, etc. (Genoa, 1480, 4to), in which he endeavors to show that Mahomet was the Antichrist of the Apocalypse. But the work by which he is chiefly known is his seventeen books of Antiquities (Rome, 1498, fol.), in which he pretended to give the works of Berossus, Marsylus of Lesbos, Caton, Sempronius, Archilochus, Xenophon, Metasthenes or Megasthenes, Manetho, and others. These writings were the cause of a dispute among the learned at the time, some, as Pineda, Louis Viveza, the Spaniard, Vossius, Melchior Canus, and others, maintained the utter falsity of all these pieces, and declared Annus to be a sheer impostor; while others, who had among them such men as Nauderius, Leander Albert, Sixtus of Siena, Alph. Maldonatus, etc., declared themselves in his favor. Annus was master of the palace for Alexander VI, and was, it is supposed, poisoned by Caesar Borgia, whom he had offended. He died Nov. 13, 1502.—Hoefler, Biog. Générale, ii, 720; Landon, Ecl. Dict. s. v.

Anniversary, in the Greek and Romish Churches, a name given to the day on which a martyr or saint is commemorated. Also, those days on which special prayer is made, year by year, for the souls of deceased persons, and masses said and alms distributed, are in the Romish Church called anniversaries. The anniversary office (officium anniversarium) is a double office, said only on the first anniversary day after the death. On all succeeding anniversary days, the simple office is said, as in the daily office for the dead.—Landon, Ecl. Dict. s. v.

Anno or Hanno (St.), archbishop of Cologne in the 11th century. Belonging to the Suabian family of Sonneberg, he was at first devoted to a military life; but, after a short career of arms, he entered the church. The emperor Henry III, the Black, appointed him to the see of Cologne upon the death of archbishop Hermann in 1055. He applied himself with diligence to his duties, both temporal and spiritual. He reformed many of the monasteries of his diocese, and built five or six others, among the latter the abbey of Sieberg. After the death of Henry III the empress made him regent. His zeal for the church outran his discretion, especially in the excessive energy with which he seconded the measures of Gregory VII (q. v.). The emperor Henry IV, though his pupil, was so dissatisfied with his conduct that he drove him from his see. He died December 4th, 1075, on which day he is commemorated.—Hoefer, Now. Biographie Générale, ii, 730; Baillet, Vies des Saints, December 4.

Annual Conference, the name of the territorial synods or councils of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which are held every year, as distinguished from the general synod (General Conference) held quadrennially. The Annual Conference is composed of all the ministers in full connection within certain territorial limits. Preachers "on trial" are required to attend the sessions, but are not allowed to vote. The times of holding the Annual Conferences are fixed by the bishops, the place by the Conference itself. The presiding officer is the bishop; but, in case of his absence, some "member of the Conference appointed by the bishop shall preside; but if no appointment be made, the Conference elects a president by ballot among the elders, without debate." The duties of the Annual Conference, and the limits of its authority, are prescribed by the Discipline. A record of its proceedings is sent to each General Conference for revision, if necessary. The territorial boundaries of the Annual Conferences are fixed by the General Conference. There are now (1866) sixty annual conferences (including mission conferences) of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, Europe, Africa, India, and China.—Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, pt. ii, ch. i.; pt. vi, ch. iv; Baker, On the Discipline; Minutes of the Annual Conferences (New York, 1866, 8vo). See CONFERENCES; METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Annulus, a ring. The clergy do not appear to have worn any badge of office until the fourth century; but subsequently various insignia or emblems of office were appropriated. The ring is now given to Romish bishops on their investiture, as emblematical of the bishop's espousals to the Church, in imitation of the ancient ceremony of presenting a ring in marriage. It was called "the ring of his espousals," annulus sponsalitiuus, or annulus pronubus; but sometimes, also, annulus patris. The pope wears a ring with the device of Peter fishing; and papal briefs, stamped with this seal, are said to be given sub annulo piscatorio. The fisher-ring has been used for this purpose since the 13th century.

Annunciad or Annunciada, ORDER OF, a military order, founded by Amedeus, count of Savoy, in 1350 or 1360, called at first the order of the knots of love, because of a hair bracelet, formed in love-knots, given to the count by a lady. Amedeus VIII, duke of Savoy (created Pope Felix III at the council of Basle), in 1494, changed the name of the order to that of the Annunciad. The figure of the Virgin was appended to the collar, in which the love-knots were changed into a pattern in twisted cord, and which bore the initials F. E. R. T., supposed to mean Fortitudo ejus Rhodum tenuit, in reference to the valiant defence of Rhodes by Amedeus the Great in 1310. The cloak of the knights was first red, afterward blue, and now of the color of amaranth, lined with cloth of silver. It still exists in Sardinia as an order of merit.—Helyot, Ordres Religieux, i, 224; Burke, Orders of Knighthood, p. 350.

Annunciade, the name of two orders of nuns.

1. That founded at Bourges in 1500, by Jeanne, queen of France, after her divorce from Louis XII. These nuns also call themselves the nuns of the ten virtues, viz., the virtues exhibited, as they say, in the mysteries which the Roman Church commemorates in the ten festivals of the Virgin Mary. Their rule is formed upon the idea of an initiation of these virtues. They wear a gray habit, a red scapulary, a cross of gold or silver, suspended from the neck, and a ring of one of those metals on the finger. At the Revolution they had 45 nunneries in France and Holland, all of which were suppressed.—Helyot, Ordres Relig. i, 227.

2. Another order of nuns, otherwise called CELESTINES (Celestes or Celestine), from the girdle and mantle of sky-blue which they wear over their white habit. A Genoese widow, named Maria Victoria Fornari, instituted this order in 1602 or 1604. The constitution of the order, approved by Clement VII, enjoins poverty and separation from the world. They are allowed to speak to persons out of their house only six times a year, and then only to their nearest relatives. In 1860 they had three nunneries in Italy, six in Belgium, and five in France. In Rome they are called Turchine (i. e. the "violet-blue" ones).—Helyot, Ordres Religieux, i, 236; P. Carl vom heil. Aloys, Statistisches Jahrbuch der Kirche (Regensburg, 1860).

Annunciation, FEAST OF THE (from the Lat. annuntiatio, announcement), a festival observed in honor of the tidings which the angel Gabriel brought to the Virgin Mary of the incarnation of our Saviour. It is called by various names in church history, e. g. Ἡμερα ἀναγγελίας, "the day of salutation;" Χαρισμός, in reference to the epithet κεχαρισμένη, employed by the angel (Luke i, 28); also Ἐναγγελισμός, with reference to the subject of the announcement. Some doubt exists as to the date of its establishment. Augusti is of opinion that the festival was celebrated at the time of the council of Laodicea, cir. 364. In the homily ascribed to Athanasius it is called one of our Lord's festivals. After the fifth century, in consequence of what passed during the Nestorian controversies, this festival was referred to Mary, and its observance fixed for the 25th of March, on which day it is now celebrated by the Greek, Roman, and English Churches. It seems to have been generally observed in the sixth century, but the first formal mention that we meet with of its being commemorated among the festivals of the Church is in the decrees of the council of Trullo, convened at the close of the seventh century. Chrysostom, and Bernard after him, call it Annu'us (Ἄννουος, Vulg. Amin), given (1 Esdr. viii, 48) as the name of one of the Levites sent to accompany the captives returning from Babylon; but it is evidently an error of the translator for אֲנִי, avitto', "and with him," of the original text (Ezra viii, 19).

Anoint (usually ἁλείωσις, mashach', χρίω). The practice of anointing with perfumed oils or ointments appears to have been very common among the Hebrews, as it was among the ancient Egyptians. See UNGUENT. The practice, as to its essential meaning, still remains in the East; but perfumed waters are now far more commonly employed than oils or ointments (q. v.). See PERFUME. It is from this source that the usage has extended to other regions. Among the Greeks and Romans oil was employed as a lubricator for suppling the bodies of the athletes in the games (q. v.), and also after the bath (q. v.).

I. In the Scriptures several kinds of anointing are distinguishable (Scacchi, Myrotheca, iii, Rom. 1637).

1. Consecration and Inauguration.—The act of anointing appears to have been viewed as emblematical of a particular sanctification, of a designation to the service of God, or to a holy and sacred use. Hence the anointing of the high-priests (Exod. xxix, 29; Lev. iv, 3), and even of the sacred vessels of the tabernacle (Exod. xxx, 26, etc.); and hence also, probably, the anointing of the king, who, as "the Lord's anointed," and, under the Hebrew constitution, the viceroy of Jehovah, was undoubtedly invested with a sacred character. This was the case also among the Egyptians, among whom the king was, ex officio, the high-priest, and as such, doubtless, rather than in his secular capacity, was solemnly anointed at his inauguration. See UNCTIONS (of Christ).

As the custom of inaugural anointing first occurs among the Israelites immediately after they left Egypt, and no example of the same kind is met with previously, it is fair to conclude that the practice and the notions connected with it were acquired in that country. With the Egyptians, as with the Jews, the investiture to any sacred office, as that of king or priest, was confirmed by this external sign; and as the Jewish lawgiver mentions the ceremony of pouring oil upon the head of the high-priest after he had put on his entire dress, with the mitre and crown, the Egyptians represent the anointing of their priests and kings after they were attired in their full robes, with the cap and crown upon their heads. Some of the sculptures introduce a priest pouring oil over the monarch (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, iv, 280). It is from this that the high-priest, as well as the king, is called "the anointed" (Lev. iv, 3; v, 16; vi, 15; Psa. cxxxiii, 2). In fact, anointing being the principal ceremony of regal inauguration among the Jews, as crowning is with us, "anointed," as applied to a king, has much the same signification as "crowned." It does not, however, appear that this anointing was repeated at every succession, the anointing of the founder of the dynasty being considered efficient for its purpose as long as the regular line of descent was undisturbed (Jahn, Bibl. Archæol. § 223); hence we find no instance of unction as a sign of investiture in the royal authority, except in the case of Saul, the first king of the Jews, and of David, the first of his line; and, subsequently, in those of Solomon, Joash, and Jehu, who ascended the throne under circumstances in which there was danger that their right might be forcibly disputed (1 Sam. xix, 24; 2 Sam. ii, 4; v, 1-3; 1 Chron. xi, 1, 2; 2 Kings xi, 12-20; 2 Chron. xxiii, 1-21). Those who were inducted into the royal office in the kingdom of Israel appear to have been inaugurated with some peculiar ceremonies (2 Kings ix, 13). But it is not clear that they were anointed at all; and the omission (if real) is ascribed by the Jewish writers to the want of the holy anointing oil which could alone be used on such occasions, and which was in the keeping of the priests of the temple in Jerusalem. The private anointing which was performed by the prophets (2 Kings ix, 3; comp. 1 Sam. x, 1) was not understood to convey any abstract right to the crown, but was merely a symbolical intimation that the person thus anointed should eventually ascend the throne.

The following species of official anointing appear to have prevailed among the Jews: (a.) Prophets were occasionally anointed to their office (1 Kings xix, 16), and are called messiahs, or anointed (1 Chron. xvi, 22; Psa. cv, 15). (b.) Priests, at the first institution of the Levitical priesthood, were all anointed to their offices, the sons of Aaron as well as Aaron himself (Exod. xl, 15; Num. iii, 3); but afterward anointing seems not to have been repeated at the consecration of ordinary priests, but to have been especially reserved for the high-priest (Exod. xxix, 29; Lev. xvi, 32); so that "the priest that is anointed" (הַכֹּהֵן הַמְשֻׁחַ, Lev. iv, 3) is generally thought to mean the high-priest (Sept. ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς ὁ κεκοσμημένος; comp. verses 5, 16, and c. vi, 22 [15]). (c.) Kings. The Jews were familiar with the idea of making a king by anointing before the establishment of their own monarchy (Judg. ix, 8, 15). Anointing was the divinely-appointed ceremony in the inauguration of their own kings (1 Sam. ix, 16; x, 1; 1 Kings i, 34, 39); indeed, so pre-eminently did it belong to the kingly office, that "the Lord's anointed" was a common designation of the theocratic king (1 Sam. xii, 3, 5; 2 Sam. i, 14, 16). The rite was sometimes performed more than once. David was thrice anointed to be king; first, privately by Samuel, before the death of Saul, by way of conferring on him a right to the throne (1 Sam. xvi, 1, 13); again over Judah at Hebron (2 Sam. ii, 4), and finally over the whole nation (2 Sam. v, 3). After the separation into two kingdoms, the kings both of Judah and of Israel seem still to have been anointed (2 Kings ix, 3; xi, 12). So late as the time of the captivity the king is called "the anointed of the Lord" (Psa. lxxxix, 38, 51; Lam. iv, 20). Besides Jewish kings, we read that Hazael was to be anointed king over Syria (1 Kings xix, 15). Cyrus also is called the Lord's anointed, as having been raised by God to the throne for the special purpose of delivering the Jews out of captivity (Isa. xlv, 1). (d.) Inanimate objects also were anointed with oil in token of their being set apart for religious service. Thus Jacob anointed a pillar at Bethel (Gen. xxxi, 13); and, at the introduction of the Mosaic economy, the tabernacle and all its furniture were consecrated by anointing (Exod. xxx, 26-28). The expression "anoint the shield" (Isa. xxi, 5; Sept. ἐπιμαίετε θυρεούς; Vulg. arripite clypeum) refers to the custom of rubbing oil into the hide which, stretched upon a frame, formed the shield, in order to make it supple and fit for use. (See the treatises in Latin, on the priestly anointing, by Clasing [Lengon. 1717]; Schwarz [Viteb. 1755]; Ziegler [Viteb. 1682]; Zoega [Lips. 1680]; on the royal anointing, by Weymar [Jen. 1629]; and among other nations, by Eschenbach [Jen. 1687]; Speckner [Viteb. 1716].)

2. As an Act of Hospitality.—The anointing of our Saviour's feet by "the woman who was a sinner" (Luke vii, 38) led to the remark that the host himself had neglected to anoint his head (ver. 46); whence we learn that this was a mark of attention which those who gave entertainments paid to their guests. As this is the only direct mention of the custom, the Jews are supposed by some to have borrowed it from the Romans at a late period, and Wetstein and others have brought a large quantity of Latin erudition to bear on the subject. (See the treatises, on this instance, in Latin, by Baier [Aldorf. 1722]; Goetze [Lips. 1687]; and in Menesthii Thesaur. ii, 200-204; Jaeschke [Lips. 1700]; Krackewitz [Rost. 1703]; Polchow [Jen. 1755]; Ries [Marb. 1727]; Sonnuel [Lond. 1775, 1794]; Trautermann [Jen. 1749].) But the careful reader of the O. T. knows that the custom was an old one, to which there are various indirect allusions. See HOSPITALITY. The circumstances connected with feasts and entertainments are, indeed, rarely intimated; nor would the present direct reference to this custom have transpired but for the remarks which the act of the woman in anointing the feet of Jesus called forth. (See Walde, De unctionibus Vett. Ebraeorum conrivalibus, Jen. 1751.) Such passages, however, as Psa. xxiii, 5; Prov. xxi, 7; xxvii, 9; Wisd. ii, 7; as well as others in which the enjoyments of oil and wine are coupled together, may be regarded as containing a similar allusion. It is, therefore, safer to refer the origin of this custom among the Hebrews to their nearer and more ancient neighbors, the Egyptians, than to the Romans or the Greeks, who themselves had probably derived it from the same people. Among the Egyptians the antiquity of the custom is evinced by their monuments, which offer in this respect analogies more exact than classical antiquity or modern usage can produce. With them "the custom of anointing was not confined to the appointment of kings and priests to the sacred offices they held. It was the ordinary token of welcome to guests in every party at the house of a friend; and in Egypt, no less than in Judæa, the metaphorical expression 'anointed with the oil of gladness' was fully understood, and applied to the ordinary occurrences of life. It was customary for a servant to attend every guest as he seated himself, and to anoint his head" (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, iv, 279; ii, 213). See SPIKENARD. It is probable, however, that the Egyptians, as well as the Greeks and Jews, anointed themselves at home, before going abroad, although they expected the observance of this etiquette on the part of their entertainer. That the Jews thus anointed themselves, not only when paying a visit, but on ordinary occasions, is shown by many passages, especially those which describe the omission of it as a sign of mourning (Deut. xxviii, 40; Ruth iii, 3; 2 Sam. xiv, 2; Dan. x, 3; Amos vi, 6; Mic. vi, 15; Esth. ii, 12; Psa. civ, 15; Isa. lxi, 3; Eccles. ix, 8; Cant. i, 3; iv, 10; also Judith x, 3; Sus. 17; Eccles. xxxix, 26; Wisd. ii, 7). One of these passages (Psa. civ, 15, "oil that maketh the face to shine") shows very clearly that not only the hair but the skin was anointed. In our northern climates this custom may not strike us as a pleasant one; but as the peculiar usages of most nations are found, on strict examination, to be in accordance with the peculiarities of their climate and condition, we may be assured that this Oriental predilection for external unction must have arisen from a belief that it contributed materially to health and cleanliness. Niebuhr states that "in Yemen the anointing of the body is believed to strengthen and protect it from the heat of the sun, by which the inhabitants of this province, as they wear but little clothing, are very liable to suffer. Oil, by closing up the pores of the skin, is supposed to prevent that too copious transpiration which enfeebles the frame; perhaps, too, these Arabians think a glistening skin a beauty. When the intense heat comes on they always anoint their bodies with oil." See OIL.

3. Anointing the Sick.—The Orientals are indeed strongly persuaded of the sanative properties of oil; and it was under this impression that the Jews anointed the sick, and applied oil to wounds (Psa. cix, 18; Isa. i, 6; Luke x, 34; Rev. iii, 18). Anointing was used in sundry disorders, as well as to promote the general health of the body. It was hence, as a salutary and approved medicament, that the seventy disciples were directed to "anoint the sick" (Mark vi, 13); and hence also the sick man is directed by the apostle (James v, 14) to send for the elders of the Church, who were "to pray for him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." The Talmudical citations of Lightfoot on Matt. vi, 16, show that the later Jews connected charms and superstitious mutterings with such anointings, and he is therefore probably right in understanding this text to mean, "It is customary for the unbelieving Jews to use anointing of the sick, joined with a magical and enchanting muttering; but how infinitely better is it to join the pious prayers of the elders of the Church to the anointing of the sick." Niebuhr assures us that at Sana (and doubtless in other parts of Arabia) the Jews, as well as many of the Moslems, have their bodies anointed whenever they feel themselves indisposed. Analogous to this is the anointing with oil practised by the twelve (Mark ix, 13), and our Lord's anointing the eyes of a blind man with clay made from saliva, in restoring him miraculously to sight (πικρῶσαι, John ix, 6, 11). See MEDICINE.

4. Anointing the Dead.—The practice of anointing the bodies of the dead is intimated in Mark xiv, 8, and Luke xxiii, 56. This ceremony was performed after the body was washed, and was designed to check the progress of corruption. Although, from the mode of application, it is called anointing, the substance employed appears to have been a solution of odoriferous drugs. This (together with the laying of the body in spices) was the only kind of embalment in use among the Jews. See BURIAL; EMBALMING.

5. Spiritual.—(1.) In the O. T. a Deliverer is promised under the title of Messiah, or Anointed (Psa. ii, 2; Dan. ix, 25, 26); and the nature of his anointing is described to be spiritual, with the Holy Ghost (Isa. lxi, 1; see Luke iv, 18). As anointing with oil betokened prosperity, and produced a cheerful aspect (Psa. civ, 15), so this spiritual unction is figuratively described as anointing "with the oil of gladness" (Psa. xlv, 7; Heb. i, 9). In the N. T. Jesus of Nazareth is shown to be the Messiah or Christ, or Anointed of the O. T. (John i, 41; Acts ix, 22; xvii, 2, 3; xviii, 5, 28); and the historical fact of his being anointed with the Holy Ghost is recorded and asserted (John i, 32, 33; Acts iv, 27; x, 38). (2.) Spiritual anointing with the Holy Ghost is conferred also upon Christians by God (2 Cor. i, 21), and they are described as having an unction (χρῖσμα) from the Holy One, by which they know all things (1 John ii, 20, 27). To anoint the eyes with eye-salve is used figuratively, to denote the process of obtaining spiritual perception (Rev. iii, 18).

6. Religious Significance of the Act.—It is somewhat remarkable that the first Biblical instance of anointing—that of Jacob's unction of his pillow at Bethel (Gen. xxviii, 18)—has reference to an inanimate object; yet the sacred import of the ceremony is obvious, and must have been derived from primeval custom. At a later date, the formal agreement noticed by Sir G. Wilkinson, between the use of oil among the Egyptians and the Israelites in consecrating to an office, may undoubtedly be regarded as evidence that the Mosaic prescription was framed with some regard to the observances in Egypt; for by the time the former was instituted, the Israelitish people had been long habituated to the customs of Egypt; and it was the part of wisdom, when setting up a better polity, to take advantage of what existed there, so far as it could be safely employed. The king so anointed was solemnly recognised as the guest and protégé of the lord of the temple; the statue was set apart for, and so far identified with the god it represented, and loth were stamped as fit for their respective destinations. But in the true religion something more and higher was involved in the act of consecration. The article or subject was brought into contact with the holiness of Jehovah, and was made a vessel and instrument of the Spirit of God. Hence, anointing with oil in the times of the old covenant was always a symbol of the gift and grace of the Holy Spirit—in the case of inanimate objects imparting to them a ceremonial sacredness, so as to fit them for holy ministrations; and in the case of persons, not only designating them to a sacred office, but sealing to them the spiritual qualifications needed for its efficient discharge.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.; Fairbairn, s. v. See CONSECRATION.

II. Moderna.—In the Romish Church the custom of anointing priests is still continued. The ordaining bishop anoints with the holy oil called chrism (q. v.) the palm of both hands, the thumb, and the forefinger of the person to be ordained; and thus, according to the expression in the ritual of ordination, the hands receive power to bless, to consecrate, and to make holy. If a clergyman is excommunicated these spots are rubbed off. This custom, like many others, is a perversion of the sacred ceremony by which the Jewish priests and kings were inducted into office.

2. The history of extreme unction (q. v.) in its present form can be traced back no further than the twelfth century. When the ceremony of anointing is mentioned at an earlier period, the reference is to the offices of baptism and confirmation. There is no mention of extreme unction in Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, or Cyprian, or in any of the writers of the first three centuries. In the fourth century Epiphanius makes no mention of it. It is not found in the "Apostolical Constitutions," a work in which all church forms are minutely described, nor in the biographies of the first six centuries. After the twelfth century it was universally adopted in the Western Church.

3. The only occasion on which anointing is used in the Church of England is at the coronation of the sovereigns, when the archbishop solemnly anoints the king or queen, after the ancient practice of the Hebrews.

ANOINTING OIL. The "oil of holy ointment" prescribed by divine authority (Exod. xxx, 23-25) for the consecration of the Jewish priests and kings was compounded of the following ingredients:

	Hebrew weight.	English weight.
		lb. oz. dwts. grs.
Pure myrrh	500 shekels	= 18 11 13 13 2.3
Sweet cinnamon	250 "	= 9 5 16 18 1-24
Sweet calamus	250 "	= 9 5 16 18 1-24
Cassia	500 "	= 18 11 13 13 2.3
Olive oil, 1 hin = 5 quarts	75½ "	= 13 4 0 0
	185½ shekels = 70 0 0 15½

The shekel is here estimated at 9 dwts. and 2 4-7 grains (Troy).

Under the law persons and things set apart for sacred purposes were anointed with this "holy ointment" (Exod. xxix, 7), which appears to have been a typical representation of the communication of the Holy Ghost to the Church of Christ (Acts i, 5; x, 38). Hence the Holy Spirit is called an unction (q. v.), whereby believers were divinely inspired and guided into all truth (2 Cor. i, 21; 1 John ii, 20, 27). The profane or common use of the holy ointment was expressly forbidden, on pain of being excommunicated (Exod. xxx, 33; Ezek. xxiii, 31). It was commanded to be kept by the Hebrews throughout their generations; it was therefore laid up in the most holy place. Prideaux observes that it was one of those things which was wanting in the second temple. There is an allusion to the ingredients of this sacred perfume in Eccles. xxiv, 15. The use of aromatics in the East may be dated from the remotest antiquity. "Ointment and perfume," says Solomon, "rejoice the heart" (Prov. xxvii, 9). They are still introduced, not only upon every religious and festive occasion, but as one essential expression of private hospitality and friendship. See OINTMENT.

THE ANOINTEDE. The prophets, priests, and kings were anointed at their inauguration; but no man was ever dignified by being anointed to hold the three offices in himself, so no person ever had the title of the Messiah, the Christ, the Anointed One, but Jesus the Saviour. He alone is king of kings and lord of lords: the king who governs the universe, and rules in the hearts of his followers; the prophet, to instruct men in the way wherein they should go; and the great high-priest, to make atonement and intercession for the whole world. Of him, Melchizedek, Abraham, Aaron, David, and others were illustrious types; but none of these had the title of "The Anointed of God." This does, and ever will, belong exclusively to Jesus the Christ, who was consecrated in our nature by the appointing of the Holy Ghost (Psa. ii, 2; Isa. lxi, 1; Dan. ix, 24; Matt. iii, 16, 17; Luke iv, 18-21; Acts iv, 27; x, 38). See MESSIAH.

Anomœans (ἀνομοῖς, dissimilar), the name by which the stricter Arians, who denied the likeness of the Word to the Father, were distinguished from the Semi-Arians, who merely denied his consubstantiality.—Gieseler, Ch. Hist. i, 198. See ARIANS.

Ānos (ἄνωος), one of the "sons" of Maani (Bani), who divorced his Gentile wife (1 Esdr. ix, 34); apparently the VANIAH (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra, x, 36).

Ansarians or Assassins, inhabitants of a district in Syria (called also ESSARIANS). Their religion is a compound of paganism and Mohammedanism, which they are said to have been taught by an old man who in 891 inhabited the village of Nasar, near Koufa, and passed for a saint and a prophet. Some of them worship the sun, others the dog and other material objects. A special work on them has been published by the Rev. Samuel Lyde (see a valuable summary of this work in the N. Amer. Review, Oct. 1862). According to Lyde, "they number about 200,000, for the most part rude and vicious. They are divided into Shemseeh (men of the sun, Northerners) and Kumreel (men of the moon, Southerners); the former may be descendants of the Canaanites; the latter, foreigners, brought their present religion into the land. The name Ansareeh is probably derived from the founder of the sect, Nusari, dating from the ninth century. Their sacred name is Khaseebeh, from the apostle of the sect. In many points they have affinities with the Assassins. They believe in the divine unity—in three personalities, the second and third being created. The first person, the supreme deity, is Manu, or Meaning; the second, Isn, or Name; the third, Bab, or Dove. Of the supreme deity there have been seven manifestations; the last is Ali, Mohammed, and Salmān il Farisee. Ali is the highest manifestation of God, alone to be adored. There is also a system of hierarchies, bewildering in numbers: 14,000 Near Ones, 15,000 Cherulim, 16,000 Spirituals, 17,000 Saints, 18,000 Hermits, 19,000 Listeners, 20,000 Followers—in all, 119,000—besides prophets, apostles, and heroes. The doctrine of metempsychosis is strictly held, and minutely delineated. They receive the Old and New Testaments, and the Koran, with many apocryphal works." An account of them is given in Chesney's Expédition to the Euphrates and the Tigris. See also Walpole's Travels in the East, and Blackwood's Magazine, lxx, 719. See ASSASSINS.

Anskar, Ansgar, or Anschairius, St., the first archbishop of Hamburg, bishop of Bremen, and so-called apostle of Sweden and Denmark. The most probable opinion is that he was born in Picardy about 801. In 821 he went from the abbey of Corbie, in Picardy, to that in Saxony. Having from his youth been desirous to labor in a missionary field, he was sent in 826 to Denmark, and thence to Sweden, where he preached the Gospel with wonderful success. After this he was made bishop of Hamburg, which see he governed until the destruction of the city by the Normans in 845; four years after this, Louis, king of Germany, made him bishop of Bremen, where he died, Feb. 3, 865, regretting that he was not called to seal his profession by martyrdom. He wrote a life of St. Willehad (in Pertz, Monumenta German. ii, 683 sq.). For a glowing account of him, see Neander, Light in Dark Places, p. 264 sq.; comp. Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 272, 284; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. ii, 29. See also Brit. and For. Evangelical Review, July, 1865. The first biography of Anskar was written by his successor, Rimbart (published by Dahlmann, in Pertz, Monum. Germ.; translated into German by Misegais, Bremen, 1826). See also Kruse, St. Anskar (Altona, 1823); Krummacher, St. Ansgar (Brem. 1828); Reuterlahl, Ansgar (Berl. 1837); Klippel, Lebensbeschreibung des Erzbischofs Ansgar (Brem. 1845); Cave, *Hist. Ansegis. 1. A Benedictine monk, born of noble parents at Lyons, was, together with Eginhard, superintendent of the royal edifices; became in 817 abbot at Luxen, and in 827 at Fontanelles. Charlemagne and Louis the Pious employed him for important embassies. He died in 833. He is the author of that important collection of imperial laws known as Libri III Capitularium, containing a number of decrees issued by Charlemagne and Louis the Pious. The German kings had to take an oath upon this book as containing the laws of the empire. The best edition of it is contained in Pertz, Monumenta Germanie legum, vol. i.—Acta Sanctorum, sec. iv, 1; D'Achery, Spicileg. t. iii.

2. Abbot of St. Michael's (probably at Beauvais); was sent in 870 by Charles the Bald as ambassador to Rome; appointed in 871 archbishop of Sens, and used as a tool by the pope against the clergy. John VIII appointed him in 876 primate of the French Church and vicar-general of the apostolic see, but a synod of Pontion protested against this, and recognised him only as metropolitan. He died in 883, and his successors had to abandon the distinction, which the pope had intended to connect forever with the see.—Gfrörer, Kirchengeschichte, vol. ii; Gallia Christiana.

Anselm of CANTERBURY (commonly called St. Anselm) was born at Aosta, a town of the Alps, in Savoy, A.D. 1033. He was treated harshly by his father, and travelled early into France, and afterward into Normandy, where he took the monastic habit in 1060, at Bec, where Lanfranc, afterward archbishop of Canterbury, was prior. Three years after, when Lanfranc was promoted to the abbacy of Caen, Anselm succeeded him as prior of Bec, and became abbot in 1078. Anselm came to England while prior of Bec, and afterward in 1092 by the invitation of Hugh Lupus, earl of Chester, who requested his aid in sickness. Soon after his arrival William Rufus also required Anselm's assistance, and finally nominated him (though with great difficulty of acceptance on Anselm's part) to the see of Canterbury, which had lain vacant from Lanfranc's death in 1089. Anselm was consecrated with great solemnity December 4, 1093. In the following year a stinted offer, as the king thought it, of £500 from the archbishop, in aid of the war which William was carrying on against his brother Robert, was the first cause of the royal displeasure toward Anselm, followed by further discontent when Anselm desired leave to go to Rome to receive the pall from Pope Urban II, whom the king refused to acknowledge as pope. Anselm proposed a visit to Rome to consult the pope, but was refused permission. He went a second time to court to ask for leave, and was again refused, but gave his blessing to the king, and embarked at Dover. The king seized upon the archbishopric, and made every act of Anselm's administration void. The archbishop got safe to Rome, and was honorably received by the pope. He lived quietly, at Rome and other places, and finished his treatise Cur Deus Homo at a monastery in Champagne. He assisted the pope at the synod or council of Bari, where he prevented Urban from excommunicating the king of England for his various and frequent outrages upon religion. The king, however, finally bribed the court of Rome to desert Anselm, who retired to Lyons, where (with the interval of an attendance at a council at Rome in 1099) he continued to reside till he heard of William Rufus's death, with that of Pope Urban shortly after. Henry I, immediately upon his accession, invited Anselm to return. The archbishop was received in England with extraordinary respect both by the king and people, but refusing to be reinvested by the king, and to do the same homage with his predecessors, he again fell under the displeasure of the court. In 1103, at the request of the king and barons, Anselm went to Rome to arrange an accommodation; the king at the same time, in distrust, dispatching an agent of his own, who arrived before the archbishop. The pope still continued inexorable, but wrote to the king, promising compliance in other matters if the king would but waive the matter of investiture. Anselm in chagrin again took up his residence at Lyons, while a fresh embassy to Rome from the king was still more unsuccessful than the former. Anselm now removed to the court of Adela of Blois, the king's sister, who, during a visit which Henry I made to Normandy, contrived an interview between him and Anselm July 22, 1105, when the king restored to him the revenues of the archbishopric, but refused to allow him to return to England unless he would comply with the investiture. Anselm remained in France, retiring to the abbey of Bec. At length the pope, adopting a middle course, refused to give up the investitures, but was willing so far to dispense as to give leave to bishops and abbots to do homage to the king for their temporalities. This was in 1106. The king now invited Anselm to England; but the messenger finding him sick, the king himself went over into Normandy, and made him a visit at Bec, where all their differences were adjusted. Anselm, being recovered, embarked for England, and, landing at Dover, was received with extraordinary marks of welcome. From this time little that is remarkable occurred in his life, except a dispute with Thomas, elected archbishop of York in 1108, who, wishing to disengage himself from dependency upon the see of Canterbury, refused to make the customary profession of canonical obedience. Before the termination of this dispute Anselm died at Canterbury, April 21, 1109, in the seventy-sixth year of his age (Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.).

The intellect of Anselm was of the highest order; Neander calls him the Augustine of the twelfth century. His speculations impressed their character not only upon the theology and philosophy of his own age, but also upon all subsequent ages to the present time. He is generally named as the "father of scholasticism." Though his faith was always sincere and undoubting, his profoundly inquisitive intellect made it necessary for him to philosophize upon the grounds of that faith. Opposing himself to Roscelin, his philosophy was a thorough-going Realism; and in applying his philosophy to theology, he sought to demonstrate the being and attributes of God by the ontological method, of which, in fact, he was substantially the inventor (Prologium, de Dei existentia; Monologium, de Divinitatis essentia). Rémusat (Vie d'Anselm, p. 473) ascribes a Pantheistic tendency to Anselm's uncompromising Realism. Does not the following passage in the Prologium appear to involve the Pantheistic theory? Speaking of the divine nature, "It is," he says, "the essence of the being, the principle of the existence of all things. . . . Without parts, without differences, without accidents, without changes, it might be said, in a certain sense, to alone exist, for in respect to it the other things which appear to be have no existence. The unchangeable Spirit is all that is, and it is this without limit, simpliciter, interminabiliter. It is the perfect and absolute existence. The rest is come from nonentity, and thither returns, if not supported by God; it does not exist by itself. In this sense the Creator alone exists; the things created do not" (p. 473, 474). It is plain that these dependent and merely relative existences must be conceived as an emanation from the supreme and substantial essence—must, like the qualities of bodies, be in fact identical with the supposed substrata. In his treatises on free-will and predestination he followed the Augustinian doctrine, and sought acutely, but vainly, to reconcile it with human freedom. He was the first also to treat the doctrine of redemption [see SATISFACTION] in a scientific way, and to seek a rational demonstration of it (in his treatise, Cur Deus Homo). He propounds the question, Why is it necessary that God should have humbled himself so far as to become man and suffer death? His process of reasoning, in reply to this question, is as follows. Man has by sin deprived God of the glory which properly belongs to him, and must therefore give satisfaction for it, i. e. he must restore to God the glory which is his; for the divine justice would not allow of forgiveness out of pure compassion, apart from such reparation. This reparation must be commensurate with the enormity of the sin; yet it is not in the power of man to give such, because, apart from this, he is God's debtor. Such a satisfaction cannot be given unless some one is able to offer to God something of his own of more value than all which is not God, for the whole world should not have tempted man to sin (Matt. xvi, 26, "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?") Since, however, he has sinned, he must offer to God more than the whole world, i. e. more than all outside of God. Consequently none can have this to give but God himself. But since it is man who owes it, it must also be given by a God-man, i. e. by a person possessing the two natures, divine and human. This could be no other than the second person of the Trinity, the Son; for otherwise there would be two Sons in the Trinity; and, had the Father become man, two grandsons (namely, the Father, grandson of himself by human descent, and the Son, grandson of the Virgin, as son of the Virgin's son). It was fitting that the man with whom God united himself should be born of a woman without the co-operation of man, and even from a virgin; for as sin and the ground of condemnation were brought about by that sex, it is just that the remedy should also have come from it alone. Thus Christ was then born without original sin; he could sin if he willed it, but he could not will it; consequently he died without owing death and of his own free will. His death, therefore, outweighed the number and magnitude of all sins. He gave unto God, for the sins of mankind, his own life unsullied by any sin of his own, thus giving what he did not owe, when considered as both God and man. But in consequence of his offering voluntarily so great a sacrifice, and inasmuch as to him no equivalent for it could be given, it was necessary, in order that the sacrifice should not be vain, that others at least should be benefited thereby in some way, namely, humanity in the forgiveness of sin. Anselm affirms the doctrine of a satisfactio vicaria activa (an active vicarious satisfaction), but not of a satisfactio passiva (passive satisfaction); for he nowhere says that Christ endured the actual punishment of men's sins (Neander, Deuungeschichte, ii, 516). Dr. Shedd (Hist. of Doctrines, ii, 282) questions this statement of Neander's, but on what appear to be insufficient grounds.

The fundamental principles of Anselm's doctrine of satisfaction are found in the writings of many fathers before Anselm, e. g. Athanasius, Gregorius of Nazianzen, Chrysostom, and Cyril of Alexandria; but Anselm is the one who collected and arranged them into a systematic whole. Dr. Shedd has treated the relation of Anselm to theology (Hist. of Doctrines, lks. iv and v) more skillfully than any other modern writer in short compass. In concluding his analysis of the Cur Deus Homo, he remarks that it "exhibits a depth, breadth, and vigor of thinking not surpassed by any production of the same extent in theological literature. Such a view of the atonement as is here exhibited is thoroughly Biblical, and thoroughly Protestant. There may be incidental views and positions in this tract with which the modern theologian would not wholly agree; but certainly, so far as the general theory of vicarious satisfaction is concerned, this little treatise contains the substance of the reformed doctrine; while, at the same time, it enunciates those philosophical principles which must enter into the scientific construction of this cardinal truth of Christianity. On both the theoretic and the practical side, it is one of the Christian classics" (vol. ii, p. 283). As to the claim of absolute originality for Anselm's system, "it may be admitted that Anselm first used the term satisfaction to express the method in which a solutio could be effected of a debitum which had been incurred by sin; but the same fundamental idea is found in the sacrificial theory, to which so frequent reference is made by many earlier writers. Sacrifices were appointed in the mosaic economy by which violated laws might be appeased, and the offerer preserve his forfeited life by something other than obedience. Satisfaction expresses a wider group of considerations, of which sacrifice is a particular illustration. We may grant to Anselm the dignity of having set forth, in more forcible light than earlier writers, the nature and responsibilities of sin, and the need of reconciliation with God. We may allow that his sense of the justice of God appears to have been more profound and comprehensive than those of earlier fathers; and the basis was doubtless laid for the quantitative and mercantile aspects of the subject which characterized the speculations of later divines" (Brit. Quarterly, April, 1865, p. 355). As to Anselm's deficiencies, Dr. Thomson (Bishop of Gloucester) remarks that "the passages of Scripture that speak of the wrath of God against man are not explicable by Anselm's system. The explanation of the Baptist, that Jesus is the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world; the prophecy of His sufferings by Isaiah (ch. liii); the words of Peter, that He "his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree"; and passages of like import in St. Paul's writings, can only find place with Anselm by a very forced interpretation. His scheme is mainly this, that the merit of the perfect obedience of Jesus was so great as to deserve a great reward, and that, in answer to the prayer of the Lord, this reward was given in the form of the salvation of His brethren. But Christ does not appear in this system as groaning and suffering under the curse of the world, as He does in Holy Scripture. Until the time of Anselm the doctrine of the Atonement had, within certain limits, fluctuated with the change of teachers; the doctrine itself was one and the same, but this or that aspect of it had been made prominent. Anselm aimed at fixing in one system the scattered truths; and the result has been that he, like his predecessors, made some parts of the truth conspicuous to the prejudice of the rest" (Aids to Faith, Essay viii).

Anselm is commemorated as a saint in the Church of Rome on the 21st of April. His life, by Eadmer, his friend and companion, is given in the edition of his works named below. The best edition of his works is that entitled Opera omnia necnon Eadmeri monachi Cantuariensis Historia (Venet. 1744, 2 vols. fol.). A selection of the most important theological and philosophical works of Anselm has been published by C. Haas (S. Anselmi opuscula philosophico-theologica selecta, vol. i, containing the Monologium and Proslodium, Tübingen, 1862). Special editions of the book Cur Deus Homo were published at Berlin, 1857, and at London, 1863. Anselm has been much studied of late years: a beautiful monograph by C. Rémusat (Saint Anselme de Canterbury, 8vo, Paris, 1852); a study by Böhringer (Die Kirche Christi und ihre Zeugen, ii, 224); and a copious treatise by Haase (1. Das Leben Anselms; 2. Die Lehre Anselms), 2 vols. Leipzig, 1843-1852; an abridged translation by Turner, Lond. 1860, 12mo) give ample facilities for the study of his history and writings. Translations of the Proslodium and of the Cur Deus Homo are given in the Bibliotheca Sacra, vols. viii, xi, and xii. See also Gieseler, *Ch. Anselm, St., called Baduarius after the name of his family (Badagio), was born at Milan, 1036. He succeeded, in 1061, his uncle, Pope Alexander II, as bishop of Lucca, which see he resigned in order to become a monk at Clugny. He returned to his see at the express order of Pope Gregory VI, who employed him for important embassies, and made him a cardinal. He tried to prevail on the canons of his cathedral church to submit to the common life, but met with so decided a resistance that he had to leave again his see. Leo IX sent him as his legate to Lombardy, where he died at Mantua, March 18, 1086. He wrote an apology of Gregory VII, a refutation of the claims of the anti-pope Guibert, and a treatise against the right of the secular princes to dispose of the property of the church. The two former may be found in Canisius, Antique Lectiones, and in the Bibl. Patrum. The life of Anselm was written by the Jesuit Rota (Notiz di San Anselmo, Verona, 1773, 8vo).—Landon, s. v.

Anselm, son of the Margrave Otto the Rich, of Ascania, became bishop of Havelberg in 1126, and archbishop of Ravenna in 1154; was Apostolicarius of Emperor Lothaire II, and was sent as an ambassador to the emperor of Constantinople for the purpose of effecting a union between the Roman and Greek Churches. He died in 1158. He wrote Three Books of Dialogues with Nicetas, archbishop of Nicomedia, about the points in dispute between the Greek and Roman Churches, given by D'Achery in the Spicilegium, i, 161 (new ed.).—Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, ii, 365; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1119; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Anselm, dean of the cathedral church of Laon, flourished at the end of the 11th century. He died July 15, 1117. He illustrated the entire Old and New Testaments with an Interlineary Glossary, compiled from the fathers, which has been several times printed, with the additions of Lira and others, especially at Antwerp, in 1634; also, the Commentary on St. Matthew, and Explanations of various Passages in the Gospels, Epistles of St. Paul, Apocalypse, etc., which are printed under the name of Anselm of Canterbury, are attributed by many writers to this author. But Dupin asserts that they are from the pen of Hervaeus, a monk of Bourg, near Dol.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1103; Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, ii, 364; Landon, s. v.

Answer (usually ἀνθ', ἀποκρίσιμα) has other significations in Scripture besides the common one in the sense of reply. 1. Moses having composed a thanksgiving after the passage of the Red Sea, Miriam, it is said, "answered;" meaning that Moses with the men on one side, and Miriam with the women on the other side, sung the same song, as it were, in two choruses or divisions, of which one "answered" the other (Exod. xv, 21). So also 1 Sam. xxix, 5, where they sung in distinct choruses; comp. Num. xxi, 17. 2. This word is likewise taken for to accuse, or to defend judicially (Gen. xxx, 33; Dent. xxxi, 21; Hos. v, 5). 3. To "answer" is likewise taken in a bad sense, as when it is said that a son answers his father insolently, or a servant his master (John xviii, 22; Rom. ix, 20; 2 Cor. i, 9). 4. To "answer" is also used in Scripture for the commencement of a discourse, when no reply to any question or objection is intended. This mode of speaking is often used by the Evangelists: "And Jesus answered and said." It is a Hebrew idiom (Job iii, 2; Cant. ii, 10; Zech. iii, 4; iv, 11, 12; Matt. xi, 25; xii, 38; xvii, 4; Mark ix, 5; Luke vii, 40). See AFFIRMATIVE.

ANSWER OF A GOOD CONSCIENCE (ἀντιείσεως ἀγαθῆς ἐπιστήμη), a phrase occurring 1 Pet. iii, 21, very variously interpreted, but apparently signifying simply the ability to address God in prayer (as if a response to His searching of the heart) with a conscience free from a sense of guilt, or the seeking after Him with a pure conscience (see Alford, in loc.). See CONSCIENCE.

Ant (נְמָלָה, nemalah', either from an Arab. root, signifying creeping, or rather from נָמַל, to cut off [circumcise], from its destructive habits, or, still better, from its insect form; Sept. μύμηξ, Vulg. furnica) occurs Prov. vi. 6; xxx. 25. In both passages its provident habits are referred to, especially its providing its food in the summer. This has generally been supposed to imply that these insects hoard up grains of corn, chiefly wheat, for their supply during winter, having first bitten out the germ to prevent it from growing in their nests. Bochart has collected an immense array of the most eminent authors and naturalists of antiquity (Jewish, Greek, Roman, and Arabian), who all gravely propound this assertion (Hieroz. iii. 478 sq.; comp. Aristot. Anim. ix. 26; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xi. 36; Horace, Sat. i. 1, 38). But it is now ascertained beyond a doubt that no European ants, hitherto properly examined, feed on corn or any other kind of grain. (See Kirby and Spence's Entomology, p. 313, 7th ed. London, 1856, where the question is fully discussed.) Bonnet found that, however long they had been kept without food, they would not touch corn. Nor do they attack the roots or stems of corn, nor any other vegetable matter. Nor has any species of ant been yet found with food of any kind laid up in its nest. The truth is, that ants are chiefly carnivorous, preying indiscriminately on all the soft parts of other insects, and especially the viscera; also upon worms, whether dead or alive, and small birds or animals. If unable to drag their booty to the nest, they make an abundant meal upon it, and, like the bee, disgorge it, upon their return home, for the use of their companions; and they appear able to retain at pleasure the nutritious juices unchanged for a considerable time. Ants are also extremely fond of saccharine matter, which they obtain from the exudation of trees, or from ripe fruits, etc.; but their favorite food is the saccharine exudation from the body of the aphides, or plant-lice. Every one must have observed these insects on the rose-tree, etc. Each different species of vegetable has its peculiar species of aphid (Reaumur, vi. 566). The aphides insert their tube or sucker between the fibres of vegetables, where they find a most substantial nutriment. This nutriment they retain a considerable time, if no ant approaches them. The ant has the talent of procuring it from the aphides at pleasure. It approaches the aphid, strikes it gently and repeatedly with its antennæ, when it instantly discharges the juice by two tubes easily discerned to be standing out from its body. These creatures are the milk kine of the ants. By a remarkable coincidence, which M. Huber justly considers too much to be ascribed to chance, the aphides and the ants become torpid at the same degree of cold (27 deg. Fahr.), and revive together at the same degree of warmth (Huber, Natural History of Ants, p. 210, etc.).

In the Introduction to Entomology, by Kirby and Spence, some diffidence is expressed (ii. 46) respecting the inference that no exotic ants have magazines of provisions, till their habits shall have been "more accurately explored." Still, are we not in possession of sufficient data to form a strong presumption in regard to the ants of Palestine, to which Solomon of course alludes in his writings? The ants of the Holy Land certainly have to encounter a degree of cold quite as severe as ever occurs in England (Kitto, Physical Hist. of Palestine, p. 210, 216). Is it not highly probable that the ants at such times become torpid, and need no magazine of provisions? And since we learn from the same authority (p. 31) that there are intervals, even in the depth of winter, when the sun shines, and there is no wind, when it is perfectly warm, sometimes almost hot, in the open air, may not the ants of Palestine and their food revive together at such times, as is the case in other countries, where ants may often be seen pursuing their avocations over the snow? With regard to Solomon's words respecting the ant, Kirby and Spence are of opinion "that, if they are properly considered, it will be found that the interpretation which seems to favor the ancient error respecting ants has been fathered upon them rather than fairly deduced from them. He does not affirm that the ant, which he proposes to the sluggard as an example, laid up in her magazines stores of grain against winter, but that, with considerable prudence and foresight, she makes use of proper seasons to collect a supply of provisions sufficient for her purposes. There is not a word in them implying that she stores up grain or other provisions. She prepares her bread and gathers her food (namely, such food as is suited to her) in summer and harvest (that is, when it is most plentiful), and thus shows her wisdom and prudence by using the advantages offered to her."

It is true that Col. Sykes speaks (Transactions of Entomol. Soc. ii. 103) of a species of Indian ant which he calls Atta providens, so called from the fact of his having found a large store of grass-seeds in its nest; but the amount of that gentleman's observations merely go to show that this ant carries seeds underground, and brings them again to the surface after they have got wet during the monsoons, apparently to dry. "There is not," writes Mr. F. Smith (Catalogue of the Formicidæ in the British Museum, 1858, p. 180), "any evidence of the seeds having been stored for food;" he observes that the processary ant of Brazil (Ecoloma cephalotes) carries immense quantities of portions of leaves into its underground nests, and that it was supposed that these leaves were for food; but that Mr. Bates satisfied himself that the leaves were for the purpose of lining the channels of the nest, and not for food. There is no evidence that any portion of plants ever forms an article of their diet. The fact is, that ants seem to delight in running away with almost any thing they find—small portions of sticks, leaves, little stones—as any one can testify who has cared to watch the habits of this insect. This will explain the erroneous opinion which the ancients held with respect to that part of the economy of the ant now under consideration; nor is it, perhaps, necessary to conclude that the error originated in observers mistaking the cocoons for grains of corn, to which they bear much resemblance. It is scarcely credible that Aristotle, Virgil, Horace, etc., who all speak of this insect storing up grains of corn, should have been so far misled, or have been such bad observers, as to have taken the cocoons for grains. Ants do carry off grains of corn, just as they carry off other things, not, however, as was stated, for food, but for their nests. "They are great robbers," says Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 337), "and plunder by night as well as by day; and the farmer must keep a sharp eye to his floor, or they will abstract a large quantity of grain in a single night." See CISTERN.

It is right to state that a well-known entomologist, the Rev. F. W. Hope, in a paper "On some Doubts respecting the Economy of Ants" (Trans. Entom. Soc. ii. 211), is of opinion that Col. Sykes's observations do tend to show that there are species of exotic ants which store up food for winter consumption; but it must be remembered that Mr. Bates's investigations are subsequent to the publication of that paper. (See Encycl. Brit. 8th ed. s. v.)

The particular species of ant referred to by Solomon has not been identified; and, in fact, ants have only latterly become the subjects of accurate observation. The investigations of Latreille (Histoire Naturelle des Fourmis, Par. 1802), Gould, Geer, Huber, and Kirby and Spence, have dissipated many erroneous notions respecting them, and revealed much interesting information concerning their domestic polity, language, migrations, affections, passions, virtues, wars, diversions, etc. (see Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.). The following facts are selected as relevant to scriptural illustration. Ants dwell together in societies; and although they have "no guide, overseer, or ruler," yet they have all one soul, and are animated by one object—their own welfare, and the welfare of each other. Each individual strenuously pursues his own peculiar duties, and regards (except in the case of females), and is regarded by, every other member of the republic with equal respect and affection. They devote the utmost attention to their young. The egg is cleaned and licked, and gradually expands under this treatment till the worm is hatched, which is then tended and fed with the most affectionate care. They continue their assiduity to the pupa, or chrysalis, which is the third transformation. They heap up the pupæ, which greatly resemble so many grains of wheat, or rather rice, by hundreds in their spacious lodges, watch them in an attitude of defence, carry them out to enjoy the radiance of the sun, and remove them to different situations in the nest, according to the required degree of temperature; open the pupa, and, at the precise moment of the transformation, disintrude the new-born insect of its habiliments.—Kitto, s. v.

To some readers it may seem strange that ants should be considered four-winged insects, whereas they may have never seen a winged individual among the thousands of ants they may have looked upon. The fact is, this tribe presents the curious anomaly (paralleled also in the Termites, or white ants, of another order) of three forms of individuals—we might almost say, three sexes. The males and females are furnished with four wings on their leaving the chrysalis state, but soon drop them spontaneously. These are comparatively few in number; but there is another race, which are the workers, and which constitute the main body of the teeming population, which never have any wings at all. These are sexless, but are considered as imperfectly developed females.

The Arabians held the wisdom of the ant in such estimation, that they used to place one of these insects in the hands of a newly-born infant, repeating these words: "May the boy turn out clever and skilful." Hence, in Arabic, with the noun nemleh, "an ant," is connected the adjective nemli, "quick," "clever" (Bochart, Hieroz. lii, 491). The Talmudists, too, attributed great wisdom to this insect. It was, say they, from beholding the wonderful ways of the ant that the following expression originated: "Thy justice, O God, reaches to the heavens" (Cholin, 63).

It may not be out of place to allude the parallel economy of a tribe of insects, which, though they belong to another zoological order, so greatly resemble ants in their most remarkable peculiarities as to be popularly associated with them. We refer to the white ants (Termites), so abundant in all tropical countries. These, too, form populous societies, living in commonwealth, in elaborate structures, which are constructed by the united labors of the whole. We have not any detailed accounts of the Oriental species; but in the minute and careful description, by Smeathman, of the African kinds, he speaks of their magazines of stored food. These are "chambers of clay, always well filled with provisions, which, to the naked eye, seem to consist of the raspings of wood, and plants which the termites destroy, but are found by the microscope to be principally the gums and inspissated juices of plants. These are thrown together in little masses, some of which are finer than others, and resemble the sugar about preserved fruits; others are like tears of gum, one quite transparent, another like amber, a third brown, and a fourth quite opaque, as we see often in parcels of ordinary gums."—Fairhairn, s. v.

It may be observed that the word chanamal' (כַּנְמָל), translated "frost" in our version of Psa. lxxviii, 47, is thought by many to refer to some species of ant or kindred insect destructive of trees.

Antarādus (Ἀνταράδος, Ptol. v, 15, § 16; Hierocles, p. 716), a city of Phœnicia, situated on the mainland opposite the island of Aradus (whence its name), which latter is alone referred to in Scripture (Gen. x, 18; 1 Chron. i, 16). See ARVAD. According to the Antonine Itinerary and the Pentapler Tables, it was 24 Roman miles from Balanea and 50 from Tripolis (Reiland, Palest. p. 216, 318). It was rebuilt, A.D. 346, by the Emperor Constantius, who named it Constantia after himself (Cedren. Hist. p. 246), but it appears under its old name likewise in the subsequent Church councils. During the Crusades it was a populous and well fortified town (William of Tyre, vii, 15), and was known as Tortosa (Tasso, Gerusal. lib. i, 6; Wilken, Kreuzz. i, 253; ii, 200; vii, 340, 715). It is now a mean village of 241 taxable Moslems and 44 Greeks (Biblloth. Sacra, 1848, p. 247). The walls, of heavy bevelled stones, are still remaining (Mignot, Mém. sur les Phén. in the Acad. des Belles Lettres, xxxiv, 239; Edrisi, p. 129, 130, ed. Jaubert).

Antediluvians, people who lived before the Deluge (q. v.), which occurred A.M. 1657. See AGE. All our authentic information respecting this long and interesting period is contained in forty-nine verses of Genesis (iv, 16-vi, 8), more than half of which are occupied with a list of names and ages, invaluable for chronology, but conveying no particulars regarding the primeval state of man. The information thus afforded, although so limited in extent, is, however, eminently suggestive (see Clarkson, Antediluvian Researches, Lond. 1836; Boucher d. Perthes, L'Homme Antediluvien, Par. 1860; Stein, De moribus ante diluvianum, Wittenb., 1783; Burton, World before the Flood, Lond. 1844; Redlob, De Antediluvianis, Hamb. 1847; Willesch, De philosophia antediluvianorum, Leipzig, 1717; Jour. Soc. Lit. July, 1862, p. 376 sq.). Some additional information, though less direct, may be safely deduced from the history of Noah and the first men after the Deluge; for it is very evident that society did not begin afresh after that event, but that, through

Noah and his sons, the new families of men were in a condition to inherit, and did inherit, such sciences and arts as existed before the Flood. This enables us to understand how settled and civilized communities were established, and large and magnificent works undertaken within a few centuries after the Deluge.

The scriptural notices show [see ADAM] that the father of men was something more than "the noble savage," or rather the grown-up infant, which some have represented him. He was an instructed man; and the immediate descendants of a man so instructed could not be an ignorant or uncultivated people. It is not necessary, indeed, to suppose that they possessed at first more cultivation than they required; and for a good while they did not stand in need of that which results from or is connected with the settlement of men in organized communities. They probably had this before the Deluge, and at first were possessed of whatever knowledge or civilization their agricultural and pastoral pursuits required. Such were their pursuits from the first; for it is remarkable that of the strictly savage or hunting condition of life there is not the slightest trace before the Deluge. After that event, Nimrod, although a hunter (Gen. x, 9), was not a savage, and did not belong to hunting tribes of men. In fact, barbarism is not discoverable before the confusion of tongues, and was, in all likelihood, a degeneracy from a state of cultivation, eventually produced in particular communities by that great social convulsion. At least, that a degree of cultivation was the primitive condition of man, from which savage life in particular quarters was a degeneracy, and that he has not, as too generally has been supposed, worked himself up from an original savage state to his present position, has been powerfully argued by Dr. Philip Lindsley (Am. Bib. Repos. iv, 277-298; vi, 1-27), and is strongly corroborated by the conclusions of modern ethnographical research; from which we learn that, while it is easy for men to degenerate into savages, no example has been found of savages rising into civilization but by an impulse from without administered by a more civilized people; and that, even with such impulse, the vis inertiae of established habits is with difficulty overcome. The aboriginal traditions of all civilized nations describe them as receiving their civilization from without—generally through the instrumentality of foreign colonists: and history affords no example of a case parallel to that which must have occurred if the primitive races of men, being originally savage, had civilized themselves.

All that was peculiar in the circumstances of the antediluvian period was eminently favorable to civilization. The longevity of the earlier seventeen or twenty centuries of human existence is a theme containing many problems. It may be here referred to for the purpose of indicating the advantages which must necessarily have therefrom accrued to the mechanical arts. In pottery, mining, metallurgy, cloth-making, the applications of heat and mixtures, etc., it is universally known that there is a tact of manipulation which no instruction can teach, which the possessor cannot even describe, yet which renders him powerful and unerring, within his narrow range, to a degree almost incredible; and when he has reached his limit of life he is confident that, had he another sixty or seventy years to draw upon, he could carry his art to a perfection hitherto unknown. Something like this must have been acquired by the antediluvians; and the paucity of objects within their grasp would increase the precision and success within the range. See LONGEVITY.

By reason of their length of life the antediluvians had also more encouragement in protracted undertakings, and stronger inducements to the erection of superior, more costly, more durable, and more capacious edifices and monuments, public and private, than exist at present. They might reasonably calculate on reaping the benefit of their labor and expenditure. The earth itself was probably more equally fertile, and its climate more uniformly healthful and more auspicious to longevity, and consequently to every kind of mental and corporeal exertion and enterprise, than has been the case since the great convulsion which took place at the Deluge.

But probably the greatest advantage enjoyed by the antediluvians, and which must have been in the highest degree favorable to their advancement in the arts of life, was the uniformity of language. Nothing could have tended more powerfully to maintain, equalize, and promote whatever advantages were enjoyed, and to prevent any portion of the human race from degenerating into savage life. See CONFUSION OF TONGUES.

The opinion that the old world was acquainted with astronomy (q. v.) is chiefly founded on the ages of Seth and his descendants being particularly set down (Gen. v, 6 sq), and the precise year, month, and day being stated in which Noah and his family, etc., entered the ark, and made their egress from it (Gen. vii, 11; viii, 13). The distinctions of day and night, and the lunar month, were of course observed; and the thirteenth rotation of the moon, compared with the sun's return to his primary position in the heavens, and the effects produced on the earth by his return, would point out the year. See MONTH. The variation between the rotations of the moon and sun easily became discoverable from the difference which in a very few years would be exhibited in the seasons; and hence it may be supposed that, although the calculations of time might be by lunar months or revolutions, yet the return of vegetation would dictate the solar year. See YEAR. The longevity of the antediluvian patriarchs, and the simplicity of their employments, favor this conjecture, which receives additional strength from the fact that the Hebrew for year, שָׁנָה, implies an iteration, a return to the same point, a repetition (Gesenius, Theas. Heb. p. 1438); and it is also remarkable that the Indians, Chinese, Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, and other nations, all deduce their origin from personages said to be versed in astronomy. See TIME.—The knowledge of zoology (q. v.) which Adam possessed was doubtless imparted to his children; and we find that Noah was so minutely informed on the subject as to distinguish between clean and unclean beasts, and that his instructions extended to birds of every kind (Gen. vii, 2-4).—A knowledge of some essential principles in botany (q. v.) is shown by the fact that Adam knew how to distinguish "seed-bearing herb" and "tree in which is a seed-bearing fruit," with "every green herb" (Gen. i, 29, 30). The trees of life and of knowledge are the only ones mentioned before the Fall; but in the history of Noah the vine, the olive, and the wood of which the ark was made (Gen. vi, 14; viii, 11; ix, 20) are spoken of in such a manner as clearly to intimate a knowledge of their qualities.—With mineralogy (q. v.) the antediluvians were at least so far acquainted as to distinguish metals; and in the description of the garden of Eden gold and precious stones are noticed (Gen. ii, 12).

That the antediluvians were acquainted with music (q. v.) is certain; for it is expressly said that Jubal (while Adam was still alive) became "the father of those who handle the כִּנּוֹר, kinor, and the זָמֶר, zemer" (Gen. iv, 21). The former [see HARP] was evidently a stringed instrument resembling a lyre; and the latter [see LYRE] was without doubt the Pandean pipe, composed of reeds of different lengths joined together. This clearly intimates considerable progress in the science; for it is not probable that the art of playing on wind and on stringed instruments was discovered at the same time. We may rather suppose that the principles of harmony, having been discovered in the one, were by analogy transferred to the other; and that Jubal, by repeated efforts, became the first performer on the harp and the pipe. See ART.

Our materials are too scanty to allow us to affirm that the antediluvians possessed the means of communicating their ideas by writing (q. v.) or by hieroglyphics, although tradition, and a hint or two in the Scriptures, might support the assertion. With respect to poetry (q. v.), the story of Lamech and his wives (Gen. iv, 19-24) is evidently in verse, and is most probably the oldest specimen of Hebrew poetry extant; but whether it was written before or after the Flood is uncertain, although the probability is that it is one of those previously-existing documents which Moses transcribed into his writing.

With regard to architecture (q. v.), it is a singular and important fact that Cain, when he was driven from his first abode, built a city in the land to which he went, and called it Enoch, after his son. This shows that the descendants of Adam lived in houses and towns from the first, and consequently affords another confirmation of the argument for the original cultivation of the human family. What this "city" was is not mentioned, except in the term itself; and as that term is in the early Scriptures applied to almost every collection of human habitations, we need not attach any very exalted ideas to it in this instance. But if we take into view the requisites necessary to enable Noah to erect so stupendous a fabric as the ark (q. v.) must have been, it will not be difficult to conceive that the art of building had reached considerable advancement before the Deluge; nor can one reflect on the building of Babel without a conviction that it must have been through the great patriarchs who lived in the old world that so much knowledge was obtained as to lead to the attempt of erecting a fabric whose summit was intended to reach the clouds. It is not likely that the builders would, by their own intuitive genius, be equal to a task which they certainly were not inspired by Heaven to execute.

The metallurgy (q. v.) of the antediluvians appears to have originated with the line of Cain (Gen. iv, 22), being carried to a high degree of perfection, so far as forging and tempering are concerned, by Tubal-Cain (q. v.).—Respecting agriculture (q. v.), which was evidently the first employment of Adam (Gen. ii, 15; iii, 17, 18), and, afterward, at first of Cain (Gen. iv, 2), we shall only add a reference to the case of Noah, who, immediately after the Flood, became a husbandman, and planted a vineyard. He also knew the method of fermenting the juice of the grape; for it is said he drank of the wine, which produced inebriation (Gen. ix, 20, 21). This knowledge he doubtless obtained from his progenitors anterior to the destruction of the old world.

Pasturage (q. v.) appears to have been coeval with husbandry. Abel was a keeper of sheep, while his brother was a tiller of the ground (Gen. iv, 2); but there is no necessity for supposing that Cain's husbandry excluded the care of cattle. The class of tent-dwelling pastors—that is, of those who live in tents that they may move with their flocks and herds from one pasture-ground to another—did not originate till comparatively late after the Fall; for Jubal, the seventh from Adam in the line of Cain, is said to have been the "father" or founder of that mode of life (Gen. iv, 20). It is doubtful whether the manufacture of cloth is involved in the mention of tents, seeing that excellent tent-coverings are even at this day made of skins; and we know that skins were the first articles of clothing used by fallen man (Gen. iii, 21). The same doubt applies to the garment with which the sons of Noah covered their inebriated father (Gen. ix, 23). But, upon the whole, there can be little doubt that, in the course of so long a period, the art of manufacturing cloths of hair and wool, if not of linen or cotton, had been acquired. See WEAVING.

It is impossible to speak with any decision respecting the form or forms of government which prevailed before the Deluge. The slight intimations to be found on the subject seem to favor the notion that the particular governments were patriarchal, subject to a general theocratical control, God himself manifestly interfering to uphold the good and check the wicked. The right of property was recognised, for Abel and Jubal possessed flocks, and Cain built a city. As ordinances of religion, sacrifices certainly existed (Gen. iv, 4), and some think that the Sabbath was observed; while some interpret the words, "Then men began to call upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. iv, 26), to signify that public worship then began to be practised. From Noah's familiarity with the distinction of clean and unclean beasts (Gen. vii, 2), it would seem that the Levitical rules on this subject were by no means new when laid down in the code of Moses. See WORSHIP.

Marriage (q. v.), and all the relations springing from it, existed from the beginning (Gen. ii, 23-25); and, although polygamy was known among the antediluvians (Gen. iv, 19), it was most probably unlawful; for it must have been obvious that, if more than one wife had been necessary for a man, the Lord would not have confined the first man to one woman. The marriage of the sons of Seth with the daughters of Cain appears to have been prohibited, since the consequence of it was that universal depravity in the family of Seth so forcibly expressed in this short passage, "All flesh had corrupted its way upon the earth" (Gen. vii, 11). This sin, described Orientally as an intermarriage of "the sons of God" with "the daughters of men" (Gen. vi, 2), appears to have been in its results one of the grand causes of the Deluge; for if the family of Seth had remained pure and obedient to God, he would doubtless have spared the world for their sake, as he would have spared Sodom and Gomorrah had ten righteous men been found there, and as he would have spared his own people, the Jews, had they not corrupted themselves by intermarriages with the heathen. Even the longevity of the antediluvians may have contributed to this ruinous result. Vastly more time was upon their hands than was needful for clearing woodlands, draining swamps, and other laborious and tedious processes, in addition to their ordinary agriculture and care of cattle; so that the temptations to idleness were likely to be very strong; and the next step would be to licentious habits and selfish violence. The ample leisure possessed by the children of Adam might have been employed for many excellent purposes of social life and religious obedience, and undoubtedly it was so employed by many; but to the larger part it became a snare and the occasion of temptations, so that "the wickedness of man became great, the earth was corrupt before God, and was filled with violence" (Crit. Bibl. iv, 14-20; see also Ant. U. Hist. i, 142-201).—Kitto, s. v. See DELUGE.

Antelope, a term apparently corrupted from the epithet "antholops" (Gr. ἀνθός, ornament, and ὤψ, the eye), applied by the ancients to the gazelle to the proverbial beauty of its eyes. It is now the name (antilopos) of a division of the hollow-horned ruminants (genus Clavicornia), distinguished by certain peculiarities of the horn, the maxillary glands, and their slight figure (Brande's Dict. s. v.). Although the word does not occur in our version of the Scriptures, yet there can be no doubt that in the Hebrew text several ruminants to which it is applicable are indicated under different denominations. In scientific nomenclature, the term antelope, at first applied to a single species, has gradually become generic, and is now the designation of a tribe, or even of a family of genera, containing a great many species. According to present usage, it embraces some species that are of considerable size, so as to be invariably regarded by the natives as having some affinity to cattle, and others delicate and rather small, that may be compared with young deer, to which, in truth, they bear a general resemblance. See DEER. The antelopes, considered as a family, may be distinguished from all others by their uniting the light and graceful forms of deer with the permanent horns of goats, excepting that in general their horns are round, annulated, and marked with striae, slender, and variously inflected, according to the subdivision or group to which they belong. They have usually large, soft, and beautiful eyes, tear-pits beneath them, and round tails. They are often provided with tufts of hair, or brushes, to protect the fore-knees from injury; they have inguinal pores; and are distinguished by very great powers of speed. Among the first of the subordinate groups is the subgenus oryx, consisting of five or six species, of which we have to notice at least three. The oryxes are all about the size of the stag of Europe, or larger, with long, annulated, slender horns, rising in continuation of the plane of the forehead, slightly divergent, regularly but not greatly curved, entirely straight or lyrate, and from three feet to three feet eight inches in length. The head is rather clumsy, and more or less pied with black and white; the neck ewed, or arched, like that of the camel; the carcass bulky, compared with the legs, which are slender, firm, and capable of sustaining great action; the tail extends only to the heel, or hough; the hair on the shoulders and neck is invariably directed forward, thus, no doubt, keeping the animal cool in flight (see Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.; Heuglin, Antelope Nordost-Africa's, Jen. 1864).

1. The yachmur' (יַחְמֹרִי, Deut. xiv. 5; 1 Kings iv. 23) is not, as in our Auth. Vers. "the fallow-deer" (Sept. ζορκίς, Vulg. caprea), but the oryx leucoryx of the moderns, the true oryx of the ancients, and of Niebuhr, who quotes R. Jona, and points out the Chaldaic jachmura, and describes it as a great goat. The Eastern Arabs still use the name ja-mur. The leu- oryx, as the name implies, is white, having a black mark down the nose, black cheeks and jowl, the legs, from the elbow and heel to the pastern joints, black, and the lower half of the thighs usually, and often the lower flank, bright rufous. The species now resides in pairs, in small families, and not unfrequently singly, on the mountain ranges along the sandy districts in the desert of Eastern Arabia, and on the banks of the Lower Euphrates; and may extend as far eastward as the west bank of the Indus, feeding on shrubby acacias, such as tortilis and Elreubergeri. It was, no doubt, formerly, if not at present, found in Arabia Petrea, and in the eastern territories of the people of Israel; and from the circumstance of the generic name of wild cow or bull being common to this, as to other allied species, it was equally caught with nets and with the noose, and styled יָחַם (tao, to, theo). To this species may be referred more particularly some of the notions respecting unicorns, since, the forehead being narrow, and the horns long and slender, if one be broken off near the root, the remaining one stands so nearly on the medial line, that, taken in connection with its white-colored hair, to uncritical inspection, a single-horned animal might appear to be really present. By nature vicious and menacing, from what may be observed in the Egyptian paintings of the industry which imposture exercised, we may conclude that human art, even in early ages, may have contributed to make artificial unicorns; and most probably those seen by some of the earlier European travellers were of this kind. See FALLOW DEER.

2. The teō' (טֵאוֹ, Deut. xiv. 5, "wild ox;" Sept. ὄονξ, Vulg. oryx) or to' (טֵאוֹ, Isa. li. 20, "wild bull;" Sept. στυβαίον, Vulg. oryx; the oryx tao, or Nubian oryx, of Ham. Smith) is either a species or distinct variety of leucoryx. The male, being nearly four feet high at the shoulder, is taller than that of the leucoryx; the horns are longer, the body comparatively lighter, and every limb indicative of vigor and elasticity; on the forehead there is a white spot, distinctly marked by the particular direction of the hair turning downward before the inner angle of the eye to near the mouth, leaving the nose rufous, and forming a kind of letter A. Under the eye, toward the cheek, there is a darkish spot, not very distinct; the limbs, belly, and tail are white; the body mixed white and red, most reddish about the neck and lower hams. It is possible that the name tao or teo is connected with the white spot on the chaffron. This species resides chiefly in the desert west of the Nile, but is most likely not unknown in Arabia; certain it is that both are figured on Egyptian monuments (the Antelope defassa of Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. iii. 18, cut 327), the leucoryx being distinguished by horns less curved, and by some indications of black on the face. See WILD OX.

3. The oryx addax may have been known to the Hebrews by the name of דִּישִׁינִי (dison', Deut. xiv. 5, "pygarg;" Sept. πύγαργος, Vulg. pygargus). It is three feet seven inches high at the shoulder, has the same structure as the others, but is somewhat higher at the croup; it has a coarse beard under the gullet, a black scalp and forehead, divided from the eyes and nose by a white bar on each side, passing along the brows and down the face to the cheek, and connected with one another between the eyes. The general color of the fur is white, with the head, neck, and shoulders more or less liver-color gray; but what distinguishes it most from the others are the horns, which in structure and length assimilate with those of the other species, but in shape assume the spiral flexures of the Indian antelope. The animal is figured on Egyptian monuments, and may be the pygarg or dishon, uniting the characters of a white rump with strepsicetrine horns, and even those which Dr. Shaw ascribes to his "bidmee."—Kitto, s. v. See SHAW.

A subgenus of the antelope family is the gazella, of which one or more species appear to be designated in Scripture by the terms "צִבְיָ, tsib'i", צִבְיָרִים, tsib'arim." See GAZELLE; ZOOLOGY.

Antelucāni (sc. cætus), i. e. before daylight. In times of persecution the Christians, being unable to meet for divine worship in the open day, held their assemblies in the night. The like assemblies were afterward continued from feelings of piety and devotion, and called antelucan or night assemblies. This custom is noticed in Pliny's Letter to Trajan (lib. x, ep. 97).—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xiii, ch. x, § 11.

Anterus, St., bishop of Rome, a Greek by birth, succeeded St. Pontianus, and was, according to Eusebius, the eighteenth, according to others the nineteenth, bishop of Rome. According to the same historian, he was elected in 238, and died one month later. But, according to Baronius, who is followed by most of the modern historians, his election falls into the year 235. Anterus ordered the acts of the martyrs to be collected, which is said to have occasioned the persecution in which he suffered martyrdom himself (see Baronius, ad ann. 137, and the notes of Pagi and Mansi).

Anthēdon (Ἀνθηδών, apparently a Greek name, signifying flowery), a city on the coast of Palestine, 20 stadia from Gaza (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. v, 9), to the south-west (comp. Ptolemy, in Reland, Palest. p. 460). It was taken and destroyed by Alexander Jannæus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 3; comp. 15, 4), but restored by Gabinus (ib. xiv, 5, 3), and added by Augustus to the dominions of Herod the Great (ib. xv, 7, 3), who changed its name to Agrippias (Ἀγριππιάς, ib. xiii, 13, 3). In the Chronicon Paschale it appears as Carinthodon, i. e. Kerith ("city") of Anthedon (Reland, Palest. p. 567). In the time of Julian it was much addicted to Gentile superstition (Sozomen, ut sup.), particularly the worship of Astarte (Venus), as appears from a coin of Antoninus and Caracalla (Vaillant, Numism. Colon. p. 115). Its bishops are named in several of the early councils (Reland, ib. p. 568). The notices correspond very well to the position assigned by Van de Velde (Map) at Tell Ajjur, a small village on the shore near Gaza (Robinson, Researches, ii, 351).

Anthem (from ἀντί, in return, and ἕρμος, a song), a psalm or hymn, sung in parts alternately, and corresponding to the antiphonal singing of the primitive Church. It was introduced by Ignatius among the Eastern Churches and by Ambrose in the West. In modern times the word is used in a more confined sense, being applied to certain passages, usually taken out of the Scriptures, and adapted to a particular solemnity. Anthems were first introduced in the reformed service of the English Church in the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Anthimus (Martyr), bishop of Nicomedia, in Bithynia; beheaded in 303 by order of Diocletian, who at the same time put to death, in various ways, many others of the faithful. The Latins commemorate them April 27th.—Eusebius, Hist. lib. viii, cap. 4 and 6.

Anthimus, bishop of Trebizond, and, in 535, patriarch of Constantinople, was deposed by Emperor Justinian as a Monophysite, and his works burned.

Anthologion (Ἀνθολόγιον), in Latin, Florilegium, a term used figuratively, like the classical word Anthology (ἀνθολογία, floral discourse), literally "a garland of flowers," hence a collection of short sentences from celebrated authors. It is the technical name of one of the Church books in use among the Greeks. It contains principally the offices which are sung on the festivals of our Lord, the Virgin, and the chief saints; then those called "communio," appointed for the festivals of the prophets, apostles, martyrs, pontiffs, etc.—Suicer, Thesaurus, p. 345.

Anthony, St., the patriarch of Cœnobites, and virtual founder of monasticism, was born A.D. 251, at Coma, in Egypt. His parents left him large possessions, but the words of our Lord to the rich young ruler so impressed his mind that he sold his possessions, gave the money to the poor, and retired into the desert, where he led an ascetic life. For more than twenty years, tried with various temptations, he dwelt apart, first in a cave, and then in a ruined house, having no communication with mankind but by a messenger, who brought him the necessaries of life. The fame of his sanctity attracted crowds of disciples, and he left his solitude to gather them into a fraternity. At the time of his death they numbered 15,000. He was visited by heathen philosophers, and Constantine the Great wrote to him, entreating his prayers. "Only in exceptional cases did Anthony leave his solitude, and then he made a powerful impression on both Christians and heathens with his hairy dress and his emaciated, ghost-like form. In the year 311, during the persecution under Maximinus, he appeared in Alexandria, in the hope of himself gaining the martyr's crown. He visited the confessors in the mines and prisons, encouraged them before the tribunal, accompanied them to the scaffold; but no one ventured to lay hands on the saint of the wilderness. In the year 351, when a hundred years old, he showed himself for the second and last time in the metropolis of Egypt to bear witness for the orthodox faith of his friend Athanasius against Arianism, and in a few days converted more heathen and heretics than had otherwise been gained in a whole year. He declared the Arian denial of the divinity of Christ worse than the venom of the serpent, and no better than heathenism, which worshipped the creature instead of the Creator. He would have nothing to do with heretics, and warned his disciples against intercourse with them. Athanasius attended him to the gate of the city, where he cast out an evil spirit from a girl. An invitation to stay longer in Alexandria he declined, saying, 'As a fish out of water, so a monk out of his solitude dies.' Imitating his example, the monks afterward forsook the wilderness in swarms whenever orthodoxy was in danger, and went in long processions, with wax tapers and responsive singing, through the streets, or appeared at the councils to contend for the orthodox faith with all the energy of fanaticism, often even with physical force" (Hook). In his last hours he retired to a mountain with two of his disciples, whom he desired to bury him like the patriarchs, and keep secret the place of his burial, thus rebuking the superstitious passion for relics. His words are thus reported by Athanasius: "Do not let them carry my body into Egypt, lest they store it in their houses. One of my reasons for coming to this mountain was to hinder this. You know I have ever reproved those who have done this, and charged them to cease from the custom. Bury, then, my body in the earth, in obedience to my word, so that no one may know the place, except yourselves. In the resurrection of the dead it will be restored to me incorruptible by the Saviour. Distribute my garments as follows: let Athanasius, the bishop, have the one sheepskin and the garment I sleep on, which he gave me new, and which has grown old with me. Let Serapion, the bishop, have the other sheepskin. As to the hair shirt, keep it for yourselves. And now, my children, farewell; Anthony is going, and is no longer with you." He died in 356, being one hundred and five years old, and unburdened by old age. His whole conduct indicates the predominance of a glowing and yet gloomy fancy, which is the proper condition of religious asceticism. Like many of the mystics, he affected to despise human science; one of his reported sayings is, "He who has a sound mind has no need of learning." At the same time, Athanasius states that he was a diligent student of the Scriptures. "The whole Nicene age venerated in Anthony a model saint. This fact brings out most characteristically the vast difference between the ancient and the modern, the old Catholic and the evangelical Protestant conception of the nature of Christian religion. The specifically Christian element in the life of Anthony, especially as measured by the Pauline standard, is very small. Nevertheless, we can but admire the miserable magnificence, the simple, rude grandeur of this hermit sanctity, even in its aberration. Anthony concealed under his sheepskin a childlike humility, an amiable simplicity, a rare energy of will, and a glowing love to God, which maintained itself for almost ninety years in the absence of all the comforts and pleasures of natural life, and triumphed over all the temptations of the flesh. By piety alone, without the help of education or learning, he became one of the most remarkable and influential men in the history of the ancient church. Even heathen contemporaries could not withhold from him their reverence, and the celebrated philosopher Synesius, afterward a bishop, before his conversion reckoned Anthony among those rare men in whom flashes of thought take the place of reasonings, and natural power of mind makes schooling needless" (Hook). Although the father of monachism, St. Anthony is not the author of any monastic "rules;" those which the monks of the Eastern schismatic sects attribute to him are the production of St. Basil. Accounts of his life and miracles are given in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists, under the date of the 17th of January, on which day his festival is kept. Many marvelous stories are told of him. The principal source of information concerning him is his life by Athanasius (Opera, vol. i, ed. Benedict), which is supposed, however, to be much interpolated. On this biography Isaac Taylor remarks, "It may be read with edification, taken for just so much as it is worth; but as an exemplar of the Christian character one may find as good, nay, some much better, among the monkish records of the worst times of Romanism. In all these fifty-four pages, scarcely so much as one sentence meets the eye of a kind to recall any notions or sentiments which are distinctively Christian. There is indeed an unimpeachable orthodoxy and a thoroughgoing submissiveness in regard to church authority; and there is a plenty of Christianized soofecism, and there is more than enough of demonology, and quite enough of miracle, but barely a word concerning the propitiatory work of Christ; barely a word indicating any personal feeling of the ascetic's own need of that propitiation as the ground of his hope. Not a word of justification by faith; not a word of the gracious influence of the Spirit in renewing and cleansing the heart; not a word responding to any of those signal passages of Scripture which make the gospel 'glad tidings' to guilty man. Drop a very few phrases borrowed from the Scriptures, and substitute a few drawn from the Koran, and then this memoir of St. Anthony, by Athanasius, might serve, as to its temper, spirit, and substance, nearly as well for a Mohammedan dervish as for a Christian saint" (Taylor, Ancient Christianity, i, 278). His seven epistles to the different monasteries in Egypt, translated out of the Egyptian tongue into Greek, are given with the commentaries of Dionysius the Carthusian upon Dionysius the Areopagite, printed at Cologne, 1536, and in the Bibl. Patrum, iv, 85.—Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. i, 468 sq.; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. i, 172, 270; Neander, *Ch. ST. ANTHONY'S FIRE.—Butler, in his Lives of the Saints, gives the following account of the origin of this name: "In 1089 a pestilential erysipelatous distemper, called the sacred fire, swept off great numbers in most provinces of France; public prayers and processions were ordered against this scourge. At length it pleased God to grant many miraculous cures of this dreadful distemper to those who implored his mercy through the intercession of St. Anthony, especially before his relics; the church [of La Mothe St. Didier, near Vienne, in Dauphiné] in which they were deposited was resorted to by great numbers of pilgrims, and his patronage was implored over the whole kingdom against this disease." The "order of Canons Regular of St. Anthony," a religious fraternity founded about 1090 for the relief of persons afflicted with the fire of St. Anthony, survived in France till 1790. See ANTHONY, ST., ORDER OF.

Anthony, St., of Padua, born at Lisbon in 1195, was at first an Augustinian monk; joined in 1220 the Franciscans, went in 1221 as missionary to Africa, lived for some time as hermit in Sicily, labored with great effect as preacher of repentance throughout Italy, and was the leader of the rigorous party in the Franciscan order against the mitigations introduced by the general Elias. See FRANCISCANS. Tradition ascribes to him the most astounding miracles, e. g. that the fishes came to listen to his open-air sermons, etc. He died at Padua in 1231, and was canonized in 1232. He is commemorated on June 13. He is patron saint of Padua, and also venerated with great distinction in Portugal. His works (sermons, a mystical explanation of the Scriptures, etc.) are of no great importance. They have been published, together with those of St. Francis of Assisi, by De la Haye, Antwerp, 1623. See Wadding, Annales minor.; Tritheim, and Bellarmin, De Script. eccl.; Dirks, Life of St. Anthony of Padua (transl. from the French, N. Y. 1866).

Anthony DE DOMINIS. See DOMINIS.

Anthony DE ROSELLIS, of Arezzo, about the year 1450 was made secretary of the Emperor Frederick III. He died at Padua in 1467, leaving a work entitled Monarchia, in five parts, on the powers of the emperor and the pope, in which he endeavors to show that the pope has not authority in temporal matters, and that in spiritual affairs he is subject to the Church. This remarkable work was printed at Venice in 1483, 1587, and is to be found in Goldast, Monarch. i, 252-556. It is, of course, placed upon the Index Expurgatorius.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1450; Landon, s. v.

Anthony of NEBRIJA, or, with a Latin name, Antonius Nebriensis, a Spanish theologian and historian, born in 1444, and died in 1532. He was appointed by Cardinal Ximenes professor at the university Alcalá de Henares, and collaborer at the Complutensian Bible Polyglot. He was also biographer of Ferdinand the Catholic. He wrote, besides a number of works on classical antiquity, a Dictionary quadruplex (Alcala, 1532, fol. 1); Quinquagena locorum S. Scripture non vulgariter enarratorum (Paris, 1520; Basle, 1543), a remarkable book, in an exegetical point of view, because it takes the original text for its basis.—Prescott, Ferdinand and Isabella, i, 456.

Anthony, St., ORDERS OF. 1. The monastic orders of the Eastern (Greek, Armenian, Jacobite, Coptic, Abyssinian) churches call themselves either after St. Anthony or St. Basil. Neither Anthony himself nor his disciples had founded a religious order, but when the rule of Basil began to spread in the Eastern churches, and most of the monks called themselves after him, some, out of veneration for Anthony, preferred to assume his name. Among the Eastern churches united with Rome, the Chaldeans, Maronites, and United Armenians have orders of Antonian monks. The Chaldeans have only one convent, Man Hormes, near Mosul, called after St. Hormisdas. The Maronite Antonians are subdivided into three classes: the Aleppines, who have their monasteries in the cities, and the Baladites and Libanensians, whose monasteries are on the Lebanon. Together, they have about 60 monasteries, with 1500 monks. The Armenian Antonians are divided into two classes—an older branch on the Lebanon, and a younger one established by Mekhitar. See MEKHITAR. The Antonians of the Eastern churches together number about 3000.—Helyot, Ordres Religieux, ii, 504; P. Karl vom heil. Aloys, Jahrbuch, 1862, p. 70.

2. A military order, founded by Albert of Bavaria, count of Hainault, Holland, and Zealand, in 1382, when he was about to make war on the Turks, and styled "The Order of the Knights of St. Anthony." They wear a collar of gold, fashioned like the girdle of a hermit, to which is appended a bell and crutch, such as are represented in pictures of St. Anthony.—Helyot, Ordres Relig. ii, 506; Landon, s. v.

3. A congregation of Regular Canons, founded in 1035 at Vienna (see Reimbold, De Antonianis, Lips. 1737). The so-called "relics of St. Anthony" were brought from the East in 1070 by Josselin of Touraine, who founded for their reception the "Church of St. Anthony," in La Mothe St. Didier, of which town he was lord. The disease vulgarly called "St. Anthony's fire" was then very prevalent; and it is reported that wonderful cures were wrought at the shrine of St. Anthony. Two gentlemen, named Gaston, who devoted all their property to the work, assisted by seven others, built, for their accommodation, a hospital in the town. One account says that Gaston's son had been cured, and that this charity was the fulfilment of a vow. It is to these hospitaliers that the order of St. Anthony owes its origin. The order soon took root in most of the kingdoms of Europe, and even in Asia and Africa. Gaston was made grand-master of the order, and all the other establishments recognised that at La-Mothe, or, as it came now to be called, St. Antoine, as their chief. Eventually, all these houses became so many commanderies, which were divided into (1.) General, i. e. dependent immediately on that in the city of St. Antoine; and (2.) Subaltern, i. e. dependent on one or other of the general commanderies. The hospitaliers were bound to a uniform and common mode of life, and bore a figure resembling the Greek Tau on their dress. In 1297, Aimon de Montagny, the seventeenth master, perceiving that the malady which had been the origin of the order was fast disappearing, and fearing lest, with the cessation of the disease, the order itself should cease, demanded of Pope Boniface VIII a new form of constitution. This the pope granted, and the new hospitaliers of St. Anthony became regular canons, following the rule of St. Augustine; and the hospital founded by Gaston, and the church built by Josselin, being united to the priory of Benedictines, which previously existed there, and which was ceded to the new order, together formed the abbey-in-chief of the order of St. Anthony, which in after ages received vast possessions and privileges. After many disorders, the fraternity fell into decay in the 18th century, and was united in 1775 to the order of Malta, which it enriched by the addition of 42 houses. The Antonians soon repented of having entered this union, and reclaimed against it in 1780, but in vain. A single commandery, Hoechst, in Germany, existed until 1803, when the order became entirely extinct.—Helyot, Ordres Religieux, i, 264; Landon, s. v.

Anthropolātræ (ἀνθρωπολάτραι, man-worshippers), a name by which the Apollinarians stigmatized the orthodox, because they maintained that Christ was a perfect man, and had a reasonable soul and body. Apollinarius denied this, maintaining that the divine nature in Christ supplied the place of a rational soul, constituting, in fact, his mind.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. i, ch. ii, § 16; Farrar, s. v.

Anthropology (ἀνθρωπολογία, a discourse on man) is that part of scientific theology which treats of man, his nature, relations, etc., as distinguished from theology proper (the doctrine of God) and Christology (the doctrine of Christ). Theological anthropology distinguishes itself from physiological anthropology by viewing man not as a natural being, but in his relation to God. It may be divided into two chief parts: the doctrine of the original condition of man before the fall, and the doctrine of the fall and of sin which through the fall came into the human race, propagated itself, and took effect in every individual.

It must be admitted that a scientific anthropology is not possible in theology without physiological anthropology, that is, without a knowledge of the natural organism of man. But physiological anthropology is only the basis of the theological, and the completest knowledge of man in an anatomical, physiological, and even psychological point of view is unable to disclose the religious nature of man. All that we may learn of the latter in a psychological way is a view of man in his individualism, as a sample of the race; but only the history of mankind in connection with the revelations of God can open to us a full look upon his religious nature. It is therefore safe to assert that, as theology must be anthropological, thus anthropology must be theological; and Harless (preface to his manual of Ethical Theology) is right in recommending to theologians not to neglect the physiological researches on the nature of man. The question of body and soul (or, according to the Trichotomists, body, soul, and spirit), as well as the question on the origin of the soul (pre-existence, traducianism, and creatianism), belong to theological anthropology only in so far as they may contribute to an understanding of man's religious nature. History knows as little of the original condition of man (state of innocence) as natural history knows of paradise. The true procedure of the dogmatic theologian will be to comprehend in his own mind the few but grand hints of the Scriptures on the subject (image of God), and then by exegetical, historical, and philosophical means, so to elaborate them as to show, behind the figurative expressions, the higher idea of humanity; for upon the correct comprehension of this idea depends the correct conception of sin, whether it is to be viewed as a mere negation, a natural deficiency, or both as a privation and deprivation, or deprivation of human nature.

In Genesis we find the biblical narrative of the origin of sin, and this narrative is reproduced daily in the experience of mankind. Even when the full Augustinian idea of original sin may not be adhered to, the consciousness of an aggregate guilt of the race, in which the individual man has his part, is the true deeply religious view, confirmed both by Scripture and experience. Psychological observations, and the study of the Scriptures, complete and illustrate each other nowhere so fully as in the doctrine of sin. Paul, Augustine, and Luther spoke from their personal experience as well as from the depths of human nature. The abstract intellect may always lean toward Pelagianism, but religious experience attests that the intellect alone cannot comprehend the depth of sin (Hundeshagen, Ueg zu Christo, i, 136 sq.).—Hagenbach, Evangelische, 7th ed., p. 308 sq. See THEOLOGY.

Anthropomorphism (from ἄνθρωπος, a man, and μορφή, a form), 1. a term used to signify the "representation of divinity under a human form;" and the nations or sects who have followed this practice have been sometimes called Anthropomorphites (q. v.). The Egyptians represented deities under human forms, as well as those of animals, and sometimes under a combination of the two. The ancient Persians, as Herodotus tells us (i, 131), adored the Supreme Being under no visible form of their own creation, but they worshipped on the tops of mountains, and sacrificed to the sun and moon, to earth, fire, water, and the winds. The Hebrews were forbidden (Exod. xx, 4, 5) to make any image or the representation of any animated being whatever. The Greeks were essentially anthropomorphists, and could never separate the idea of superior powers from the representation of them under a human form; hence, in their mythology and in their arts, each deity had his distinguishing attributes and a characteristic human shape. Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans revere God as a spirit, and therefore reject all representations of Deity in human form.

2. The term is also used to denote that figure of speech by which the sacred writers attribute to God parts, actions, and affections which properly belong to man; as when they speak of the eyes of God, his hand, etc. Anthropomorphism (ἄνθρωπομορφισμός) differs from anthropopathy (ἄνθρωποπάθεια) in this: the first is the attributing to God any thing whatever which, strictly speaking, is applicable to man only; the second is the act of attributing to God passions which belong to man's nature. Instances of both are found in the Scriptures, by which they adapt themselves to human modes of speaking, and to the limited capacities of men (see Klugling, Ceb. d. Anthropomorphismus d. Bibl., Danz. 1806; Gelepe, Apologie d. anthropomorph. u. anthropopath. Darstellung Gottes, Leips. 1842). These anthropopathies we must, however, interpret in a manner suitable to the majesty of the Divine nature. Thus, when the members of a human body are ascribed to God, we must understand by them those perfections of which such members are in us the instruments. The eye, for instance, represents God's knowledge and watchful care; the arm his power and strength; his ear the regard he pays to prayer and to the cry of oppression and misery, etc. Farther, when human affections are attributed to God, we must so interpret them as to imply no imperfection, such as perturbed feeling, in him. When God is said to repent, the antecedent, by a frequent figure of speech, is put for the consequent; and in this case we are to understand an altered mode of proceeding on the part of God, which in man is the effect of repenting.

Anthropomorphic phrases, generally considered, are such as ascribe to the Deity mixed perfections and human imperfections. These phrases may be divided into three classes, according to which we ascribe to God: 1. Human actions (ἄνθρωποποιήσεις); 2. Human affections, passions, and sufferings (anthropopathy); 3. Human form, human organs, human members (anthropomorphism). A rational being, who receives impressions through the senses, can form conceptions of the Deity only by a consideration of his own powers and properties (Journal Sac. Lit. 1848, p. 9 sq.). Anthropomorphic modes of thought are therefore unavoidable in the religion of mankind; and although they can furnish no other than corporeal or sensible representations of the Deity, they are nevertheless true and just when we guard against transferring to God qualities pertaining to the human senses. It is, for instance, a proper expression to assert that God knows all things; it is improper, that is, tropical or anthropomorphic, to say that he sees all things. Anthropomorphism is thus a species of accommodation (q. v.), inasmuch as by these representations the Deity, as it were, lowers himself to the comprehension of men. We can only think of God as the archetype of our own spirit, and the idea of God can no longer be retained if we lose sight of this analogy. Anthropomorphism must be supplanted by Christianity; anthropomorphism is not supplanted, but spiritualized and refined. Only what is false must be rejected—that crudeness which transfers to God human passions (πάθη) and defects, for want of recollecting the elevation of the Supreme Being, as well as his relationship to man. Christianity must teach us to distinguish what is owing to the corrupting influence of sin from what constitutes the true analogy between God and man. In heathenism a false anthropomorphism prevailed, since polytheism presented in its gods the apotheosis of human qualities, not only of virtues, but of vices, and withal a deification of the power manifested in Nature. Among the common, carnally-minded Jews there was a corresponding crudeness in their views of the Divine attributes; for omnipotence was represented as unlimited caprice, and punitive justice as perfectly analogous to human wrath. McCosh remarks that "of all systems, Pantheism is the most apt, in our times, to land in Anthropomorphism. For, if God and his works be one, then we shall be led to look on humanity as the highest manifestation of the divinity, and the natural devoutness of the heart will find vent in hero-worship, or the foolish raving about great men, which has been so common among the eminent literary men of the age now passing away, the issue of the Pantheism which rose like a vapor in Germany, and came over like a fog into Britain and America" (Intuitions of the Mind, pt. iii, § 5). See Seiler, Bibl. Hermeneutik, p. 56; Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v.; Horne, Introduction, i, 362; Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, i, 102 sq.; Tappe, De Anthropopathia (Dorp. 1815).

Anthropomorphites [see ANTHROPOMORPHISM], a sect of ancient heretics, who were so denominated because they understood every thing spoken in Scripture in a literal sense, and particularly that passage of Genesis in which it is said "God made man after his own image." Hence they maintained that God had a human shape (see Fremling, De Anthropomorphitis, Lund. 1787). They were also called AULANI, from Audius, a Syrian who originated their sect. The orthodox bishops prevailed on the emperor to banish Audius to Syria, where he labored for the propagation of Christianity among the Goths, built convents, and instituted several bi-shops, and died about 372. In consequence of repeated persecutions, the sect ceased to exist toward the close of the 5th century. Origen wrote against certain monks in Egypt who were Anthropomorphites; but whether they inherited their views from Audius, or professed them independently of him, is still doubtful. Anthropomorphites appeared again in the 10th century, and in the 17th under Paul Felgenhauer (q. v.). "Anthropomorphism has been recently revived by the Mormons. In Elder Moffat's Latter-Day Saints' Catechism, God is described as an intelligent material personage, possessing body, parts, and passions, and unable to 'occupy two distinct places at once'." (Williams, Note to Brownie on 39 Articles, p. 19).—Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 620, 705-6; Landon, s. v.

Anthropopathy. See ANTHROPOMORPHISM.

Antibaptists (from ἀντί, against, and βαπτίζω, to baptize), those who oppose baptism. Of this description there are two sorts: (1.) Those who oppose it altogether, as the Friends, usually called Quakers, who have from the beginning rejected it as an ordinance, declaring it to be superseded by the baptism of the Spirit, under whose peculiar administration Christians live, and whose influences can be and are received (as they maintain) without any sacramental medium for their conveyance. But though these are Antibaptists essentially, they are not so technically. (2.) The class of persons to whom that name properly belongs are those who deny the necessity of baptism to any except new converts. "Baptism," they tell us, "is a proselyting ordinance, to be applied only to those who come over to Christianity from other religions, and not to their descendants, whether infant or adult." This they infer from the words of the commission, and from the practice of the apostles and first Christians. It has been stated that there are in Ireland several growing societies of Antibaptists. See BAPTISM.

Antiburghers, a branch of seceders from the Church of Scotland, who differ from the Established Church chiefly in matters of church government; and from the Burghers (q. v.), with whom they were originally united (in the Erskine secession), respecting the lawfulness of taking the Burgess oath, which ran thus: "I profess and allow with my heart the true religion presently professed within this realm and authorized by the laws thereof; I shall abide thereat and defend the same to my life's end; renouncing the Roman religion called Papistry." The seceders could not agree in their interpretation of this oath, some of them construing it into a virtual approval of the National Church, others maintaining that it was merely a declaration of Protestantism and a security against Popery. The contest was soon embittered by personal asperities, and in 1747 a schism took place. Those who rejected the oath were called the General Associate Synod, or Antiburghers, the others were known as the Associate Synod, or Burghers. The former party were, in matters of church government, rigid adherents of the old Presbyterian system. (Marsden, Churches and Sects, i, 293; Eadie, U. P. Church, in the Encyc. M. trop.) See ERSKINE; SECEDERS; SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF.

Antichrist (ἀντίχριστος, against Christ; others, instead of Christ [see below]), a term which has received a great variety of interpretations. Although the word Antichrist is used only by the Apostle John (Epist. i and ii), yet it has been generally applied also (1) to the "Little Horn" of the "King of Fierce Countenance" (Dan. vii and viii); (2) to the "false Christ" predicted by our Saviour (Matt. xxiv); (3) to the "Man of Sin" of St. Paul (2 Thess.); and (4) to the "Beasts" of the Apocalypse (Rev. xiii, xvii).

1. Meaning of the word.—Some maintain (e. g. Greswell) that Antichrist can mean only "false Christ," taking ἀντι in the sense of "instead." But this is undue refinement; ἀντι bears the sense of "against" as well as "instead of," both in classical and N. T. usage. So ἀντιγράψασθαι means to gain instead of, while ἀντιλέγειν means to speak against. The word doubtless includes both meanings—"pseudo-Christ" as well as "opposed to Christ," much as "anti-pope" implies both rivalry and antagonism. According to Bishop Hurd, it signifies "a person of power actuated with a spirit opposite to that of Christ." For, to adopt the illustration of the same writer, "as the word Christ is frequently used in the apostolic writings for the doctrine of Christ, in which sense we are to understand to 'put on Christ,' to 'grow in Christ,' or to 'learn Christ,' so Antichrist, in the abstract, may be taken for a doctrine subversive of the Christian; and when applied to a particular man, or body of men, it denotes one who sets himself against the spirit of that doctrine." It seems, however, that the Scriptures employ the term both with a general and limited signification. In the general sense, with which Bishop Hurd's idea mainly agrees, every person who is hostile to the authority of Christ, as Lord or head of the Church, and to the spirit of his religion, is called Antichrist; as when the Apostle John, referring to certain false teachers who corrupted the truth from its simplicity, says, "Even now are there many Antichrists" (1 John ii, 18; iv, 3), many who corrupt the doctrine and blaspheme the name of Christ, i. e. Jewish sectaries (Lücke, Comment. in loc.).

II. Types and Predictions of Antichrist in O. T.—1. Balaam. As Moses was the type of Christ, so Balaam, the opponent of Moses, is to be taken as an O. T. type of Antichrist (Num. xxxi, 16; comp. Jude 9-11; 2 Pet. ii, 14-16; Rev. ii, 14). See BALAAM.

2. Antiochus Epiphanes, the "King of Fierce Countenance" (Dan. viii, 23-25): "And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power; and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many; he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand." (Comp. also ch. xi, xii.) Most interpreters concur in applying this passage to Antiochus Epiphanes as a type of Antichrist. Antiochus is here set forth (ch. viii) as a theocratic anti-Messiah, opposed to the true Messiah, who, it will be remembered, is generally described in O. T. as a king. Jerome (quoted in Smith, Dictionary, s. v.) argues as follows: "All that follows (from ch. xi, 21) to the end of the book applies personally to Antiochus Epiphanes, brother of Seleucus, and son of Antiochus the Great; for, after Seleucus, he reigned eleven years in Syria, and possessed Judæa; and in his reign there occurred the persecution about the Law of God, and the wars of the Maccabees. But our people consider all these things to be spoken of Antichrist, who is to come in the last time. . . . It is the custom of Holy Scripture to anticipate in types the reality of things to come. For in the same way our Lord and Saviour is spoken of in the 72d Psalm, which is entitled a Psalm of Solomon, and yet all that is there said cannot be applied to Solomon. But in part, and as in a shadow and image of the truth, these things are foretold of Solomon, to be more perfectly fulfilled in our Lord and Saviour. As, then, in Solomon and other saints the Saviour has types of His coming, so Antichrist is rightly believed to have for his type that wicked king Antiochus, who persecuted the saints and defiled the Temple" (Hieron. Op. iii, 1127, Par. 1704). See ANTOCHUS EPIPHANES.

3. The Little Horn (Dan. vii). Here the four beasts indicate four kings; their kingdoms are supposed to be the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Syrian (some say Roman) empires. The last empire breaks up into ten, after which the king rises up and masters three (ver. 24) of them. It is declared (ver. 25) that "he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time"—indicating a person, as well as a power or polity. It is likely that this prediction refers also to Antiochus as the type of Antichrist, at least primarily. See HORN, LITTLE.

III. Passages in N. T.—1. In Matt. xxiv, Christ himself foretells the appearance of false Messiahs; thus, ver. 5: "For many shall come in my name, saying I am Christ, and shall deceive many;" also ver. 23, 24: "Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ or there, believe it not; for there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; inso much that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." (Comp. Mark xiii, 21, 22.) In these passages anti- Christian teachers and their works are predicted. Christ teaches "that (1) in the latter days of Jerusalem there should be sore distress, and that in the midst of it there should arise impostors who would claim to be the promised Messiah, and would lead away many of their countrymen after them; and that (2) in the last days of the world there should be a great tribulation and persecution of the saints, and that there should arise at the same time false Christs and false prophets, with an unparalleled power of leading astray. In type, therefore, our Lord predicted the rise of the several impostors who excited the fanaticism of the Jews before their fall. In antitype He predicted the future rise of impostors in the last days, who should beguile all but the elect into the belief of their being God's prophets, or even his Christs. Our Lord is not speaking of any one individual (or polity), but rather of those forerunners of the Antichrist who are his servants and actuated by his spirit. They are ψευδόχριστοι (false Christs), and can deceive almost the elect, but they are not specifically ὁ ἀντίχριστος (the Antichrist); they are ψευδοπροφήται (false prophets), and can show great signs and wonders, but they are not ὁ ψευδοπροφήτης (the false prophet) (Rev. xvi, 14)" (Smith, s. v.).

2. St. Paul's Man of Sin. Paul specifically personifies Antichrist, 2 Thess. ii, 3, 4: "Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God;" also ver. 8-10: "And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming; even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish." Here he "who opposeth himself" (ὁ ἀντικείμενος, the Adversary, ver. 4) is plainly Antichrist. Paul tells the Thessalonians that the spirit of Antichrist, or Antichristianism, called by him "the mystery of iniquity," was already working; but Antichrist himself he characterizes as "the Man of Sin," "the Son of Perdition," "the Adversary to all that is called God," "the one who lifts himself above all objects of worship;" and assures them that he should not be revealed in person until some present obstacle to his appearance should have been taken away, and until the predicted ἀποστασία should have occurred (Smith, s. v.). Comp. 1 Tim. iv, 1-3; 2 Tim. iii, 1-5. See MAN OF SIN.

3. The Antichrist of John. The Apostle John also personifies Antichrist, alluding, as St. Paul does, to previous oral teaching on the subject, and applying it to a class of opponents of Christ; ch. ii, 18: "Little children, it is the last time; and as ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now are there many Antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time;" and to a spirit of opposition; ch. iv, 3: "And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God. And this is that spirit of Antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come; and even now already is it in the world." The Apostle here teaches "that the spirit of the Antichrist could exist even then, though the coming of the Antichrist himself was future, and that all who denied the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus were Antichrists, as being types of the final Antichrist who was to come. The teaching of John's Epistles, therefore, amounts to this, that in type, Cerinthus, Basilides, Simon Magus, and those Gnostics who denied Christ's Sonship, and all subsequent heretics who should deny it, were Antichrists, as being wanting in that divine principle of love which with him is the essence of Christianity; and he points on to the final appearance of the Antichrist that was "to come" in the last times, according as they had been orally taught, who would be the antitype of these his forerunners and servants." Comp. also 1 John iv, 1-3; 2 John v, 7. "From John and Paul together we learn (1) that the Antichrist should come; (2) that he should not come until a certain obstacle to his coming was removed; (3) nor till the time of, or rather till after the time of the ἀποστασία; (4) that his characteristics would be (a) open opposition to God and religion; (b) a claim to the incommunicable attributes of God; (c) iniquity, sin, and lawlessness; (d) a power of working lying miracles; (e) marvellous capacity of beguiling souls; (5) that he would be actuated by Satan; (6) that his spirit was already at work manifesting itself partially, incompletely, and typically, in the teachers of infidelity and immorality already abounding in the church" (Smith, s. v.).

The Obstacle (τὸ κατέχον).—Before leaving the apostolical passages on Antichrist, it is expedient to inquire into the meaning of the "obstacle" alluded to in the last paragraph: that which "withholdeth" (τὸ κατέχον, 2 Thess. ii, 6); described also in ver. 7 as a person: "he who now letteth" (ὁ κατέχων). The early Christian writers generally consider "the obstacle" to be the Roman empire; so "Tertullian (De Resur. Carn. c. 24, and Apol. c. 32); St. Chrysostom and Theophylact on 2 Thess. ii; Hippolytus (de Antichristo, c. 49); St. Jerome on Dan. vii; St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xx, 19); St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. xv, 6; see Dr. H. More's Works, 1 k. ii, ch. xix, p. 690; Mede, bk. iii, ch. xiii, p. 656; Alford, Gk. Test. iii, 57; Wordsworth, On the Apocalypse, p. 520). Theodoret and Theodore of Mopsuestia hold it to be the determination of God. Theodoret's view is embraced by Pelt; the Patristic interpretation is accepted by Wordsworth. Ellicott and Alford so far modify the Patristic interpretation as to explain the obstacle to be the restraining power of human law (τὸ κατέχον) wielded by the empire of Rome (ὁ κατέχων) when Tertullian wrote, but now by the several governments of the civilized world. The explanation of Theodoret is untenable on account of Paul's further words, 'until he be taken out of the way,' which are applied by him to the obstacle. The modification of Ellicott and Alford is necessary if we suppose the ἀποστασία to be an infidel apostasy still future; for the Roman empire is gone, and this apostasy is not come, nor is the Wicked One revealed. There is much to be said for the Patristic interpretation in its plainest acceptance. How should the idea of the Roman empire being the obstacle to the revelation of Antichrist have originated? There was nothing to lead the early Christian writers to such a belief. They regarded the Roman empire as idolatrous and abominable, and would have been more disposed to consider it as the precursor than as the obstacle to the Wicked One. Whatever the obstacle was, Paul says that he told the Thessalonians what it was. Those to whom he had preached knew, and every time that his Epistle was publicly read (1 Thess. v, 27), questions would have been asked by those who did not know, and thus the recollection must have been kept up. It is very difficult to see whence the tradition could have arisen, except from Paul's own teaching. It may be asked, Why then did he not express it in writing as well as by word of mouth? St. Jerome's answer is sufficient: 'If he had openly and unreservedly said, 'Antichrist will not come unless the Roman empire be first destroyed,' the infant church would have been exposed in consequence to persecution' (ad Algas, Qu. xi, vol. iv, p. 209, Par. 1706). Remigius gives the same reason: 'He spoke obscurely for fear a Roman should perhaps read the Epistle, and raise a persecution against him and the other Christians, for they held that they were to rule for ever in the world' (Bib. Patr. Misc. viii, 1018; see Wordsworth, On the Apocalypse, p. 343). It would appear, then, that the obstacle was probably the Roman empire, and on its being taken out of the way there did occur the 'falling away.' Zion the beloved city became Sodom the bloody city—still Zion though Sodom, still Sodom though Zion. According to the view given above, this would be the description of the church in her present estate, and this will continue to be our estate, until the time, times, and half time, during which the evil element is allowed to remain within her, shall have come to their end" (Smith, s. v.).

3. Passages in the Apocalypse.—(1) The Beast from the Sea. The Apocalypse symbolizes the final opposition to Christianity as a beast out of the pit (xi, 7): "And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and kill them;" out of the sea (xiii): "And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy. And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion; and the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority" (comp. the whole chapter, and chap. xvii, 1-18). The "beast" is here similar to the Little Horn of Daniel. "The Beast whose power is absorbed into the Little Horn has ten horns (Dan. vii, 7), and rises from the sea (Dan. vii, 3); the Apocalyptic Beast has ten horns (Rev. xiii, 1), and rises from the sea (ibid.). The Little Horn has a mouth speaking great things (Dan. vii, 8, 11, 20); the Apocalyptic Beast has a mouth speaking great things (Rev. xiii, 5). The Little Horn makes war with the saints, and prevails (Dan. vii, 21); the Apocalyptic Beast makes war with the saints, and overcomes them (Rev. xiii, 7). The Little Horn speaks great words against the Most High (Dan. vii, 25); the Apocalyptic Beast opens his mouth in blasphemy against God (Rev. xiii, 6). The Little Horn wears out the saints of the Most High (Dan. vii, 25); the woman who rides on, i. e. directs, the Apocalyptic Beast, is drunken with the blood of saints (Rev. xvii, 6). The persecution of the Little Horn is to last a time, and times and a dividing of times, i. e. three and a half times (Dan. vii, 25): power is given to the Apocalyptic Beast for forty-two months, i. e. three and a half times (Rev. xiii, 5)" (Smith, s. v.). These and other parallels show that as the Little Horn was typical of an individual that should stand to the church as the leading type of Antichrist, so John's Apocalyptic Beast was symbolical of a later individual, who should embody the elements of a similar Antichristian power with respect to the Christians.

(2) The Second Beast and the False Prophet (Rev. xiii, 11-18; xix, 11-21). In these passages we find described a second beast, coming up out of the earth, who is accompanied by (or identical with) "the False Prophet." The following views are from Smith, s. v.: "His characteristics are [1] 'doing great wonders, so that he maketh fire to come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men' (Rev. xiii, 13). This power of miracle-working, we should note, is not attributed by John to the First Beast; but it is one of the chief signs of Paul's Adversary, 'whose coming is with all power, and signs, and lying wonders' (2 Thess. ii, 9). [2] 'He deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the Beast' (Rev. xiii, 14). 'He wrought miracles with which he deceived them that received the mark of the Beast and worshipped the image of the Beast' (Rev. xix, 20). In like manner, no special power of beguiling is attributed to the First Beast; but the Adversary is possessed of 'all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved' (2 Thess. ii, 10). [3] He has horns like a lamb, i. e. he bears an outward resemblance to the Messiah

(Rev. xiii, 11); and the Adversary sits in the temple of God showing himself that he is God (2 Thess. ii, 4). [4] His title is The False Prophet, ὁ ψευδοπροφήτης (Rev. xvi, 13; xix, 20); and our Lord, whom Antichrist counterfeits, is emphatically the Prophet, ὁ Προφήτης. (The ψευδοπροφήται of Matt. xxiv, 24, are the forerunners of ὁ ψευδοπροφήτης, as John the Baptist of the True Prophet.) It would seem that the Antichrist appears most distinctly in the Book of the Revelation by this Second Beast or the False Prophet, especially in the more general or representative character. He is not, however, necessarily a person, but rather the symbol of some power that should arise, who will ally itself with a corrupt religion (for the two Apocalyptic beasts are designated as distinct), represent itself as her minister and vindicator (Rev. xiii, 12), compel men by violence to pay reverence to her (xiii, 14), breathe a new life into her decaying frame by his use of the secular arm in her behalf (xiii, 15), forbidding civil rights to those who renounce her authority and reject her symbols (xiii, 17), and putting them to death by the sword (xiii, 15)." See BEAST.

IV. Interpretations.—Who or what is Antichrist? The answers to this question are legion. The Edinburgh Encyclopædia (s. v.) enumerates fourteen different theories, and the list might be greatly enlarged. We give (1) a brief summary of the Scripture testimony; (2) the views of the early Christians; (3) the views held in the Middle Ages; (4) from the Reformation to the present time. In this sketch, we make use, to a considerable extent, of the article in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, to which references have already been made.

1. Scripture Teaching.—The sum of Scripture teaching with regard to the Antichrist, then, appears to be as follows: Already, in the times of the apostles, there was the mystery of iniquity, the spirit of Antichrist, at work. It embodied itself in various shapes—in the Gnostic heretics of John's days; in the Jewish impostors who preceded the fall of Jerusalem; in all heresiarchs and unbelievers, especially those whose heresies had a tendency to deny the incarnation of Christ; and in the great persecutors who from time to time afflicted the church. But this Antichristian spirit was originally, and is now again diffused; it has only at times concentrated itself in certain personal or distinct forms of persecution, which may thus be historically enumerated: 1. Antiochus Epiphanes, the consummation of the Hellenizing policy of the Græco-Syrian monarchy, and denoted by the Little Horn and fierce king of Daniel. 2. The apostate Jewish faith, especially in its representatives who opposed Christianity in its early progress, and at length caused the downfall of the Jewish nation, as represented by the allusions in our Saviour's last discourse and in John's epistles. 3. The Roman civil power (the first beast of Revelation) abetting the pagan mythology (the second beast, or false prophet) in its violent attempts to crush Christianity, at first insidiously, but finally open, as culminating in Nero and Domitian. It is this phase which seems incipiently alluded to by Paul. All these have again their fulfillment (so to speak) in the great apostasy of the papal system. (Compare especially the characteristics of the Second Beast, above.) There is also dimly foreshadowed some future contest, which shall arouse the same essential elements of hostility to divine truth. See BABYLON; GOG.

2. Early Christian Views.—The early Christians looked for Antichrist in a person, not in a polity or system. "That he would be a man armed with Satanic powers is the opinion of Justin Martyr, A.D. 103 (Dial. 371, 20, 21, Thirlbii, 1722); of Irenæus, A.D. 140 (Op. v, 25, 437, Grabii, 1702); of Tertullian, A.D. 150 (De Res. Carn. c. 24; Apol. c. 32); of Origen, A.D. 184 (Op. i, 667, Delarue, 1733); of his contemporary, Hippolytus (De Antichristo, 57, Fabricii, Hamburgi, 1716); of Cyprian, A.D. 250 (Ep. 58; Op. 120, Oxon.

1682); of Victorinus, A.D. 270 (Bibl. Patr. Magna, iii, 136, Col. Agrip, 1618); of Lactantius, A.D. 300 (Div. Inst., vii, 17); of Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 315 (Catech., xv, 4); of Jerome, A.D. 330 (Op. iv, pars i, 219, Parisis, 1633); of Chrysostom, A.D. 347 (Comm. in II Thess.); of Hilary of Poitiers, A.D. 350 (Comm. in Matt.); of Augustine, A.D. 354 (De Citit. Dei, xx, 19); of Ambrose, A.D. 380 (Comm. in Luc.). The authors of the Sibylline Oracles, A.D. 150, and of the Apostolical Constitutions, Celsus (see Orig. c. Cels. lib. vi), Ephraem Syrus, A.D. 370, Theodoret, A.D. 430, and a few other writers, seem to have regarded the Antichrist as the devil himself, rather than as his minister or an emanation from him. But they may, perhaps, have meant no more than to express the identity of his character and his power with that of Satan. Each of the writers to whom we have referred gives his own judgment with respect to some particulars which may be expected in the Antichrist, while they all agree in representing him as a person about to come shortly before the glorious and final appearance of Christ, and to be destroyed by His presence. Justin Martyr speaks of him as the man of the apostasy, and dwells chiefly on the persecutions which he would cause. Irenæus describes him as summing up the apostasy in himself; as having his seat at Jerusalem; as identical with the Apocalyptic Beast (c. 28); as foreshadowed by the unjust judge; as being the man who 'should come in his own name,' and as belonging to the tribe of Dan (c. 30). Tertullian identifies him with the Beast, and supposes him to be about to arise on the fall of the Roman Empire (De Res. Carn. c. 25). Origen describes him in Eastern phrase as the child of the devil and the counterpart of Christ. Hippolytus understands the Roman Empire to be represented by the Apocalyptic Beast, and the Antichrist by the False Prophet, who would restore the wounded Beast by his craft and by the wisdom of his laws. Cyprian sees him typified in Antiochus Epiphanes (Eshort. ad Mart. c. 11). Victorinus, with several others, misunderstanding Paul's expression that the mystery of iniquity was in his day working, supposes that the Antichrist will be a revived hero; Lactantius, that he will be a king of Syria, born of an evil spirit; Cyril, that he will be a magician, who by his arts will get the mastery of the Roman Empire. Jerome describes him as the son of the devil, sitting in the Church as though he were the Son of God; Chrysostom as ἀντι-Θεός τις, sitting in the Temple of God, that is, in all the churches, not merely in the Temple at Jerusalem; Augustine as the adversary holding power for three and a half years—the Beast, perhaps, representing Satan's empire. The primitive belief may be summed up in the words of Jerome (Comm. on Daniel): 'Let us say that which all ecclesiastical writers have handed down, viz., that at the end of the world, when the Roman Empire is to be destroyed, there will be ten kings, who will divide the Roman world among them; and there will arise an eleventh little king, who will subdue three of the ten kings, that is, the king of Egypt, of Africa, and of Ethiopia, as we shall hereafter show; and on these having been slain, the seven other kings will also submit. "And behold," he says, "in the ram were the eyes of a man"—this is that we may not suppose him to be a devil or a dæmon, as some have thought, but a man in whom Satan will dwell utterly and bodily—"and a mouth speaking great things;" for he is "the man of sin, the son of perdition, who sitteth in the temple of God, making himself as God"' (Op. iv, 511, Col. Agrip, 1616). In his Comment. on Dan. xi, and in his reply to Algasia's eleventh question, he works out the same view in greater detail, the same line of interpretation continued. Andreas of Casarea, A.D. 550, explains him to be a king actuated by Satan, who will reunite the old Roman Empire and reign at Jerusalem (In Apoc. c. xiii); Aretas, A.D. 650, as a king of the Romans, who will reign over the Saracens in Bagdad (In Apoc. c. xiii). (Smith, s. v.)

3. Middle-Age Views.—In the Middle Age it was the prevailing opinion that Antichrist would either be brought forth by a virgin, or be the offspring of a bishop and a nun. About the year 950, Adso, a monk in a monastery of Western Franconia, wrote a treatise on Antichrist, in which he assigned a later time to his coming, and also to the end of the world (see Schrockh, Kirchengesch. xxi, p. 243). He did not distinctly state whom he meant to be understood by Antichrist (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 263). "A Frank king," he says, "will reunite the Roman Empire, and abdicate on Mount Olivet, and, on the dissolution of his kingdom, the Antichrist will be revealed." The same writer supposes that he will be born in Babylon, that he will be educated at Bethsaida and Chorazin, and that he will proclaim himself the Son of God at Jerusalem (Treat. in Antichr. eund. August. Opera, ix, 454, Paris, 1637). In the singular predictions of Hildegarde († 1197), Antichrist is foretold as the spirit of doubt. She states that the exact season of Antichrist is not revealed, but describes his manifestation as an impious imitation or "parody of the incarnation of the Divine Word" (Christian Remembrance, xlv, 50). See HILDEGARDE. But "the received opinion of the twelfth century is brought before us in a striking manner in the interview between Richard I and the abbot Joachim of Floris († 1202) at Messina, as the king was on his way to the Holy Land. 'I thought,' said the king, 'that Antichrist would be born in Antioch or in Babylon, and of the tribe of Dan, and would reign in the temple of the Lord in Jerusalem, and would walk in that land in which Christ walked, and would reign in it for three years and a half, and would dispute against Elijah and Enoch, and would kill them, and would afterward die; and that after his death God would give sixty days of repentance, in which these might repent which should have erred from the way of truth, and have been seduced by the preaching of Antichrist and his false prophets.' This seems to have been the view defended by the archbishops of Reuen and Auxerre, and by the bishop of Bayonne, who were present at the interview, but it was not Joachim's opinion. He maintained the seven heads of the Beast to be Herod, Nero, Constantius, Mohammed, Melchut, who were past; Saladin, who was then living; and Antichrist, who was shortly to come, being already born in the city of Rome, and about to be elevated to the apostolic see (Roger de Hoveden, in Richard I., anno 1170). In his own work on the Apocalypse, Joachim speaks of the second Apocalyptic Beast as being governed by 'some great prelate who will be like Simon Magus, and, as it were, universal pontiff throughout the world, and be that very Antichrist of whom St. Paul speaks.' These are very noticeable words. Gregory I had long since (A.D. 590) declared that any man who held even the shadow of the power which the popes of Rome soon after his time arrogated to themselves would be the precursor of Antichrist. Arnulphus, bishop of Orleans (or perhaps Gerbert), in an invective against John XV at the Council of Rheims, A.D. 991, had declared, that if the Roman pontiff was destitute of charity and puffed up with knowledge, he was Antichrist; if destitute both of charity and of knowledge, that he was a lifeless stone (Mansi, ix, 132, Ven. 1774); but Joachim is the first to suggest, not that such and such a pontiff was Antichrist, but that the Antichrist would be a Universalis Pontifex, and that he would occupy the apostolic see. Still, however, we have no hint of an order of men being the Antichrist; it is a living individual man that Joachim contemplates." Amalrich of Bena († 12th century) seems to have been the first to teach explicitly that the pope (i. e. the papal system) is Antichrist: Quia Papa esset Antichristus et Roma Babylon et ipse sedet in monte Oliveti, i. e. in pinguedine potestatis (according to Casarius of Heisterbach; comp. Engelhardt, Kirchenhistorische Abhandlungen, p. 256, quoted by Hagenbach). The German emperors, in their contests with the popes, often applied the title Antichrist to the latter; we find instances of this as early as the times of the Hohenstaufen. Emperor Louis, surnamed the Bavarian, also called Pope John XXI the mystical Antichrist (Schroëckh, xxxi, p. 108). John Aventinus, in his Annalium Bœorum, libri viii, p. 651, Lips. 1710, himself the Romish writer, speaks of it as a received opinion of the Middle Age that the reign of Antichrist was that of Hildebrand († 1085), and cites Eberhard, archbishop of Salzburg (12th century), as asserting that Hildebrand had, "in the name of religion, laid the foundation of the kingdom of Antichrist 170 years before his time." He can even name the ten horns. They are the "Turks, Greeks, Egyptians, Africans, Spaniards, English, French, Germans, Sicilians, and Italians, who now occupy the provinces of Rome; and a little horn has grown up with eyes and mouth, speaking great things, which is reducing three of these kingdoms—i. e. Sicily, Italy, and Germany—to subservency; is persecuting the people of Christ and the saints of God with intolerable opposition; is confounding things human and divine, and attempting things unutterable, execrable" (Smith, s. v.). Pope Innocent III (A. D. 1213) designated Mohammed as Antichrist; and as the number of the beast, 666, was held to indicate the period of his dominion, it was supposed that the Mohammedan power was soon to fall.

The Waldenses have a treatise (given in Legor, Hist. des Eglises Vaudoises) concerning Antichrist of the 12th century (Gieseler, Maitland, and others, dispute the date, but the best authorities now agree to it). It treats of Antichrist as the whole anti-Christian principle concealing itself under the guise of Christianity, and calls it a "system of falsehood adorning itself with a show of beauty and piety, yet (as by the names and offices of the Scriptures, and the sacraments, and various other things may appear) very unsuitable to the Church of Christ. The system of iniquity thus completed, with its ministers, great and small, supported by those who are induced to follow it with an evil heart, and blindfold—this is the congregation which, taken together, comprises what is called Antichrist or Babylon, the fourth beast, the whore, the man of sin, the son of perdition." It originated, indeed, "in the times of the apostles, but, by gaining power and worldly influence, it had reached its climax in the corruption of the Papal Church.

"Christ never had an enemy like this; so able to pervert the way of truth into falsehood, inasmuch that the true church, with her children, is trodden under foot. The worship that belongs alone to God he transfers to Antichrist himself—to the creature, male and female, deceased—to images, carcases, and relics. The sacrament of the Eucharist is converted into an object of adoration, and the worshipping of God alone is prohibited. He robs the Saviour of his merits, and the sufficiency of his grace in justification, regeneration, remission of sins, sanctification, establishment in the faith, and spiritual nourishment; ascribing all these things to his own authority, to a form of words, to his own works, to the intercession of saints, and to the fire of purgatory. He seduces the people from Christ, drawing off their minds from seeking those blessings in him, by a lively faith in God, in Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Spirit, and teaching his followers to expect them by the will, and pleasure, and works of Antichrist.

"He teaches to baptize children into the faith, and attributes to this the work of regeneration; thus confounding the work of the Holy Spirit in regeneration with the external rite of baptism, and on this foundation bestows orders, and, indeed, grounds all his Christianity. He places all religion and holiness in going to mass, and has mingled together all descriptions of ceremonies, Jewish, heathen, and Christian—and by means thereof, the people are deprived of spiritual food, seduced from the true religion and the commandments of God, and established in vain and presumptuous hopes. All his works are done to be seen of men, that he may glut himself with insatiable avarice, and hence every thing is set to sale. He allows of open sins without ecclesiastical censure, and even the incontinent are not excommunicated" (Neander, Church History, iv, 605 sq.).

The Hussites followed the Waldenses in this theory of Antichrist, applying it to the papal system. So did Wickliffe and his followers: Wickliffe, Triologus (cited by Schroëckh, xxxiv, 509); Janow, Libre de Antichristo (Hist. et Monum. J. Huss, vol. i). Lord Cobham (Sir John Oldcastle), executed as a Wickliffite, 1417, declared to King Henry V that, "as sure as God's word is true, the pope is the great Antichrist foretold in Holy Writ" (New Gen. Diet. s. v. Oldcastle).

4. From the Reformation downward.—One of the oldest German works in print, the first mentioned by Panzer in the Annalen der älteren deutschen Literatur, is Das Buch vom Antichrist (The Book of Antichrist), or, also, "Büchlin von des Endte Christs Leben und Regierung durch verheugniß Gottes, wie er die Welt tuth verkeren mit seiner fälschen Lere und Rut des Teufels." etc.—"Little Book concerning Antichrist's Life and Rule through God's Providence, how he doth pervert the World with his false Doctrine and Counsel of the Devil," etc. (reprinted at Erfurt, 1516). As early as 1520 Luther began to doubt whether the pope were not Antichrist. In a letter to Spalatin, Feb. 23, 1520, he says, "Ego sic angor at prope non dubitem papam esse proprie Antichristum." In the same year, when he heard of Eck's success in obtaining the bull against him from the pope, Luther exclaimed, "At length the mystery of Antichrist must be unveiled" (Danke, Hist. of Reformation, bk. ii, ch. iii). In the Reformation era the opinion that the papal system is Antichrist was generally adopted; and it is the prevalent opinion among Protestants to this day, although, as will appear below, some writers make Rome only one form of Antichrist. The various classes of opinion, and the writers who maintain them, are given by Smith, s. v., as follows: Bullinger (1504), Chytraeus (1571), Aretius (1573), Foxe (1586), Napier (1593), Mede (1632), Jurieu (1685), Bp. Newton (1750), Cunningham (1813), Faber (1814), Woodhouse (1828), Habershon (1843), identify the False Prophet, or Second Apocalyptic Beast, with Antichrist and with the papacy; Marlort (1574), King James I (1603), Daubuz (1720), Galloway (1802), the First Apocalyptic Beast; Brightman (1600), Pareus (1615), Vitringa (1705), Gill (1776), Bachmair (1778), Fraser (1795), Croly (1828), Fysh (1837), Elliott (1844), both the Beasts. That the pope and his system are Antichrist was taught by Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, Melancthon, Bucer, Beza, Calixtus, Bengel, Michaelis, and by almost all Protestant writers on the Continent. Nor was there any hesitation on the part of English theologians to seize the same weapon of offence. Bishop Bale (1491), like Luther, Bucer, and Melancthon, pronounces the pope in Europe and Mohammed in Africa to be Antichrist. The pope is Antichrist, say Cramer (Works, ii, 46, Camb. 1841), Latimer (Works, i, 149, Camb. 1844), Ridley (Works, p. 53, Camb. 1841), Hooper (Works, ii, 44, Camb. 1852), Hutchinson (Works, p. 301, Camb., 1842), Tyndale (Works, i, 147, Camb. 1848), Sandys (Works, p. 11, Camb. 1841), Philpot (Works, p. 152, Camb. 1842), Jewell (Works, i, 109, Camb. 1845), Rogers (Works, p. 182, Camb. 1851), Fulke (Works, ii, 269, Camb. 1848), Bradford (Works, p. 435, Camb. 1848). Nor is the opinion confined to these 16th century divines, who may be supposed to have been specially incensed against popery. King James held it (Apol. pro Juram. Fidel. Lond. 1609) as strongly as Queen Elizabeth (see Jewell, Letter to Bulling. May 22, 1559, Zurich Letters,

First Series, p. 33, Camb. 1842); and the theologians of the 17th century did not repudiate it, though they less and less dwelt upon it as their struggle came to be with Puritanism in place of popery. Bishop Andrewes maintains it as a probable conclusion from the Epistle to the Thessalonians (Resp. ad Bellarm., p. 304, Oxon. 1851); but he carefully explains that King James, whom he was defending, had expressed his private opinion, not the belief of the church, on the subject (ibid., p. 23). Bramhall introduces limitations and distinctions (Works, iii, 520, Oxf. 1845); significantly suggests that there are marks of Antichrist which apply to the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland as much as to the pope or to the Turk (ibid., iii, 287), and declines to make the Church of England responsible for what individual preachers or writers had said on the subject in moments of exasperation (ib., ii, 582). From this time onward, in the Church of England, the less evangelical divines are inclined to abandon the theory of the Reformers, while, of course, the Romanizers oppose it. Yet it appears, from the list above, that some of the best interpreters in that church, as well as in other branches of Protestantism, maintain the old interpretation of the prophecies of Daniel, Paul, and John.

Some writers have gone back to the old idea of an individual Antichrist yet to come, e. g. "Lacuzza or Benezra (1810), Burgh, Samuel Maitland, Newman (Tracts for the Times, No. 83), Charles Maitland (Prophetic Interpretation). Others prefer looking upon him as long past, and fix upon one or another persecutor or heresiarch as the man in whom the predictions as to Antichrist found their fulfilment. There seems to be no trace of this idea for more than 1600 years in the church. But it has been taken up by two opposite classes of expounders—by Romanists who were anxious to avert the application of the Apocalyptic prophecies from the papacy, and by others, who were disposed, not indeed to deny the prophetic import of the Apocalypse, but to confine the seer's ken within the closest and narrowest limits that were possible. Alcasar, a Spanish Jesuit, taking a hint from Victorinus, seems to have been the first (A. D. 1604) to have suggested that the Apocalyptic prophecies did not extend further than to the overthrow of paganism by Constantine. This view, with variations by Grotius, is taken up and expounded by Bossuet, Calnet, De Saey, Eichhorn, Hug, Herder, Ewald, Moses Stuart, Davidson. The general view of the school is that the Apocalypse describes the triumph of Christianity over Judaism in the first, and over heathenism in the third century. Mariana sees Antichrist in Nero; Bossuet in Diocletian and in Julian; Grotius in Caligula; Wetstein in Titus; Hammond in Simon Magus (Works, iii, 620, Lond. 1631); Whity in the Jews (Comm., ii, 431, Lond. 1760); Le Clerc in Simon, son of Giora, a leader of the rebel Jews; Schüttgen in the Pharisees; Nösset and Krause in the Jewish zealots; Harduin in the High-priest Ananias; F. D. Maurice in Vitellius (On the Apocalypse, Camb. 1860)." (Smith, s. v.)

5. The same spirit that refuses to regard Satan as an individual, naturally looks upon the Antichrist as an evil principle not embodied either in a person or in a polity. Thus Koppe, Storr, Nitzsch, Pelt. (See Alford, Gk. Test., iii, 69.) Some of the Romish theologians find Antichrist in rationalism and radicalism, others in Protestantism as a whole. Some Protestants fix it in Romanism as a whole, others in Jesuitism; others, again, in the latest forms of infidelity, while some of the ultra Lutherans find it in modern radicalism, political and religious. Any view of this kind, when carried so far as to exclude all personal identification, is certainly too vague to be satisfactory. But, at the same time, the just conclusion seems to be that Antichrist is not to be confined to any single person or power, but is essentially a great principle or system of falsehood, having various manifestations, forms of working, and degrees, as especially exemplified in Antiochus Epiphanes, Jewish bigotry, and pagan intolerance; while it is undeniable that later Romanism exhibits some of the most prominent characteristics of Antichrist in a manner so striking and peculiar as to assure us that the system is not only one among the many species of Antichrist, but that it stands in the fore-front, and is pointed at by the finger of prophecy as no other form of Antichrist is (Eden, s. v.).

V. Time of Antichrist.—A vast deal of labor has been spent upon computations based upon the "time, times, and dividing of time" in Daniel (vii, 25), and upon the "number of the Beast" (666) given in Rev. xiii, 18. We can only refer to the commentators and writers on prophecy for these, as it would take too much space to enumerate them. As to Daniel's "time, times, and dividing of time," it is commonly interpreted to mean 1260 years. "The papal power was completely established in the year 755, when it obtained the exarchate of Ravenna. Some, however, date the rise of Antichrist in the year of Christ 606, and Mede places it in 456. If the rise of Antichrist be not reckoned till he was possessed of secular authority, his fall will happen when this power shall be taken away. If his rise began, according to Mede, in 456, he must have fallen in 1716; if in 606, it must be in 1866; if in 755, in 2015. If, however, we use prophetic years, consisting of three hundred and sixty days, and date the rise of Antichrist in the year 755, his fall will happen in the year of Christ 2000" (Watson, s. v.). As to the "number of the beast," the interpretation suggested by Irenæus is one of the most plausible. The number is "the number of a man" (Rev. xiii, 18); and Irenæus names Λατίνος as fulfilling the conditions (see Alford, Comm.), who considers this the nearest approach to a complete solution. But human ingenuity has found the conditions fulfilled also in the name of Mohammed, Luther, Napoleon, and many others. After all the learning and labor spent upon the question, we must confess that it is yet left unsolved.

VI. Jewish and Mohammedan Traditions of Antichrist.—Of these we take the following account from Smith, s. v.: 1. "The name given by the Jews to Antichrist is (אַרְמִילִּיּוֹס) Armillus. There are several rabbinical books in which a circumstantial account is given of him, such as the 'Book of Zerubbabel,' and others printed at Constantinople. Buxtorf gives an abridgment of their contents in his Lexicon, under the head 'Armillus,' and in the fiftieth chapter of his Synagoga Judaica (p. 717). The name is derived from Isa. xi, 4, where the Targum gives 'By the word of his mouth the wicked Armillus shall die,' for 'with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked.' There will, say the Jews, be twelve signs of the coming of the Messiah: (1.) The appearance of three apostate kings who have fallen away from the faith, but in the sight of men appear to be worshippers of the true God. (2.) A terrible heat of the sun. (3.) A dew of blood (Joel ii, 30). (4.) A healing dew for the pious. (5.) A darkness will be cast upon the sun (Joel ii, 31) for thirty days (Isa. xxiv, 22). (6.) God will give universal power to the Romans for nine months, during which time the Roman chieftain will afflict the Israelites; at the end of the nine months God will raise up the Messiah Ben-Joseph—that is, the Messiah of the tribe of Joseph, named Nehemiah—who will defeat the Roman chieftain, and slay him. (7.) Then there will arise Armillus, whom the Gentiles or Christians call Antichrist. He will be born of a marble statue in one of the churches in Rome. He will go to the Romans and will profess himself to be their Messiah and their God. At once the Romans will believe in him and accept him for their king. Having made the whole world subject to him, he will say to the Jews: 'I have given you.' 'Bring me the law which I have given you.' They will bring it with their book of prayers; and he will accept it as his own, and will exhort them to persevere in their belief of him. Then he will send to Nehemiah, and command the Jewish Law to be brought him, and proof to be given from it that he is God. Nehemiah will go before him, guarded by 30,000 warriors of the tribe of Ephraim, and will read, 'I am the Lord thy God: thou shalt have none other gods but me.' Armillus will say that there are no such words in the Law, and will command the Jews to confess him to be God as the other nations had confessed him. But Nehemiah will give orders to his followers to seize and bind him. Then Armillus, in rage and fury, will gather all his people in a deep valley to fight with Israel, and in that battle the Messiah Ben-Joseph will fall, and the angels will bear away his body and carry him to the resting-place of the Patriarchs. Then the Jews will be cast out by all nations, and suffer afflictions such as have not been from the beginning of the world, and the residue of them will fly into the desert, and will remain there forty and five days, during which time all the Israelites who are not worthy to see the redemption shall die. (8.) Then the great angel Michael will rise and blow three mighty blasts of a trumpet. At the first blast there shall appear the true Messiah Ben-David and the prophet Elijah, and they will manifest themselves to the Jews in the desert, and all the Jews throughout the world shall hear the sound of the trump, and those that have been carried captive into Assyria shall be gathered together; and with great gladness they shall come to Jerusalem. Then Armillus will raise a great army of Christians, and lead them to Jerusalem to conquer the new king. But God shall say to Messiah, 'Sit thou on my right hand,' and to the Israelites, 'Stand still and see what God will work for you to-day.' Then God will pour down sulphur and fire from heaven (Ezek. xxxviii, 22), and the impious Armillus shall die, and the impious Idumeans (i. e. Christians), who have destroyed the house of our God and have led us away into captivity, shall perish in misery, and the Jews shall avenge themselves upon them, as it is written: 'The house of Jacob shall be a fire, and the house of Joseph a flame, and the house of Esau (i. e. the Christians) for stubble, and they shall kindle in them and devour them: there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau, for the Lord hath spoken it' (Obad. 18). (9.) On the second blast of the trumpet the tombs shall be opened, and Messiah Ben-David shall raise Messiah Ben-Joseph from the dead. (10.) The ten tribes shall be led to Paradise, and shall celebrate the wedding-feast of the Messiah. And the Messiah shall choose a bride among the fairest of the daughters of Israel, and children and children's children shall be born to him, and then he shall die like other men, and his sons shall reign over Israel after him, as it is written: 'He shall prolong his days' (Isa. liii, 10), which Rambam explains to mean, 'He shall live long, but he too shall die in great glory, and his son shall reign in his stead, and his sons' sons in succession' (Buxtorffii Synagoga Judaica, p. 717, Basil, 1663).

2. Mussulmans, as well as Jews and Christians, expect an Antichrist. They call him Al Dajjal, from a name which signifies an impostor, or a liar; and they hold that their prophet Mohammed taught one of his disciples, whose name was Tamini Al-Dari, every thing relating to Antichrist. On his authority, they tell us that Antichrist must come at the end of the world; that he will make his entry into Jerusalem, like Jesus Christ, riding on an ass; but that Christ, who is not dead, will come at his second advent to encounter him; and that, after having conquered him, he will then die indeed. That the beast described by John in the Revelation will appear with Antichrist, and make war against the saints; that Imam Mahadi, who remains concealed among the Mussulmans, will then show himself, join Jesus Christ, and with him engage Dajjal; after which they will unite the Christians and the Mussulmans, and of the two religions will make but

"These Mohammedan traditions are an adaptation of Christian prophecy and Jewish legend, without any originality or any beauty of their own. They too have their signs which are to precede the final consummation. They are divided into the greater and lesser signs. Of the greater signs the first is the rising of the sun from the west (comp. Matt. xxiv, 29). The next is the appearance of a beast from the earth, sixty cubits high, bearing the staff of Moses and the seal of Solomon, with which he will inscribe the word 'Believer' on the face of the faithful, and 'Unbeliever' on all who have not accepted Islamism (comp. Rev. xiii). The third sign is the capture of Constantinople; while the spoil of which is being divided, news will come of the appearance of Antichrist, and every man will return to his own home. Antichrist will be blind of one eye and deaf of one ear, and will have the name of Unbeliever written on his forehead (Rev. xiii). It is he that the Jews call Messiah Ben-David, and say that he will come in the last times and reign over sea and land, and restore to them the kingdom. He will continue forty days, one of these days being equal to a year, another to a month, another to a week, the rest being days of ordinary length. He will devastate all other places, but will not be allowed to enter Mecca and Medina, which will be guarded by angels. Lastly, he will be killed by Jesus at the gate of Lud. For when news is received of the appearance of Antichrist, Jesus will come down to earth, alighting on the white tower at the east of Damascus, and will slay him; Jesus will then embrace the Mohammedan religion, marry a wife, and leave children after him, having reigned in perfect peace and security, after the death of Antichrist, for forty years. (See Pococke, Porta Mosis, p. 258, Oxon, 1655; and Sale, Koran, Preliminary Discourse.)" (Smith, s. v.)

Antichristianism, a term that conveniently designates, in a collective manner, the various forms of hostility which Christianity has met with at different times. It is equivalent to "the spirit of Antichrist" (τὸ τοῦ Ἀντιχριστοῦ) in the apostolic age (1 John iv, 3). See ANTI-CHRIST. Indeed it exhibited itself against the true religion in the persecutions which the Jews underwent from Antiochus Epiphanes (q. v.), and may be traced in the history of the protosaint Abel (q. v.). It was this that Enoch (q. v.) and Noah denounced in their preaching (Jude 14; 2 Pet. ii, 5-7); that "vexed the righteous soul" of Lot; and that, in fine, has broken forth in all ages as the expression of the world's malignity against the good (comp. John xv, 18-21; 2 Tim. iii, 12). Since the days of persecution it has been confined chiefly to intellectual modes of opposition, and has received the names of Infidelity, Deism, Rationalism, etc. See APOLOGETICS. The Scriptures, however, appear to point to a time when the Antichristian elements shall again array themselves in forms of palpable violence. See GOG. For "the carnal mind" (τὸ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκός, native will) is no less than ever opposed (ἐξέζηρα) to the divine economy and purposes (Rom. viii, 7). It is the same "mystery of iniquity" already foreseen by Paul as then "working" to successive developments (2 Thess. ii, 7); "that ἀνομία in the hearts and lives, in the speeches and writings of men, which only awaits the removal of the hindering power to issue in that concentrated manifestation of ὁ ἄνομος, which shall usher in the times of the end" (Alford, Gr. Test. prol. to vol. iii, p. 68). A stream of Antichristian sentiment and conduct pervades the whole history of the world. The power of evil which we see at work calls forth Antichristian formations, now in one shape, now in another; and so, according to the prophets, it will be until the final triumph of the kingdom of Christ (Olshausen, Commentary, v, 321 sq., Am. ed.). See MYSTERY OF INIQUITY; INFIDELITY.

Antidicomarianites or Antimarianians, a sect of Christian disciples who appeared in Arabia at the end of the fourth century, and taught that Mary had children by Joseph after the Lord's birth. They were not heretics, but doubtless honest opponents of the growing Mariolatry of the time.—Gieseler, Ch. Hist. div. i, § 97; Walch, Hist. der Ketzereien, iii, 578; Epiphanius, Heres. 78, § 19.

Antidōron (ἀντίδωρον, a gift in return or exchange), the title given to the bread which, in the Greek Church, is distributed to the people after the mass. It receives its name from its being received instead of the ἅγιον εὐχάρι, or holy communion, by those who were not prepared to receive the latter, though also by those who were. It was also called eulogia, or the "blessed" bread, and was sometimes taken by the bishop of one church to him of another in token of intercommunion.—Goar, Rit. Græc. p. 151.

Antígōnus (Ἀντίγονος, a frequent Greek name, signifying apparently against his parent), the name of two members of the Asmonean family.

1. A son of John Hyrcanus, and grandson of Simon Maccabæus. His brother, Aristobulus, made him his associate in the kingdom, but was at length prevailed upon by their common enemies to put him to death, B.C. 105 (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 18 and 19).

2. A son of Aristobulus (brother to Hyrcanus and Alexandra), sent as a prisoner to Rome, with his father and brother, by Pompey, who had taken Jerusalem. After remaining in Italy for some time, he returned to Judæa, and, after a variety of fortunes, was established king and high-priest, Herod being compelled to fly to Rome, B.C. 40. Having obtained assistance from Antony and Caesar, Herod returned, and, after a firm and protracted resistance on the part of Antigonus, retook Jerusalem and repossessed himself of the throne. Antigonus surrendered to Sosius, the Roman general, but he was carried to Antioch, and, at the solicitation of Herod, was there ignominiously put to death by Antony, B.C. 37. He was the last of the Maccabæan princes that sat on the throne of Judæa (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 13-16; Wars, i, 18, 3; Dio Cass. xlix, 22; respecting the date, see Wernsdorf, De ple Macc. p. 24; Ideler, Chronol. i, 399).—Calmet, s. v.

Antigua, a British West India island, of the Leeward group, which in 1848 had a population of 36,190 souls. It is the see of a bishop of the Church of England, whose diocese comprises, beyond Antigua, the British islands of St. Christopher's (population in 1848 23,127), Nevis (population in 1851 10,200), Barbuda (population 1600), Montserrat (population in 1850 7800), Dominica (population in 1842 18,291), Tortola (population in 1844 6689), Anguilla (population in 1844 2934), and the Danish islands St. Croix (population in 1850 23,720) and St. Thomas (population 13,666). The diocese had, in 1859, twenty-seven clergymen in the British islands (including two archdeacons-) and three in the Danish islands. See Clergy List for 1860 (Lond. 1860, 8vo). See AMERICA.

Antilegōmēna (ἀντιλεγόμενα, contradicted or disputed), an epithet applied by the early Christian writers to denote those books of the New Testament which, although known to all the ecclesiastical writers, and sometimes publicly read in the churches, were not for a considerable time admitted to be genuine, or received into the canon of Scripture. These books are so denominated in contradistinction to the homologoumena (ὁμολογούμενα), or universally acknowledged writings. The following is a catalogue of the Antilegōmēna: The Second Epistle of Peter; the Epistle of James; the Epistle of Jude; the Second and Third Epistles of John; the Apocalypse, or Revelation of John; the Epistle to the Hebrews.

The earliest notice which we have of this distinction is that contained in the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, who flourished A.D. 270-340. He seems to have formed a triple, or, as it appears to some, a quadruple division of the books of the New Testament, terming them—1, the homologoumena (received); 2, the antilegōmēna (controverted); 3, the notka (spurious); and 4, those which he calls the utterly spurious, as being not only spurious in the same sense as the former, but also absurd or impious. Among the spurious he reckons the Acts of Paul, the Shepherd of Hermas, the Revelation of Peter, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Instructions of the Apostles. He speaks doubtfully as to the class to which the Apocalypse belongs, for he himself includes it among the spurious: he then observes that some reject it, while others reckon it among the acknowledged writings (homologoumena). Among the spurious writings he also enumerates the Gospel according to the Hebrews. He adds, at the same time, that all these may be classed among the antilegōmēna. His account is consequently confused, not to say contradictory. Among the utterly spurious he reckons such books as the heretics brought forward under pretence of their being genuine productions of the apostles, such as the so-called Gospels of Peter, Thomas, and Matthias, and the Acts of Andrew, John, and the other apostles. These he distinguishes from the antilegōmēna, as being works which not one of the ancient ecclesiastical writers thought worthy of being cited. Their style he considers so remote from that of the apostles, and their contents so much at variance with the genuine doctrines of Scripture, as to show them to have been the inventions of heretics, and not worthy of a place even among the spurious writings. These latter he has consequently been supposed to have considered as the compositions of orthodox men, written with good intentions, but calculated by their titles to mislead the ignorant, who might be disposed to account them as apostolical productions, to which honor they had not even a dubious claim. (See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iii, 5, 25.) The same historian has also preserved the testimony of Origen, who, in his Commentary on John (cited by Eusebius), observes: "Peter, upon whom the Church of Christ is built, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail, has left one epistle undisputed; it may be, also, a second, but of this there is some doubt. What shall we say of him who reclined on the breast of Jesus, John, who has left one Gospel, in which he confesses that he could write so many that the whole world could not contain them? He also wrote the Apocalypse, being commanded to conceal, and not to write, the voices of the seven thunders. He has also left us an epistle consisting of very few lines (σπιχου); it may be also a second and third are from him, but all do not concur in their genuineness; both together do not contain a hundred stich" (for the signification of this word, see Christian Remembrancer, iii, 465 sq.). And again, in his Homilies, "The epistle with the title 'To the Hebrews' has not that peculiar style which belongs to an apostle who confesses that he is but rude in speech, that is, in his phraseology. But that this epistle is more pure Greek in the composition of its phrases, every one will confess who is able to discern the difference of style. Again, it will be obvious that the ideas of the apostle are admirable, and not inferior to any of the books acknowledged to be apostolical. Every one will confess the truth of this who attentively reads the apostle's writings. . . . I would say, that the thoughts are the apostle's, but that the diction and phraseology belong to some one who has recorded what the apostle has said, and as one who has noted down at his leisure what his master dictated. If, then, any Church considers this epistle as coming from Paul, let him be commended for this, for neither did these eminent men deliver it for this without cause; but who it was that really wrote the epistle God only knows. The account, however, that has been current before our time is, according to some, that Clement, who was bishop of Rome, wrote the epistle; according to others, that it was written by Luke, who wrote the Gospel and the Acts" (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi, 25).

Upon other occasions Origen expresses his doubts in regard to the antilegomena, as, where, in his commentary on John's Gospel, he speaks of the reputed (φασκουμένη) Epistle of James, and in his commentary on Matthew, where he uses the phrase, "If we acknowledge the Epistle of Jude;" and of the Second and Third Epistles of John he observes, that "all do not acknowledge them as genuine;" by which epithet, we presume, he means written by the person to whom they are ascribed. It is remarkable that Eusebius (ii, 23; iii, 25) classes the Epistle of James, the Acts of Paul, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Epistle of Barnabas, at one time with the spurious, and at another with the antilegomena. By the word spurious, in this instance at least, he can mean no more than that the genuineness of such books was disputed; as, for instance, the Gospel of the Hebrews, which was received by the Ebionites as a genuine production of the Evangelist Matthew. This is the work of which Jerome made a transcript, as he himself informs us, from the copy preserved by the zeal of Pamphilus in the Casarean Library. He also informs us that he translated it into Greek, and that it was considered by most persons as the original Gospel of Matthew (Dialog. contra Pelag. iii, 2, and Comment. in Matt. xii). Whether the Shepherd of Hermas was ever included among the antilegomena seems doubtful. Eusebius informs us that "it was disputed, and consequently not placed among the holographomena. By others, however, it is judged most necessary, especially to those who need an elementary introduction; hence we know that it has been already in public use in our churches, and I have also understood, by tradition, that some of the most ancient writers have made use of it" (iii, 3). Origen speaks of The Shepherd as "commonly used by the Church, but not received as divine by the unanimous consent of all." He therefore cites it, not as authority, but simply by way of illustration (lib. x, in Epist. ad Roman.). Eusebius further informs us that in his own time there were some in the Church of Rome who did not regard the Epistle to the Hebrews as the production of the Apostle Paul (vi, 25; iii, 3). Indeed, it was through the influence of Jerome that the Church of Rome, at a much later period, was with much difficulty brought to acknowledge it as canonical. "The most ancient Latin or Western Church did not rank it among the canonical writings, though the epistle was well known to them, for Clement of Rome has quoted from it many passages. It is true that some Latin writers in the fourth century received it, among whom was Jerome himself; yet even in the time of Jerome the Latin Church had not placed it among the canonical writings" (Marsh's Michaulis, iv, 266). "The reputed Epistle to the Hebrews," says Jerome, "is supposed not to be Paul's on account of the difference of style, but it is believed to have been written by Barnabas, according to Tertullian, or by Luke the Evangelist; according to others, by Clement, afterward bishop of the Roman Church, who is said to have reduced to order and embellished Paul's sentiments in his own language; or at least that Paul, in writing to the Hebrews, had purposely omitted all mention of his name, in consequence of the odium attached to it, and wrote to them eloquently in Hebrew, as a Hebrew of the Hebrews, and that what he thus eloquently wrote in Hebrew was still more eloquently written in Greek, and that this was the cause of the difference in style" (Ex Catalog.). And again, in his epistle to Dardanus, "I must acquaint our people that the epistle which is inscribed 'To the Hebrews' is acknowledged as the Apostle Paul's, not only by the Churches of the East, but by all the Greek ecclesiastical writers, although most [of the Latins] conceive it to be either written by Barnabas or Clement, and that it matters nothing by whom it was written, as it proceeds from a churchman (ecclesiastici viri), and is celebrated by being daily read in the churches. But if the custom of the Latins does not receive it among canonical Scriptures, nor the Greek Churches the Apocalypse of St. John, I, notwithstanding, receive them both, not following the custom of the present age, but the authority of ancient writers; not referring to them as they are in the habit of doing with respect to apocryphal writings, and citations from classical and profane authors, but as canonical and ecclesiastical." "Peter also," says Jerome, "wrote two epistles called Catholic; the second of which is denied by most on account of the difference of style (Ex Catalog.). Jude is rejected by most in consequence of the citation from the apocryphal book of Enoch. Notwithstanding, it has authority by use and antiquity, and is accounted among the Holy Scriptures" (Ibid.); and in his Letter to Paulinus: "Paul wrote to seven churches, but the Epistle to the Hebrews is by most excluded from the number;" and in his commentary on Isaiah, he observes that "the Latin usage does not receive the Epistle to the Hebrews among the canonical books." Contemporary with Jerome was his antagonist Rufinus, who reckons fourteen epistles of Paul, two of Peter, one of James, three of John, and the Apocalypse.

It seems doubtful whether, antecedent to the times of Jerome and Rufinus, any councils, even of single churches, had settled upon the canon of Scripture, and decided the question respecting the antilegomena, for the removal of doubts among their respective communities; for it seems evident that the general or œcumenical council of Nice, which met in the year 325, formed no catalogue. The first catalogue, indeed, which has come down to us is that of an anonymous writer of the third century. He reckons thirteen epistles of Paul, accounts the Epistle to the Hebrews the work of an Alexandrian Marcionite, mentions the Epistle of Jude, two of John, and the revelations of John and Peter, saying, with respect to them, that "some among us are opposed to their being read in the church" (see Hug's Introduction, § xiv). But soon after the council of Nice public opinion turned gradually in favor of the antilegomena, or controverted books; for we then find them for the first time cited without any marks of doubt as to their canonicity. Thus, in the year 348, Cyril of Jerusalem enumerates fourteen epistles of Paul and seven Catholic epistles. Gregory of Nazianzus, who, according to Cave (Historia Literaria), was born about the time of the Nicene Council, and died in 389, enumerates all the books now received except the Apocalypse. Epiphanius, who was chosen bishop of Constantia in A.D. 367 or 368, and composed his catalogue of ecclesiastical writers in 392, cites, in his Panarion, the different books of the New Testament in a manner which shows that he received all that are in the present canon. Of the Apocalypse he says that it was "generally or by most received;" and, speaking of the Alogians, who rejected all John's writings, he observes, "If they had rejected the Apocalypse only, it might have been supposed that they had acted from a nice critical judgment, as being circumspect in regard to an apocryphal or mysterious book; but to reject all John's writings was a sign of an anti-Christian spirit." Amphilochius also, bishop of Iconium, in Lycaonia, who was contemporary with Epiphanius, and is supposed to have died soon after the year 394, after citing the fourteen epistles of Paul, in his Iambics, adds, "But some say the Epistle to the Hebrews is spurious, not speaking correctly, for it is a genuine gift. Then the Catholic epistles, of which some receive seven, others only three, one of James, one of Peter, one of John; while others receive three of John, two of Peter, and Jude's. The Revelation of John is approved by some, while many say it is spurious." The eighty-fifth of the Apostolical Canons, a work falsely ascribed to Clement of Rome, but written at latest in the fourth century, enumerates fourteen epistles of Paul, one of Peter, three of John, one of James, one of Jude, two of Clement, and the (so-called) Apostolical Constitutions, among the canonical books of Scripture. This latter book, adds the pseudo-Clement, it is not fit to publish before all, "because of the mysteries contained in it." The first council that is supposed to have given a list of the canonical books is the much agitated council of Laodicea, supposed to have been held about the year 360 or 364 by thirty or forty bishops of Lydia and the neighboring parts; but the fifty-ninth article, which gives a catalogue of the canonical books, is not generally held to be genuine. Its genuineness, indeed, has been questioned by both Roman Catholic and Protestant historians. In his Introduction to the Old Testament Jahn refers to this canon as the work of "an anonymous framer." Among the canonical books included in the pretended fifty-ninth canon of this council are the seven Catholic epistles, viz., one of James, two of Peter, three of John, one of Jude; fourteen of Paul, in the following order, viz., Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, Hebrews, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, and Philemon. The Apocalypse is not named. Jerome and Augustine, whose opinions had great influence in settling the canon of Scripture, essentially agreed in regard to the books of the New Testament. St. Augustine was present in the year 393 at the council of Hippo, which drew up a catalogue of all the books of Scripture, agreeing in all points, so far as the New Testament was concerned, with the canon universally received, with the exception, perhaps, of the Hebrews, for the ancient doubt still appears through the wording of the acts of this council. They commence with enumerating only thirteen epistles of Paul, and then add "one, by the same author, to the Hebrews." They then mention two of Peter, three of John, one of James, and the Apocalypse, with a proviso that the churches beyond the sea be consulted with respect to this canon. And to the same effect the council of Carthage, held in the year 397, having adopted the same catalogue, the bishops assembled in council add, "But let this be known to our brother and fellow-priest (consacerdoti) Boniface [bishop of Rome], or to the other bishops of those parts, that we have received those [books] from the fathers to be read in the church." The same catalogue is repeated in the epistle of Innocent I, bishop of Rome, to St. Exupere, bishop of Toulouse, in the year 404, which, by those who acknowledge its genuineness, is looked upon as a confirmation of the decrees of Hippo and Carthage. It was still more formally confirmed in the Roman synod presided over by Pope Gelasius in 494, "if, indeed," to use the words of the learned Roman Catholic Jahn, "the acts of this synod are genuine" (see his Introduction). But, however this may be, the controversy had now nearly subsided, and the antilegomena were henceforward put on a par with the acknowledged books, and took their place beside them in all copies of the Scriptures. Indeed, subsequently to the eras of the councils of Hippo and Carthage, we hear but a solitary voice raised here and there against the genuineness of the antilegomena. Theodore, bishop of Mopsuestia, for instance, the celebrated Syrian commentator and preacher, who died about A.D. 428, is accused by Leo of Byzantium of having "abrogated and antiquated the Epistle of James, and afterward other Catholic epistles" (see Canisii Thesaurus, i, 577). And Cosmas Indicopleustes, so called from the voyage which he made to India about the year 535 to 547, in his Christian Topography, has the following observations in reference to the authority of these books: "I forbear to allege arguments from the Catholic epistles, because from ancient times the Church has looked upon them as of doubtful authority. . . . Eusebius Pamphilus, in his Ecclesiastical History, says that at Ephesus there are two monuments, one of John the Evangelist, and another of John, an elder, who wrote two of the Catholic epistles, the second and third inscribed after this manner, 'The elder to the elect lady,' and 'The elder to the beloved Gaius,' and both he and Irenæus say that but two are written by the apostles, the first of Peter, and the first of John. . . . Among the Syrians are found only the three before mentioned, viz., the Epistle of James, the Epistle of Peter, and the Epistle of John; they have not the rest. It does not become a perfect Christian to confirm any thing by doubtful books, when the books in the Testament acknowledged by all (homologoumena) have sufficiently declared all things to be known about the heavens, and the earth, and the elements, and all Christian doctrine."

The most ancient Greek manuscripts which have come down to our times contain the Antilegomena. From this circumstance it is extremely probable that the copies from which they were transcribed were written after the controversies respecting their canonicity had subsided. The Alexandrian manuscript in the British Museum (now generally admitted to have been written in the fourth or early in the fifth century) contains all the books now commonly received, together with some others, with a table of contents, in which they are cited in the following order: "Seven Catholic epistles, fourteen of Paul, the Revelation of John, the First Epistle of Clement, the Second Epistle of Clement, and the Psalms of Solomon (which latter have, however, been lost from the MS.)." (It is observable that Eusebians classes the First Epistle of Clement among the Homologoumena, or universally-received books; but by this he probably meant no more than that it was acknowledged by all to be the genuine work of Clement.) The order of all the epistles is the same as in our modern Bibles, except that the Epistle to the Hebrews is placed after the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians. In the Vatican manuscript B, which, in respect of antiquity, disputes the precedence with the Alexandrian, the Apocalypse is wanting, but it contains the remaining antilegomena. (The omission of this last book may be owing simply to the loss of the last part of the codex, in consequence of which the concluding chapters of the Hebrews, and the whole of 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, and Philemon are likewise missing.) The Syrian canon of the New Testament did not include all the antilegomena. All the manuscripts of the Syrian version (the Peshito, a work of the second century) which have come down to us omit the Second Epistle of Peter, the Second and Third of John, that of Jude, and the Apocalypse. Nor are these books received to this day either by the Jacobite or Nestorian Christians. These are all wanting in the Vatican and Medicean copies, written in the years 548 and 586, and in the beautiful manuscript of the Peshito, preserved in the British Museum, and the writing of which was concluded at the monastery of Bethkoki, A.D. 768, on 197 leaves of vellum, in the Estrangelo character.

In the inquiring age immediately preceding the Reformation the controversy respecting the antilegomena was revived, especially by Erasmus and Cardinal Cajetan; by the latter, however, upon principles so questionable as to expose him to the charge of assailing the authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews with the same weapons which the Emperor Julian had employed to impugn the authority of Matthew's Gospel. The doubts thus raised were in a great measure silenced by the decree of the council of Trent, although there have not been wanting learned Roman Catholic divines since this period who have ventured to question at least the Pauline authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews. It is well known that Luther, influenced in this instance not so much by historicocritical as by dogmatical views, called the Epistle of James "an epistle of straw" (epistola straminea). He also wished the antilegomena to be distinguished from the other books in his translation of the Bible. In consequence of this, the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistles of James and Jude, and the Apocalypse have no numbers attached to them in the German copies of the Bible up to the middle of the seventeenth century; and it is observed by Tholuck (Commentary on Hebrews, in Biblical Cabinet) that "the same plan should have been adopted with respect to second Peter and second and third John, but it did not seem proper to detach them from the Homologoumena which belonged to them. Thus he wished at the same time to point out what were the "right noble chief books of Scripture." We are informed by Father Paul Sarpi (Hist. of the Council of Trent, bk. ii, ch. xliii, t. i, p. 235; and ch. xlvi, p. 240) that one of the charges collected from the writings of Luther in this council was "that no books should be admitted into the canon of the Old Testament which were not in the canon of the Jews, and that from the New should be excluded the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistle of James, the Second Epistle of Peter, the Second and Third of John, and the Apocalypse." Tholuck states that the "Evangelical Churches, both Lutheran and Reformed, adopted the same canon with respect to the New Testament as that of the council of Trent" (Comment. on Heb. vol. i, Introd., ch. i, § 3, note b). Some, or all, of the antilegomena have been again impugned in recent times, especially in Germany. See each in its place. —Kitto, s. v. Compare CASON (of Scripture).

Antilibanus (Ἀντιλίβανος, opposite Libanus, Judith i, 7), the eastern of the two great parallel ridges of mountains that enclose the valley of Cæle-Syria proper (Strabo, xvi, 754; Ptol. v, 15, § 8; Pliny, v, 20). It is now called Jebel esh-Shurki. The Hebrew name of Libanon (Sept. Λιβανός, Vulg. Libanus), which signifies "whitish," from the gray color of the limestone, comprehends the two ranges of Libanus and Antilibanus, as they are distinguished in classical usage. The general direction of the Antilibanon range is from north-east to south-west. Nearly opposite Damascus it bifurcates into diverging ridges; the easternmost of these, the HERMON of the O. T. (Jebel esh-Sheilh), continues its south-west course, and attains, in its greatest elevation, a point about 10,000 feet above the sea. The other ridge takes a more westerly course, is long and low, and at length unites with the other bluffs and spurs of Libanus. The former of these branches was called by the Sidonians Sirion, and by the Amorites Shenir (Deut. iii, 9), both names signifying "a coat of mail" (Rosenmüller, Alther. ii, 235). In Deuteronomy (iv, 9) it is called Mount Sion, "an elevation." In the later books (Cant. iv, 8; 1 Chron. v, 23) Shenir is distinguished from Hermon properly so called; and in its Arabic form, Sanir, this was applied, in the Middle Ages, to Antilibanus, north of Hermon (Abulfeda, Tab. Syr. p. 164). The geological formations seem to belong to the Upper Jura classification of rocks, oolite and Jura dolomite prevailing. The poplar is characteristic of its vegetation. The outlying promontories, in common with those of Libanus, supplied the Phœnicians with abundance of timber for ship-building.—Grote, Hist. of Greece, iii, 358; Ritter, Erdkunde, XV, ii, 156 sq., 495; Raumer, Paläst. p. 29-35; Burekhardt, Syria; Robinson, Researches, iii, 344, 345. Antimensium (from ἀντι, instead of, and mensa, a table), a consecrated table-cloth, occasionally used in the Greek Church in places where there was no altar. It answers to the Latin altare portabile, or portable altar. The origin of this cloth is said to be the following: When the bishop consecrated a church, a cloth, which had been spread on the ground and over the communion-table, was torn in pieces and distributed among the priests, who carried away each a fragment to serve to cover the tables in their churches and chapels; not that it was necessary such cloths should be laid on all tables, but only on those which either were not consecrated or whose consecration was doubtful.

Antinomians (from ἀντι, against, and νόμος, the law), those who reject the moral law as not binding upon Christians. Some go farther than this, and say that good works hinder salvation, and that a child of God cannot sin; that the moral law is altogether abrogated as a rule of life; that no Christian believeth or worketh any good, but that Christ only believeth and worketh, etc. Wesley defines Antinomianism as "the doctrine which makes void the law through faith." Its root lies in a false view of the atonement; its view of the imputation of Christ's righteousness implies that he performs for men the obedience which they ought to perform, and therefore that God, in justice, can demand nothing further from man. As consequences of this doctrine, Antinomianism affirms that Christ abolished the moral law; that Christians are therefore not obliged to observe it; that a believer is not obliged to use the ordinances, and is freed from "the bondage of good works;" and that preachers ought not to exhort men unto good works: not unbelievers, because it is hurtful; nor believers, because it is needless (Wesley, Works, v, 196).

1. Antinomianism, i. e. faith without works, is one of the forms of error against which the Epistle of James is directed, showing that even in the apostolic age it had made its appearance. So the tract of

2. But the full development of Antinomianism is due to John Agricola († 1566), one of the early coadjutors of Luther. See AGRICOLA. Some of the expressions of Luther and Melancthon, as to justification and the law, in the arduous of their controversy with Rome, were hasty and extravagant: e. g. Luther declared that "in the new covenant there is no longer a constraining and forcing law; and that those who must be scared and driven by laws are unworthy the name of Christians" (Luther, Werke, Walch's ed. xviii, 1855). So, in his writings against the Zwickau enthusiasts, he was hasty enough to say, "These teachers of sin annoy us with Moses; we do not wish to see or hear Moses; for Moses was given to the Jews, not to us Gentiles and Christians; we have our Gospel and New Testament; they wish to make Jews of us through Moses; but they shall not" (Werke, xx, 203). Melancthon (Locæ Communes, 1st ed. by Augusti, p. 127) declares that "it must be admitted that the Decalogue is abrogated." But these unguarded expressions did not set forth the real views of Luther and Melancthon. So, in the "Instructions to the Pastors of the Saxon Electorate" (1527), it was enjoined that "all pastors must teach and enforce diligently the ten commandments, and not only the commandments themselves, but also the penalties which God has affixed to the violation of them." Agricola saw in these instructions what he thought was a backsliding from the true doctrine of justification by faith only, and charged Luther and Melancthon bitterly with dereliction in faith and doctrine. He affirmed that the Decalogue is not binding on Christians, and that true repentance comes, not from preaching the law, but by faith. Luther confuted Agricola, who professed to retract at Torgau (1527); but Melancthon remarked that "Agricola was not convinced, but overborne" (Corpus Reformatorum, i, 914). Accordingly, in 1537, when Agricola was established at Wittenberg, he wrote a number of propositions, published anonymously, under the title Positiones inter fratres sparsæ, on the nature of repentance and its relations to faith, in which his heresy was taught again, even in language so extreme as the following: "Art thou steeped in sin—an adulterer or a thief? If thou believest, thou art in salvation. All who follow Moses must go to the Devil; to the gallows with Moses." After a while Agricola confessed the authorship of these theses; and Luther replied in a series of disputations (Werke, Walch, xx, 2034; ed. Altenb. vii, 310 sq.), in which he refuted the doctrines of Agricola, but dealt gently with him personally. Finding mildness of no avail, Luther attacked Agricola violently in 1539 and 1540, classing him with the Anabaptist fanatics, and calling him very hard names. About this time Agricola had a call to Berlin, retracted again, and was reconciled to Luther (Dec. 9, 1540). He continued, however, to be violently attacked by Flacius. After the death of Agricola, Antinomian opinions were in particular advocated in Germany by Amsdorf (q. v.), who maintained that good works are an obstacle to salvation, and by Otto of Nordhausen, who repeated the opinions of Agricola. In the Fornula Concordiæ (pt. ii, cap. v, § 11) we find the following condemnation of these heresies: "Et juste damnatur Antinomi adversarii legis, qui prædicationem legis ex ecclesia expulsiunt et affirmant, non ex lege, sed ex solo Evangelio peccat à arguenda et contritionem docendum esse."

3. Similar sentiments were maintained in England during the protectorate of Oliver Cromwell, especially by his chaplain Saltmarsh, and some of the so-called "sectaries," who expressly maintained that, as the elect cannot fall from grace nor forfeit the divine favor, the wicked actions they commit are not really sinful, nor to be considered as instances of their violation of the divine law; and that, consequently, they have no occasion either to confess their sins or to break them off by repentance.

4. Antinomianism arose also, in the 17th century, from ultra-Calvinism, especially as taught by Dr. Crisp († 1642). It is true he acknowledges that, "In respect of the rules of righteousness, or the matter of obedience, we are under the law still, or else," as he adds, "we are lawless, to live every man as seems good in his own eyes, which no true Christian dares so much as think of." The following sentiments, however, among others, are taught in his sermons: "The law is cruel and tyrannical, requiring what is naturally impossible." "The sins of the elect were so imputed to Christ, as that, though he did not commit them, yet they became actually his transgressions, and ceased to be theirs." "The feelings of conscience, which tell them that sin is theirs, arise from a want of knowing the truth." "It is but the voice of a lying spirit in the hearts of believers that saith they have yet sin wasting their consciences, and lying as a burden too heavy for them to bear." "Christ's righteousness is so imputed to the elect, that they, ceasing to be sinners, are as righteous as he was, and all that he was." "An elect person is not in a condemned state while an unbeliever; and should he happen to die before God calls him to believe, he would not be lost." "Repentance and confession of sin are not necessary to forgiveness. A believer may certainly conclude before confession, yea, as soon as he hath committed sin, the interest he hath in Christ, and the love of Christ embracing him" (Crisp, Works, ii, 261-272; Orme, Life of Baxter, ii, 232).

This form of High Calvinism, or Antinomianism, absolutely "withers and destroys the consciousness of human responsibility. It confounds moral with natural impotency, forgetting that the former is a crime, the latter only a misfortune; and thus treats the man dead in trespasses and sins as if he were already in his grave. It prophesies smooth things to the sinner going on in his transgressions, and soothes to slumber and the repose of death the souls of such as are at ease in Zion. It assumes that, because men can neither believe, repent, nor pray acceptably, unless aided by the grace of God, it is useless to call upon them to do so. It maintains that the Gospel is only intended for elect sinners, and therefore it ought to be preached to none but such. In defiance, therefore, of the command of God, it refuses to preach the glad tidings of mercy to every sinner. In opposition to Scripture, and to every rational consideration, it contends that it is not man's duty to believe the truth of God—justifying the obvious inference that it is not a sin to reject it. In short, its whole tendency is to produce an impression on the sinner's mind that, if he is not saved, it is not his fault, but God's; that, if he is condemned, it is more for the glory of the Divine Sovereignty than as the punishment of his guilt. So far from regarding the moral cure of human nature as the great object and design of the Gospel, Antinomianism does not take it in at all, but as it exists in Christ, and becomes ours by a figure of speech. It regards the grace and the pardon as every thing, the spiritual design or effect as nothing. Hence its opposition to progressive, and its zeal for imputed sanctification: the former is intelligible and tangible, but the latter a mere figment of the imagination. Hence its delight in expatiating on the eternity of the Divine decrees, which it does not understand, but which serve to amuse and to deceive, and its dislike to all the sober realities of God's present dealings and commands. It exults in the contemplation of a Christ who is a kind of concretion of all the moral attributes of his people; to the overlooking of that Christ who is the Head of all that in heaven and on earth bear his likeness, and while unconscious of possessing it. It boasts in the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints, while it believes in no saint but one, that is Jesus, and neglects to persevere' (Orme's Life of Baxter, ii, 243).

The chief English writers of the 17th century who have been charged as favoring Antinomianism, besides Crisp, are Richardson, Saltmarsh, Hussey, Eaton, Town, etc. These were answered by Gataker, Witsius, Bull, Ridgely, and especially by Baxter and Williams. For Baxter's relation to the controversy, see Orme, Life of Baxter, vol. ii, chap. ix, where it is stated that "Baxter saw only the commencement of the controversy, which agitated the Dissenters for more than seven years after he had gone to his rest (+ 1691). He was succeeded by his friend Dr. Williams (+ 1716), who, after incredible exertion and no small suffering, finally cleared the ground of the Antinomians."

In the eighteenth century Antinomianism again showed itself, both in the Church of England and among the Dissenters, as an offshoot of what was called High Calvinism. Its most powerful opponents were John Fletcher, in his Checks to Antinomianism (Works, N. Y. ed. 4 vols. 8vo) and John Wesley, Works (N. Y. ed. 7 vols. 8vo). The error of Antinomianism lies chiefly in the sharp contrast which it draws between the law and the Gospel. Wesley saw this, and dwells, in many parts of his writings, on the relation and connection of law and Gospel. We give an instance: "There is no contrariety at all between the law and the Gospel. Indeed, neither of them supersedes the other, but they agree perfectly well together. Yea, the very same words, considered in different respects, are parts both of the law and of the Gospel. If they are considered as commandments, they are parts of the law; if as promises, of the Gospel. Thus, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart,' when considered as a commandment, is a branch of the law; when regarded as a promise, is an essential part of the Gospel—the Gospel being no other than the commands of the law proposed by way of promise. There is, therefore, the closest connection that can be conceived between the law and the Gospel. On the one hand, the law continually makes way for, and points us to the Gospel; on the other, the Gospel continually leads us to a more exact fulfilling of the law. The law, for instance, requires us to love God, to love our neighbor, to be meek, humble, or holy. We feel that we are not sufficient for these things; yea, that 'with man this is impossible.' But we see a promise of God to give us that love. We lay hold of this Gospel, of these glad tidings; it is done unto us according to our faith: and 'the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in us' through faith which is in Christ Jesus. The moral law, contained in the Ten Commandments, and enforced by the prophets, Christ did not take away. It was not the design of his coming to revoke any part of this. This is a law which never can be broken, which 'stands fast as the faithful witness in heaven.' The moral stands on an entirely different foundation from the ceremonial or ritual law, which was only designed for a temporary restraint upon a disobedient and stiff-necked people; whereas this was from the beginning of the world, being written, not in tables of stone, but on the hearts of all men" (Sermons, i, 17, and 223). The heresy showed itself at a later period, especially through the influence of Dr. Robert Hawker (q. v.), vicar of Charles the Martyr, Plymouth, who was a very popular preacher, and "poisoned the surrounding region" with Antinomian tendencies. Against him, Joseph Cottle wrote Strictures on the Plymouth Antinomians, and Burt, Observations on Hawker's System of Theology. See Robert Hall, Works (N. Y. ii, 458); Bennett, History of the Dissenters, p. 344. A full account of the Antinomians of the Crispian type, and of the controversy about it, is given in Nelson, Life of Bishop Bull (vol. vii of Bull's Works, ed. of 1827).
